

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

UNIFORM WITH THE PRESENT WORK.

A DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES. THE HISTORY, INSTITUTIONS, and ANTIQUITIES of the CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By VARIOUS WRITERS. Edited by WM. SMITH, D.C.L., and ARCHDEACON CHEETHAM, D.D. With Illustrations. 2 vols. Medium 8vo. 3*l*. 13*s*. 6*d*.

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE: ITS ANTIQUITIES, BIOGRAPHY, GEOGRAPHY, and NATURAL HISTORY. By VARIOUS WRITERS. Edited by WM. SMITH, D.C.L. With Illustrations. 3 vols. Medium 8vo. 5*l*. 5*s*.

DR. WM. SMITH'S ANCIENT ATLAS.

AN ATLAS OF ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY, BIBLICAL and CLASSICAL, intended to illustrate the above works. Compiled under the superintendence of Dr. WM. SMITH and Sir GEORGE GROVE. With Descriptive Text, giving the Sources and Authorities, Indices, &c. With 43 Maps, folio, half-bound. 6*l*. 6*s*.

"The students of Dr. Wm. Smith's admirable Dictionaries must have felt themselves again and again brought up short for want of an Atlas constructed on the same scale of precise and minute information with the article they were reading. This want has been supplied by the superb work before us. The indices are full, the engraving is exquisite, and the delineation of the natural features very minute and beautiful. It may safely be pronounced—and higher praise can scarcely be bestowed—to be a worthy companion of a series of familiar volumes which it is intended to illustrate."—The Guardian.

PREFACE TO VOL. II.

IN publishing another volume the Editors have to explain that it has been found desirable to extend the work to four volumes. They felt that the value of a Dictionary of early Christian Biography would depend both upon the completeness of its onomasticon, and upon its thorough discussion of the greater names. It became apparent, as they proceeded, that to attain these objects a larger space would be required than was at first contemplated, and the liberality of the publisher has allowed them the space necessary to carry out their design. Although the present volume terminates with HERMOCRATES, it will be found that, for the special purposes of the Christian Biography of the first eight centuries, one half of the Alphabet has practically been treated. A remarkable number of the important names in Church History occur in the early letters. This volume, for instance, contains articles which are necessarily of exceptional length on such names as Eusebius of Caesarea, Gnosticism, the Gregories of the East and the West, Ephraim the Syrian, Epiphanius, the Apocryphal Gospels, the Hebrew Learning of the Fathers, and Hermas; while Anglo-Saxon names commencing with the letter E are peculiarly numerous. There will consequently be no difficulty in completing the work within the limits now prescribed to it.

In reference to this extension of the book, the Editors feel that it is but justice to the generous labours of the contributors to call attention to the original research which has been bestowed upon it and to the scientific purpose which has been kept in view. The first volume was very kindly received; but some further explanation of the design and character of the undertaking seems still due to the distinguished English and Foreign scholars who have co-operated in it. In combination with the DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES, the book will be found to be unique in the comprehensiveness with which the whole sphere of Christian life during the first eight centuries has been treated. It has been compared with the valuable German cyclopaedias of Herzog and of Wetzer and Welte. But in the first place it is an attempt, to which those works make no pretension, to notice every name connected with the history of the early Church; and though many such names may be insignificant in themselves, they are frequently of considerable importance in determining critical difficulties which arise in respect to the greater personages. It sometimes happens, for example, that exact knowledge respecting some obscure name which is mentioned by two writers may throw important light on their relations to each other. The information, moreover, furnished by these minor articles is often precisely that which a student finds it most difficult to obtain, and the minute points they illustrate in Church History are sometimes very characteristic. But a not less important difference between this work and the foreign cyclopaedias which have preceded it will at once be seen if reference be made to a few of the more important articles. The subjects of such articles will be found to be treated not merely with independence and originality, but with a fulness which no modern work has attempted. Since, indeed, the Cyclopaedias just mentioned survey the whole range of religious history, from its commencement to the present time, it would have been impracticable for them to enter with any fulness of detail into the history of the first eight centuries. From this point of view it is hoped that this Dictionary may serve to remove a reproach which has not unfrequently been cast upon Protestant learning, and for which it must be admitted that there has hitherto been some ground. Since the admirable work of Cave, the subjects of Patrology, and of early Christian life and literature, have been less comprehensively treated among us than is their due. The present work, however, will supply a greater mass of materials for the history of the early centuries of the Church, together with a more complete application to them of the resources of modern learning and criticism, than is anywhere else accessible; and the credit may, therefore, without presumption, be claimed for it of being, at least in design and effort, the most important contribution to Church History which, either in this country or abroad, has been made for many years.

In dismissing a second volume, the Editors have again to express their gratitude for the ready and cordial co-operation they have received; but their acknowledgments are pre-eminently due to two distinguished scholars, to whose generous assistance the work is peculiarly indebted. Dr. Salmon, the Regius Professor of Divinity in Trinity College, Dublin, and Canon Stubbs, the Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford, have not only written numerous and important articles, but have had the goodness to read the proofs of this volume. They are of course in no way responsible for the final result of the Editors' labours; but their suggestions have been of the greatest service. The Editors must also express their continued obligations to the Rev. Charles Hole, Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History in King's College, London, for the constant devotion with which he has assisted them, and for the invaluable learning and labour he has bestowed upon the work.

CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY, LITERATURE, SECTS, AND DOCTRINES.

EABA (1), EABAE, a daughter of Eanfrith, brother of Eanhere, under-kings or ealdormen of the Hwicci, and wife of Ethelwalch, king of the South Saxons (d. 685). She was baptized in her brother's dominions, and, with her husband, who received Christianity about 661 under the influence of Wulfhere, king of the Mercians, encouraged Wilfrid in 681 to attempt the conversion of the South Saxons. Nothing more is known of Eaba, but from the name of her father Eanfrith, her friendship with Wilfrid, and the connexion between the Hwiccian princes and the royal house of Northumbria, she was probably nearly related to St. Ebba, abbess of Coldingham. (Bede, H. E. iv. 13; Edd. V. Wulf. c. 40.) [S.]

EABA (2), an abbat of Malmesbury in the 8th century. His name occurs among the memorials of St. Boniface, in a letter addressed by a monk unnamed [HERECA] to Lullus of Mainz. In this the writer reminds Lullus of their ancient friendship "in Maldubia civitate, quando Eaba abbas in amabili caritate nutrit te;" and calls to his recollection that Eaba had given him the name of "Lytel." (Mon. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, p. 300; Bonif. Epp. ed. Würdtwein, ep. 123.) No such name occurs in the received, but very imperfect lists of the abbats of Malmesbury. (W. Malmesb. G. P. lib. v.; Monast. Angl. i. 255.) There is, however, in the list recently discovered by Mr. W. de G. Birch in the Cotton MS. Vitellius A. 10 (Birch, Abbats of Malmesbury, pp. 6, 39), an abbat Acambriht, who may be identical with Eaba, and with an abbat Eanberht, who, between 755 and 757 had a charter from Ethelbald of Mercia, and Cynewulf of Wessex. [EANBERHTA.] However this may have been, as Lullus must have been over thirty when in 754 he was made bishop, and as according to his biographers he was seven years old when he was admitted into the monastery (Vit. S. Lulli, ap. Surium, Oct. 16), Eaba's date at Malmesbury must fall about 730. [S.]

EABBA (Kemble, C. D. 37; Thorn, in Twysd. ed. 1770; Elmham, pp. 233, 234, ed. Hardwick), abbat. [EORMENBURH.] [C. H.]

CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. II.

EADBALD

EADA, presbyter, a valued friend of Alcuin, who thanks him for presents, and praises his munificence towards him. Alcuin says his bark has been hurried along by gales into the vortex of wealth, and he envies Eada his chosen life of poverty, where he would gladly follow him according to his own earliest bent. Mabillon concludes that Eada was a monk. The editors of the Monumenta Alcuiniana have no doubt that the epistle addressed to him was written before Alcuin went to preside over his abbey at Tours and they suggest the date A.D. 796. (Mon. Alcuin. ep. 47, ed. Jaffé, p. 269; Alcuin, Opp. ed. Froben. i. 201, ep. 140; Mabill. Annal. Ord. S. Ben. lib. xxvii. c. 31.) [C. H.]

EADBALD (1) (AUDUVALD, Bed. H. E. ii. 8; AUDUBALD, ib. ii. 10, 11; AEODBALD, ib. ii. 6, tit. 7, 9; AEDBOLD, Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 616; Hen. Hunt. ii. in M. H. B. 715, c; AETHELBALD, Flor. Wig. ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 627), son of Ethelbert, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Kent in the February of 616. He "had not only," in his father's lifetime, "refused to receive the faith of Christ," but after his death conformed to a custom which was almost a law among the heathen nations (see Kemble, Saxon Engl. ii. 407) by marrying his widowed stepmother. He seems to have been afflicted by fits of insanity or violent excitement, which Bede regards as Divine rebukes (ii. 5). His kinsmen, the three sons of Sabert of Essex, who had succeeded their father, drove out Mellitus, bishop of London, who came to Canterbury, where he, Justus of Rochester, and archbishop Laurentius held a consultation, and resolved on returning to Italy. The two former acted on this resolution, and that night, according to the Canterbury story, as it came down to Bede, Laurentius, left alone, prepared his bed in the church of the monastery of SS. Peter and Paul, and while he slept was rebuked, and even scourged by St. Peter for having so much as purposed to desert his flock; in the morning he hastened to Eadbald and shewed the marks of this mysterious castigation. "Who has dared," asked the king, "thus to treat a person of your dignity?" Laurentius improved the occasion by his answering with such effect that Eadbald was overawed and converted. This is the tale; it has been suggested that originally it was only a story of a dream, and that the corporal inflictions were a later addition to it; in that case Eadbald must have been impressed by Laurentius's account of the dream, and by that only. The other alternative is to suppose that Laurentius stooped to a fraud for the purpose of making a salutary impression on the self-willed pagan prince. Whatever was the cause of Eadbald's change, it was most thorough and practical. He broke off his unlawful "connubium" (Bede, ii. 6), "renounced all manner of idolatry, accepted the faith, was baptized, and took pains in all things to consult for and promote the interests of the church, to the utmost of his power." He sent to Gaul, and recalled Mellitus and Justus; the latter returned in peace to Rochester, but the Londoners would not receive the former, and Eadbald, not having inherited his father's overlordship, was unable to constrain them. What he could do he did; "in union with his own people," he studied to devote himself to the divine precepts. He built a chapel of the Virgin within the monastery of SS. Peter and Paul. He is said to have founded a nunnery at Folkestone for his daughter Eanswitha, who became the local saint of the place. The venerable church within the precincts of Dover Castle is thought to be substantially a work of his reign (see Freeman, Norm. Conq. iii. 939). But he did not enforce the abandonment or destruction of idols (cf. Bede, iii. 8). When Edwin, who had recently gained possession of the throne of Northumbria, sent envoys to ask the hand of Eadbald's sister Ethelburga—called Tata in her own family as a name of endearment—her brother answered firmly, that he could not allow a Christian maiden to be wedded to a heathen husband. The envoys reported this refusal to Edwin, who sent them back with the assurance that he would in no wise hinder Ethelburga from the practice of her own religion; on the contrary, he would freely permit both herself and her attendants, male and female, to worship as Christians, and would even himself adopt their faith, if, on inquiry, it should seem better to wise men "holier and worthier of God." On these terms Eadbald consented to the marriage in 625, and sent with her on her journey northwards Paulinus, consecrated by archbishop Justus, in the episcopate, in the hope that he might act not only as her spiritual guide, but as a missionary bishop in Northumbria. When Edwin fell in the battle of Hatfield, and Ethelburga and Paulinus returned to Kent, Eadbald established the latter in the vacant see of Rochester (Bede, ii. 20). This was in the close of 633; Eadbald lived seven years longer, and died in 640, "leaving his kingdom to his son Eadcombert" (Bede, iii. 8). For a Cottonian MS. referring to Eadbald, see Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 259. [W. B.]

EADBALD (2), an ealdorman, whose name (printed Facuualdus by the Magdeburg Centuriators) appears among the witan, who approved the acts of the legatine council held in southern England in 787. He is identified by Jaffé with the ealdorman Eadbald, who attested Mercian charters from 777 onwards. (Kemble, C. D. i. 159, 167, 170; Mon. Alcuin. p. 162; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 462.) [S.]

EADBALD (3) (AEDBOLDUS, F. Wig. M. H. B. 546), the twelfth bishop of London in the ancient lists. (M. H. B. 617.) As his name occurs between those of Kenwalch, who was bishop in 793, and Heathoberht, who attested grants in 798 and 799, he is no doubt to be identified with the bishop Eadbald, who, according to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, went away from the land in the year of Offa's death, 796. (M. H. B. 338.) [S.]

EADBALD (4) (Reyner, Discept. Hist. de Antiq. Ord. Bened. in Angl. Duac. 1626; Alford, Annal. Eccles. Angl. ann. 804, t. iii. p. 14; Alcuin, Opp. ed. Froben. i. 23, 284 notes), abbat of Jarrow. [ETHELBALD (2).] [C. H.]

EADBALT (Gaimar, Estoria v. 1273, M. H. B. 780), king of Kent. [EADBALD (1).] [C. H.]

EADBERCT. [EADBERHT, EADBERT.]

EADBERHT (1) (Kemble, C. D. 72, A.D. 724, brother of Ethelbert king of Kent; C. D. 85, A.D. 738; 1003, A.D. 741; 1004, A.D. 747), king of Kent. [EADBERT (2).] [C. H.]

EADBERHT (2) (Kemble, C. D. 106, A.D. 761; 107, A.D. 761; 110, A.D. 762, all doubtful), king of Kent. [EADBERT (3).] [C. H.]

EADBERHT (3) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 670 a; Flor. Wig. ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 635), king of Kent. [EADBERT PRAEN.] [C. H.]

EADBERHT (4) (A. S. C. ann. 757, 768 in M. H. B. 333, 334; Simeon Dunelm. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 659 a, 662 a, c, e, 663 e), king of Northumbria. [EADBERT (5).] [C. H.]

EADBERHT (5) (EADBERT), a monk of Lindisfarne, succeeded Cuthbert in A.D. 688 as bishop of that see, being especially noted for his knowledge of the Scriptures, and for the strict way in which he gave a tenth of everything to the poor (Bed. H. E. iv. 29). He was the first prelate who removed from his monastery the old roof of reeds or wattles, with which Finan had covered it, replacing them with sheets or webs of lead (id. iii. 25).

In the spring of A.D. 698, the first translation of the remains of St. Cuthbert took place. Eadberht gave his assent, but was from home when the examination of the grave was made, spending Lent, according to his wont, in solitude and prayer on some neighbouring island. The monks open the grave, and find what they considered to be an undecayed body. Delighted at their discovery they hasten with the news to Eadberht, taking with them some of the robes which they had found in the tomb. The bishop kissed them, and bade his brethren clothe the saint anew, and inter him in the coffin above ground, which had been prepared. Then the tears rushed down his cheeks, and he told them that the place from which the body had been taken would soon be filled again. The words were prophetic. On the 6th of May following the speaker himself died, after a long and a painful illness, and in accordance with his earnest desire, as he deprecated a sudden death. The monks laid his body under Cuthbert's coffin (Bed. H. E. iv. 30; Vita S. Cuth. capp. xlii. xliii.; Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dun. i. 11).

The memory of Eadberht was dear to the 'family' of Lindisfarne, and in their enforced wanderings they carried about with them his remains, together with those of their great patron. At Durham, where they finally rested, the bones of Eadberht occupied one of the little bags of relics with which Cuthbert's body was surrounded (Saxon Poem de Situ Dunelmie; Hist. Transl. S. Cuthberti, ed. Surtees Soc. 191; Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. ii. 16). When Cuthbert's tomb was opened in 1827 some of these relics were discovered in it. Eadberht has a place in the calendar on May 6. (Cf. Acta SS. Boll. 6 Maii, ii. 107-8.) There is a short account of Eadberht derived from Bede in MS. Cotton, Julius, A. x. 93-4. [J. R.]

EADBERHT (6), bishop of Dunwich. [ALDBERHT (1).]

EADBERHT (7) (EADBRIHT, FILBRITH, Wharton, Epp. Lond. p. 20; ALDBERHT), the ninth bishop of London (M. H. B. 617). He is probably the "Fadberchus," whose name occurs among the attestations of the legatine council of 787 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 461), and, as two bishops of this name attest the act of Offa at the council of Brentford in 781 (Kemble, C. D. 145; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439), it is probable that he became bishop between 772, when his predecessor Wigbeah was living (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402), and the year 780. Eadgar, his successor, was bishop in 788. Eadberht would, if these limits are correct, be bishop of London at the time of the foundation of the archbishopric of Lichfield. [S.]

EADBERHT (8) (Kemble, Cod. Diplom. 992, A.D. 683; 995, A.D. 692), bishop. [EADBERT (7).] [C. H.]

EADBERHT (9), abbat of Reculver. To him about the year 747 a grant of land at Berhamstede (Berstead) was made by Eardulf king of Kent. (Kemble, C. D. 1005.) The name appears as Heahberht in Monast. Angl. i. 454, 455. [S.]

EADBERHT (10), a Mercian abbat, who attested a charter of Offa, dated in 774 (Kemble, C. D. 121), in which land is granted at Hehham (Higham) to archbishop Jaenbert. [S.]

EADBERHT (11), an abbat of the diocese of Sherborn, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

EADBERHT (12), a priest of the diocese of Leicester, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) The name is common to three other priests who attended the same council from the dioceses of Elmham, Dunwich, and Selsey. (Ib.) [S.]

EADBERT (1) (Alcuin, Carm. 280, Opp. ii. 240, ed. Froben.), bishop of Lindisfarne. [EADBERHT (5).] [C. H.]

EADBERT (2), king of Kent, son of Wihtred, and brother of Ethelbert and Alric, whom Bede (H. E. v. 23) mentions as Wihtred's heirs. At the witenagemot of Beccanceld (696-716) there appears among the attestations "signum Aethelberhti pro se et fratre suo Eadberto," from which it would seem probable that

Eadbert was the second son. According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (M. H. B. 327, 330) Eadbert succeeded Wihtred in 725 and died in 748. Wihtred's death is fixed by Bede to April 23, 725, and it would seem probable from charters that the brothers, or at least Eadbert and Ethelbert, then began to reign conjointly. Thus, besides the evidence afforded by charters of Ethelbert as king dated in 732 and 740 (Kemble, C. D. 77, 86), in a charter dated April 738 Eadbert grants ten ploughlands at Hohg and Andscohesham to the church of Rochester (K. C. D. 85), and the grant is confirmed by Ethelbert; another charter of Eadbert, dated 747, is a grant from the port dues at Fordwich to the church of Reculver (ib. 1004), which appears in a genuine charter of Ethelbert dated 741 (ib. 86) as a grant of that king. In a third grant, however, Eadbert seems by himself to give fisheries at Limenea to Christ Church, Canterbury. (Kemble, C. D. 1003.) The last document, in its present form, is spurious, as it identifies Eadbert with his namesake and contemporary, the king of Northumbria, Eadbert Eating; and the other two are of very questionable authenticity. If the date assigned to the death of Eadbert in the Chronicle and by Florence of Worcester be accepted, all the later charters in which the name appears must be assigned to another Eadbert; on this point the evidence of historians is both weak and conflicting. Florence of Worcester in his Chronicle (M. H. B. 543) makes Ethelbert succeed Eadbert in 748 and die in 760 (ib. 544), whilst in the Genealogia (ib. 635) he makes Ethelbert succeed Wihtred, and Eadbert, whom he confounds with Eadbert Praen, succeed Ethelbert. William of Malmesbury assigns to the three brothers successive reigns, Eadbert twenty-three, Ethelbert eleven, and Alric thirty-four years; a computation which agrees with that of the Chronicle of Florence so far as concerns the two elder brothers, but would give an extraordinarily long life to Alric, whom also he represents as conquered by Offa in 774. (G. R. lib. i. § 15; ed. Hardy, p. 24.) The Canterbury writers and the charters of St. Augustine's add a new element of confusion. According to Elmham, Eadbert, in the thirty-sixth year of his reign, which he makes coincide with the year 760 and the archiepiscopate of Bregwin, bestowed land at Mungeham on St. Augustine's (Elmham, ed. Hardwick, p. 319), and the same year confirmed to the abbess Sigeburga a grant which had been made by Ethelbald king of Mercia. (Ib. 322.) The king's death is also dated in 761 and it is added that he was buried at Reculver (ib. 324), Ethelbert being his successor and reigning only one year. It is obvious that the chronology is here constructed to agree with the charters; the writer was conscious of the difficulty, and tried to correct the supposed misstatement of the Chronicle; but he follows William of Malmesbury in ascribing to Alric the third brother a reign that ends in 795. (Ib. 337.) In this confusion it would seem most reasonable to set the reign of Alric aside altogether, as resting on no evidence earlier than that of William of Malmesbury; to accept the year 762 for the death of Ethelbert [ETHELBERT (2)], and to suppose that any genuine grants, if such there be, which bear the name of Eadbert later than 762 were issued by some other Eadbert, who, in the anarchic condition of Kent, may have risen to power. Such would be the grant of king Sigiræd to bishop Eardulf, dated 762, and confirmed by Eadbert (Kemble, C. D. 110; Mon. Angl. i. 162); that of Offa to Rochester dated 764, and attested by king Heabert (K. C. D. 111), and two undated grants by Egbert to Rochester, also attested by Heabert. (Ib. 113, 160.) The great uncertainty as to the true date of Eadbert's death makes it impossible to refer any important events of English history to his reign; Elmham, however, accuses him as favouring the trick by which archbishop Cuthbert attempted to deprive St. Augustine's of the privilege of the archiepiscopal burials. (P. 317.) [S.]

EADBERT (3) king of Kent, referred to in the preceding article, seems to reign conjointly with Egbert in 765. (Kemble, C. D. 113.) In another charter in which Diora is mentioned as bishop of Rochester (K. C. D. 160), and which therefore must be dated between 765 and 785, Eadbert (under the form Heaberht) subscribes an act of Egbert. Nothing more is known about him, unless, which is difficult to suppose, he was identical with Eadbert Praen. [S.]

EADBERT (4) PRAEN, king of Kent, a member of the royal house of Kent and a kinsman of Egbert of Wessex. (H. Hunt. M. H. B. 733; cf. Chr. S. A.D. 823; M. H. B. 343.) Although he was in holy orders, having been perhaps ordained in order to disqualify him for the Kentish crown, he obtained, after the death of Offa, the support of a great part of Kent, and made himself king. Notwithstanding the hostility of Kenulf king of Mercia, and of archbishop Ethelhard, who enlisted pope Leo III. against him as an apostate priest, he maintained his position for three years. As these years must be computed from the death of Offa they fall in 796, 797, and 798; in the last of which Eadbert Praen was taken prisoner by Kenulf, who ordered his eyes to be put out and his hands to be cut off. Kenulf then annexed Kent as a subject kingdom to Mercia, and placed it under the government of king Cuthred. (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 670; H. Hunt. ib. 732, 733, 734.) If the tradition of the abbey of Winchelcomb rests on any authority Eadbert Praen survived his overthrow for many years, and on the occasion of the dedication of that monastery in 811, recorded by William of Malmesbury (G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 294; G. R. ed. Hardy, lib. i. § 95), was manumitted by Kenulf. During his short reign he struck coins bearing his name, "Eadbeart rex," and those of four different moneyers, Babba, Ethelmod, Jaenberht and Tidheah. (Hawkins, Silver Coins of England, pp. 32, 33.)

Several interesting points might be raised respecting Eadbert Praen. The origin of his surname is unknown. His relation to the Aescings is obscure, and his political career may be read in two ways. It is even possible that he was identical with the Eadbert whose name appears in the charters of 762 and later years [EADBERT (3)], and that having been deposed in one of the struggles of the time, he may have been condemned to the tonsure. As he was a kinsman of Ealhmund, father of Egbert king of Wessex, who reigned in Kent in 786, he probably belonged to a branch which represented the West Saxon as opposed to the Mercian interest in Kent; and as archbishop Ethelhard was altogether under the influence of Kenulf, and had probably been a nominee of Offa, his opposition to Eadbert Praen was no doubt as much political as ecclesiastical. We may then infer that Eadbert, instead of being a mere adventurer, was the champion of Kentish independence; such a conclusion is warranted by the words of Henry of Huntingdon, who, following some lost authority (or perhaps the Chronicle, M. H. B. 343), describes the deposition of Eadbert as an unjust act. (M. H. B. 733.) A good deal of light is thrown on this side of the subject by the letters of Alcuin. In one he entreats Ethelhard not to desert his church (Mon. Alc. ep. 44, p. 265; H. and S. iii. 495), and mentions that he has written to Offa to defend him. Although Eadbert is not mentioned by name the letter suggests that his schemes had been in preparation before Offa's death. In another letter Alcuin writes to the nobles and clergy of Kent, urging them to recall Ethelhard, and warns them of the evils of discord, alleging that the ancient lines of the kings had nearly become extinct. (Mon. Alcuin, ed. Jaffé, p. 369; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 509-511.) Although we cannot accept 795 as the date of the death of king Alric, to which Alcuin might seem to refer, it is probable that the direct line of succession was quite extinct before the West Saxon Ealhmund became king in 786. In 798 Leo III., writing to Kenulf, says that he has anathematized Eadbert, "quia nos de clerico illo apostata qui ascenderat in regnum, similem illum deputantes Juliano Parabatae, anathematizantes abjicimus, salutem animae ejus procurantes," and promises that if the pretender still holds out he will issue letters to the whole nation of Britain to rise and expel him. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 524.) It is clear, therefore, that Eadbert was no ordinary rebel; but the obscurity that hangs over the Kentish succession cannot now be penetrated. The mistake of Florence, by which Eadbert Praen is confused with the earlier king, son of Wihtred, has been noticed [EADBERT (1)]. [S.]

EADBERT (5) (EADBERHT), king of Northumbria, son of Eata, and cousin of "the most glorious Ceolwulf," whom he succeeded A.D. 737 (Cont. Bed. in M. H. B. 288 B). His brother Egbert became archbishop of York two years earlier. Eadbert was a very able ruler, and added largely to the dignity and extent of his dominions. Symeon tells us that he won the admiration and the friendship of the Angles, Picts, Britons, and Scots, and that Pepin, king of France, regarded him with respect, and sent him various king-like gifts (Hist. Eccl. Dun. ii. 3). In A.D. 740, whilst Eadbert was attacking the Picts, a part of his kingdom was ravaged by Ethelbald king of Mercia (Chronol. apud Bedam). In A.D. 750 he took from the Britons of Strathclyde the district of Kyle in Ayrshire, which had formerly belonged to Northumbria (id.). In the same year Eadbert came into violent collision with the officers of the church of Lindisfarne. Symeon gives a somewhat different account of the occurrence in his History of the Church of Durham (ii. cap. 2) from that which is recorded in the chronicle ascribed to him.

EADBERT

(p. 19, ed. Surtees Soc.). It appears that Offa, son of Aldfrid, a man of royal descent, took sanctuary in Lindisfarne at St. Cuthbert's shrine, from whence he was forcibly taken by his foes and killed. In connexion with this outrage, Cynewulf, bishop of Lindisfarne, was imprisoned by Eadbert at Bambrough, and the charge of his diocese was intrusted for a time to Frithbert bishop of Hexham. It seems probable that the king was offended with Cynewulf for giving protection to the fugitive, who, if he was a son of king Aldfrith, may possibly have been looked upon by Eadbert as a rival.

In A.D. 756 Eadbert met with a great reverse. He made an alliance with his former enemies, the Picts, and joined Ungus their king in an expedition to Alclyde, where the Britons surrendered to him. But a few days subsequently, on the 10th of August, his army was routed and destroyed between Ouania and Niwanbirig (Symeon, Hist. Regum, 20). Mr. Hodgson Hinde was of opinion that these places were Loch Ouan and Newburgh in Perthshire. Mr. Skene, however, prefers Newburgh in Northumberland.

In A.D. 757 pope Paul I. wrote to Eadbert, stating that abbat Fordred had complained to him of his taking away three monasteries which had been granted to him by a certain abbess, Staninggrave (Stonegrave), Cuchawalda (Coxwold) and Donaemuthe (Jarrow), and giving them to the patrician Moll (possibly Ethelwald Moll, who is spoken of as "frater ejus"), a layman. The pope asks him to make restitution (Wilkins, i. 145; id. ed. Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 394).

Two years after this disaster, and perhaps in consequence of it, Eadbert voluntarily resigned his throne in behalf of his son Osulf, and adopted the religious life. Symeon tells us that the other English kings tried to prevent him by promising to surrender a portion of each of their kingdoms for the augmentation of Northumbria, if he would continue to preside over it (Hist. Eccl. Dun. ii. 3). They pleaded in vain. Eadbert retired to the minster of York, of which his brother Egbert was the head, and there spent ten years. He died on Aug. 19, 768, and was buried in the cathedral in the same porch (or chapel) in which Egbert had been laid two years earlier (Saxon Chron. sub anno).

The two brothers possessed a mint at York, at which they coined stycas, the little copper coins which were peculiar to Northumbria. They shew the legend of the king on one side, and the archbishop on the other. Several types have been discovered, which used to be erroneously ascribed to Eadbert of Kent. [J. R.]

EADBERT (6) (Wend. F. H. ann. 722), etheling, exile. [ALDBERT (3).] [C. H.]

EADBERT (7) (EADBERT), the first bishop of the South Saxons. He was abbat of the monastery founded by Wilfrid at Selsey; and when, under the administration of Daniel bishop of Winchester and Forthere bishop of Sherborn, the South Saxons were detached from the West Saxon dioceses, Eadbert was consecrated bishop of the new see. This event took place after the death of Aldhelm (A.D. 709), and is commonly dated in 711. (Matt. Paris, ed. Luard, i. 323.) The attestation of Eadbert is found attached to the act of the council of Clovesho, A.D. 716, by which the privilege of Wihtred was confirmed

(Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300); his name is likewise found in the attestations of charters of Nunna king of Sussex, which in their present condition are of uncertain date and questionable authenticity. (Kemble, C. D. 995, 1000, 1001.) The name "Eadbertus abbas" attached to a spurious charter of Caedwalla, dated 688, was probably intended to denote this person (ib. No. 994). William of Malmesbury, by a curious mistake, represents Eadbert as consecrated by archbishop Nothelm. (G. P. lib. ii. § 96.) He and his successor Eolla were both dead before Bede closed his history. (H. E. v. 18.) [S.]

EADBERT (8), one of the East Anglian bishops at the time of Bede's death, according to Florence and Simeon, whose general narrative at that point is based upon the account in Bede (H. E. v. 23), Aldbert however, not Eadbert, being the name in Bede. All three mention the two East Anglian bishops (Heatholac being the second, in which they agree) without assigning their respective sees, whereas Wendover gives Eadbert to Elmham and Heatholac to Dunwich. The ancient lists however (M. H. B. 618), which are of superior authority to Wendover's, assign "Aldbertus" (if he be the same) to Dunwich. There is evidently much obscurity as to the succession in Elmham and Dunwich at that period, as to which, vid. ALDBERT (1), and Stubbs, Regist. Sacr. 168. (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 731 in M. H. B. 542 b; Sim. Dun. G. R. G. in M. H. B. 657 c; Wend. F. H. ann. 731, ed. Coxe.)

[C. H.]

EADBERT (9), the fifth bishop of the Middle Angles at Leicester. (M. H. B. 624.) He was consecrated according to the northern chronology, preserved by Simeon of Durham, in 764. (M. H. B. 663.) His name is found attached to the charters of the Mercian kings from 767 to 781, and, as his successor Unwona appears among the prelates at the legatine council of 787, his death probably took place between 781 and 787. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439; W. Malmesb. G. P. lib. iv. § 176; Kemble, C. D. 116, 120, 121, 128, 129, 131, 134, 137, 138, 140, 143, &c., &c.) [S.]

EADBERT (10) (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 139), bishop, see unnamed, witnesses a charter of Offa king of Mercia, reckoned spurious or doubtful by Kemble, Sept. 22, 760. His name occurs next to that of the archbishop. [EADBERT (7).]

[C. H.]

EADBERT (11) (Ricard. Hagulst. cap. 18, but in cap. 19 EANBERT; Twysden, col. 299, 300; ed. Raine, pp. 41, 42; Wend. F. H. ann. 800, ed. Coxe), bishop of Hexham. [EANBERT.]

[C. H.]

EADBERT (12), according to Wendover a bishop of London, who died A.D. 802, and was succeeded by EADGAR (Wend. F. H. ann. 802, ed. Coxe). He is possibly intended for Heathobert, the thirteenth bishop. [C. H.]

EADBIRTH, a bishop whose name is attached to a charter of Nunna king of the South Saxons, granting him lands, A.D. 725 (Kemble, C. D. 1000). [EADBERT (7).] [C. H.]

EADBIRTH (Nenn. Hist. in Mon. Hist. Brit. 75 b), EADBRIHT (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann.

738 in M. H. B. 542 e; id. ad Chron. Ap. 5. 639 e), EADBRYHT (A. S. C. ann. 73: in M. H. B. 329), king of Northumbria. [EADBERT (5).] [C. H.]

EADBOLD (A. S. C. ann. 633 in M. H. B. 309), king of Kent. [EADBOLD (1).] [C. H.]

EADBRICT PREN (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. M. H. B. 732 c), EADBRICH PREN (Chron. Mailr. an. 794), king of Kent. [EADBERT (4) PRAEN.] [C. H.]

EADBRIGHT, a bishop, see unnamed, who attests a charter of Osmund king of Sussex, A.D. 770 (Kemble, C. D. 1009). His date suggests a possible identification with Eadberht ninth bishop of London, or Eadbert fifth bishop of Leicester. [EADBERHT (7), EADBERT (9).] [C. H.]

EADBRIHT (1) (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 726 d), EADBRITH (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1788 in M. H. B. 786), EADBRYHT (A. S. C. ann. 748 in M. H. B. 330), king of Kent. [EADBERT (2).] [C. H.]

EADBRIHT (2) (Flor. Wig. Nom. Episc. Lund. M. H. B. 617), bishop of London, preceding Eadgar. [EADBERHT (7).] [C. H.]

EADBRIHT (3), bishop, see unnamed, attesting a charter of archbishop Ethelhard, considered spurious or doubtful by Kemble, A.D. 798. (Kemble, C. D. 1018.) Probably bishop of London. [EADBERT (10), (12).] [C. H.]

EADBRITH (Wend. F. H. ann. 675, ed. Coxe), bishop of London, succeeding Wiger, i.e. Wigered. He is the Aidberht, ninth bishop, of Stubbs's Regist. Sac. 159. [C. H.]

EADBURCH (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 2066; M. H. B. 789), queen of Wessex, daughter of Offa king of Mercia. [EADBURGA (1).] [C. H.]

EADBURGA (1), daughter of Offa, and queen of the West Saxons. She is mentioned by Offa in a grant to Chertsey abbey, dated 787, together with his wife Cynethritha, his son Egfrith, and his daughters Ethelburga, Ethelfleda, and Ethelswitha. (Kemble, C. D. 151.) In 789 (Chr. S. 787) Eadburga was married to Brihtric, king of Wessex, who thus obtained the protection of Offa. According to Asser (M. H. B. 471), who says that he heard the story from king Alfred, and no doubt preserved the tradition of the West Saxon royal family, Eadburga was extremely jealous of any one who had influence with her husband, and altogether unscrupulous in the use she made of the sword or poison to get rid of her rivals. On one occasion she prepared poison for one of the favourites, whose dismissal she had failed to secure; Brihtric drank the poison and left Eadburga a widow in the year 802. (Chr. S. 800.) As the West Saxons would not tolerate her continuance in the kingdom, she fled to the continent, and took refuge with the emperor. Charles on the occasion of her reception, jestingly gave her the choice between himself and his son. Eadburga replied: "If the choice is given me, I choose your son, inasmuch as he is the younger." Charles answered: "If you had chosen me you should have had my son; as you have chosen my son you shall have neither." He gave her, however, a monastery, over which she presided as abbess, but having been unchaste she was expelled, and died after having begged alms daily, attended by a single servant, in the streets of Pavia. (Asser, M. H. B. 471, 472; Flor. Wig. 546, 552; Sim. Dun. 673.) In consequence of Eadburga's misconduct the West Saxons refused to give the title of queen to the wives of their kings, a rule which was first broken when Judith, the wife of Ethelwulf, was crowned by Hincmar at Verberie. (Asser, p. 741; Ann. Bertin. ap. Pertz, i. 450; cf. Will. Malmesb. G. R. lib. ii. § 113.) [S.]

EADBURGA (2) (Bonif. Epp. in Monum. Mogunt. pp. 53, 84, 98, 211, 212, 214; Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 475), abbess of Minster in Thanet. [BUGGA (2).] [C. H.]

EADBURGA (3), abbess of Repton; daughter of Ealdulf [ALDWULF], king of the East Angles; called also Ethelburga (Wallingford, ap. Gale, p. 528), Aedberga, Aetberga, and Redburga (Lib. Eliens. p. 25), Aegberga (V. S. Guthlac, A.A. SS. O. S. B. saec. iii. pt. 1, p. 270). After having lived for some years as an anchoret she became abbess of Hrepandun or Repton towards the close of the 7th century. She is recorded to have sent to St. Guthlac a leaden coffin with a shroud for his burial, and to have asked him to foretell his successor. Guthlac described him as a person who was still a pagan, but would shortly be baptized, a prophecy which was fulfilled in Cissa, who succeeded him. (Vit. S. Guthlac; Hist. Eliens. lib. i. c. 7; ed. Stewart, p. 26; Bromton, ap. Twysden, c. 797.) Another Eadburga, who is said to have been a nun at Aylesbury, and to have given her name to the village of Edburton, is called a daughter of Redwald of East Anglia; but she seems altogether mythical. (See Hardy, Cat. Mat. Brit. Hist. i. 476.) [S.]

EADBURGA (4), the second in the list of the abbesses of St. Peter's, Gloucester. According to the "Historia" of that monastery she was the widow of Wulfhere king of Mercia, and received benediction from St. Egwin in 710; in the 15th (or 25th) year of her abbacy she died, and was buried by bishop Wilfrid of Worcester, A.D. 735. (Hist. Glouc. ed. Hart, i. 6, 7; Mon. Angl. i. 532, 542.) This story is scarcely reconcilable with the history of St. Eormenhild, who is likewise described as wife of Wulfhere [EORMENHILD]; and the authority on which it rests is scarcely worth consideration. It is, however, possible that Eormenhild may have left her husband to become a nun, and that Eadburga was a later wife. [S.]

EADBURGH (Asser, de Gest. Alf. M. H. B. 471 d, e), EADBURH (Ethelwerd, Chron. iii. 20 in M. H. B. 509; Flor. Wig. Chron. in M. H. B. 552 a, b; id. Geneal. Reg. Merc. in M. H. B. 630; Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 731 d), EADBURHGE (A. S. C. ann. 787, text in M. H. B. 336), daughter of Offa king of Mercia, queen of Wessex. [EADBURGA (1); EDBIRT.] [C. H.]

EADBYRHT (1) (MSS. in Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 365), bishop of Lindisfarne. [EADBERHT (5).] [C. H.]

EADBYRHT (2) (Ethelwerd, Chron. ii. 15 in M. H. B. 507 c, d), king of Northumbria [EADBERT (5).] [C. H.]

EADDA, bishop, see unnamed, who attest a charter of Ethelward subregulus of the Hwicci, A.D. 706. (Kemble, C. D. 56.) [HEDDA; HEADDA.] [C. H.]

EADFERED FLESAURS (Nenn. Hist. in M. H. B. 76 A), king of Northumbria. [ETHELFRID (1).] [J. R.]

EADFIRD (Hist. Nennii in M. H. B. 75 b), son of Edwin king of Northumbria. [EADFRID (1).] [C. H.]

EADFRID (1) (EADFRITH), a son of Edwin king of Northumbria and his first wife Coenburga, daughter of Cearl king of Mercia. He was born whilst his father was in exile, prior to his accession to the throne. With the rest of the royal family he became a Christian, and was baptized by Paulinus (Bed. H. E. ii. 14). In A.D. 633, after the death of his father at Haethfelth, Eadfrid was obliged to take refuge with Penda king of Mercia, by whom he was treacherously put to death (id. ii. 20). [J. R.]

EADFRID (2) (EADFRITH), bishop of Lindisfarne from A.D. 698 to 721 (Flor. Wigorn. i. 45, 50). There is little known of him except in connexion with his monastery. There is a single letter addressed to him by Aldhelm abbat of Malmesbury on his return from Ireland. It is written in the uncouth Latinity of the period, and is of trifling importance (Epp. Hib. Syll. iv. 13; Aldhelm, ed. Giles, 90-5).

Eadfrid's chief mission in life was to spread the fame and glory of his great predecessor, Cuthbert. "Multum fervens amore," says Symeon. He rebuilt the oratory on Farne island, where Cuthbert had lived in solitude, Feldgild then being its occupant (Symeon, H. E. D. i. 11).

But he did more than this. He was an artist of no common skill, and wrote and illuminated the famous Evangelium, known as the Durham book, or Lindisfarne Gospels, which is one of the most beautiful MSS. in Europe. Eadfrid probably commenced it during Cuthbert's lifetime, whilst he was a monk at Lindisfarne, and it was afterwards laid by the scribe as an offering upon the shrine of the saint. Ethelwold, Eadfrid's successor in the see, gave the cover, which Bilfrid decorated with silver and gold set with precious stones, and Aldred added an interlinear gloss. This volume was henceforward one of the most precious treasures of Lindisfarne. When the monks were obliged to flee before the Danes they took it with them. On one occasion, in the 9th century, it had a wonderful escape. The monks were trying in vain to cross over the channel to Ireland, when the Gospels fell into the sea (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. ii. 12). After three days they discovered the book to their great delight on the coast of Whithorn, uninjured, save by a few stains of sea-water, which it still shews. When the monks rested at length at Durham, and Lindisfarne was restored, the volume went back to its old home, and there it stayed until the Dissolution. It was called in the Inventories of the House 'Liber S. Cuthberti qui demersus est in mare.' After a while it passed into the hands of Robert Bowyer, clerk of the House of Commons, from whom it was acquired by Sir Robert Cotton. It is now among the Cottonian MSS. in the British Museum, Nero D. 4. The text of these Gospels, with their invaluable Anglo-Northumbrian gloss, has been edited for the Surtees Society by Messrs. Stevenson and Waring. A more exact rendering has been made for the Syndics of the University of Cambridge by Messrs. Kemble and Hardwick, and since their deaths by Mr. Skeat. The gloss has been printed by Karl Bouterwek (Die vier Evangelien in altnord-lumbrischer Sprache, 800, 1857). The beauty of the writing and the exquisite illuminations are noticed by every writer on palaeography, especially by Professor Westwood.

The writing of these Gospels was not Eadfrid's only offering to Cuthbert's memory. He took care that his good deeds were handed down to posterity. The nameless author of the first biography of Cuthbert dedicates his work to Eadfrid and the family at Lindisfarne, stating that he had written it at their desire (Appendix, Bedae Opp. Minora, pp. 259-60). They had also the honour of evoking a greater boon to history, in inducing Bede to draw up his famous Life of the saint, in return for which Eadfrid promised that the writer should be duly remembered in the prayers of the house of Lindisfarne (Vita S. Cuthb. Prologus).

It can be no matter of surprise that the wandering Cuthbertines carried about with them the bones of Eadfrid, to whom their beloved saint had been so dear. The relics rested at last in Durham, in the shrine, where they were deposited in a little bag, and even now they have not wholly disappeared. (Carmen de Situ Dunelm. Hist. Translat. S. Cuthb. 191; Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. ii. 6.) [J. R.]

EADFRITH (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 664 in M. H. B. 532 d; id. Geneal. Reg. Northum. ib. 632; id. ad Chron. App. ib. 639 c), son of Edwin king of Northumbria. [EADFRID.] [C. H.]

EADGAR (1), the third bishop of the Lindisfarne, or people of Lindsey (M. H. B. 624; Bed. H. E. iv. 12). His name is attached to an Evesham charter of the year 706 (Kemble, C. D. 56), and to the act of the council of Clovesho in 716, by which the privilege of Wihtried was confirmed. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300.) Before the year 731, where Bede closes his history, Eadgar had been succeeded by Cyniberct or Kinbert. (H. E. v. 23.) [S.]

EADGAR (2), the tenth bishop of London. (M. H. B. 617.) He is known only by the fact that his name appears in the ancient lists between those of Eadberht or Aldberht, and Coenwalch or Kenwalch, and in the attestation of a grant made by Offa to Rochester at a council at Cealchyth in 789 (Kemble, C. D. 157; see also 155; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 465). As Eadberht was alive in 787, and the episcopate of Coenwalch ended before 796, Eadgar's date must fall between those limits. [S.]

EADGAR (3), presbyter, who signs a charter of Coenwulf king of Mercia, A.D. 814. (Kemble, Cod. Dip. no. 206.) [C. H.]

EADGUIN (Nennius, in M. H. B. 74 c, 76 b), king of Northumbria. [EDWIN.] [C. H.]

EADGYD, a nun of Barking, mentioned by Bede. (H. E. iv. 8.) She died of the plague of 664, after being thrice called by the boy Aesica whilst he was dying. [S.]

EADHAEITH (Bede. H. E. v. 24, Recapit. Chron. ann. 678 in M. H. B. 288 d), bishop of Lindsey. [EADHED.] [C. H.]

EADHAMAIR, Irish saint. [EDHAMAIR.]

EADHED, a priest of Oswy king of Northumbria, sent by him with Ceadda into Kent to seek episcopal ordination for the latter at the hands of Deusdedit. This was in A.D. 664. Finding that Deusdedit was dead, they went to bishop Wini, in Wessex, by whom Ceadda was consecrated. (Bede. H. E. iii. 28.) In A.D. 378, archbishop Theodore, at York, consecrated Eadhed bishop of Lindsey, that province having come under the rule of Egfrid of Northumbria (Bede. H. E. iv. 12; A. S. C. ann. 678.). Soon afterwards Ethelred king of Mercia recovered the province of Lindsey, and Eadhed retired from it. He was then placed at Ripon. (Bede. ut sup.) [J. R.]

EADHERE, a priest of the diocese of Lichfield, who attended the council at Clovesho in 883. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 546.) [S.]

EADHOLAC (Chron. Marbr. ann. 731), bishop of East Anglia. [HEATHOLAC.] [C. H.]

EADLBALT (Hist. Nennii, M. H. B. 75 a), king of Mercia, son of Alguing. [ÆTHELBALD (1).] [C. H.]

EADLFRID (Hist. Nennii, M. H. B. 76 b), king of Northumbria. [ÆTHELFRID.] [C. H.]

EADLIT (Hist. Nennii, M. H. B. 75 a), king of Mercia, son of Penda. [ÆTHELRED.] [C. H.]

EADRED (1) (Angl. Sac. i. 404), bishop of Dunwich. [EARDULF (3).] [C. H.]

EADRED (2) (HEADRED, HEARDRED), was consecrated bishop of Hexham on Oct. 29, A.D. 797, at a place called Wuduforda. The consecrators were archbishop Eanbald and bishop Higbald (Saxon Chron.; Symeon, Chron. ed. Surtees Soc. 85). He died in A.D. 800, in the third year of his episcopate, of which there is nothing known (Symeon, ut supra, 88). [J. R.]

EADRED (3), a name common to two priests, one of the diocese of Leicester, the other of that of Sidnacester, who attended the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

EADRIC (1), king of Kent, son of Egbert. On the death of his father, which took place in July, 673, Eadric was probably under age; anyhow his claim to the succession was set aside in favour of that of his uncle Hlothere, who occupied the throne from 673 to 685. During some part of this time Eadric was apparently admitted to a share of the royal dignity, but towards the close of it he was driven into exile among the South Saxons, with whose aid he engaged in war with Hlothere. In the campaign Hlothere was wounded, and died under the hands of his surgeons, Feb. 6, 685. (Bede, H. E. iv. 26.) After his uncle's death, Eadric reigned for a year and a half, dying, according to Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 537), in 686; but the day of his depositio is given in the very ancient Annales Cantuarienses (Pertz, Scr. iv. 2) as Aug. 31, 687). He is probably identical with that Eadric whom William of Malmesbury (G. R. lib. i. § 34) calls king of the South Saxons and successor of Ethelwalch, who was killed by Caedwalla of Wessex in his attack of Sussex in 686. Eadric is mentioned by Hlothere in a charter dated May, 679, in which he bestows lands in Thanet on abbat Bercuald with the consent of archbishop Theodore and of Eadric, his brother's son (Kemble, C. D. No. 16). It is possible, then, that his claim to share the throne was recognised thus early. The Textus Roffensis has preserved a short code of laws of sixteen articles, entitled, "These are the dooms which Hlothere and Eadric kings of the Kentishmen established," but containing no clauses of ecclesiastical interest (Thorpe, Ancient Laws, pp. 11-15). This would seem to prove that the relations of Eadric with his uncle had been for some time at least pacific. Kent was, during the whole period assigned to Hlothere and Eadric, in a very uneasy state; Ethelred of Mercia, Oswy of Northumbria, and Swebheard, son of Sebbi of Essex, claimed, if the charters of the Kentish monasteries are at all to be trusted, the right of overlordship or a share in the Kentish territory, and the enterprise of Mul and Caedwalla added a new element of trouble. Sussex was the place of refuge for discontented princes from both Kent and Wessex. It is just possible that Eadric in 686 had succeeded in uniting Kent and Sussex under his sway; both kingdoms broke up after his death. Sussex was governed by two ealdormen, Andhun and Berththun, who, after the death of Ethelwalch, had resisted Caedwalla, but now fell before him; and Kent was devastated, as Bede says, by foreign and doubtful kings, until Wihtried, the brother of Eadric, succeeded in recovering the royal authority about the year 694 (Chr. S. M. H. B. 323). One charter granted by Eadric as sole king was preserved at St. Augustine's; in this he granted to that monastery lands near to Canterbury, adjacent to an estate which had been given by Hlothere; it is dated June, in the fourteenth indiction, which fixes it to 686 (Kemble, C. D. 27; Elmham, ed. Hardwick, p. 251; Thorn, ap. Twysden, c. 1770). According to Elmham, who asserts that he was killed by Mul and Caedwalla, he was buried at St. Augustine's (p. 252). William of Malmesbury, who likewise mentions his violent death, regarded the shortness of his reign as a punishment for the sin committed by his father Egbert against the rights of the children of Eormenred (G. R. lib. i. § 14). [S.]

EADRIC (2), the second abbat of St. Alban's (Gesta Abbatum, i. 8, 9; Monast. Angl. i. 179). He is not mentioned in any ancient authority and may be entirely mythical. According to the St. Alban's story, he was a kinsman of Offa, and was, in compliance with Offa's request that the monks should elect an abbat out of their own body, chosen to the abbacy after Offa's death in 796. He ruled his house discreetly, and maintained its rights when they were threatened by Egfrid. [S.]

EADULF (1) (Stubbs, Regist. Sacr. pp. 5, 173), bishop of Rochester. [ALDULF (2).]
[C. H.]

EADULF (2) (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. 168), bishop of Dunwich. [EARDULF (3).]
[C. H.]

EADULF (3) I. (ALDULF, EALDWULF), the sixth bishop of Lindsey (M. H. B. 625). He had served his predecessor Alwig as deacon, and was consecrated as his successor in 750 (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 662). The only charter to which his name is appended is a grant made by Cynewulf of Wessex to Bath in 758 (see Kemble, C. D. 193, where the date is wrongly given 808 instead of 758; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 396). He died in 765 (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 663). The proper form of his name is unquestionably Ealdulf.

EADULF (4) II. (KALDULF), the eighth bishop of Lindsey (M. H. B. 625). He succeeded Ceolwulf in 796, and ruled his diocese for forty years. He is probably the "Eadulfus" who is described as "Eboracensis humilis episcopus" in the profession of obedience made to archbishop Ethelhard of Canterbury (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 506), a document which was no doubt garbled to support the later claims of Canterbury over York; for there was no such archbishop of York at the time, nor, although the profession is in other respects sound, was any claim of the sort as yet asserted for Canterbury. As Eadulf attests two charters of Egfrid of Mercia (Kemble, C. D. 170, 171, A.D. 796) as "electus," it is probable that he was consecrated by Ethelhard, but the rite may have been delayed by the fact that jurisdiction over Lindsey was just at this time claimed by the archbishop of Lichfield. Eadulf's signature is appended to acts of the council of Clovesho in 798 (Kemble, C. D. 175; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 515). He attended the synod of Clovesho in 803 with two abbats and four priests of his diocese (K. C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546); and his name is attached to nearly all the Mercian charters of the age and to the records of councils and synods. Of these the most important is that of Celchyth in 816 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 579). He appears for the last time in 836. The proper form of his name seems to be Eadulf. Although he was bishop during the most trying period of Mercian history, nothing more of his personal action is to be discovered.

EADULF (5) (ALDULF), the fifteenth bishop of Lichfield (M. H. B. 626). He succeeded Higbert, probably at the time when Lichfield was reduced to the rank of a suffragan see; attended the council of Clovesho in 803 (Kemble, C. D. 1024), and subscribed Mercian charters from that year until 814. In 816 his successor Herewin attended the council of Celchyth, so that Eadulf died or resigned before that year. He is mentioned as the predecessor of Herewin in the profession made by the bishop of Lichfield to archbishop Ceolnoth (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 614). If it were not that his name is authoritatively written Aldulf, it might be suggested that the profession of Eadulf, referred to in the preceding article [EADULF (4)], was his. Much of the historic importance of this prelate is owing to the fact that William of Malmesbury, and most of the writers who followed him supposed Eadulf to be the archbishop of Lichfield who was appointed by Offa in 787 or 788, thus confounding him with Higbert his predecessor. Malmesbury may have been misled by further confusion between Aldulf of Lichfield and Aldulf bishop of Mayo, whose consecration is mentioned by Simeon of Durham under the year 786. This mistake, which perpetuated itself throughout the Fasti of the bishops, and even misled the learned Henry Wharton, was not cleared up until the publication of the Anglo-Saxon charters satisfactorily proved Higbert to have been the only archbishop of Lichfield. (See Will. Malmesb. G. P. ed. Hamilton, pp. 16, 308; Wharton, Ang. Sacra, i. 430.) [HIGBERT.] [S.]

EADULF (6) (EALDULF, ALDULF), a South-Saxon dux or ealdorman, contemporary with Offa king of Mercia, and bishop Wiothun of Selsey, whose name appears in grants of lands in Sussex about the year 791 (Kemble, C. D. 1015, 1016). One of these is a gift to bishop Wiothun for a church of St. Andrew at Ferring, the other a gift to Selsey in the time of bishop Gislehere, who attests it. The latter is probably the earlier in date, as Gislehere was bishop in 780 and 781, and Wiothun from 789 to 805; but both share the general doubtful character of the Selsey charters.

EADULF (7) (EADWLF), a priest of the diocese of Sidnacester, who signs the acts of the synod of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) [S.]

EADUINE (Ethelwerd, Chron. iii. 2 in M. H. B. 510 d), king of Northumbria. [EDWIN.]

EADUULF (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 170, 171, 175, 183, 185, 190, 191, 197, 237), bishop of Lindsey. [EADULF II.]

EALDWULF (2) (Kemble, C. D. 1015, A.D. 791 in 1016, cir. A.D. 791), king of Sussex. [C. H.]

EALDWULF (3), bishop of Rochester. [ALDULF (2).]

EALFRID (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1568 in M. H. B. 783), king of Northumbria, died at Drifelda. [ALDFRITH.] [C. H.]

EALGHEARD, EALHEARD, bishop, see unnamed, who attests charters of Offa king of Mercia, A.D. 789, 790. (Kemble, C. D. 157, 159.) [ALHEARD.] [C. H.]

EALHEARD, a deacon whose attestation is appended to a spurious charter of Kenulf of Mercia in 799. (Kemble, C. D. 177.) [S.]

EALHFLAEDE (Bed. H. E. iii. 21, Sax. transl. in Smith's Beda, p. 550, 42), daughter of Oswy, wife of Penda of Mercia. [ALCHFLEDA.] [C. H.]

EALHFRIH (Bed. H. E. iii. 14, 21, Sax. transl. in Smith's Beda, pp. 539, 19, 551-6), son of Oswy. [ALHFRIH.] [C. H.]

EALHMUND (1), king of Kent, son of Eafa, and father of Egbert afterwards king of Wessex. His reign in Kent is fixed by the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle in 784 (rightly 786). The same year, 784, is given as the date of a charter (Kemble, C. D. 1013), in which he grants to abbat Wetred and the monastery of Reculver, twelve hides of land in Scildwic, and that is all that is distinctly known about him, but it is possible that the Eamundus rex who in company with archbishop Bregwin confirms a grant of Sigisred to Rochester (Kemble, C. D. 114), before 766, may be identical with Ealhmund. It may further be conjectured that he was one of the many kings of divisions of Kent who sprang up after the main line of the Aescings was extinct; and that, as his son Egberht is spoken of as a kinsman of Eadberht Praen (H. Hunt, M. H. B. 783), he was an earlier champion of the national party in Kent opposed to the supremacy of Mercia. [See ROBERT (4) and EADBERT PRAEN.] [B.]

EALHMUND (2) (Kemble, C. D. 1018, A.D. 796, marked by Kemble doubtful or spurious), intended for Alhmund bishop of Winchester, who was not consecrated until 802. (Stubbs, Reg. Sec. 9, 16.) [C. H.]

EALHMUND (3), abbat, attests a charter of Offa king of Mercia, A.D. 789. (Kemble, Con. Dip. No. 155; Birch, Fasti Monast. p. 68.) [C. H.]

EALHUN, a priest of Canterbury, who attested a charter of archbishop Wulfred, dated 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.) [S.]

EALHWINE (Lapp. Hist. Eng. i. 181), EALWINE. [ALCUIN.]

EALRED (Wend. F. H. ann. 773, ed. Coxe), king of Northumbria. [ALCHRED.] [C. H.]

EAMBERTH, archbishop of York. [EGBERT.]

EANBALD I (ENBALD), the pupil and the successor of Albert in the see of York. It is probable that he was brought up in the minster under the charge of Egbert and Albert, and, winning their regard, in due time became a teacher himself. Albert shewed his regard for Eanbald and Alcuin by making them the keepers or masters of the fabric of the new minster which he built. In the last years of his life Albert, according to the old Celtic custom, practically nominated Eanbald his successor by making him his coadjutor in the see about the year A.D. 780. In this capacity he was associated with Albert in his last public act, the dedication of his new cathedral. (Alcuin, de SS. Eocl. Ebor.)

Eanbald succeeded Albert in A.D. 782, and Alfwold, king of Northumbria, took immediate steps to procure for him the pall. (Saxon Chron.; Symeon, Chron. ed. Surtees Soc. 26.) Alcuin, at his old friend's request, went to Rome to bring it. (Vita Alcuini, ed. Jaffé.) As he was returning with it he met Charlemagne at Parma, who extorted from him a promise that he would come and stay with him in France if he could gain the assent of his own king and archbishop. In a little while the desire of Charles was realised. Alcuin, on his return to York, obtained the permission that was required, and went to France accompanied by some of his most distinguished scholars—Wizo, Fridugisus, and Sigulf. The result of this visit was the establishment of a system of universities, or higher schools, in France, Germany, and Italy.

In A.D. 786 was held a great council of the Northumbrian church, before the legates George and Theophylact, at which Eanbald and his suffragans and king Alfwold were present. (Stubbs and Haddan, iii. 444, etc.; Alcuin, Lettera, ed. Jaffé, 155, etc.)

The state of Northumbria during Eanbald's archiepiscopate was anything but satisfactory. Long after king was murdered or dethroned, and all the foundations of society were so violently shaken that it would be impossible for the church and school of York to make their influence properly felt. Alcuin did his best to restore peace and order. He had gone to France soon after Albert's death to assist Charlemagne in his educational work, but he came home to Northumbria in A.D. 790 to lend the king and Eanbald a helping hand. (Epp. ed. Jaffé, 170-1, 174-5.) It was all in vain. The disorder was so great that after a short sojourn the great scholar left Eanbald and York and went back to France, where the rest of his life was passed.

In A.D. 793 an inroad of the Danes into Northumbria added largely to the misery of the kingdom. The famous house of Lindisfarne was devastated by the marauders, who made an attempt upon Jarrow in the following year. These were only the beginnings of such troubles, but they cast dismay upon the northern church. Alcuin, from his home in France, wrote more than one warning letter to king Ethelred (Epp. 180-90); he consoled Higbald of Lindisfarne for his loss, and promised to use his good offices with Charlemagne for the restoration of the captives (id. 190-4); he spoke many kind words of comfort and hope to the brethren of Wearmouth and Jarrow (Epp. 196-201); he impressed upon all the absolute necessity of union in the face of so savage a foe.

In A.D. 795 great efforts were made by Eanbald and the church of York to bring Alcuin back to England. It seems to have been Eanbald's intention, like his predecessor, to retire from his charge, and it was no doubt the general wish that Alcuin should succeed him. Alcuin gives his Northumbrian friends good advice, and speaks of them with the utmost affection (Epp. 249-56), but manifests no eagerness to return. In a letter to Eanbald he begs that if he is determined to resign there may be a free choice of a successor in the hands of the chapter; and upon the chapter itself he impresses unanimity and the avoidance of simony in a fresh election (id. 257-8, 260-1). Eanbald's idea, if seriously entertained at all, was never carried out. His last official act was the coronation of Eardulf, king of Northumbria, on 25th of June, A.D. 796. On the 10th of August the archbishop died at a monastery called Etlete or Edete (Symeon, Chron. p. 34). T. Stubbs (col. 1697) calls it Aclete. It may possibly be Elmete (Leeds?), where there was a monastery in Beda's time. Eanbald's remains were interred with those of his predecessor in his minster at York. Alcuin, writing after his decease to Arno, archbishop of Salzburg, solicits his prayers for Eanbald, who was, he says, "mihi pater et frater et amicus fidelissimus, etiam et condiscipulus sub magistro meo." (Epp. p. 324.)

There are silver and copper coins of Eanbald in existence struck by him during his archiepiscopate. [J. R.]

EANBALD II. (ENBALD, HEANBALD, EANTBALD), archbishop of York, following Eanbald I. Our information of him, which extends only through a period of about twelve years, is derived chiefly from the epistles of Alcuin; and among the historians we are the most indebted to Simeon of Durham. Eanbald was trained in the school of York, where he was a favourite pupil of Alcuin. His name first occurs in the correspondence of Alcuin in the latter days of Eanbald I. Alcuin in an epistle to the brethren of the church of York (ep. 6. ed. Froben) speaks of having received their letter through the presbyter Eanbald, and Froben, dating the epistle A.D. 793, rightly concludes that the presbyter was he who afterwards became Eanbald II., referring to Hoveden's statement that Eanbald presbyter of York was the successor of Eanbald I. (see Hoved. ann. 796, ed. Stubbs, i. 16). Since Froben's time there has been found among the Cotton manuscripts a passage (Mon. Alc. ep. 35, p. 254; Haddan and Stubbs, Concil. iii. 500), purporting to be a continuation of ep. 6, stating that Eanbald was unable to return home, being detained by a severe illness with Alcuin, who was in attendance on Charles the Great in Saxony. Charles is known to have been in Saxony in the summer of 796, so that the date 793 has been given up in favour either of 796 (as Haddan and Stubbs) or 795 (as Mon. Alcuin. ed. Jaffé, p. 252). There does not seem any sufficient reason to doubt that the presbyter Eanbald of the new passage is identical with the presbyter Eanbald of ep. 6, and the second archbishop of the name. No translation to the northern metropolitan see from another see had yet occurred; every archbishop had been elevated direct from the presbyterate (see Stubbs, Reg. Sac. in locis). Alcuin in the next epistle (ep. 49, Frob. Aug. 796; ep. 37, Mon. Alc. A.D. 795; H. and S. iii. 499, A.D. 499) addresses one whom he calls "dominus omnium dilectissimus," and Alcuin "his son" is prevented coming to him by a sharp fever and king Charles's detention in Saxony; Alcuin longs to see him again, and trusts he may find him enjoying the same honour in which he left him; he rejoices in the intelligence of his prosperity brought to him by Eanbald (who is not here designated "presbyter," only "famulus vester," but Froben thinks he is perhaps the presbyter of ep. 6); a new archbishop is about to be appointed, and Alcuin beseeches this "dominus" to permit no violence against the church of God, and to take care that the brethren have a free election. Froben does not attempt to identify the person here addressed; in Haddan and Stubbs he is "a powerful man"; but in the Mon. Alc. he is assumed, and we think with much probability, to be none else than archbishop Eanbald I., who in that case would be meditating resignation. It is at all events clear that a formidable danger was menacing the succession at York, and Alcuin was employing his great influence in securing the free action of the clergy in the appointment. Alcuin's next letter reveals another danger. It is addressed to his "beloved friends at York." (Ep. 48, Frob. A.D. 796; ep. 36, Mon. Alc. A.D. 795; H. and S. iii. 500, A.D. 796.) Alcuin urges that should it be necessary for them to elect an archbishop before he could reach them (implying, as Froben notices, that he was a member of their body and had a voice in the election) they would proceed with scrupulous integrity and tolerate no manner of simoniacal doings. In the most solemn terms he bids them maintain their old unsullied reputation in the choice of their archbishop. One more letter belongs to this crisis (ep. 39, Mon. Alc. A.D. 795). It is from the presbyter Eanbald to archbishop Eanbald, reporting his return from abroad, and delivering a letter he has brought him from Alcuin, so that there is a strong presumption that the "dominus" was the archbishop, whose "famulus" the presbyter might well have been termed. Eanbald I. died Aug. 10, 796, and Eanbald II. was consecrated on Sunday, Aug. 14 (A

S. C. ann. 796; Simeon of Durham's Sus. lay, Aug. 13, being an error, as Aug. 13 was Saturday.) As the vacancy lasted but four days, it is obvious that Alcuin's letters from Saxony were written before it occurred and while it was in expectation. Matters seem to have stood thus: Eanbald I. feeling the approach of death meditated retirement; the court was watching the event and preparing to force its nominee; the presbyter Eanbald, as the candidate favoured by the archbishop and the best of the cathedral body, was sent to Alcuin to obtain his adhesion and procure his return to England for the purpose of protecting the intended appointment; the archbishop died, and the election was made at the earliest possible moment. The subsequent views obtained of Eanbald II. are consistent with this account of the crisis; the new archbishop has to deal with a worldly-minded clergy and a hostile court, but he is constantly supported and encouraged by letters from Alcuin. It may be remarked that an unsettled state of affairs similarly led Augustine of Canterbury to consecrate Laurentius to succeed him (Bed. H. E. ii. 4), as well as Ethelbert (or Albert) of York to appoint his successor [EANBALD I.]. The consecration of Eanbald II. took place in the monastery of Sochasburg, not in York cathedral, the officiating bishops being the three suffragans of the province, Ethelbert of Hexham, Higbald of Lindisfarne, Badulf of Withern (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 796, M. H. B. 669 d; Chron. de Mailros, ann. 796), the archbishop of Canterbury not being among them. Sochasburg (as Simeon writes it), where also Higbald had been consecrated (A. S. C. ann. 780, "Soccabyrig"), is thought by Lambard (Dict. Angl. Topog. 1730, p. 334) and by others since to be Sockburn on the Tees, an old place of some curious traditions; but Surtees questions this identification, and argues for Sadberge, a spot to the north of it, likewise of interesting and still more ancient memories. (Surt. Hist. Durh. iii. 243, 265.) No monastery, however, seems to be remembered at either spot. Soon after his consecration Eanbald received a long letter from Alcuin (ep. 50, Frob. cir. Aug. 796; Mon. Alc. p. 72, post. Aug. 10, 796; H. and S. iii. 501, A.D. 796), which graphically exhibits that good man's ideal of an archbishop, while it also discloses some of the weak points in the court of a Northumbrian prelate of his period. Eanbald should be on his guard against the seductions of secular pomp, the luxuries of the table, the vanities of dress, the voice of adulation; nor must he be daunted by detractors; let him not be a reed shaken by the wind, nor a ruined wall, nor a house upon the sand, but a temple of the living God, established upon a rock and inhabited by the Holy Spirit. In his retinue should be found men of worth rather than those who affect the vanities of attire; not men who halloo after the fox, but such as will accompany him in his rides, melodiously chanting the psalter (for further illustrations of which see concerning abbat Ceolfred in Bed. Vit. Abbat. Smith, 302, 30 sq., and other instances in Mabillon, de Cursu Gallic. 433, § 73, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 413). Never should he be robed in the pallium of sacred benediction without the ministry of attendant deacons; there should be subdeacons likewise, with all the other ranks in due gradation, so that the church, which is septiform in the gifts of the Spirit, may shine in a septiform distinction of ecclesiastical degrees, all occupying their proper positions and vested according to their rank. The clerics in comely apparel, in demeanour staid, should in their singing avoid all swagger of tone, and seek to please God rather than man. Nor let them disdain to make themselves acquainted with the rules of the Ordo Romanus (the earliest historical mention of which work is believed to occur in this passage, Alc. Opp. Frob. i. 66, note f; H. and S. iii. 504 note); for in thus imitating the chief of the churches of Christ they will earn St. Peter's blessing. In another letter of advice (ep. 57, Frob.; H. and S. iii. 505, A.D. 796), Alcuin strongly recommends him the use of Gregory's Pastoral, which he should read and re-read, taking it with him wherever he went.

It was on Sept. 8, 797 (A. & C. ad ann.), when the Nativity of St. Mary was celebrated (Sam. Dan. G. R. A., true reading of the date in Surtees Soc. ed. p. 34), that Eanbald, having received the pallium from Rome, was "solemnly confirmed in the episcopate of the Northumbrians," but in what the confirmation consisted Simeon, who alone mentions it, does not state, and he may be simply using the language of his own day. He was the fourth archbishop of York (not the third, as Malmes. G. R. i. § 65, ed. Hardy) reckoning from Egbert, and the tenth bishop counting from Paulinus. The contemporary king of Northumbria was Eardulf, whose accession was about three months before Eanbald's, and the archbishop of Canterbury was Ethelhard. His first recorded metropolitanical act was the consecration, on Oct. 29, 797, of Hardred bishop of Hexham at Wudaforda, assisted by his suffragan Higbald of Lindisfarne. (Rich. of Hexham, cap. 8, Twysd. col. 299; Sam. Dan. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 669 e, "Wudaforda"; A. & C. ann. 797 does not mention Higbald nor the place.) The localities of all the consecrations held by Eanbald are mentioned, but not one of them, nor even the place of his own consecration, was York, an indication possibly of a hostile court influence in that city. Another letter of Alcuin to Eanbald, whom he now begins, after his whim [ALCUIN], to call "Symeon" (Ep. 171, Frob. "de anno et loco minime constat"; H. and S. iii. 507, A.D. 796, or later), discloses growing difficulties. Alcuin sympathises with him in certain trials (not further indicated) which have accompanied his elevation; he replies to inquiries respecting the Liber Medicus; again, and with much point, he returns to the Ordo Romanus, his language plainly shewing that the book was meeting with anything but a welcome at York. He hopes that in the faith and piety of his son Eanbald he will himself survive after death, while he trusts that sacred studies will never be neglected at York to render all the pains he once took in the collection of books a labour lost. With this letter Alcuin sends a present of four cups ('caucelli'), and a hundred pounds of 'stagnum' (stannum, tin) for covering the 'domuscula cloccarum' (the bell-tower, as Raine understands it) "propter ornamentum et loci celebritatem." It is to be observed in reference to Eanbald's troubles that in these last days of the heptarchal church the archbishops of both provinces were at feud with their sovereigns. Ethelhard of Canterbury with the Mercian king æthelstan ruled the south, and Eanbald with Eardulf. The temporary establishment of a Mercian archbishopric [HIGBERT] proves how intense was the quarrel in the southern and strongest division of England. This community of trouble drew the two archbishops together to a degree that was quite unusual in those days as compared with the intercourse they each had with foreign churches (H. and S. iii. 520). In 798 we find Alcuin counselling Ethelhard to confer with Eanbald in reference to the great schism then established in Mercia (Ep. 60, Frob.; H. and S. iii. 520). To this year also belongs the most interesting of all the actual facts recorded of Eanbald's archiepiscopate—his assembling a synod at Pincanhalth (on the supposed identity of which with Finchale, near Durham, see note in H. and S. iii. 444). Neither Surtees nor Raine could venture to affirm the identity. Raine, Priory of Finchale, pref. pp. xii. xiii.). The synod of Pincanhalth (again it is some other place rather than York) is worthy of notice on several accounts. It is the first Northumbrian synod of which any particular account survives since that of Whitby, in 664, so fully reported by Bede, and the synod of Whitby was not exclusively Northumbrian. The synodal history of the northern province is naturally more scanty than that of the southern (see obscure gatherings in Haddan and Stubbs under the years 678, 679, 701, 705, 787). Eanbald's synod of Pincanhalth is the only one presided over by a northern archbishop at which a declaration of faith is recorded, and in this respect there are two synods of the south with which it may be compared—Haethfelth under Theodore in 680 (Bed. H. E. iv. 17; H. and S. iii. 141), and Celchyth under Jaenbert in 787 (H. and S. iii. 444). It may be noted also that the Paschal controversy, which was a grand topic at Whitby, is prominent here again at Pincanhalth, shewing that the old Celtic and anti-Roman party of the north had not died out, another token of which may be gathered from the cold reception of the Ordo Romanus already noticed. Finally, the synod of Pincanhalth was the last in the north previous to the downfall of the Northumbrian church under the Danes, and its latest testimony was according to the orthodoxy of the day. This synod therefore ought certainly to have received more attention than it has had from the modern historians of the heptarchal church (see a brief and quite exceptional notice in Collier, Eccles. Hist. i. 339). It was attended, writes Simeon of Durham, by many great laymen (principales) and ecclesiastics, who "consulted on many things affecting the interest of God's holy church and the nation of the Northumbrians and of all the provinces, and concerning the observance of the Paschal feast, and of decisions divine and secular which were made in the days of righteous kings and good dukes and holy bishops and other wise men, monks and clerics, of whose wisdom and justice, and divine virtues the state of the kingdom of the Northumbrians was at that time sweetly and unspeakably redolent. They took care by wise counsel to make arrangements for the honour of God and the necessities of his servants, and to augment the service of God, that for these things they might receive the good recompense of eternal reward. The lord bishop Eanbald commanded the faith of the five councils to be recited." Here Simeon indicates the dogmatic articles from The History of the Angles, in a rough quotation from Bede's account of the synod of Haethfelth, and concludes: "Having asserted and confirmed these things they returned home, praising God for all his benefits" (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 798, Stevenson's transl. p. 460). The synod of Haethfelth in 680 was of course unable to affirm the sixth council (on the Monothelite heresy), that council commencing its sessions only in the same year; but why the sixth council was passed over at Pincanhalth also does not appear; perhaps this northern synod held it sufficient to adopt the precedent preserved by the great northern historian. The synod of Celchyth in 787 accepted the sixth council as well as the first five; but it was too early for it to express an opinion on the seventh council (on image worship), which was sitting only in that year. To this extent, then, the primitive church of England, as represented by these three synods, committed itself in dogma to the great conciliar decisions of its times. It never committed itself beyond. In 798 the seventh council was a recent event, and its decision on the image question was exciting great controversy. Alcuin, in the newly-discovered passage of his ep. 6, speaks of the dangers and divisions of the Catholic faith which he was resisting abroad; the image question was without a doubt the great disturber, and Eanbald, being then in conference with Alcuin, must have witnessed his uncompromising attitude in regard to it. The ignoring of the seventh council at the synod of Pincanhalth so soon afterwards was a victory on Alcuin's side in his own country, and may well be regarded as a sign of his influence.

To proceed chronologically with Eanbald; in the year 800 another of the suffragans of York, Eadbert bishop of Hexham, is consecrated, and the archbishop may be assumed to have officiated though he is not expressly mentioned (Rich. of Hexham, capp. 18, 19, in Twysd. X. Scriptt. col. 299). The consecration was at Ethingaham. In 800 or 801, Alcuin once more and for the last recorded time, addressed "the son of his prayers Symeon sacerdos" (Ep. 174, Frob. A.D. 800; Mon. Alc. ep. 80, p. 620, post, Ap. 3, 801; H. and S. iii. 534, A.D. 801). Here the archbishop's troubles come more distinctly into view. Alcuin suspects that they may have arisen partly from Eanbald himself, in case he has harboured the king's enemies or protected their possessions. If he suffers justly, why is he disturbed? If unjustly, he should remember the tribulations of the saints. Let him not, however, think of forsaking his church, but rather await the martyr's crown. Thus was Eanbald warned against a desertion of his flock like that so severely blamed by Alcuin in his brother archbishop of the south. Eanbald must stand fast as the standard-bearer of Christ. Let him remember how the venerable Mattathias, in the peril of death, exhorted his sons to contend against the Lord's adversaries. Eanbald has seen how kings and princes who persecuted his predecessors and the church of Christ came to untimely ends; let him be patient and prayerful; God will perhaps convert his opponents from foes to friends. This being the state of affairs, it may well be suspected that the recent synod of Pincanhalth was implicated in the dispute. Eminent laymen were present but not the king, though secular affairs as well as ecclesiastical were discussed; it was a quasi-parliamentary gathering under the archbishop, and may have been a general rallying-point of the Northumbrians to the spiritual power in opposition to the royal authority, for Eardulf was at strife with his lay subjects as well as with the great ecclesiastic, and in 808 was a fugitive from his throne.

In the year 800 Alcuin writes (Ep. 175; Frob. A.D. 800) that he has heard of the affliction of his beloved "Symeon." Calvinus and Cuculus must exhort him to be of good courage; his predecessors in the see had to endure the like; nay, all the saints have been sufferers, and the Baptist died a martyr to the truth. But let "Symeon" be jealous of any other cause of suffering than that of declaring the truth; for Alcuin fears he may be courting trial through his territorial wealth, and his harbouring the enemies of the king. And why does he number so many soldiers in his train? Apparently it is out of compassion to others, but that is a short-sighted compassion which injures the many, even the good, while seeming to benefit the few, and those perhaps not innocent. For "Symeon" is injuring the monasteries, when he takes a crowd of such followers into them to be entertained with him on his visits; never had his predecessors so numerous a retinue. From these expressions, and from other indications noticed in the course of this article, we seem to view a prelate generally on the move, keeping the rural roads, travelling from monastery to monastery, never far from the lands of the see, and scarcely, if at all, abiding in the city of York. Medallist testimony points much the same way, disclosing a great lord who coins his own money to circulate from the monasteries, and on the estates of the church. Mr. Edward Hawkins observes that the earliest known coins of the see of York, next to those of archbishop Egbert, belong to Eanbald, whose coins he was once disposed to regard as the earliest of all (1st ed. 1841, p. 53); and this Eanbald he concludes to be the second archbishop of the name from the fact that all the types and moneyers on his coins appear likewise on the coins of king Eanred, in whose reign Eanbald II. died. Nor is it without significance that in a hoard of 8000 coins found at Hexham in 1833 those of Eanbald were numerous enough to have made the specimens common, while out of 10,000 discovered at York in 1842 not more than one of Eanbald was found. (Hawkins, Silver Coins of England, 2nd ed. 1876, pp. 73, 109.)

In 801 Eanbald is mentioned in a letter of Alcuin addressed to Ethelhard (Ep. 173, Frob. A.D. 800; Mon. Alc. ep. 171, A.D. 801, p. 616; H. and S. iii. 532, A.D. 801). Alcuin is pleased that the two archbishops have met and conferred, one result of which he trusts will be that the churches of Christ will be exalted in honour, and the lives of those who minister in them will be amended. Very corrupt have those lives been, hardly above the level of the vain laity. Clergy and people seem to differ in nothing but the tonsure.

There occurs another consecration by him of a suffragan, Egbert of Lindisfarne, probably on Trinity Sunday, June 11, 803, Eanbert of Hexham, Badulf of Withern, "and other bishops" assisting, the place being Biguella (Sim. Dun. Hist. Ch. Durham, Stevenson's note; Stubbs, Reg. Sac. p. 9). In 808 Eanbald is mentioned in the correspondence of pope Leo III. with the emperor Charles, in connexion with the expulsion of Eardulf from his kingdom, but it is uncertain what were the archbishop's relations with the dethroned king and his rival (H. and S. iii. 564, note); one of the letters shews Eanbald opposed, as well as the archbishop of Canterbury (now Wulfred), to Kenulf king of Mercia, who ruled in the south (Ep. of Leo III. to Charles, Mansi, Concil. xiii. 969; Mon. Carolina, ed. Jaffé, 311; H. and S. iii. 563); in another letter he is again mentioned, but with no light; he has sent a despatch to Charles, but his messenger has misunderstood his business, and offended the emperor by proceeding to Rome before delivering it (Mansi, xiii. 974; Patr. Lat. xcvi. 535; H. and S. iii. 565.)

Here ends the clear contemporary light cast upon this Northumbrian metropolitan. It is but a few glimmers we get of him after this. The "praesul Eantbaldu," who loves pope Leo in Alcuin's poem (Carm. 226, Opp. ii. 228, Prob.) is probably Eanbald.

Eanbald was evidently on a visit to Alcuin when this little poem was written. There is independent proof that after his elevation to the see Eanbald was with Alcuin, but at what date cannot be determined, except that it must have been between 800 and 807, while George was patriarch of Jerusalem. In a letter to that prelate (Ep. 183, Frob.) Alcuin begs his intercessory prayers for "Symeon, bishop," for Onias and Martinus "sacerdotes," for Nathanael, archdeacon, and others, adding, "Who are with us, and never cease to intercede for your beatitude." As Alcuin died May 19, 804, the interval for this visit is defined within narrow limits.

How long Eanbald II. lived after 808 is uncertain. Simeon of Durham says that his successor, Wulfsey, was archbishop in the reign of Eanred (Sim. Dun. Epist. de Archiep. Flor., Opp. Surt. Soc. p. 134), and 812 is the year some have supposed (Raine, Archbishops of York, p. 111). Pits attributes to Eanbald II. a work entitled Decreta Synodalia (Pits, Angl. S. Theol. 164), and Tanner repeats the statement (Tann. Bibl. Brit. 248), but as Raine observes, without any foundation. [C. H.]

EANBERCHT, denounced with Hunraed and two others by Boniface archbishop of Mainz, in his Life of Willibald, as false brethren, who in the name of religion seduced the people into heresy. (Monum. Mogunt. p. 453, ed. Jaffé.) [C. H.]

EANBERHT (1), one of five presbyters in Thuringia, whom Lullus archbishop of Mainz directs to arrange in their localities for public prayers and a week of abstinence to avert a plague of rain which was then afflicting the country. Each was likewise requested to offer thirty masses for the deceased bishop of Rome, who is not named, and ten masses for the two now Magenfrith and Hraban. During the episcopate of Lullus three bishops of Rome died, so that this letter may belong to any of the years 757, 767, or 772. (Monum. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, 281.) [C. H.]

EANBERHT (2), an abbat to whom Ethelbald king of Mercia, in a charter attested by Cynewulf, of Wessex, and the West-Saxon bishops and abbats, granted lands "in dominium Christi ecclesiae." (Kemble, C. D. 100, A.D. 755-757.) The list of abbats of Malmesbury recently discovered by Mr. Birch contains the name of Aeambriht, who may be identified with this person and possibly with Eaba [EABA (2)]. (Birch, Abbats of Malm. p. 6.) [S.]

EANBERHT (3), ealdorman of the Hwicci, and brother of Aldred and Uhtred. (Kemble, C. D. 102, 105.) The three brothers were benefactors to Worcester from 755 to 770. [HWICCI.] [S.]

EANBERHTTA (Cod. Dip. 100; Birch, Abbats of Malmesb. p. 6; id. Fasti Monast. 68), abbat. [EANBERHT (2); EABA (2).] [C. H.]

EANBERT (EADBERT; EANBERHT; OSBERT), bishop of Hexham, between Heardred and Tidferth. Richard of Hexham states that he was ordained at Ethingaham, A.D. 800, and sat fourteen years; but the Saxon Chronicle places his death in 806. His episcopate fell in the reign of Eardulf, king of Northumbria, and his metropolitan was Eanbald II. archbishop of York. Nothing further is known of him. (Ricard. Hagulst. cap. 18, 19 in Twysd. Scriptores, coll. 299, 300; Wend. Flor. Hist. ann. 800, ed. Coxe; A. S. C. ann. 806; Stubbs, Regist. Sac. 9, 181.) [C. H.]

EANBRYTH (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 800 in M. H. B. 671), bishop of Hexham. [EANBERT.] [C. H.]

EANBURGA, an abbess mentioned in a questionable charter of Offa, belonging to Worcester, and dated 781. In this the king confirms to Eanburga, for her life, lands in Homtune and Faehhaleage, which bishop Heathored had given her, subject to the rights of the mother church of Worcester. (Kemble, C. D. 141.) [S.]

EANFERTH, bishop of Elmham. [EANFRITH (3).]

EANFLED (1), a name inscribed on the fourth tablet of the taller pyramid in the cemetery at Glastonbury, which William of Malmesbury describes as of great antiquity. (Malm. G. R. i. § 21, ed. Hardy.) [C. H.]

EANFLED (2) (EONFLED), daughter of Edwin king of Northumbria, by his second wife Ethelburga of Kent. She was born on Easter Sunday, A.D. 626. On her birth Paulinus, who was the queen's chaplain, ascribed the safety of the mother and child to God's answer to his prayers, and Edwin, who was then wavering between Christianity and paganism, allowed Paulinus to baptize the infant. The ceremony was performed on Whitsunday. (Bed. H. E. ii. 9.) On the death of her father, in A.D. 633, the princess was carried by her mother into Kent. (Id. ii. 20.) About A.D. 643 she became the wife of Oswy king of Northumbria id. iii. 15), who at her request gave Ingetlingum (Gilling?) to Trumheri, to be the site of a monastery in memory of the murdered Oswin (id. iii. 24). Eanfled was a great patroness of religion, observing the Roman method of counting Easter, and having a chaplain of her own, named Romanus (iii. 15). It was by her assistance that the youthful Wilfrid was enabled to pay his first visit to Rome. (Eddi, cap. p. 213; Bed. H. E. v. 19.) Eanfled was buried with her husband at Whitby, in the monastery of which her daughter Elfleda was subsequently the abbess. (Bed. H. E. iii. 24.) [J. R.]

EANFRID (1) (ANFRID, EANFRITH), a son of Ethelfrid king of Northumbria, and himself king of Bernicia on the death of Edwin in A.D. 633. During his predecessor's reign he had been in exile with his brothers in Scotland, where he had been converted to Christianity and baptized. On becoming king he apostatized. In the following year he was treacherously slain by Caedwalla, whom he had incautiously sought with twelve chosen knights to sue for peace (Bed. H. E. iii. 1). [J. R.]

EANFRID (2) (Kemble, C. D. 198, A.D. 808, an error for 758 [EADULF (3)]), bishop. [EANFRITH (3).] [C. H.]

EANFRIGIDUS, Alcuin's agent on the continent. Alcuin in 790 writes from England to his disciple Josephus abroad begging him to send for Eanfrigidus, and confer with him as to the transmission of some silver, the proceeds apparently of his villa of Vurmec, and a goat's-hair dress, "vestimentum caprinum." (Mon. Alcuin. ed. Jaffé, p. 171, ep. 16, not in Froben's collection.) [C. H.]

EANFRITH (1) (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 593, 634; M. H. B. 526 b, 528 e; id. Geneal. Reg. North. M. H. B. 632), king of Bernicia. [EANFRID (1).] [C. H.]

EANFRITH (2), king of the Hwicci, brother of Eanhere and father of Eaba queen of the South Saxons (Bede, H. E. iv. 13), about the year 661. He was probably father or near kinsman of Osric and Oshere, who, in the next generation, were benefactors of the Mercian churches. [HWICCI.] [S.]

EANFRITH (3) (EANFERTH), the fifth bishop of Elmham, called Lanferth in the printed lists. (M. H. B. 618.) His name occurs between that of Ethelfrith, who was consecrated in 736, and that of Ethelwulf, who attested a charter of 781. He may thus be identified with Eanfrith, who attests the grant of Cynwulf of Wessex to Bath in 758 (Kemble, C. D. 193, for date cf. EADULF (3)), and possibly with the bishop Eanfrith, who, having been a monk of Glastonbury, died, according to William of Malmesbury, in 782. (Antt. Glaston. ap. Gale, p. 325.) [S.]

EANGHEARD, a priest of Canterbury, who subscribes a charter of archbishop Wulfred, dated April 21, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 195.) [S.]

EANGIST, a disciple of Alcuin, who is said to have been cured of his toothache by a touch of his master's comb. (Vit. Alcuini Auct. Anonym. ap. Mon. Alcuin. p. 33, ed. Jaffé.) [C. H.]

EANGITHA, an English abbess, mother of Heaburga otherwise called Bugga. [BUGGA (2).] A letter is extant addressed by her to St. Boniface, to be dated between 719 and 722. In this she complains of her many cares, the poverty of her monastic estate, the hostility of the king, and the fewness of her relations. She refers also to the abbess Wale as her spiritual mother, and recommends a brother named Denewald to the good offices of Boniface. (Bonif. Epist. 14; Mon. Moguntina, p. 66.) If the identification of Bugga, or Heaburga, with Eadburga abbess of Minster, be allowed, then Eangitha must have been the widow of Centwin king of Wessex, and sister of Eormenburga queen of Northumbria. It is perhaps safer not to rely too much on the identification. [S.]

EANHERE, brother of Eanfrith, king or viceroy of the Hwicci. [EANFRITH (2).] [S.]

EANMUND (1) (Kemble, C. D. 114, between A.D. 759 and 765), king in Kent. [EALHMUND.] [C. H.]

EANMUND (2), founder and first abbat of a monastery of St. Peter, in Northumbria, the history of which, written by the monk Ethelwulf, is dedicated to bishop Egbert of Lindisfarne. [ETHELWULF (2).] [S.]

EANRED (1), presbyter of the diocese of Leicester, who attested the acts of the council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024.) [C. H.]

EANRED (2), king of Northumbria, who succeeded Elfwold or Alfwold, A.D. 810, and reigned thirty-two or thirty-three years. Within the period embraced by this work, he was contemporary with Eanbald II. and Wulfsey archbishops of York, Egbert bishop of Lindisfarne, and Tidferth bishop of Hexham. (Symeon Dun. ed. Surtees Soc. pp. 134, 211, 219; Wend. F. H. ann. 810.) On Eanred's coins, see E. Hawkins, Silver Coins of Eng. ed. Kenyon, pp. 71-73. [C. H.]

EANSWITHA (EANSWIDA), a daughter of Eadbald king of Kent, who lived a virgin and was buried at Folkestone. (Flor. Wig. in M. H. B. 627, 635; Elmham, Hist. Aug. pp. 175, 176.) Her life (printed by Capgrave, fo. 97, and in the AA. SS. Bolland. Aug. vol. vi. pp. 686, 687) says that Eadbald built her a church at Folkestone, which was dedicated to St. Peter, near which she founded a nunnery, with a church of her own. She was asked in marriage by a king of Northumbria, but refused him. The day of her death was Aug. 31; the year is given as 640 or 673, alike without authority. Her relics, which had been at first buried in her own church, were subsequently translated to St. Peter's. The present church of Folkestone is dedicated to her conjointly with St. Mary, and that of Brensett, in Kent, is dedicated to her sole honour. On the seal of the corporation of Folkestone she appears carrying two fishes in a half-noop. (Parker, Anglican Calendar, p. 229, quoting Huser's Emblems of the Saints. See also Mon. Angl. i. 451; Hardy, Cat. Mat. Br. Hist. i. 228, 229, 382.) [S.]

EANTBALD. This name with the title of praesul occurs in a poem of Alcuin addressed to pope Leo III. Eantbald is sending presents to Leo, and Alcuin sends a poem by his messenger. It is thought that Eantbald is the archbishop of York, Eanbald II., so often mentioned in Alcuin's works. (Alc. Carm. 226; Opp. ii. 228, ed. Froben.) [C. H.]

EANULF (1), a Mercian noble, son of Osmod and kinsman of Ethelbald king of Mercia (716-757). He founded the monastery of Bredon, in Worcestershire, about the year 716, with the advice of Ethelbald, who began to reign in that year, and of Egwin bishop of Worcester, who died soon after. His monastery was dedicated to St. Peter, and archbishop Tatwin was educated there. Eanulf was grandfather to king Offa, who was a great benefactor of Bredon. (Kemble, C. D. 120, 138, 140, 248, 261.) Besides Bredon, Eanulf had a grant of land at Westbury, which subsequently was given to Worcester. (Kem. C. D. 166; Monast. Angl. i. 607; vi. 1625.) [S.]

EANULF (2), a presbyter addressed by Alcuin in or before the year 804. Alcuin was then abroad, but where Eanulf was is not apparent. Eanulf, who had been a disciple of Alcuin, is counselled, among other things, not to wander about in his ministry, but remain where he was appointed to serve. The letter, which shews that he was a presbyter bound to regular discipline, gives a hint of what had been his previous life, and what were some of the temptations and difficulties of his office. (Alcuin, Ep. 226, ed. Froben.; Ep. 281, Mon. Alcuin.) [C. H.]

EANWALD, a priest of Worcester, who attests a charter of bishop Deneberht in or about 802. (Kemble, C. D. 181.) [S.]

EANWLF, an abbat of a monastery, unnamed, who addresses Lullus archbishop of Mainz, May 24, 773, expressing gratitude for a letter received from him and a deep sense of the honour. On the following day, May 25, he addresses Charles king of the Franks. It was about two years after Charles's accession, and when his expeditions against the pagan Saxons had commenced. The abbat counsels him to be zealous for their conversion, hunt down (in-squere) idolaters, overthrow their temples, reform their manners by severity, by gentleness, by good example; Christ will then reward him in the next life, besides giving him a glorious name on earth to future ages. (Monum. Magunt. ed. Jaffe, pp. 282, 283.) The letter indicates how the church was watching the opening career of the great Frank. [C. H.]

EAPPA, one of the priests of Wilfrid, who materially assisted him in A.D. 678 in the conversion of Sussex, baptizing many of the people (Bed. H. E. iv. 13). He afterwards became the head of the monastery of Selsey, and probably gave to bishop Acca an account of a miraculous vision at that place, with which his name is connected (Id. iv. 14). Eappa is not mentioned by Eddi. [J. R.]

EARCOMBERT, king of Kent, son of Eadbald and Emma, succeeded his father Eadbald in

640, and reigned until 664. According to the later writers he was younger than his brother Eormenred [EORMENRED], and secured the succession either by the will of his father (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 646), or by usurping the rights of his infant nephews (Elmham, pp. 176, 184), Ethelbert and Ethelred. Bede, however, says nothing about this, but describes Earcombert as a zealous Christian king, as the first English king who by his royal authority ordered the worship of idols to be abolished, and as having directed the observance of the Lent fast (H. E. iii. 8; Chr. S. in M. H. B. 310) under severe penalties. No laws, however, bearing the name of Earcombert have been preserved. He married Sexburga, the elder daughter of Anna king of the East Angles, who, after his death, became abbess of Sheppey, and subsequently succeeded her sister St. Etheldreda as abbess of Ely. By Sexburga Earcombert was the father of St. Earcongota (Bed. H. E. iii. 8), St. Eormenhild (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 627), and Egbert and Hlothere, who successively reigned in Kent. Earcombert is mentioned by Eddius (c. 3) and Bede (H. E. v. 19) as welcoming Wilfrid in his first visit to Kent, and Eddius in particular enlarges on the assistance afforded by Earcombert. Notwithstanding his piety, Earcombert does not occur as a monastic benefactor. He died after a reign of twenty-four years, July 14, 664, the same day as archbishop Deusdedit (Bede, H. E. iv. 1), and was buried at St. Augustine's. (Thorn. c. 1769.) [S.]

EARCONGOTA, the daughter of Earcombert, king of Kent, by his wife Sexburga. She is described by Bede (H. E. iii. 8) as a virgin of great virtue, and as a nun of the monastery of Farmoutier in Brie, recently founded by St. Fara or Burgundofara. Bede says that many stories were told of Earcongota's miraculous powers, and gives an account of the circumstances of her death. As the time, of which she had warning, approached, she visited the cells of the sisters and asked their prayers. She had seen a band of white-clad men approach the monastery, and when she asked their errand was told that they were come to fetch the coin of gold that had come from Kent. Some of the faithful saw her soul carried off by angels; her body was laid in the church of St. Stephen. (See Bede, H. E. iii. 8; Elmham, p. 191; AA. SS. Boil. 25 Feb. iii. 387, 388, 759; Hardy, Cat. Materials for British History, i. 369, 370.) Her life, written by John of Tynemouth, is still in MS. William of Malmesbury (G. R. lib. i. § 11) places Earcongota at Chelles, not at Farmortier. [S.]

EARCONUALD (Bed. H. E. iv. 6 M. H. B. 217 d), bishop of London. [ERKENWALD.] [C. H.]

EARDRED, the third bishop of Dunwich after the division of the East Anglian diocese. (M. H. B. 618.) There is great difficulty in assigning the dates and even the relative position of the bishops of Dunwich. Aldberht, the bishop mentioned by Bede at the close of his work (H. E. v. 23) appears as the fifth bishop in the ancient list; if both these authorities are right, Eardred's date must fall within the first thirty years of the 8th century. If again he is identified with Eardulf, the East Anglian (Symeon, 37). In the next year another dangerous rival was arrested and slain at Eardulf's bidding, Alchmund son of Alcred, who was really the legitimate heir to the Northumbrian throne (Symeon, 38). Three enemies having been thus removed, Eardulf, in A.D. 801, led an army against Kenulf king of Mercia, whom he accused of harbouring and encouraging the conspirators against his life. No bloodshed, however, occurred, the bishops and nobles making peace between the intending combatants (Symeon, 39). These, however, were troublous times in Northumbria. Archbishop Eanbald II., like king Kenulf, found it necessary to keep soldiers in his retinue for protection, and is said to have protected the lands and persons of the foes of Eardulf. Alcuin blames him for this conduct (Epp. 621, 623), probably seeing that the only chance for Northumbria was having a stern king like Eardulf at its head. At last, in A.D. 808, a competitor of the name of Alfwold drove Eardulf from his kingdom. He was too active to be long in exile. He visited Charlemagne and pope Leo, who suspected archbishop Eanbald and king Kenulf of hatching the successful conspiracy, and in A.D. 809 the banished sovereign was restored through the interposition of Charlemagne (Einhard, apud Duchesne, ii. 255; Bouquet, v. 602; Mabillon, Ann. Ben. ii. 383). In the following year Eardulf died, and transmitted his kingdom to his son Eanred, who was the last independent monarch of Northumbria.

During the reign of Eardulf the province of Galloway came into the possession of the Picts. There are coins of Eardulf in existence, and those struck by his son are exceedingly numerous.

[J. R.]

EARDULF (3) (HERDULF), a bishop of East Anglia, who was present at the council held at Clovesho in 747. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360.) As Eanfrith was at this time bishop of Elmham, Eardulf must have been bishop of Dunwich; but nothing more is known about him, and his name does not appear in the ancient lists. [S.]

EARDULF (4), the twelfth bishop of Rochester. (M. H. B. 616.) He first appears in a grant made by Eardulf, king of Kent, to Rochester, the date of which (762) is corrected by the names of the witnesses to 747. If this charter and its correction be trusted, Eardulf must have become bishop the very year in which his predecessor Dunno had attended the council of Clovesho (Kemble, C. D. 96), and have been involved in a contest about the rights of his church with a person called Walhun. His successor, Diona, appears first in 775. Eardulf's dates fall between these two limits. Besides the charter of king Eardulf, this bishop received other grants for Rochester; land at Woldham from king Ethelbert in 750, and land in the city of Rochester from Sigraed, king of half Kent, in 762. In 764 Offa and Sigraed gave him twenty ploughlands at Easingham, Frenesbury, and Wicham. (Ann. Roff. Ang. Sac. i. 341.) The charters by which these grants were secured are some of them preserved in the Textus Roffensis, but are not free from the suspicion of forgery, and add considerably to the difficulty of settling the chronology of the Kentish kings; see Kemble, C. D. 110, 111, 113, 114. The last two, which are less suspicious than the others, are of the time of archbishop Bregwin, and one is dated

765. Eardulf's name as witness also appears in a grant to Minster. (K. C. D. 112.) See Ang. Sac. i. 343. A more interesting relic of Eardulf is a letter addressed by him, in conjunction with Eardulf king of Kent, to Lullus of Mainz, the successor of St. Boniface. In this he calls Lullus the dearest of all bishops, addresses him as an intimate friend, and desires his prayers for both the Eardulfs. A little present, "reptis ruptilis," is sent with the letter; the bearer is the priest Laearored, and the names of three kinsmen are appended, for whom the prayers of Lullus are requested; Irmigi, Noththry and Dubcha. The date of the letter must of course be 755, or later, as in that year Lullus became bishop. (Mon. Mogunt. pp. 285, 286.) [S.]

EARDUULF (Kemble, C. D. 96), king of Kent. [EARDULF (1).] [C. H.]

EARDWLFUS (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 798 in M. H. B. 669 c, 670 a, 671 a, d), king of Northumbria. [EARDULF (2).] [C. H.]

EARNULF (Chron. Mailr. ann. 794), king of Northumbria. [EARDULF (2).] [C. H.]

EARPWALD (EORPWALD, AERTHWALD, Lb. Eliens. p. 13), the son of Redwald, king of the East Angles. Redwald had received Christianity in Kent, but had relapsed on returning to his own kingdom. Earpwald was converted under the influence of Edwin, king of Northumbria, and introduced Christianity into his dominions soon after Edwin's own conversion, and some time before the year 632, to which the event is referred by Florence of Worcester. (M. H. B. 528.) We have no account of the date of his succession to the throne. Shortly after his conversion he was murdered by a pagan named Ricbert. Smith, the editor of Bede, arguing from the chronology of the East Anglian bishops, places this event in 627; and Hussey remarks that at least twenty-eight years elapsed between the conversion of Earpwald and the death of archbishop Honorius (Bede, H. E. ii. 15), which would throw back the date to 625. The years of his reign are given by Lappenberg as 617-628. Redwald is last mentioned in 617. (Chr. S. M. H. B. 303.) Henry of Huntingdon ascribes the death of Earpwald to Penda. (M. H. B. 716.) [S.]

EASCULPH (Angl. Sac. i. 404), bishop of Dunwich. [ASTWULF.] [C. H.]

EASWINUS (Wend. F. H. ann. 673, 676, ed. Coxe), king of Wessex. [ESCWINE.] [C. H.]

EAST ANGLES, KINGS OF. The kingdom of the East Angles, which in its later extension was co-extensive with the diocese of Elmham, Thetford, or Norwich, comprised in its earlier stages, besides the modern counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, some of the frontier lands which were afterwards parts of Mercia. The fen country of the Gyrvi, extending from South Lincolnshire to South Cambridgeshire, which, after the consolidation of the Mercian power, was regarded as part of Mercia, was earlier a debatable land between Mercia and East Anglia, and earlier still was a part of East Anglia itself.

Ely, according to Bede, was in East Anglia (H. E. iv. 19); and Florence of Worcester and William of Malmesbury place Cambridgeshire also under the rule of the kings of the East Angles (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 644; W. Malmesb. G. R. ed. Hardy, lib. i. § 102). The East Angles were converted to Christianity before the Mercians, and hence probably the early foundation of the fen monasteries. The see of the first four bishops of the East Angles was at Dunwich, on the coast of Suffolk; the diocese was divided in 673 between two bishops, one of whom, at Elmham (Helmham, North Elmham), ruled Norfolk; the other, at Dunwich, ruled Suffolk. In the Danish ravages of 870 both lines of bishops were for a time extinguished, and when the church revived under the sons of Edward the Elder, Elmham was regarded as the sole see for the whole province.

The kings of the East Angles, within the period known to history, traced their descent from Woden through Wuffa in the ninth generation from the mythic patriarch. Wuffa (called by the hagiographers Offa) was father of Tytla or Tytil, who was father of Eni and Redwald. The East Angles must have been among the earliest of the German settlers; the details of their migrations are altogether unknown, but Henry of Huntingdon probably represents a true tradition when he asserts that, like Mercia, the East Anglian territory was long divided among a number of nameless "procerea." If Wuffa was the first who united the whole nation under one sceptre, this would account for the prominence given to him in the genealogy. As grandfather of Redwald he could hardly be dated earlier than 530 A.D. Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 714) gives him the title of king, and makes him a contemporary of Ceaulin, king of Wessex, cir. 571 A.D. The dates assigned in the later chronicles are of no authority whatever. Matthew Paris, however, following Henry of Huntingdon, dates Uffa in 571, and Tytil in 578. (Chron. Maj. ed. Luard, pp. 248, 249.)

The first Christian king was Redwald, the son of Tytil [REDWALD]. No date is assigned for his accession; he is counted by Bede as the fourth of the kings who exercised supremacy over the whole of Britain, and by the Saxon Chronicle as the fourth Bretwalda. Such a position he could have acquired only after the death of Ethelbert I. of Kent, in 616. (Bede, H. E. ii. 5; Chr. S. A. D. 827, M. H. B. 843.) The date of the conversion and relapse of Redwald cannot be fixed. Earpwald [EARPWALD] succeeded him, probably about 624. Ricbert, who killed Earpwald, was a pagan, and a period of anarchy followed the murder. Sigbert, son of Redwald, restored unity to the kingdom about 631, reigning conjointly for a few years with his kinsman Egric, who succeeded him on his resignation. Sigbert and Egric both perished in battle against Penda, about A.D. 636 (Flor. Wig.). Anna, son of Eni the brother of Redwald, succeeded [ANNA], and reigned until 654 (Chr. S. cf. Smith's Notes on Bede, H. E. iii. 18, 19). Ethelhere, brother of Anna, the next king, perished at the battle of Winwaed, A.D. 655 [ETHELHERE]. Here at last a definite date is found. Ethelwald, brother and successor of Ethelhere, died according to Florence (M. H. B. 532) in 664. Aldulf, son of Ethelhere, was in the seventeenth year of his reign in 680 (Bede, H. E. iv. 17). [ALDULF (1).] His accession is therefore definitely fixed. If the letter of pope Sergius on the appointment of archbishop Brihtwald (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 229) be genuine, Aldulf must have been alive in 692. Alfwald or Elfwald, his brother and successor, is mentioned in the genealogies without definite dates. There is a letter of a king Elfwald of the East Angles to St. Boniface, which must be dated about 747 (Mon. Mogunt. p. 210); and the death of Elfwald is given by Simon of Durham under the year 749 (M. H. B. 663). A king named Selred, who is called king of the East Angles, and made (Chr. Maior.) the predecessor of Elfwald, is really king of the East Saxons.

On the death of Elfwald, the East-Anglian kingdom was held conjointly or contemporaneously by two kings, whom Simon calls Alberht and Hunbeanna, who divided the kingdom. Hunbeanna is perhaps a misreading for the name of Boorna, who in the genealogy by Florence (M. H. B. 636) is made a contemporary of Offa, and, in the Chronicle of Florence (M. H. B. 544), is represented as king in 758. Boorna was succeeded by Ethelred, who was the father of St. Ethelbert [ETHELBERT (3)], who perished in 792. Edmund, the martyr king of 870, is the only other king of English race known to have borne the title. The obscurity and uncertainty of the whole series is partly owing to the destruction of all national monuments during the Danish occupation, and partly to the fact that from the age of Ethelbald king of Mercia onwards the East Angles were entirely under the rule of Mercia, a state of things which may possibly be dated earlier, as it is clear that from the death of Anna the kings were in a very secondary position.

Some coins ascribed to East Anglian kings are in existence, a silver coin resembling a scotia assigned to Boorna (or Hunbeanna); and coins bearing the name of Eadwald, with that of moneyer Wintred, who is known to have struck East Anglian coins under Offa and Kenulf, are referred to an East Anglian king of the name, but only conjecturally, as there is no other evidence that such a person ever existed (Flav. King, English Silver Coins, pp. 55-57). [R.]

EAST SAXONS. The kingdom of the East Saxons was contemporaneous with the old diocese of London. That diocese embraced the counties of Essex, Middlesex, and southern Hertfordshire; the last-mentioned district, however, largely consisted of the territories of St. Alban's Abbey, and was exempt from episcopal jurisdiction. This exemption was of much later date than the period embraced in this work; but it had the effect of continuing an uncertainty of boundary which existed earlier in consequence of the uncerthe same names, were East Saxon and subject to the see of London. The archdeaconry of St. Alban's, containing twenty-two parishes in Hertfordshire and four in Buckinghamshire, was added to the diocese of London in the reign of Edward VI. The independence of the St. Alban's parishes dates a long way back into antiquity, and they may be regarded either as Mercian or as a border land between the two kingdoms.

The kings of the East Saxons traced their genealogy through Ercwin, in the ninth generation from Woden; and the peculiar feature of their pedigree is that with one exception, that of Offa, all the names begin with the same letter, E. To Ercwin, who is also called Erchenwin, no historian has ventured to assign a date; but he is regarded as the first king of the East Saxons. His son Eleda was married to Ricca, the sister of Ethelbert I. of Kent. Sebert, his son and successor, was the first Christian king, and must have been reigning under the supremacy of Ethelbert in the year 604, when the see of London was founded. Sebert, some time before the death of archbishop Laurentius, about 616, died, leaving his kingdom to his three sons (Bede, H. E. ii. 5), Saxred, Seward, and Sigebert, who all fell in battle against the West Saxons (A. Flor. Wig. M. H. B. p. 527). The date of this event is fixed by Matthew Paris (i. 272) in 623, but without authority. The next king was Sigebert the Little, the son of Seward (Bede, H. E. iii. 22; Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 629). Sigebert the Good, who succeeded Sigebert the Little, restored Christianity among his people, who had fallen away after the death of king Sebert; he was the son of Sigebald (or Seaxbald), a descendant of Eleda through another line, was baptized about 633 under the influence of Oswy king of Northumbria, and soon after (cir. 640) was killed by his subjects. Swithelm, his successor, seems to have been his brother (Bede, H. E. iii. 22; Flor. Wig. in M. H. B. 637); he was baptized by Cedd in East Anglia. Swithelm died apparently before the year 664, the year of the great plague, during which Bede (H. E. iii. 30) makes Sigberi and Sebbi kings of the East Saxons under the supremacy of Mercia. Sigberi was the son, and Sebbi the brother of Sigebert the Little (M. H. B. 629). Of the two kings Sigberi, with his people, apostatized during the plague; Sebbi continued faithful. Sigberi died before Sebbi, who reigned in all thirty years, and died about 685 (Bede, H. E. iv. 11). Sigberi left a son Offa, who possibly succeeded to his share of the kingdom, and left his kingdom in 709, retiring to Rome (Bede, H. E. v. 19). Sebbi had two sons, Sigheard and Swefred or Swefred, the latter of whom was tithe for the kingdom of Kent.

Offa seems to have survived and to have united the kingdom. M. H. B. 637). On Offa's death in 709, Selred, the son of I (ib.), succeeded. His death is mentioned in Durham in 747 (M. H. B. his successor (Flor. Wig. M. ing in 758 (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. in the genealogy as Swithand, in the pedigree is not fixed. a Sigeric (Flor. Wig. 679) at Rome in 799 (Chr. & M. H. B. at was his son (Flor. Wig. 679).

This Sigerael is mentioned in the Winchcomb charter of 811 (Kemble, C. D. 197) as present at the dedication of the church, in company with Kenulf. His is the last name in the genealogy; but another king, named Swithred or Swithed, is mentioned by Matthew Paris as conquered by Egbert in 828 (ed. Luard, i. 374, 375). The names mentioned in this article may be consulted.

The dense obscurity that hangs over every portion of East-Saxon history is not broken by any light derived from coins or charters. [S.]

EASTERWINE (EOSTERWINI), coadjutor abbat of Wearmouth, was the nephew of Benedict Biscop, founder and first abbat of that monastery. He was born in 650 (Hist. i. 157), the eighth year of King Oswy, and, being of noble birth, held the rank of a "minister" or "king's thane," under Oswy's son and successor Egfrid, before he was 24. At that age he renounced all secular prospects in order to join the community which his uncle was just then forming at Wearmouth. As a monk, he was so far from presuming on his "eorl-kin," that he took pleasure in sharing the homeliest work with his brethren; he was to be seen, conspicuous by his vigorous form and kindly demeanour, engaged in threshing, winnowing, milking, baking, gardening, cooking, always "lingua suavis, et animo hilaris" (Bede, Hist. Abb. 7). He was ordained priest in 679. After Ceolfred had been sent with a new monastic colony to Jarrow, Benedict made Easterwine his own coadjutor at Wearmouth, "in the 9th year from its foundation," i.e. in 682-3. In this dignity he retained all his frank humility; whenever he came across monks at work, he would join them by handling plough or hammer or winnowing machine, as if simply one of themselves; he shared their meals, slept in their dormitory, and, while careful to maintain discipline, was accustomed, "from his innate and habitual affectionateness," to warn beforehand against the misconduct which, if it occurred, would bring a cloud of sorrow over his bright countenance ("limpidissimam vultus ejus lucem"). During Benedict's absence (on his last journey to Rome) Easterwine, with many others of the community, was attacked by the "yellow pestilence." Even after fatal symptoms appeared, he remained two days in the common dormitory, and then removed into a private room. On the day before his death he came out, sat in the open air, and summoning all the monks, gave them, "more naturae misericordis," the kiss of peace and farewell, while they were weeping over the imminent departure of "such a father and pastor." He died while matins were being sung in the church, on the 7th of March, 686, aged only 36 years. See Bede, Hist. Abb. 6, 7. [W. B.]

EATA (1), the first bishop of Hexham and the fifth of Lindisfarne. He was one of the twelve Northumbrian boys whom St. Aidan, in the first days of his episcopate at Lindisfarne, "received to be instructed in Christ" (Bede, iii. 26). One of his fellow pupils was Ceadda or Chad (ib. iii. 28). In the year of Aidan's death, 651, we find Eata presiding as abbat over a monastery at "Mailros," Old Melrose, a spot which Bede describes as almost surrounded by the windings of the Tweed (ib. v. 12). He happened to be absent when, in the winter of that year, Cuthbert applied for admission into the monastery, and was received by Boisil the prior (Bede, Vit. Cuthb. c. 6). When, "after a few years," the sub-king Alchfrid, son of king Oswy, gave Eata some land at Ripon for the construction of a monastery, the abbat sent Cuthbert with other monks to occupy the new home. Eata himself appears to have spent some time there, for we read that he with the other inmates was sent back home (Vit. Cuthb. c. 8), or as we may infer from another passage (Bede, E. H. v. 19), preferred to depart rather than adopt the Catholic Easter and other observances which differed from those of Lindisfarne. After the conference of Whitby, bishop Colman, on the eve of his departure from Lindisfarne, asked king Oswy to place Eata over that monastery; and the abbat of Melrose thus (contrary to the rule established in foreign churches, C. of Epaon, A.D. 517, c. 9) held in combination the government of two monasteries, and apparently won the affection of both communities by qualities which Bede commemorates in the brief description of him as "the gentlest and simplest of all men" (Bede, iii. 26, iv. 27). About the same time he lost his prior Boisil, who, as he himself, we are told, had forewarned Eata three years previously, died of the plague which then ravaged Britain, and was known in Ireland as "the yellow pest" (Vit. Cuthb. 8). After some years, Eata transferred Cuthbert, who had succeeded Boisil as prior of Melrose, to the priorship of Lindisfarne, and employed him in a task which, perhaps, was too rough for his own disposition, that of improving the discipline of the house (Bede, iv. 27; Vit. Cuthb. 16). By Eata's request Cuthbert framed a body of rules for the monks (Anon. Vit. Cuthb. l. 3). In 678, when the diocese of York was divided by archbishop Theodore and king Egfrid without the consent of bishop Wilfrid, Eata was selected for one of the new bishoprics. He was to preside over Bernicia, having his episcopal chair either in Hexham or in Lindisfarne. Three years later, in 681, a further subdivision took place; Eata retained Lindisfarne, while Trumbert was made bishop of Hexham (Bede, iv. 12). When in 685 Cuthbert was consecrated as successor of the deposed Trumbert, Eata yielded to his former prior's strong feeling in favour of Lindisfarne, and returned to Hexham, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died of dysentery (Bede, Vit. Cuthb. 8) on October 26, 686, after an episcopate of eight years, and probably about fifty years after he had come to Lindisfarne, as a boy, to be trained by Aidan. He was commemorated on the anniversary of his death, and a church, called after "St. Eata the Confessor," was standing at Attingham (Atcham) on the Severn, near Shrewsbury, in 1075. The village was the birthplace of Ordericus Vitalis, who was baptized in the church on the "Easter Saturday" of that year (Ord. Vit. v. 1, xiii. 45). See also Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 292. [W. B.]

EATA (2) (A. S. C. ann. 738 in M. H. B. 329; EATE, Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1752 in M. H. B. 785), son of Leodwald, was the father of Eadbert king of Northumbria, and of Egbert archbishop of York [C. H.]

EATA (3) (ECHA, ETHA), an anchorite who lived at Crayke, in Yorkshire, and whose death in 767 is recorded by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 663). In a marginal note of the MS. of Simeon the event is placed in 752 (ib. 662). Under the name Echa, this person is described by Alcuin, in the poem on the saints of York, as a chaste man who had given up worldly honours to hold communion with God, and as endowed with the gift of prophecy. He makes him a contemporary of archbishop Egbert of York, A.D. 734-766 (Mon. Alcuin, ed. Jaffé, p. 123). His name appears in the list of anchorites in the Liber Vitae Dunelmensis, p. 6, as "Echha presbyter." [S.]

EATBERT (Bed. H. E. Chronol. in M. H. B. 288 c), king of Northumbria. [EADBERT (4).] [C. H.]

EATHED (Flor. Wig. Nom. Praesul. Lindisf. in M. H. B. 624 d, e; Id. Chron. ann. 677, 681), bishop of Lindsey. [EADHED.] [C. H.]

EATTA (Wend. F. H. ann. 678, 686, ed. Coxe), bishop of Hexham. [EATA (1).] [C. H.]

EBAGNIUS, a magistrianus, or official of the magister officiorum in the imperial court (Ducange, s. v.). He was sent with a letter from the emperor Theodosius II. to Augustine inviting him to the council of Ephesus. On arriving at Carthage, Ebagnius learned from the bishop Capreolus that Augustine was dead; he then returned to Constantinople with a letter from Capreolus to that effect. (Liberatus Diaconus, Breviarium, c. 5, Patrol. Lat. lxxiii. p. 977; Ceillier, viii. 417; Baronius, A.D. 430, lxxiv.) [W. M. S.]

EBALTERIUS, EBALTIUS, EBARCIS. [EBARCIUS.]

EBARCIUS (1) Sixteenth bishop of Nevers, following St. Itherius, and succeeded by Opportunus. He flourished about A.D. 696, according to the Gallia Christiana. His date, however, is very doubtful. Coquille, in his list of the bishops of Nevers (Hist. du Nivernois, Paris, 1612, sub fin.), places Ouarcus or Evarcius between St. Deodatus (called by him Derdatus) and Galdo, while Le Cointe (ann. 766, n. x. tom. v. p. 692) mentions an Euarcus or Euardus as in occupation of the see in A.D. 766, as the successor of Waldo, or nearly a century later. It is possible, too, that the passages quoted under the head of Ebarcius bishop of Tours, may really refer to Ebarcius of Nevers (Gallia Christiana, xii. 628.) [S. A. B.]

EBARCIUS (2) (EBALTIUS, EBASTIUS, EBARCIS, EBALTERIUS, EVARICUS), 33rd bishop of Tours, succeeding Bertus, and followed by Palladius. He appears under the name of Ebarcis as a subscriber of a privilegium or charter of Agirardus, or Ageradus, bishop of Chartres, given, A.D. 696, to the monastery of the Blessed Virgin, on the Loire (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1228, and Mabillon, de Re Dipl. lib. v. tab. 21, who, however, conjectures him to belong to Nevers) and, again, in a placitum of Childebert III. concerning Noisy-sur-Oise (Nocito-Villa) (Bouquet, Hist. de la Fr. iv. 676). In a charter Louis, king of the Aquitanians (the Pious), in favour of Noailles (Nobiliacum), mentions is made of an Ebasius, who may have been identical with Ebarcius of Tours (see Gall. Christ. II. instrumenta, p. 346, and see also EPARCHIUS bishop of Poitiers). In none of the above quoted passages is the see mentioned, so that it is at least possible that Ebarcius bishop of Nevers is the person referred to, or Eparchius of Poitiers (Gall. Christ. xiv. 30). [S. A. B.]

EBARCIUS (3) bishop of Poitiers. [EPARCHIUS (2).]

EBASIUS, bishop of Vicus Aterii, a town in the province of Byzacia in Africa. He subscribed the synodal epistle of Stephanus the primate of the province of Byzacia, purporting to be addressed to the emperor Constantine against the Monothelites. Hardouin (Concil. iii. 739) and Mansi (Concil. x. 927) both date this council and letter A.D. 649, when no Constantine was reigning, but Constans II., who succeeded Constantine III. in 641. Morcelli (Afr. Christ. i. 353), though referring to Hardouin as his authority, gives A.D. 641 as the year. Baronius (Annal. ann. 646. i.-vi.) gives 646 for the date, and reads Constans for the emperor. [C. H.]

EBASTIUS. [EBARCIUS.]

EBBA (1) (AEBBA, AEBBE, EBBE, Malmesb. Gest. Pontif. 231, ed. Hamilton), abbess of Coldingham, a daughter of Ethelfrid king of Northumbria, by his second wife, Acha or Acca, sister of king Edwin, to whom he was married about A.D. 603. She was uterine sister of St. Oswald, and sister or aunt to several kings of Northumbria. After her father's death in A.D. 616, she sought refuge in Scotland with her brothers, where Donald Brek, the king, protected her (Aberdeen Breviary). Capgrave states that she was sought in marriage by Aedan king of Scots, and that to escape from him she fled to Coldingham, where she was protected by a miracle. This story may probably be dismissed when we remember that Aedan was vanquished in battle by Ethelfrid before Ebba was born. Capgrave says that Ebba received the veil from bishop Finan. Her brother king Oswy gave to her a small Roman camp, on the Derwent, in the western part of the county of Durham, which she turned into a monastery, and which was called Ebchester after her. The village church is also dedicated to her (Capgrave; Surtees, Durham, li. 301).

Ebba was also abbess of Coldingham, in Berwickshire, and gave her name to St. Abb's Head, the bleak rock hard by, which juts out into the sea. Coldingham was a twin or double monastery, i.e. an establishment in which monks and nuns resided, apart indeed, but under one head. This system was at all times a dangerous one, and in this particular case, as history shews, had afterwards its peculiar disadvantages. Of Ebba's rule at Coldingham there is but little known. It was under her that Etheldreda her nephew Egfrid's wife placed herself when she took the veil in A.D. 671 (Bed. H. E. iv. 19). [ETHELDREDA (2).] Here Cuthbert visited Ebba at her desire, and went to pray by night on the deserted beach, where the seals came nestling up to him out of the water (Id. Vita S. Cuth. cap. x.) On one occasion queen Ermenburga, Egfrid's second wife, was mentally afflicted under her roof, and Ebba ascribed it to the imprisonment of Wilfrid by Egfrid, and blamed her nephew severely for his conduct. She also described a miracle which Wilfrid is said to have wrought while he was in ward (Eddi, capp. 37, 39).

In A.D. 679, the monastery of Coldingham was destroyed by fire, an event which made a great sensation far and near (Bed. H. E. iv. 25). The buildings were probably of a very humble description, the walls of wood and clay, and the thatch of straw. Ebba did not long survive the destruction of her house. She is said to have died on August 25, A.D. 683 (on which day her festival was observed). Capgrave says that she was buried in her monastery, where a long while after her death her body was found by some shepherds. This was probably after its subsequent destruction by the Danes. Ebba's remains are said to have been removed, and placed on the south side of the altar. In a later day Aelfred, sacrist of Durham, a prowling relic-hunter, brought Ebba's bones, or some of them at least, to Durham, where they were laid beside those of her friend St. Cuthbert, in his shrine (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dun. iii. 7).

Ebba was worshipped as a saint, and divers miracles are ascribed to her agency. A life of her by Reginald, a monk of Durham, is in the Bodleian library (Fairfax, 6). It is short, and of little merit, compared with the other works of the same author, and although unpublished itself has been largely used by Capgrave. EBBA (2), an abbat who was sent to bishop Wilfrid in A.D. 709 by Ceolred, king of Mercia, to invite him to a conference on the state of the monasteries in his kingdom. (Eddi, Vita Wulf. cap. 61.) [J. R.]

EBBI, an abbat, probably in Northumbria, of whom we know nothing more save that he died in A.D. 775. (Symeon, Chron. ed. Surtees Soc. 34.) [J. R.]

EBBO (1), ST., the 29th occupant of the see of Sens, succeeding his uncle Gericus, was born towards the close of the 7th century at Tonnerre, of noble parents. In early life he was elected to the administration of the district, a post which had become almost hereditary in his family. Civil honours, however, were distasteful to him, and while still young he relinquished his post and entered the monastery of St. Pierre le Vif, near Sens, of which, on the death of Viraboldus, he was elected abbat. He could not have remained here long, for in the first year of Dagobert III. (A.D. 711) he subscribes himself episcopus to a charter or deed, by which his sister Ingoara made over certain lands to the monastery of St. Pierre (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1258). According to the Chronicon Fontanellense (see D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. ii. p. 270) he was present at a convention of bishops at Tolpiac, which is assigned to A.D. 722 or 723. A few years later he is said to have saved the city of Sens. The Saracens, after laying waste the greater part of Gaul, arrived before Sens, and laid siege to it (A.D. 732). The garrison, reduced to the last extremity, besought the aid of Ebbo, who, after prayer, sallied forth, almost unaccompanied, and put the enemy to flight, their arms being miraculously directed against themselves. The latter portion of his life he spent in solitude and meditation at Arcea (Arce), a place situated a few miles from Sens, returning, however, at intervals to teach and console his flock. He died about A.D. 750, and was succeeded by Merulfus, or, according to the Bollandists, Arthbertus. He was buried at his old monastery of St. Pierre, by the side of his sisters, Ingoara and Leoteria. (Chroniques de St. Denis, liv. v. c. xvi.; Chron. Auct. Incert.; Vita Ebb. Episc. Sen. Auct. Anon. Saec. x., all to be found in Bouquet, iii. pp. 311, 315, 650 respectively; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 94; Gall. Christ. xii. 12.) [S. A. B.]

EBBO (2) (EBULO, EBULUS), 29th bishop of Limoges, succeeded St. Cessator, and was followed by Asclepius. He is said to appear in the catalogue of the abbats of Solignac as "Ebulo Episcopus." Le Cointe (Ann. Eccl. a. 752 n. clvi. tom. v. 387) conjectures that he was abbat and bishop as late as the beginning of Pippin's reign. A.D. 752. (Gall. Christ. ii. 506.) [S. A. B.]

EBEDJESUS (1) (Ἀβδῆσους), the name of a bishop, three presbyters, a deacon, and a monk, in the Persian martyrdoms under Sapor, about A.D. 361.

(i) In a bare list of bishops mentioned by Sozomen (H. E. ii. 18) as suffering in that country at this period Abdas and Ebedjesus occur together, while Dausas, who closes the list, is briefly stated to have been taken captive at Zabde and martyred. Copious Acta of these two bishops and numerous companions were first printed in the original Chaldaic, with a Latin translation by Assemani (Mart. Or. et Occ. 1748, p. 144). The Menology of Basil also relates (May 16) how bishop Ebedjesus in Persia, denounced by his own nephew, a deacon, was martyred under Sapor with bishop Abdas and others.

(ii) Three presbyters, Ebedjesus, are named in the Assemani MS. just referred to as martyred with bishops Abdas and Ebedjesus.

(iii) In the same Chaldaic Acta occurs a deacon Ebedjesus, a mere name, in a company of deacons martyred with the two bishops. But in another of Assemani's Chaldaic MSS. (ut sup. p. 133), wherein the martyrdom of bishop Dausas is related, Ebedjesus appears as a distinct and prominent character. [DAUSAS.] Sozomen is silent as to this companion, whereas the Acta in Assemani are very full, and are supported by the Menaea (Ap. 9) which he cites. Assemani states that a mutilation in his MS. prevents any information being given concerning the death of deacon Ebedjesus.

(iv) The monk Ebedjesus is enumerated with other monks in the Assemani Acta (u. s. p. 144) as suffering with bishops Abdas and Ebedjesus.

[C. H.]

EBEDJESUS (2) was a disciple of St. Abda Durkonensis, and flourished in the episcopate of Tamuza or Tomarsa, who was bishop of Seleucia about the end of the 4th century (Assemani Bibl. Orient. iii. 614). He founded the monastery of Hirta, now a town three miles west of Cufa and the seat of a Nestorian bishopric; formerly the seat of a Jacobite bishopric (Asseman. de Monophysitis, 88; Bibl. Orient. ii. 400.)

[F. D.]

EBEREGISILUS (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. cap. 62. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. col. 761), bishop of Cologne. [EBREGESILUS.] [C. H.]

EBERGISUS. [EBREGISUS.]

EBERHARD (1), a wealthy and powerful count in Alsace, the son of duke Adalbert. He granted land for a monastery to St. Pirminius, then an exile in those parts, and thus was founded the monastery of Morbacum, Murbach, or Münsterthal, on the river Rotbach among the eastern slopes of the Vosges mountains. (Gall. Christ. v. 783; xv. 533). In 728 a charter of confirmation and privileges was granted to it by Wedegern, bishop of Strasburg, in which diocese it then was, though it was afterwards included in that of Basel. In this document (which is printed among various ecclesiastical monuments in Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1281) the name is written Eborhardus, and the signature "Ebrobardus Comis."

[C. H.]

EBERHARD (2), bishop. [EBARD.]

EBERULFUS, chamberlain and alleged murderer of Chilperic I. The crime was committed in A.D. 584, and the same year Guntram, Chilperic's brother, and king of Burgundy, announced his intention of investigating the matter. Fredegund, the widow, denounced Eberulfus, who, she said, had afterwards stolen part of his treasure and fled to Tours. Guntram thereupon swore before his nobles to take vengeance upon Eberulfus and his posterity to the ninth generation, that the sight of their punishment might arrest for ever this impious custom of killing kings. Eberulfus took refuge in the sanctuary of St. Martin at Tours. Whether he was guilty of this particular crime remains doubtful. According to Gregory of Tours his denunciation was due to the fact that he had offended Fredegund by refusing to remain with her after Chilperic's death. The author of the Gesta Regum Francorum imputes the crime to Fredegund herself, alarmed at the prospect of detection in her adultery with Landericus (c. 35, Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 1453-4), and in this is followed by Aimoin (iii. 57; Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 730, 731). But whether implicated in the murder or not, Eberulfus was one of the most lawless and desperate men of his time. Though a refugee in the sanctuary, and scarcely daring to quit the actual tomb, he put no check upon his violent nature. He blasphemed the saint, and committed murders at his very feet, and the shrine was polluted with his orgies and extravagances. A priest who hesitated to give him more wine, when he was already drunk, barely escaped with his life; and Gregory of Tours himself, to whose championship of the rights of the sanctuary he might at any moment have to look for his life, he outraged and threatened, declaring that he should die convicted. He first slay him and every other servant. Guntram sent one to draw him, if possible, out of the precinct, and then kill or take him prisoner, but to be careful not to violate the sanctuary. Arrived at Tours, he succeeded in ingratiating himself with Eberulfus by protestations of friendship and assurances of his good offices with the king. In the absence of Gregory, the two made a feast in the church, in the course of which Eberulfus was induced to send away his servants for more wine. Claudius and his attendants then fell upon him, and killed him within the sanctuary. They themselves lost their lives either in the combat, or from the indignation of the people, who resented the insult done to the saint. Such of his goods as had not been already pillaged when he first fell into disgrace were distributed by Guntram among his friends. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vii. 21, 22, 29.)

EBIONISM and EBIONITES. The name Ebionite first occurs in Irenaeus (circa A.D. 180-190; Adv. Haer. i. c. 22; [al. c. 26;] pp. 212-13, ed. Harvey). It was repeated, probably from him, by Hippolytus (circ. A.D. 225-235; Refutat. Omn. Haeres. vii. c. 34 [al. c. 22], ii. p. 406, ed. Duncker) and Origen († A.D. 254; Contr. Celsum, ii. c. 1) who set the example of introducing explanations of the name not always consistent with each other (cp. loc. cit. and De Principiis, iv. c. 1, § 22, Greek). In this, others imitated him, but offered different explanations (e.g. Eusebius [† c. A.D. 340], Eccl. Hist. iii. c. 27), while other writers fabricated a leader, "Ebion," after whom the sect was called [cp. Oehler, Corpus Haeres. i. for the opinions of Philastrius (p. 42), Pseudo-Tertullian (p. 275), Pseudo-Jerome (p. 290), Isidore of Spain (p. 306), &c.]. These derivations and explanations owe their origin to the tendency to carry back the character of Ebionism, or the date of its founder, as far as possible. Thus the "Ebionite" was (according to his own statement) the "poor" man (עֲבִיּוֹן), he who voluntarily strove to practise the Master's precept (Matt. x. 9) in Apostolic times (Acts iv. 34-7; cp. Epiphanius, Haer. xxx. c. 17); and the correctness of the etymology is not shaken by the Patristic scorn which derived the name from "poverty of intellect," or from "low and mean opinions of Christ" (see Eusebius, l. c.; Origen, de Princ. l. c.; Ignatius, Epist. ad Philadelph. c. 6, longer recension). "Ebion," as a name first personified by Tertullian, was said to have been a pupil of Cerinthus, and the Gospel of St. John to have been as much directed against the former as the latter. St. Paul and St. Luke were asserted to have spoken and written against Ebionites. The "Apostolical Constitutions" (vi. c. 6) traced them back to Apostolic times; Theodoret (Haer. fab. ii. c. 2) assigned them to the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81-96). The existence of an "Ebion" is, however, now surrendered. Ebionism, like Gnosticism, had no special founder; but the belief that its birth-place was the Holy Land, and its existence contemporary with the beginning of the Christian Church, is, with certain reservations, probably correct. A tendency to Ebionism existed from the first; gradually it assumed shape, and as gradually it developed itself in the two special forms presently to be noticed.

The records of the Church of Jerusalem contained in the Acts of the Apostles prove how strong was the zeal for the Law of Moses among the Jewish converts to Christianity. Gradually the leading Apostles there, SS. Peter, James, and John, whose powers of restraint and conciliation cannot be over-estimated, passed away, or were withdrawn. The fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) took place, and the Church was formed at Pella under Symeon. The Jewish Christians were from the time of this visitation of God brought face to face with two leading facts. The first was that the temple being obliterated, and the observance of the Law and its ordinances being possible to them only in part, there was valid reason for doubting the necessity of retaining the rest. The second was that if they adopted this view they must henceforth expect to find in the Jews their most uncompromising enemies. As Christians they had expected a judgment predicted by Christ, and, following His advice, had fled from the city. Both prediction and act were resented by the Jews. What the Jews were prepared to do, and actually did, is shewn not only by the contemptuous term (Minim) they applied to the Jewish Christians (Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, iv. p. 89, &c.), but by the share they took in the death of the aged bishop Symeon (A.D. 106). The breach was further widened by the refusal of the Jewish Christians to take part in the national struggles—notably that of Bar-Cochba (A.D. 132)—against the Romans, by the tortures they had to suffer for their refusal, and lastly, by the erection of Aelia Capitolina (A.D. 138) on the ruins of Jerusalem. The Jews were forbidden to enter it, while the Jewish and Gentile Christians who crowded there read in Hadrian's imperial decree the abolition of the most distinctively Jewish rites, and they practically signified their assent to it by electing as their bishop a Gentile and uncircumcised man—Mark (Euseb. Ecc. Hist. iv. 6).

Changes hitherto working gradually were now rapidly developed. Jewish Christians, with predilections for Gentile Christianity and its comparative freedom, found the way made clear to them for a more open preference of the freer forms; others in attempting to be both Jews and Christians ended in being neither, and exposed themselves to the contempt of Rabbin as well as Christian (Grätz, p. 433); others lastly receded farther from Christianity, and approximated more and more closely to pure Judaism. The Ebionites are to be ranked among the last. By the time of Trajan (A.D. 96–117) political events had given them a definiteness of organization to which they had been previously strangers, and their position as a sect opposed to Gentile Christianity became fixed by the acts which culminated in the erection of Aelia Capitolina.

The Ebionites were known by other names, such as "Homuncionites" (Gk. "Anthropians" or "Anthropolatrians") from their Christological views, "Peratici" from their settlement at Peraea, and "Symmachians" from the one able literary man among them whose name has come down to posterity [SYMMACHUS]. Acquaintance with Hebrew was then confined to a few, and his Greek version of the Old Testament was produced for the benefit of those who declined the LXX adopted by the orthodox Christians, or the Greek versions of Aquila and Theodotion accepted by the Jews. Many, if not most, of the improvements made by the Vulgate on the LXX are due to the Ebionite version. (Field, Origenis Hexaplarum quas supersunt. Preface.)

Ebionism presents itself under two principal types, an earlier and a later, the former usually designated Ebionism proper or Pharisaic Ebionism [see NAZARENES], the latter, Essene or Gnostic Ebionism. The earlier type is to be traced in the writings of Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Hippolytus, Tertullian, &c.; the later in those of Epiphanius especially.

(a) Ebionism proper.—The term expresses conveniently the opinions and practices of the descendants of the Judaizers of the Apostolic age, and is very little removed from Judaism. Judaism was to them not so much a preparation for Christianity, as an institution eternally good in itself, and but slightly modified in Christianity. Whatever merit Christianity possessed was possessed as the continuation and supplement of Judaism. The divinity of the Old Covenant was the only valid guarantee for the truth of the New. Hence the tendency of this class of Ebionites to exalt the Old at the expense of the New, to magnify Moses and the Prophets, and to allow Jesus Christ to be "nothing more than a Solomon or a Jonas" (Tertull. de Carne Christi, c. 18). Legal righteousness was to them the highest type of perfection; the earthly Jerusalem, in spite of its destruction, was an object of adoration "as if it were the house of God" (Irenaeus, l. c.); its restoration would take place in the millennial kingdom of Messiah, and the Jews would return there as the manifestly chosen people of God.

They divided the life of Jesus Christ into two parts; one preceding, the other following, His Baptism. In common with Cerinthus and Carpocrates, they represented Him to have been "the Son of Joseph and Mary according to the ordinary course of human generation" (Iren. l. c.). They denied His birth of a Virgin, translating the original word in Isa. vii. 14 not παρθένος, but νεαῖς. He was "a mere man, nothing more than a descendant of David, and not also the Son of God" (Tert. c. 14). But at His Baptism a great change took place. The event is described in the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" current among them, and the description is an altered expansion of the record of St. Matthew (iii. 13, 14). The voice from heaven spake not only the words recorded by the Evangelist, but also the words: "This day have I begotten Thee" (Ps. ii. 7). A great light suddenly filled the place. John the Baptist asked, "Who art Thou, Lord?" and the Voice answered as before. John prostrated himself at the feet of Jesus, "I pray Thee, Lord, baptize me," but Jesus forbade him, saying, "Suffer it to be so," &c. &c. (Epiphanius, Haer. xxx. 13). The day of Baptism was thus the day of His "anointing by election and then becoming Christ" (cf. Justin Martyr. Dial. c. Tryph. c. xlix.), it was the turning-point in the life of Jesus: from that moment He was endued with power necessary to fill His mission as Messiah; but He was still man. The Ebionites knew nothing of either pre-existence or divinity in connexion with Him. They are said to have freed themselves from the common Jewish notion that the Messiah was to be an earthly king; they were not shocked, as were so many of the Jews, at the humbleness of the birth, the sufferings, and crucifixion of Jesus; but they agreed with them in looking upon the advent of Messiah as future, and in deferring the restitution of all things to the millennium.

In conformity with these opinions upon the relationship between Judaism and Christianity, and upon the person and dignity of Jesus Christ, the Ebionites proper insisted that the Law should be strictly observed not only by themselves but by all. They quoted the words of Jesus (Matt. v. 17), and pointed to His practice (cp. Matt. xxvi. 55; John vii. 14, &c.). It was the natural tendency of this view to diminish the value of faith in Christ and a corresponding life. Of far greater moment to them, and as necessary to salvation, was the due observance of circumcision, the sabbath, the distinction between clean and unclean food, the sacrificial offerings—probably with the later Pharisaic additions (cp. Levitic. Eccl. Hist. vi. c. 17)—and the refusal of fellowship or hospitality to the Gentiles (cp. Justin, c. xlvii.). They even quoted the words of Jesus (Matt. x. 24, 25) as their warrant, and affirmed their motto to be: "We also would be imitators of Christ" (Origen, quoted by Schliemann). Jesus, they asserted, "was justified by fulfilling the Law. He was the Christ of God, since not one of the rest of mankind had observed the Law completely. Had any one else fulfilled the commandments of the Law, he would have been the Christ." Hence, they concluded, "when Ebionites in like manner fulfil the Law, they are able to become Christ." (Hippolytus, l. c.)

As might be expected, the Apostle Paul was especially hateful to them. They repudiated his official character, they reviled him personally. In language which recalls that of the Judaizers alluded to in the Epistles to the Corinthians and Galatians, they represented him as a teacher directly opposed to St. Peter, St. James, and St. John; they repudiated his Apostolic authority because (as they affirmed) he had not been "called of Jesus Christ Himself," nor trained with the other Apostles in the Church of Jerusalem. They twisted into a defamatory application to himself his employment of the term "deceiver" (2 Cor. vi. 9); he was himself one of the "many which corrupted the word of God" (2 Cor. ii. 17); he proclaimed "deliverance from the Law" only "to please men" (Gal. i. 10) and "commend himself" (2 Cor. iii. 1). His personal character was held up to reproach according to the rith pride, marked l. 1), and even by They rejected his authenticity—but s from the Law."

They went as far as not a Jew but in Acts xxi. 30), in the hope of sughter, but that rered himself from himself in writing observance of the v. l. xxi. 18, 25.) as and the Gnostics used a recension which they termed the "gospel according to the Hebrews." It was a Chaldean version written in Hebrew letters, and was afterwards translated by Jerome into Greek and Latin, who declared it to be identical with the "gospel of the Twelve Apostles," and the "gospel of the Nazarenes" (see Herzog, Real-Encyclopædie, "Apokryphen d. N. Test." p. 520, ed. 1877). In the Ebionite "gospel" the section corresponding to the first two chapters of St. Matthew was omitted, the supernatural character of the narrative being contradictory to their views about the person of Jesus Christ. It is difficult to say with certainty what other books of the New Testament were known to them; but there is reason to believe that they (as also the Gnostic-Ebionites) were familiar with the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke. The existence among them of the "Protangelium Jacobi" and the Προβηλ τοῦ Πέτρου indicates their respect for these Apostles.

(b) Essene or Gnostic Ebionism.—This, as the name indicates, was a type of Ebionism affected by external influences. The characteristic features of the essenic Essenes were reproduced in its practices, and the traces of influences more directly mystical and oriental were evident in its doctrines. The fact that Ebionism generally passed through different phases at different times renders it, however, difficult to define with precision the line which separates Gnostic and Pharisaic Ebionism. Epiphanius (Adv. Hæres. xxi.) is the chief authority on this class of Ebionites. He met them in Cyprus, and by personal inquiry obtained information upon points in which the older Hæreticologists had failed him (cp. R. A. Lipsius, Zur Quellen-Kritik d. Epiphanius, pp. 136, 143, 150, &c.).

Their principal tenets were as follows:—Christianity they identified with primitive religion or genuine Messianism, and as distinguished from what they termed accretions to Messianism, or the post-Mosaic developments described in the later books of the Old Testament. To carry out this distinction they fabricated two classes of "prophets," προφήται ἀληθείας, and προφήται εὐσεβείας καὶ ἀληθείας. In the former class they placed Adam, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Aaron, Moses, and Jesus; in the latter David, Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, &c. In the same spirit they accepted the Pentateuch alone among the Old Testament writings, and emaculated it; rejecting whatever reflected questionably upon their favorites. They held that there were two antagonistic powers appointed by God, Christ and devil; to the former was allotted the world to come, to the latter the present world. The conception of Christ was variously entertained. Some affirmed that He was created (not born) of the Father, a Spirit, and higher than the angels; that He had the power of coming to this earth when He would, and in various modes of manifestation; that He had been incarnate in Adam, and had appeared to the patriarchs in bodily shape; others identified Adam and Christ. In these last days He had come in the person of Jesus. Jesus was therefore to them a successor of Moses, and not of higher authority. They quoted from their gospel a saying which was attributed to Him, "I am He concerning Whom Moses prophesied, saying, A prophet shall the Lord God raise unto you like unto me," &c. (Clm. Hæm. iii. c. 33), and this was enough to identify His teaching with that of genuine Mosaicism. But inasmuch as they declined to fix the precise moment of the union of the Christ with the man Jesus—a union assigned by the Pharisaic Ebionites to the hour of Baptism—they admitted His miraculous origin.

In pursuance of their conception that the devil was the "prince of this world" they were strict ascetics. They abjured flesh-meat, repudiating passages (e. g. Gen. xviii. 8) which contradicted their view; they refused to taste wine, and communicated with unleavened bread and water. Water was to them "in the place of a god;" ablutions and lustrations were imperative and frequent. In one point they rejected asceticism for truer rules; they held the married life in honour, and recommended early marriages. To the observance of the Jewish sabbath they added also the observance of the Christian Lord's day. Circumcision was sacred to them from the practice of the patriarchs and of Jesus Christ; and they declined all fellowship with the uncircumcised. On the other hand they repudiated the sacrifices of the altar and the reverence of the Jew for the Temple. In common with the Ebionites proper, they detested St. Paul, rejected his Epistles, and circulated stories discreditable to him. The other Apostles were known to them by their writings, to which they assigned inferiority in comparison with their own gospel.

It may perhaps be impossible to state precisely when Gnostic Ebionism replaced Ebionism proper, just as it is impossible to state definitely when Essenism became affected by Gnosticism; but the conjecture appears not improbable that as the siege of Jerusalem under Titus gave an impetus to Ebionism proper, so the ruin under Hadrian developed Gnostic Ebionism. Not that Gnosticism began then to affect it for the first time, but that Gnostic ideas hitherto held in solution were precipitated and found a congenial home among men who through contact with oriental systems in Syria were already predisposed to accept them. The Essene Ebionite in accepting Gnosticised Christianity brought to it the customs to which he was most attached. (Cp. Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, Lect. viii.)

This is further evident from the book of Elchasai and the Clementine Literature (see these names). These works are the production of the Essene Ebionites; and where they speak of Jesus Christ and His Apostles, His sayings and their lives, they do so, not in the words of the canonical Gospels and Epistles, but with additions or omissions, with that colouring which transforms (e. g.) St. Peter, St. Matthew, and St. James the Just into Essenes, and yet with that Gnostic tendency of thought which makes them lineal descendants of the Judaizers who imperilled the church at Colossae. (See Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 73, &c., and Essenism and Christianity, p. 397, &c.)

The Essene or Gnostic-Ebionites differed from the Pharisaic Ebionites in another respect. By missionary zeal, as well as by literary activity, they sought to obtain converts to their views. In the earlier part of the 3rd century the Ebionite Alcibiades of Apamea (Syria) repaired to Rome. He brought with him the book of Elchasai, and "preached unto men a new remission of sins (proclaimed) in the third year of Trajan's reign" (A.D. 101). Hippolytus, who gives an account of the matter (Hæc. ix. c. viii.

&c. ed. Clark), exposed the decided antinomianism which penetrated the teaching of the mythical teacher and of the pupil, but it is evident that many "became victims of the delusion." The immorality which the book—in imitation of the teaching of Callistus—indirectly encouraged probably attracted some, but could not fail to discredit the dogmatic views of the missionary.

Ebionite Christianity did not, however, last very long, neither did it exercise much influence west of Syria while it lasted. In Palestine the discomfiture accorded to "a certain one" (probably Alcibiades) who came to Caesarea about A.D. 247 maintaining the "ungodly and wicked error of the Elchasaites" (Euseb. vi. c. 38; cp. Redepenning, Origines, ii. p. 72) was in keeping with the reception accorded to less extreme Ebionite views from the time of the reconstitution of the mother Church at Aelia Capitolina. Judaism of every kind gradually passed out of favour. The attitude of the bishops of Palestine in the Paschal controversy of the 2nd century was the attitude of men who wished to stand clear of any sympathy with Jewish customs; the language of Justin Martyr and of Hegesippus was the language of the representatives of the Samaritan and the Hebrew Christianity of the day, not of the Ebionite. And outside of Palestine Ebionism had even less chance of survival. From the very first, the instructions and memories of St. Paul and St. John excluded it from Asia Minor; in Antioch the names of Ignatius, Theophilus, and Serapion were vouchers for Catholic doctrine and practice; and the daughter-Churches of Gaul and Alexandria naturally preferred doctrine supplied to them by teachers trained in the school of these Apostles. Even in the Church of Rome, whatever tendency existed in Apostolic times towards Ebionism, the separation—also in Apostolic times—of the Judaizers was the beginning of the end which no after-amalgamation under Clement could retard. The tone of the Shepherd of Hermas—a work which emanated from the Roman church during the first half of the 2nd century (see Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 99, n. 3)—however different from the tone of Clement and St. Paul is not Ebionite; the slightest comparison with another so-called Roman and certainly later Ebionite work—the Clementine writings—is sufficient to prove it. The end of Ebionism had actually come—so far as the Roman Church was concerned—when in the 2nd century Jewish practices—notably as regards the observance of Easter—were unhesitatingly rejected. The creed of the Christian in Rome was the creed which he held from Irenaeus in Gaul and Polycarp in Asia Minor, and not from the Ebionite. When the above-named Alcibiades appeared in Rome (A.D. 219), Hippolytus denounced his teaching (that of Elchasai) as that of "a wolf risen up against many wandering sheep, whom Callistus had scattered abroad:" it came upon him as a novelty; it had "risen up," he says, "in our own day." (Hæc. ix. cc. 8, 12.) The bishop's language is a proof of the oblivion which had certainly befallen any previous propagation of Ebionism in Rome.

For a couple of hundred years more, Ebionism—especially of the Essene form—lingered on. A few Ebionites were left at the time of Theodoret, about the middle of the 5th century: the rest had either returned to strict Judaism and to the utter rejection of Christianity, or to a purer Christianity than that which Ebionism favoured.

The Patristic notices on the Ebionites will be found in the works referred to (cp. on their value, R. A. Lipsius, Die Quellen d. ältesten Ketzengeschichte, 1875). The literature on the subject is further collected by (int. ed.) Schilleman, Die Clementinen, 1844; Ritachi, Die Entstehung d. alt-katholischen Kirche, 1857; Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians; Dissertation III. St. Paul and the Thmas, 1876.

A.D. 464). (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 1191; Gall. Christ. xiii. 963, instr. 291.) [S. A. B.]

EBORIUS (I). The name of "Eborius episcopus de civitate Eboracensi provincia Britannia" is attached, with those of Rastitutus and Adelfius, to the acts of the council of Arles in 514. [ADELPHICUS.] He is possibly the person called Hibernus in the synodal letter to pope Sylvester (Mansi, II. 469). The name may represent the British Iver, Ebar, or Ibar. (See Haddan and Stubbs, I. 7; Mansi, Conc. II. 466, 467; Labbe, Conc. I. 1430.) [EBURICUS.] [S.]

EBORIUS (S), king of the Suevi in Spain. [EBURIC.]

EBRAISILUS (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 694), bishop of Meaux. [EBRISILUS.] [C. H.]

EBREGESILUS (EBRISILUS, EBRISILUS), ninth bishop of Cologne, succeeding Charentinus, and followed by Remedius, or, according to some, eighth, preceding Charentinus. In Gregory of Tours the name appears in a double connexion, as borne by an ambassador of queen Brunehild, and a bishop of Cologne. Although there is no statement to that effect, it is by no means improbable that the two are identical. In the former capacity he was sent by the queen to Spain with a golden shield and two costly bowls as presents for the king, but Guntram, at Paris, being informed that gifts were on the way to the

Two miracles are related by Gregory in connexion with him. Being seized with pains the brain, he was healed by the application of his head of some of the dust of those fifty of the Theban Legion, who were said to have been buried at Cologne. He was also famous as a discoverer at Oppidum Bertonense of the bones of St. Mallorea. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. 28; x. 15; De Glor. Mart. lxii. lxiii.; Ga. Christ. III. 625; Labbe, Sacros. Conc. vi. 1317.

EBREGISILUS (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 694), bishop of Meaux. [EBRISILUS.] [C. H.]

EBREGISUS (ENBORINUS, EVERGISTUS), 87. twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth bishop of Toul (afterwards Liège), succeeding St. Perpetuus. the Gesta of Herigerus bishop of Liège (ch. A. 1009), the following words occur after a notice of St. Perpetuus, "Beatus quoque Ebergisus ac cedeus 24 in Trumonia ejusdem episcopatus villa fuit tumultus" (Gesta, xxviii. Migne Patr. Lat. cxxix. 1033). In a short Chronicon of Liège (see Gall. Christ. III. 820) it is stated that he was bishop in A.D. 618. According to the compilers of the Gallia Christiana, his day of commemoration is the 28th of March, as distinguished from that of Evergisus of Cologne with whom he has been confused, and whose day is the 24th of October (cf. Ussard, Martyrologium; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 884, cxxiv. 616, 617, 618). He is said to have died in A.D. 62 and to have been buried at Dortmund (Trumonia). His successor was Joannes. (Le Coigne, Act. Eccl. Franc. ann. 609, n. 15, ann. 623, n. 8, tom. II. pp. 609, 723.) [S. A. B.]

EBRELINDUS, bishop of Laon. [ELINDUS.]

EBREMUNDUS (EVERMUND), saint and abbat. Migne and the Bollandists agree in the account of his life, but place it at quite different periods; the former saying he was born about the middle of the 7th century, and died about A. 720; the latter placing his death before A.D. 58. He was born at Bayeux, of a noble family, and passed his youth at court, Thierry III. being then king according to Migne, and Chilperic I. according to the Acta and Du Saunoy. There he was rich and honoured, and married a wife of noble birth. Reading one day the words of our Lord "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me," he resolved to renounce the world, and with the consent of his wife, wife took the veil, retired from court and founded the abbey of Fontenay, in the diocese of Soissons. He was afterwards made by the bishop of the diocese abbat of Mont Mairu. Many miracles are related of him. His body was buried at a monastery, but was translated to Creil in the 11th century, for fear of the Norman incursions was burned by the Huguenots in 1567, with exception of part of the head, which, being a separate reliquary, was preserved by the monks.

The common source of the various accounts of the saint seems to be a life of doubtful authenticity, taken from a breviary of Sens, and given forth in the Acta, which places him in the time of Chilperic, who was assassinated in A. 584, and makes him a contemporary of St. Kermat or Evroult, and of St. Alnober or Ancher.

Bishop of Séz, who attended a council at Rouen in A.D. 689, and died in A.D. 701. The same life says he was buried by Lothaire, bishop of Séz, who is said to have been either next or fourth in succession from Alnobert. Migne seems to have chosen one mode of cutting the knot and the authors of the Acta the other. (Migne, Hagiographia, 967; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 285. The life in Du Saussay, Mart. Gallic. is given verbatim in the Acta.)

The abbey of Fontenoy founded by St. Evremond must not be confounded with the better known abbey of the same name in the diocese of Bayeux which was founded in the reign of William the Conqueror. The former abbey was destroyed by the Normans and never restored. Its site was two leagues north of Séz. (Gallia Christiana, xi. 413, 712.) [F. D.]

EBRETINGUS, bishop of Laon. [ELINDUS.]

EBRIGISILUS, ST. (EBREGIBILUS, EBRAISILUS), twenty-third bishop of Meaux, the successor of St. Patiusus. He is said to have been a monk of Jouarre (Jotrum), near Meaux, and the brother of Aguilberta, the abbess of the nunnery in the same place. His date is quite uncertain, but perhaps may be placed towards the end of the 7th century. He was succeeded by Edoldus. He was buried in the burying-place of the monastery, but in 1627 his remains, together with those of his sister and St. Theodechild, were disinterred in the presence of the queen Maria de Medicis, and placed in the church of Jouarre (Gall. Christ. viii. 1601; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 694).

[S. A. B.]

EBRINUS (Bed. iv. 1), mayor. [EBROINUS.]

EBROINUS (1) was set up by the Frankish chiefs as mayor of the palace in Neustria and Burgundy about the year 658 (Gesta Reg. Fr. 45). Balthildis, mother of Clotaire III., regent during the minority of her son, was in some degree a check upon Ebroin. With her retirement in 664 to the monastery of Chelles, Ebroin's unrestrained tyranny began. He was arbitrary, rapacious, and cruel; he sold justice for money; he trampled under foot both nobility and clergy [pro levi offensâ sanguinem nobilium multorum fundebat innoxium (Vita Leodegarii, c. 2, ap. Bouquet, ii. 611)]. In 670, on the death of Clotaire, Ebroin determined to set up Theodoric (or Thierry), Clotaire's brother as king, without calling together the customary Frankish assembly. The chiefs who, uninvited, came to salute the new king were repulsed with insults (V. Leodeg. c. 3). A conspiracy was formed. Childeric of Austrasia was set up as king of the whole realm, Theodoric deposed and banished to a monastery; Ebroin was also banished to Luxeuil. The leader in this revolution was Leodegar bishop of Autun. Three years later Leodegar himself shared the same fate at the hands of Wulfoald. Wulfoald's tyranny again brought about the murder of Childeric, and universal anarchy prevailed (magna turbatio patriæ, V. Leod. c. 7). In Neustria Theodoric was set up as mayor by the Burgundian party under Leodesius, Erchinoald's son, and Leodegar, who had returned from banishment. In Austrasia Dagobert II. was king of one party (Wulfoald's), a supposititious son of Clotaire II. of another. Ebroin escaped from Luxeuil, formed a party of his own, and entered Neustria. Theodoric and Leodesius fled, but the former was taken, and compelled to acknowledge Ebroin as his mayor (Gesta, 45). Leodesius was treacherously put to death, Leodegar taken and blinded, and a few years afterwards also put to death. Ebroin then turned against Austrasia, overthrew Wulfoald, caused Dagobert to be murdered, and compelled the Austrasians to acknowledge Theodoric (A.D. 678). Pippin of Héristal, however, the grandson of Pippin the elder, organized resistance in Austrasia. The Austrasian forces were defeated, Martin, Pippin's brother, betrayed and executed. Ebroin was now at the summit of his ambition, being supreme tyrant of the whole Frankish kingdom. Fortunately for that kingdom he was shortly afterwards (681) murdered by the hand of Erminfred, a Frankish chief (Gesta, 47).

Ebroin has been treated, especially by Fauriel (Histoire de la Gaule Méridionale, ii. p. 461), as the champion of the crown against the nobles, of the Neustrian semi-Roman monarchical power against the old Frankish and Austrasian free aristocracy. This struggle, which had been proceeding with varying success for a considerable period in the separate Frankish kingdoms, was definitely decided in Neustria and Burgundy by Ebroin against the nobility. The results of victory however went not to the king but to the mayor, and in this respect the career of Ebroin is important as preparing the way for the Carolingian mayors and the Carolingian kings. (Cf. Bonnell, Anfänge d. Karolingischen Hauses, p. 117.) His relations towards the nobility give us the key to his relations towards the clergy. It was the strong political position of the bishops as allies and members of the Frankish nobility in withstanding the royal and mayoral power that rendered Ebroin so cruel and truculent towards the church. [Ebroino alias strenuo viro, sed in nece sacerdotum nimis feroce, Vita S. Praejecti, c. 8, ap. Mabillon quoted by Fehr, Staat und Kirche im Fränkischen Reiche bis auf Karl den Grossen, p. 109, note.] It is useless to attempt to palliate, as Bonnell (p. 118) has done, the conduct of Ebroin by attributing to him on mere conjecture high political motives. Fehr (pp. 109, 110) rightly withstands the attempt which compels its advocate to exaggerate the importance of certain trivial facts in the life of Ebroin, and to throw perhaps undue discredit on our chief authorities, the Vitae Leodegarii (Bonnell excurs. vi. pp. 154-6). The judgment of G. Richter (Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, i. p. 175, note 2), though negative, is probably as near the truth as can be got: "That Ebroin," he says, "had any higher aim than the satisfaction of his ambition is by no means justified by the authorities." Compare also Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, ii. 696, n. 1, and generally Pertz, Geschichte d. Merovingischen Hausmeier, pp. 46-51. [T. R. B.]

EBROINUS (2), the 42nd occupant of the see of Bourges, following St. David, and succeeded by St. Agiulfus or Aigulfus. Nothing further is known of him than that he was in possession of the see in 810, as we learn from dismissory or commendatory letters (litterae fur- matae), addressed by him to Magno archbishop of Sens on behalf of a priest named Dodebert. These letters bear date the 10th year of the empire of Charles the Great, and the 48rd of his reign, and may be found in Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. vol. vii. p. 158. (Gall. Christ. ii. 29.) [S. A. B.]

EBROINUS (3) (charter of archbishop Numerianus, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 191), bishop of Toul. [EBORINUS.] [C. H.]

EBRUINUS (Fredegar. Chron. Contin. cc. 22, 96, 97, 98, in Patr. Lat. lxxi.), mayor. [EBROINUS (1).] [C. H.]

EBRULFUS (1), ST. (EVROUL, EVROULT), founder of the monastery of St. Evroul d'Ouche, at Uticus (Ouche) in the diocese of Lisieux in Neustria. Brought up at the court of Childebert I., and holding high place under his brother and successor Clotaire, he was remarkable for his learning and wealth. Reading the scriptures he was struck with the passages which dwell on the renunciation of the world for Christ, which, in the spirit of his time, he interpreted as commands addressed to himself to embrace the monastic life. Accordingly he distributed his goods among the poor, persuaded his wife to enter a nunnery, and himself became a monk in the diocese of Bayeux. But this did not content him long. His fellows revered his superior sanctity, and he dreaded the pride of heart which might follow. He longed also for a more solitary life. Departing with three faithful friends into the wilderness, he was guided by an angel to take up his abode at a place called Mons-fortis (St. Evroul de Montfort) in the pagus Oximensis (Exmes), A.D. 571. Orderic Vit. H. E. lib. vi. c. 6, ed. Migne, P. L. clxxxviii. 470. But here his popularity brought him too many visitors, and after a few months he moved again, and struck into the forest of Ouche, at that time the haunt of robbers and wild beasts. Here he built a little hut of boughs for himself and his companions. It is related that so numerous were the disciples who flocked thither, that he built fifteen monasteries for men and women, though he himself did not desert his hut. This life he led until his death in A.D. 596, only interrupted in A.D. 593 by a plague which attacked the community, and carried off seventy-eight of the brethren, and which was the occasion of two miraculous resuscitations related of him. He is commemorated on the 29th of December, on which day he appears in the Martyrologium of Usuard. The fortunes of his monastery for the 400 years succeeding his death are unknown, as all the records were destroyed by Danish pirates, according to Ordericus Vitalis. But we know it was restored A.D. 1051. (Mabillon, Acta SS. Benedict. saec. i. p. 354; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. ann. 565, n. xi.; ann. 571, n. vii.; ann. 572, n. ix.; ann. 593, n. xvi. xvii.; ann. 596, n. xvii.; tom. ii. pp. 58, 126, 130, 407, 446. Lipomanus, de Vitis SS. tom. vii. p. 335, Dec. 29.) [S. A. B.]

EBRULFUS (2), eighteenth bishop of Noyon and Tournai, following Chrasmarus, and succeeded by Bertundus or St. Acharius. According to Le Cointe he died in A.D. 621, but he is placed earlier than 575 by the compilers of the Gallia Christiana. Nothing is known of his life. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. ann. 621, n. ii. tom. II. p. 716; Gall. Christ. ix. 981.) [S. A. B.]

EBRULFUS (3) (EVROLT, EVROULT), ST., said to have been abbat of the monastery of St. Fuscien-aux-Pois, near Amiens, probably towards the close of the 6th century. A life of him written by an anonymous author not earlier than the 9th century, was first published by Mabillon from a very old MS. (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. i. 366 Paris, 1668-1701), and again from another MS by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 25 Jul. vi. 194). Historically it is probably worthless. He was born at Beauvais of French parents, in answer to the prayers of his mother, who had been long barren. From earliest childhood he was prompt in obedience and averse to evil. Soon, for the love of Christ, he withdrew himself from his parents, esteeming the carnal affections as enemies of his soul, and passed his youth in fasting and reading the scriptures. After a time he assumed the monastic habit, and built himself a cell at the place which afterwards was called, from its numerous houses of prayer, Oratorium (Oroër). The fame of his sanctity reached the bishop of Beauvais, who summoned him to his presence, and ordained him a deacon. In due course he became a priest, and his eminent piety was evidenced by the performance of many miracles. The monastery built on the spot where St. Fuscianus and St. Victorinus had suffered martyrdom, near Amiens, lost its abbat, and queen Fredegund, who, according to this most improbable narrative, venerated Ebrulfus, persuaded the nobles of her court to confer on him the office (cf. Gall. Christ. x. 1302). A vision directed him to accept it, though against his will. In the monastery he shewed himself humbler than the lowest of the brethren. It was vouchsafed to him to find the body of Maxianus or Maximianus (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 461), directed in a vision by St. Lucian, the fellow-sufferer of that martyr. He died July 25, and was buried in the oratorium, in the territory of Beauvais, where he had formerly dwelt, and which was afterwards called by his name. Some years later his tomb was adorned and enriched by a pious and noble matron named Theclana or Teolana, and Theodebert, or Chrodobertus, bishop of Paris (Gall. Christ. vii. 25), built a church over it. A nunnery too was established there, which in the time of the first abbess Angadrisma was saved from conflagration by the presence of the saint's body (cf. Gall. Christ. ix. 813). When the Northmen devastated France his body was translated to Beauvais and placed in the church of St. Peter (circ. 850). The life is followed in the Acta SS. by an account of his miracles (p. 196) by another anonymous and still later author. Though his death is assigned to July 25, and is marked under that date in the martyrologies (e.g. Usuard auct. Reg. Suec. in Migne, cxxiv 297), the church of Beauvais commemorates him on the 26th. There has been some discussion as to his date. Mabillon and the Bollandists (obs. praev. ut supra, p. 192) follow the life, which plainly speaks of the reign of Chilperic I. towards the close of the 6th century. Le Cointe would place him a century later, but this view is generally dissented from. (Hist. Litt. de la France, vi. 38.) [S. A. B.]

EBULUS(1) (EVOLUS, EMILIUS), third bishop of Limoges, placed by the Sammarthani next to St. Aurelianus, whose death they date A.D. 89. He fled through fear of persecution to Evahonium (Evax) in Bria, where he remained in concealment till his death. Jordanus, a bishop of Limoges in the 11th century, mentions him by the name of Ebulus. (Gall. Christ. ii. 500; Jordanus, Epist. ad Bened. viii. pap. in Patr. Lat. cxi. 1159 a; Gama, Ser. Ep. 564.) [R. T. S.]

EBULUS (2) (EUBULUS), sixth bishop of Avignon, succeeding one unknown, A.D. 202, according to an ancient manuscript quoted in the Gallia Christiana (i. 852), where it is stated that he was ordained and sent to Vienne from Rome by pope Victor at the close of his pontificate, and that having sat sixteen years and above eight months (the last three years being spent in the desert), he died in his church before the altar of St. Mary in the act of blessing his clergy and people, on 12th June (the year being by computation 219), having previously consecrated the presbyter Joannes as his successor. The Sammarthani in this place conjecture that he was the Eubolus who carried the letter of Victor (about the fifth year of his pontificate (cir. 194) to Desiderius bishop of Vienne, Victor calling him "de collegio nostro," and begging for him a favourable reception as one ready to live and die with Desiderius. This letter of Victor occurs in Baronius (A. E. ann. 198, xvii.), and Baronius, on the strength of it recognises Desiderius as bishop of Vienne. But the later compilers of the Gall. Chr. (xvi. 9 B) reject this Desiderius, and Jaffé prints Victor's letter as spurious (Reg. Pont. 922). The doubt cast upon Desiderius of course makes the existence of Eubolus questionable [C. H.]

EBULUS (3), EBULO, 29th bishop of Limoges. [EBBO (2).]

EBUR, or, according to another reading, YBOR, a bishop who is said in the Annales Cambrie to have died A.D. 501, "anno ccc. l. statis suae." (Annal. Camb. ann. lvii. i.e. A.D. 501, in M. H. B. 850 b.) In the Annals of Tynagh, where he is named Ibar (O'Connor, Script. ii. 127), he is said to have died 9 kal. Mai. A.D. 503, aged 303 years. [EBORIUS (1).] [C. H.]

EBURIC (EBORICH, EBORIUS, and in Gregory of Tours EURICUS), king of the Suevi in Spain. He succeeded his father Miro A.D. 383, and immediately after his accession acknowledged the supremacy of the Goths under Leovigild. "He asked for Leovigild's friendship, rendered him the oath of allegiance as his father had done, and received from him the kingdom of Gallaecia," says Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. v. 43), an act which may possibly have given courage to the national party among the Suevi, and caused the rising of Eburic's brother-in-law, Audika, in 584. Eburic was deposed and forced into a monastery. (Isid. Hist. Suev. apud Esp. Syr. vi. 506, and Baron. Annal. ann. 584, ix.) Audika then married Miro's widow, Sisigunthis, Eburic's step-mother, his first wife being apparently dead. His success, however, was short-lived. In the following year, 485, Leovigild took him prisoner and condemned him to the same fate that he had previously forced upon Eburic, says Isidore (l. c.). Leovigild, however, took no steps to reinstate Eburic, of whom we hear nothing further, and the Suevi were incorporated in the Gothic state (Joannes Biclaensis, ann. 585, apud Esp. Sagr. vi. 346). Eburic therefore was the last of the native Suevian kings. From 584 onwards the Gothic kings are often found bearing the title of Rex Suevorum. (Dahn, Könige der Germanen, Vte. Abth. 571.)

EOCLESIA, one of the eight primary aeons in the system of VALENTINUS (Iren. I. i. p. 7, v. p. 17; Hippol. Ref. vi. 30, p. 187; Epiph. Haer. 31, pp. 165, 169). This higher Ecclesia was held to be the archetype of the lower Ecclesia constituted by the spiritual seed on earth (Iren. I. v. 6, p. 28). In a Gnostic system described by Irenaeus (I. xxx. p. 109) we have also a heavenly church, not, however, as a separate aeon, but as constituted by the harmony of the first existing beings. According to Hippolytus (v. 6, p. 95), the NAASSENES counted three Ecclesiae.

It is especially in the case of the church that we find in Christian speculation prior to Valentinus traces of the conception, which lies at the root of the whole doctrine of aeons, that earthly things have their archetypes in pre-existent heavenly things. Hermas (Vis. ii. 4) speaks of the church as created before all things and of the world as formed for her sake; and in the newly discovered portion of the so-called Second Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians (c. 14) the writer speaks of the spiritual church as created before the sun and moon, as pre-existent like Christ Himself, and like Him manifested in the last days for men's salvation; and he even uses language which, if it were not sufficiently accounted for by what is said in the Epistle to the Ephesians as to the union between Christ and His church, might be supposed to have affinity with the Valentinian doctrine of the relation between Anthropos and Ecclesia. In the notes to the passages just cited, in Lightfoot's and in Gebhardt and Harnack's editions will be found references to other early writers who have used similar language concerning the church. It need not be supposed that this language was directly suggested to those who first used it by the Platonic philosophy, for there are passages in the New Testament which sufficiently account for it; and the so-called Clement claims to have derived his doctrine from "the books and the apostles." The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews quotes the direction to Moses to make the tabernacle after the pattern shewn him on the Mount (a passage cited in Acts vii. 44), and his argument dwells on the inference that the various parts of the Jewish service were but copies of better heavenly archetypes. This same heavenly tabernacle appears as part of the imagery of the book of the Revelation (xi. 19, xv. 5). In the same book the church appears as the Lamb's wife, the new Jerusalem descending from heaven; and St. Paul's teaching (Eph. i. 3) might be thrown into the form that the church existed in God's election before the foundation of the world. ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORIANS [HISTORIANS, ECCLESIASTICAL].

ECCLESIASTICI. It would seem from Irenaeus, iii. 15, that this title was first used by Valentinians as a nickname for the members of the church who refused to join their sect. However this may be, it soon became a recognised appellation for members of the church, whether of the church as opposed to the world (Cyril Hier. Cateches. 15. 7, p. 226), or more usually as opposed to heretics. On the uses of the word see DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES. Further illustrative references will be found in Du Cange, in the notes of Valesius and Heinichen on Eus. H. E. ii. 25, and of Massue and Tontée respectively on the passages cited from Irenaeus and Cyril. But it is to be noted that several of the instances cited by these authorities of the early use of the word to denote members of the clergy are not at all decisive, and that when the word first came to be so used, it was limited to the inferior orders of the clergy. [G. S.]

ECCLESIASTICUS, one of the aeons in the system of VALENTINUS (Iren. I. i. p. 7; Hippol. Ref. vi. 30, p. 187; Epiph. Haer. 31, pp. 165, 169). [G. S.]

ECCLESIIUS (1), bishop of Ravenna, from 522 to 532, between Aurelianus and Ursicinus. July 27, according to tradition, was the date of his death. He accompanied pope John I. whom Theodoric compelled to go on a mission to the emperor Justin in 526. (Anonymus Valesianus, i.e. the Chronicle of Maximian archbishop of Ravenna, so Waitz and Holder Egger, Monum. Rerum Italicarum Langob. p. 273, ed. Gardthausen, 1875, p. 303. He had some disputes with his clergy, and the matter was carried to pope Felix IV., who summoned Ecclesius to Rome. The matter was arranged by a decree of the pope (Agnellus Liber Pont. cap. 60), and the customs instituted under Ecclesius were appealed to by later archbishops. (Cf. Agnellus, Vita Theodori; Jaffé Regest. Pontif. ann. 526-530; p. 71.)

Ecclesius built the church of Sancta Maria Major in Ravenna. (Rubeus, Hist. Ravenn. 154.) Under his direction also was begun the celebrated basilica of St. Vitalis in Ravenna built by Julianus Argentarius, and consecrated in 547 by archbishop Maximianus. Agnellus cap. 77, records an inscription in the narthex of the church commemorating the work. It is mentioned also on the gravestone of Ecclesius who was buried in the church of St. Vitalis (Richter, Die Mosaiken von Ravenna, 1878, 72.) In the central mosaic of the apse of the church the angel on the left introduces Ecclesius bearing a model of the church. (Kugler's Handbook of Painting, Ital. School, Lady Eastlake 4th ed., pt. i. p. 32; Richter, p. 92, and note.) In the church of St. Apollinaris in Classe, where mosaics belonging to the end of the 7th century are intended to place the church of Ravenna on a level with that of Rome, Ecclesius appears among the four bishops of Ravenna beneath the apse. (Richter, p. 104; Kugler, p. 60.) For the life of Ecclesius, the chief authority is Agnellus Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Rav. ed. Holder Egger Monum. Rerum Italicarum, etc. 1878, pp. 31-322. [A. H. D. A.]

ECCLESIIUS (2), bishop of Chiusi (Clusium) A.D. 600-602, the second known bishop of the see standing in the list between St. Florentinus and Marcellinus (Ughel. Ital. Sacr. iii. 51) where he is called Eulogius; Gams, Ser. I.

759). He received two letters from Gregory the Great (lib. x. indict. iii. Ep. 34 and Ep. 45). In lib. xii. indict. v. Epist. 47 Gregory sends to Ecclesius, through Venantius bishop of Perugia, a cloak on account of the severe cold (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1090, 1102, 1251).

[A. H. D. A.]

ECDICIA, a lady to whom St. Augustine wrote a letter of rebuke, on account of her conduct towards her husband. Having partly persuaded him to adopt the rule of matrimonial continence, she persevered in her resolution when he wished to put an end to the engagement; and not only so, but by assuming widow's weeds and withdrawing from his society she so irritated him as to induce him to give way to the temptation to adultery. Besides this, she had given away to some wayfaring monks nearly all the money of his that she had in her possession, and thus excited in him a general spirit of indignation against persons of this class. Lastly, with the view of training their son for the monastic life, she had stinted him in necessary food. Augustine, therefore, rebukes her sharply, in a letter full of sound sense and clear spiritual discernment. (Aug. Ep. 262; see also Serm. 354.)

ECDICIUS (1) or ECDITIUS, martyr, Mar. 10. [SEBASTE, FORTY MARTYRS OF.]

ECDICIUS (2), a civil officer of high rank under the emperor Julian. He was governor of the great diocese of Egypt in the praefecture of the East, in succession to Hermogenes, and as such enjoyed the dignity of "praefectus augustalis," and resided at Alexandria (Cod. Theod. XIV. xxvii. 1). As Georgius, the previous bishop of Alexandria, had been a great collector of books, and left a considerable library, Julian wrote to Ecdicius that he would do him a personal favour if he would search for those literary treasures and have them sent to him. However Ecdicius may have fulfilled these instructions, he would appear to have been somewhat remiss in the discharge of his official duty with regard to paganism. The heathen of Alexandria had long been accustomed to celebrate a great festival at the rising of the Nile, when, among other ceremonies, the praefect of Egypt cast "golden presents" into the river (Seneca, Nat. Quaest. iv. 2). Constantine had forbidden this festival, but an edict of Julian had re-established it (Euseb. u. s.; Sozomen, v. 1). Julian evidently had his doubts about the heartiness of Ecdicius in the revival, and accordingly wrote to him a characteristic letter on the subject, telling him that he had heard of the "rise of the Nile from Theophilus the Stratopedarch, and that "perhaps he would like to know it" (Julian. Ep. 50, Heyler, p. 93). Ecdicius was the officer charged by Julian with the expulsion of Athanasius, and appears to have been lukewarm in that proceeding. There is extant another letter from Julian to Ecdicius. In this the emperor declares his great personal interest in "music," and charges the praefect to encourage it in Alexandria "by all means," making especial mention of the pupils of Dioscorus, a "musician" of the city (Ep. 56, Heyler, 108; Ammian. Marcell. xxii. 16). Ecdicius would be the "Rector Aegypti," who took a prominent part in Julian's ostentatious display of his paganism at Antioch, and read a composition in praise of Apis on that occasion (Ammian. Marcell. xxii. 14). There are two edicts of Julian addressed to Ecdicius in the Codex Theodosianus, both of which were issued at Antioch, and are dated Dec. 2, A.D. 362 (XV. i. 8, 9, ed. Ritter, v. 317, 318; Prosopogr. ō. vi. pt. ii. 50 b).

ECDICIUS (3), a presbyter spoken of by Basil with contempt and abhorrence, intruded into the bishopric of Parnasus in Cappadocia Tertia by Demosthenes vicar of Pontus, in the synod called by him at Ancyra in Galatia in the middle of the winter of A.D. 375, in the place of Hypsinus, whom Demosthenes had caused to be deposed. (Basil. Epist. 226, 237, 239, 73, 204, 101, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxii.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 415.)

[E. V.]

ECDICIUS (4), murderer of his friend Edoebicus in his revolt against Honorius, A.D. 411 (Sozom. H. E. ix. 14).

[W. M. S.]

ECDICIUS (5) (according to Gregory of Tours, but HECDICIUS according to Apollinaris Sidonius, and DECIUS according to Jornandes) was the son of Avitus emperor of the West, A.D. 455, 456 (Idat. Chron. Olymp. cccviii. ccxix.; and brother of Papianilla, wife of Apollinaris Sidonius (Apoll. Sid. Ep. v. 16). He was a native of Arverna (Clermont), where he early acquired some distinction as a man of letters, and became very popular with his fellow-citizens (Apoll. Sid. iii. 3). When Euric, whom Apollinaris calls Evarix, brother and successor of Theodoric king of the Visigoths, invaded the provinces which the Romans still retained in Gaul, inflicting great cruelties on the inhabitants (Apoll. Sidon. vii. 6; Greg. Tur. ii. 25), Ecdicius was Roman "dux," and held Arverna in that capacity. He at first successfully repelled the invader, and with an incredibly small force (Apoll. Sidon. iii. 3; Greg. Tur. ii. 24; Jornandes, xlv.), but afterwards had to yield the city, when peace was made with the Visigoths (Baron. Annal. a. a. 474, viii.; Pagi, Crit. in loc.). Ecdicius then went to Burgundy (Jorn. u. s.; Greg. ii. 24; Apoll. Sid. ii. 1). While he was there, a terrible famine occurred, and he munificently fed large numbers of the starving inhabitants at his personal expense (Greg. Tur. u. s.). The emperor Nepos soon sent for him to Rome, and at the same time made him "patricius." Num. xx. of the "Carmina" of Apollinaris Sidonius is addressed "Ad suum Sororium Hecdicum." [T. W. D.]

ECDICIUS (6), bishop of the island of Tenos in the Aegean, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553, at Constantinople. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 943; Mansi, ix. 394.) [L. D.]

ECDICIUS (7), bishop of Vienne. [EDICTIUS.]

ECEBOLUS [HECEBOLUS.]

Egwald may be identical with Egbald bishop of Winchester. [EGBALD (3).] [S.]

ECGWIN (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 708, 717, in M. H. B. 540 a, 541 a; id. Nom. Praesul. Wicc. ib. 622 e; id. Ad Chron. App. ib. 637 b; Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 417), ECGUINI (Kemble, C. D. 55, 57, 58, 60, 61, 64, 68, all spurious or doubtful Mercian charters between A.D. 714 and 717), bishop. [EGWIN.] [C. H.]

ECHA, anchorite at Crayke. [EATA.]

ECHDACH (EACHAD, Ann. Tig.), son of Eudin (Cutin) king of the Saxons, clericized and put in confinement (Ann. Ult. A.D. 730; Ann. Tig. A.D. 731; O'Connor, Scriptt. ii. iv.). He has not been identified in the Anglo-Saxon royal families. The name is generally used by the Annals of Ulster for EOCHADH. [J. G.]

ECHEA, niece of St. Patrick. [ECHI.]

ECHEN, ECHEUS. [ETCHEN.]

ECHFERD (Gaimar, Estoria, v. 1932, in M. H. B. 787), king of the Mercians. [EGFRID (2).] [C. H.]

ECHFIRD (Nenn. Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 74 b), ECHGFRID (Nenn. Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 74 b), king of Northumbria, son of Oswy. [EGFRID (1).] [C. H.]

ECHFRITH (ATFRITH), the fifth abbat of Glastonbury in William of Malmesbury's list. He presided, according to the same authority, from 719 to 729, during which time Ina's greatest privileges were granted to the monastery (Will. Malmesb. Antt. Glast. ap. Gale, pp. 310, 313, 328). The name does not appear in the more ancient list given in MS. Tiberius B. 5; Memorials of St. Dunstan, p. lxxxii. See EAHFRITH. [S.]

ECHI (ECHEA, ACHEA), niece of St. Patrick, commemorated Aug. 5. In Evinus' Life of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 132, c. 21, 175 n. 20) mention is made of the three sons of Conis and Darerca, sister of St. Patrick, and also of their two daughters, St. Echea of Killglass in the region of Teffia (now Annaly, co. Longford), near the church of Ardagh to the south, and St. Lalloca of Senlios in Connaught. St. Aengus the Culdee (de Matr. Sanct. iv. c. 6), O'Clery, and other Irish authorities, refer to the two sisters with more or less distinctness, yet of their history nothing is really known, and attempts at identification are fruitless (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 362). Of St. Echi's nunnery in the parish of Kilglass, co. Longford, there are now no remains; Senlis, Senlisa, or Senlos, where her sister's nunnery is said to have been, is unidentified, but was probably in the county of Roscommon, on the west side of Slieve Baun. (Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 111; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 211, calling Darerca his (sic) mother; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 231, col. i. 227, nn. 1, 2.) [J. G.]

ECHLECH, son of Daighre and brother of Caimein and Caemhan, is commemorated on Aug. 14 (Mart. Doneg.). [J. G.]

ECHTACH (ECTACIA), commemorated Feb. 5. In the Life of St. Corbmac (Mar. 27) it is related (Colgan, Acta SS. 753, c. 13) that St. Corbmac fixed his monastic seat among the sons and posterity of Amhalghaidh son of Fiachra, that is, in the present barony of Tirawley in the county of Mayo, and that there they, with their relations who were descended from Dathi, another son of Fiachra, venerated the most pious stranger and his successors with great readiness, till in course of time their devotion gradually turned away to a number of saints, and among others to St. Ectacia, virgin. Colgan (ib. 756 n. 20) says this is the Echtach virgin whose dedication is given (Mart. Doneg. and Tall.) on Feb. 5. [J. G.]

ECHTBRANN, abbat of Glendaloch, co. Wicklow, died A.D. 795 (Ann. Inisf. in O'Connor, Scriptt. ii.). [J. G.]

ECHU. [EOCHADH.]

ECIA, a lady of "glorious memory," mentioned by pope Gregory the Great, Ep. 55 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 516). [C. H.]

ECIANUS, bishop of Cluainfoda. [ETCHEN.]

ECLECTICS. Eclectic philosophers have existed in many ages of the world: and the early history of Christianity furnishes a remarkable instance of such a system. It was impossible that the early Christians, when once they had received into their body men of culture and learning, should not be struck with that noblest product of ancient morality, the philosophy which took its birth from Socrates, and was thenceforward known by the names of its divergent branches, as Platonic, Aristotelian, Stoic, etc. Hence arose attempts to reconcile the various forms of philosophy with Christianity, and to present the whole under one view. The author of the Epistle to Diognetus, Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Pantaenus, Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen, are the chief names connected with this tendency.

It is to be observed that this eclecticism differed in its animating principle from every ordinary eclectic philosophy, in that it aimed in the first instance to reconcile philosophy with religion, and only as a secondary aim and by a sort of consequence to reconcile the different philosophies with each other. The following very remarkable passage from Justin Martyr displays the first and principal aim in its purest form: "We have been taught that Christ is the firstborn of God, and we have before shewn Him as being the word (or reason), in which every race of men has obtained participation; and they who lived by the aid of this word (or reason) are Christians, even though they were esteemed atheists, as among the Greeks Socrates and Heraclitus and those like to them, and among the barbarians Abraham and Ananias" (τὸν Χριστὸν πρωτότοκον τοῦ Θεοῦ εἶναι ἐδιδάχθημεν, καὶ προεμύσαμεν λόγον ὄντα, οὗ πᾶν γένος ἀνθρώπων μετέσχε· καὶ οἱ μετὰ λόγου βιώσαντες Χριστιανοὶ εἰσι, καὶ ἄθεοι ἐνομίσθησαν οἷον ἐν Ἑλλήσει μὲν Σωκράτης καὶ Ἡράκλειτος, καὶ οἱ ὅμοιοι αὐτοῖς ἐν βαρβάροις τε Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἀνανίας. Apolog. prim. p. 71.) It will be seen from this passage that Justin laid stress (and with perfect truth) on the spiritual element of the ancient philosophers as the uniting point between them and Christianity; with their system-making he had less concern, though he had been converted from Platonism to Christianity, and when a Christian always esteemed Platonism as far above the other ancient philosophies. Of the secondary aim above-mentioned, the reconciliation of the different ancient philosophies with each other, though always in subordination to Christianity, Clemens Alexandrinus is the typical example. He ridicules the fear which many have of the Greek philosophy, calling it a bugbear (Strom. lib. vi. cap. 10, p. 278). "By philosophy," he says, "I mean not the Stoic, nor the Platonic, or the Epicurean, or the Aristotelian; but whatever things have been spoken well by each of these sects, and which teach righteousness along with a pious knowledge, all this eclectic (or selected) matter I call philosophy" (φιλοσοφίαν δὲ οὐ τὴν Στωϊκὴν λέγω, οὐδὲ τὴν Πλατωνικὴν ἢ τὴν Ἐπικουρείαν τε καὶ Ἀριστοτελικὴν ἀλλ' ὅσα εἰρηται παρ' ἑκάστῃ τῶν αἰρέσεων τούτων καλῶς, δικαιοσύνην μετ' εὐσεβοῦς ἐπιστήμης ἐκδιδάσκοντα, τοῦτο σύμπαν τὸ ἐκλεκτικὸν φιλοσοφίαν φημί—Strom. lib. i. cap. 7, p. 124). Clement looked upon the ancient philosophies as definitely leading men on the way to absolute truth. It may be doubted if he went to the heart of the matter as much as Justin had done; and his idea that the ancient philosophers borrowed from the Hebrew Scriptures was baseless and untrue. But of all the ancient Fathers, none presented so much of the type of an eclectic philosopher as Clement.

In Origen, philosophy, in so far as it is apparent, returns again to the Platonic form; and after Origen, attempts to reconcile Christianity with philosophy, though not quite unknown, are very rare among the early Fathers; for the use which Christian theologians afterwards made of the terms of Greek philosophy is quite different from any reconciliation of religion and philosophy. Whether Heraclas, the pupil of Origen and bishop of Alexandria, continued the philosophical tradition is uncertain, though at an early age he had been a pupil of Ammonius Saccas. Synesius of Cyrene at a much later date was well known in philosophy; and Proaeresius, the Neoplatonist, is said to have been a Christian. Doubtless the rise of the Neoplatonic school, with its tendency to present itself as at once the rival and the antagonist of Christianity, kept Christian writers in the main far removed from the domain of philosophy. But the approximation had been very close at the end of the second century A.D.; the founder of the Neoplatonic school, Ammonius Saccas, was himself born a Christian, and it is even not quite certain whether he did not continue such throughout.

None of the writers above mentioned called themselves Eclectics, or would appear to have been called by this name in ancient times.

With reference to this whole subject see especially Vacherot's Histoire Critique de l'Ecole d'Alexandrie, vol. i. ch. v. pp. 223-302, from which chapter the quotations in the present article have been derived. See also the names of the writers here mentioned in the present Dictionary. [J. R. M.]

ECLECTUS (ELECTUS), chamberlain of the emperor Commodus. On the last day of A.D. 194, that prince, after shedding during a long period the noblest blood of Rome, had determined on the following morning to execute amongst others Marcia his favourite concubine, Eclectus his chamberlain, and Laetus his Praetorian praefect. Learning their intended fate, they determined to prevent it by the death of the tyrant, and the same night they introduced to his chamber a wrestler, who strangled him without a struggle. [W. M. S.]

His name has suggested a suspicion that he was a Christian (see vol. i. p. 611), and though this ground is but slight, the name Eclectus being found in non-Christian inscriptions (Gruter, 403-5, 691-4, 996-5, 1142-6; Boeckh, 4105, 6224, 6579), yet the conjecture receives some confirmation from the fact that he became the husband of MARCIA, who was a Christian, certainly in sympathies, and possibly by profession. His Christianity is not disproved even if it be true that though he personally took no part in the assassination of his master, he was an accessory to it before the fact. He had ascertained that by his remonstrance against a mad and murderous project he had so stirred the tyrant's deadly resentment that it was only by the emperor's death the lives of himself and of those who had joined in his advice could be saved. The question is not how in such circumstances a Christian ought to have acted, but whether it can be pronounced improbable that a professing Christian might have acted as Eclectus is said to have done. His conduct on this occasion may claim the more lenient judgment on account of his fidelity to his new master. When a mob of soldiers came in to take the life of Pertinax, Eclectus was the only one of his attendants who did not desert him, and he died fighting in his defence against overwhelming odds; on which his contemporary, Dion Cassius remarks that he had before that considered Eclectus a good man, but then gave him real admiration. On the other hand, Tertullian (Apol. 35) has no suspicion that any of the murderers of Commodus was a Christian. Eclectus was by birth an Egyptian; he had been a freedman of L. Verus, on whose death he was retained by M. Aurelius, passed then into the service of Quadratus, where Marcia was his fellow servant, and on the destruction of Quadratus was taken with her into the service of Commodus. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 4, 19, 22, lxxiii. 1; Capitolin. Ver. 9, Part. 4, 11; Herodian. i. 51.) [G. S.]

ECOPHYSIUS, martyr. [EPHYSIUS.]

ECTGAILE, son of Bait, abbat of Muicirt, died A.D. 787 (Ann. Ult. in O'Conor, Scriptt. iv. 113). [J. G.]

ECTHESIS, a declaration on the nature of the Person of the Son issued by the emperor Heraclius, in A.D. 639.

During the greater part of the 7th century the Greek church was disturbed by the Monothelite controversy. The name arose from the party who maintained that the Saviour had one will and not two. For the details of the controversy reference should be made to MONOTHELISM, SERGIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, THEODORE, BISHOP OF PHARAN, SOPHRONIUS, PATRIARCH OF JERUSALEM, and MAXIMUS, A MONK. It is only necessary to say here that about 616 Sergius had met with words ascribed to his predecessor, Mennas, "one will and one life-giving operation," that after consulting bishop Theodore about them, he adopted them; that correspondence arose, and that the opposite contention was that there were two wills acting in the same direction. At the same time the emperor Heraclius was, from political motives, anxious to reconcile the great Monophysite party to the ruling church of the Greek empire. In his campaigns against the Persians in 622 and the following years he met many Monophysite bishops. It occurred to him that the formula "one divinely human mode of working and willing in Christ" might serve as a ground on which Chalcedonians and Monophysites might both stand. Or, at any rate, these words became the subject of his inquiries and correspondence. Both parties recognised the Greek father Dionysius; and Dionysius attributed to Christ an ἐνέργεια θεανθρωπική. Sergius the patriarch, when consulted by the emperor about the phrase (Harduin. Concil. iii. 1338), could not object to it.

But Cyrus of Phasis doubted its propriety. He consulted Sergius. Sergius, in a letter which displays a most servile adherence to patristic language, replied that many fathers had used the expression one mode of working, none had spoken of two. If one had done so, it would be necessary to follow him. The scruples of Cyrus were removed. In 630 he found himself patriarch of Alexandria. He brought back thousands of Monophysites by a compromise in nine points, placing the Monophysite tenets beside the language of Chalcedon.

But there was in Alexandria a zealous monk of Palestine named Sophronius. The doctrine of the phrase seemed to him to lead to Monophysitism. He opposed it. The matter was referred, by mutual consent, to Sergius. Sergius, approving rather the "one mode of working and willing," did not wish to make it binding on the church; against two modes of working and willing he was decided. He persuaded Cyrus to abide by the forms in use; and Sophronius promised he would speak neither of one mode nor two, and avoid all dispute. In 634 Sophronius was elevated to the patriarchate of Jerusalem (Hard. iii. 1315).

This gave a new turn to affairs. Sophronius would now have to issue his profession of faith, and might be considered a more independent authority. Sergius invoked the aid of pope Honorius. Honorius wrote twice to Sergius, in concurrence with his views; he wrote also to the patriarchs of Alexandria and Jerusalem. Although his language may be in some points questionable, he was, with much good sense, opposed to logical determinations on such a subject. Christ must have one will. He approved the oikonomia or accommodation which reunited the Monophysites of Alexandria and elsewhere with the Catholic church. But on the one hand, "one mode of working" might lead to Nestorianism; "two modes" might end in Eutychianism. Both expressions should be avoided.

Meantime the customary encyclical of Sophronius had appeared on his assumption of the patriarchate of Jerusalem. Without rejecting the phrase ἐνέργεια θεανθρωπική, he insisted on two modes of operation, each belonging to the different natures, acting in the harmony of the one Christ. The Saracens soon afterwards separated Palestine from Christendom. But this revival of the controversy was the origin of the Ecthesis.

The emperor Heraclius, anxious to nip in the bud a danger so menacing to the peace of the empire, issued in A.D. 638 this document, ἐκθεσις τῆς πίστεως. It expressed the opinions of Sergius, and was probably his work. According to the teaching of the Catholic councils it upheld the doctrine of one Christ in two natures, one and the self-same person working that which is divine and that which is human. But the phrase one ἐνέργεια was to be avoided, because, though it occurred occasionally in the writings of the fathers, yet it caused uneasiness to some persons, as it seemed to deny the duality of the natures. So, likewise, it was forbidden to speak of two ἐνέργειαι, because the expression had been used by no authority, and gave offence to many. It might involve two contradictory wills in Christ, and that was beyond even Nestorius. "The humanity with its own rational soul had never determined itself of its own will in opposition to the λόγος united with it, but always so as the divine λόγος willed."

The tendency of this document was evidently in favour of the Monothelites. And as far as it could help the peace of the church, it could only be by concealing real differences instead of removing them. It remained in force about ten years.

The Ecthesis received the sanction of councils at Constantinople under Sergius and his successor Pyrrhus, and at Alexandria under Cyrus, no opposition could arise from Antioch and Jerusalem, which were in the hands of the Arabs. Honorius was dead; his successor in the papacy, Severinus, appears to have rejected it, and the following pope, John IV., condemned it with a council. The emperor thereupon disowned it, telling John that Sergius was its author, and that it had been only issued at his urgent request.

Heraclius died in 641. Constantine, Heraclionas, and Constans II. followed in quick succession. John IV. and his successor, Theodore, begged these emperors to suppress the Ecthesis, and at length, in 648, it was superseded by the Typus of Constans. The Monothelite tendency of the Ecthesis had been vigorously opposed by Maximus.

EDA (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. anno 801, in M. H. B. 672 b), dux and afterwards abbat. [EDWINE.] [C. H.]

EDALDUS (1), bishop of Vienne, the supposed recipient of an undated letter from pope John III. (560-573). This letter, which purports to be in answer to inquiries of the archbishop on some point of ritual in the service of mass, and to be accompanied by a gift of the pallium and relics, was first published by Joannes à Bosco, and is supposed, from internal evidence, to be a forgery. It is given by Migne (Patr. Lat. lxxii. 18). Edaldus does not appear in the list of Viennese bishops given in the Gallia Christiana (xvi. 26), where Naamatus and Philippus occur as the contemporaries of John III. There was a later Edaldus in this see. [EOALDUS.] (Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, xi. 334.)

[S. A. B.]

EDALDUS (2), bishop of Meaux. [EDOLDUS.]

EDALDUS (3), forty-first bishop of Vienne. [EOALDUS.]

EDAN, a common form of AEDHAN, is most frequently attached to St. Maedhog, of Cluainmor-Maedhog (Apr. 11), brother of bishop Etchen (Feb. 11), of Clonfad. Edan was alive A.D. 598 [MAEDHOG]. See also Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 188.

[J. G.]

EDANA. [ETAOIN.]

EDANCIUS, magister militum, and duke of Sardinia, alluded to in a letter of Gregory the Great to the deacon Honoratus, concerning the better treatment of the inhabitants of the island. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. Ep. 49 in Migne, lxxvii. 512.) [A. H. D. A.]

EDAPHIUS, one of the three deacons of Constantinople whom Chrysostom was accused of having maltreated. (Phot. Bibl. cod. 59, p. 18 a; Patr. Gr. ciii. 107.) [E. V.]

EDATIUS, presbyter of Arthona, now Artonne, a village of Auvergne, dep. Puy-de-Dôme. (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. cap. 5.) [C. H.]

EDBALD (A. S. C. text, anno 640, in M. H. B. 310; Malmesb. G. R. A. i. §§ 10, 48, ed. Hardy), king of Kent. [EADBALD (1).]

[C. H.]

EDBALT Brut y Tywysogion, Engl. tr. in M. H. B. 842), king of the Saxons. [ETHELBALD.] [C. H.]

EDBERGE (EDBURGE), Mercian princess, venerated in Flanders (Butler, Lives of the Saints, June 20; Chambers, Book of Days, i. 798). [IDABERGA.] [J. G.]

EDBERT (1) (Malm. G. R. i. § 15, ed. Hardy; Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 724 e), king of Kent, son of Wihtred. [EADBERT (2).]

[C. H.]

EDBERT (2) (Wend. F. H. ann. 675. ed. Coxe), bishop of London. [HEATHOBERT.] [C. H.]

EDBERT (3) (Kemble, C. D. 122), bishop, signs charter of Offa king of Mercia, A.D. 774, with Berthun bishop of Lichfield, and Ceolwulf bishop of Lindsey. [EADBERT (9).] [C. H.]

EDBERT (4) (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1937, M. H. B. 787), king of Northumbria. [EADBERT (5).] [C. H.]

EDBERT (5) (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. M. H. B. 730 c), archbishop of York, preceded Ethelbert and just before called EGBERT. [EGBERT (6).] [C. H.]

EDBERT (6) (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. M. H. B. 731 a), archbishop of York, preceded Eanbald. [ETHELBERT (6).] [C. H.]

EDBERT (7) (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. M. H. B. 726 c), bishop of the East Ang. [ALDBERT (1).] [C. H.]

EDBIRT, king of the West Saxons, mentioned in a spurious charter of A.D. 801 (Kem. C. D. 178) as conferring land in Bodecaule to his minister Eadgils. Kemble thinks that "Edbirtus rex" in the body of the charter is a mistake of the writer for "Eadburh regis" "Eadburh" being said at the conclusion to the grantor of the charter to Glastonbury. It may not "Edbirt" have been an error for Brihtic king of Wessex, who was the husband of Eadburh or Eadburga?

[C. H.]

EDBRICUS (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. M. H. B. 727 e), king of Northumbria, succeeded Ceolwulf. [EADBERT (2).] [C. H.]

EDBRIHT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. M. H. B. 734 b), king of Kent, son of Wihtred. [EADBERT (2).] [C. H.]

EDBRIT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in H. B. 728 b), king of Kent, who reigned two years and died in the ninth year of Cuthbert. [EADBERT (2).] [C. H.]

EDBRITH PREN (Malm. G. R. i. § 15, ed. Hardy), king of Kent. [EADBERT (4) PREN.] [C. H.]

EDBURGA (1) (Dugd. Monast. i. 531, Birch, Fast. Mon. 64), queen of Mercia, afterwards abbess of Gloucester. [EADBURGA (1).] [C. H.]

EDBURGA (2) (Elmh. p. 219, ed. Hardy; Dugd. i. 448), EDBURH, abbess of Minster Thanet. [BUGGA (2).] [C. H.]

EDDANUS (Gall. Christ. v. 784), bishop of Strassburg. [ETHO.] [C. H.]

EDDI (Kemble, C. D. 19, A.D. 680), bishop who grants lands in Lantocal and Ferramel abbat Hemgislaus. [HEDDA, bishop of Gloucester.] [C. H.]

EDDIUS (or "AEDDI," named STEPHEN Bede calls him (iv. 2), "AEDDE" as he calls himself (Vit. Wilfr. 14), was distinguished chanter in Kent, when Wilfrid, unable to obtain possession of the see of York for which he had been elected and consecrated, vi. Egbert king of Kent, during the vacancy of the see of Canterbury, and performed episcopal duties in that diocese. He says of himself simply Wilfrid returned from Kent into Northumbria with the chanters "Aedde and Aeona." Bede says that Wilfrid "invited him from Kent that he was the first teacher of chant in many Northumbrian churches, excepting James," the deacon (iv. 2). He lived on confidential terms with Wilfrid, and accompanied him to Rome, on his second journey as an appellant, in 704 (see Vit. Wilfr. 50, 51). After Wilfrid's death he was requested by Acca bishop of Hexham and Tatbert abbat of Ripon to write the life of their common master and patron. He undertook the task (so he says in an elaborately modest preface), as a matter of obedience, but also as conscious of the "great gain" to himself personally involved in his remembrance of "bishop Wilfrid."

He tells the tale like one who had heard from Wilfrid himself the most minute particulars of his personal history. But he is not only, as was natural, credulous as to whatever might enhance the glory of his hero, but inaccurate in regard to other persons; and the accusation which he makes (and in which Bede follows him) against queen Bathildis, or "Balchild," as having been the cause of the execution of Wilfrid's early patron, the archbishop of Lyons, has been usually reckoned among these errors,—Bathildis being a devout woman whom the Frankish church learned to honour as a saint. Eddius also confounds the name of the archbishop (who was really called Aunemund) with that of his brother count Dalphinus (Mabillon, Ann. Bened. i. 425, 438). He calls Colman metropolitan bishop of York—a double mistake (c. 10), and, stranger yet, his text exhibits "papa" after the name of that presbyter Agatho who took part in the Whitby conference (ib.; cf. Bed. iii. 29). While he does full justice to Chad's excellence ("religiosissimum, admirabilem doctorem," "servus Dei verus et mitissimus"), he makes him admit—what in all probability he never would have admitted—that he had "sinned" by receiving consecration from Wini and the two British bishops. He apparently exaggerates the rites performed by Theodore in regard to Chad (c. 15). He sometimes substitutes vague generalities for precise narrative, as in the account of the uncanonical division of Wilfrid's diocese in 678 (c. 24). He calls the Lombard king Pertharit "king of Campania" (c. 28). He seems to have had somewhat imperfect information as to Wilfrid's mission work in Sussex. He represents Theodore as humbling himself to Wilfrid in a strain which outruns probability (c. 42). He does not bring out the fact that both the first and the second restorations of Wilfrid were arrangements in the nature of a compromise, and that the second was still less favourable than the first to his original claim as bishop of York. On the whole he writes like a hearty partisan, but he cannot be called unfair or disingenuous. He does not conceal the harshness of Wilfrid's speech at Easterfield ("duris sermonibus," c. 45; he uses "duris" in a like sense in c. 37), and when he speaks of him as coming on one occasion from Ripon, "cum filio suo proprio" (c. 57), he uses words which have raised some question as to Wilfrid's character, but which have been naturally explained by his own anecdote about Eadwald, the bishop's adopted son (c. 18). He was a well-educated man after the ecclesiastical standard of his own age; his Latin is occasionally rather anomalous, but he makes his readers see what he depicts, and his book has some passages at once terse and impressive. His "praefatio" contains a quotation from Horace, Carm. ii. 10, 11. The date at which he flourished, according to Gale (Scr. xv. vol. i.), is 720. [W. B.]

EDDO (1), bishop of Curia Rhaetorum, now Chur or Coire, a town of the Grisons. He stands sixth in the list, between Sidonius and St. Valentinus, and is believed to have sat from about the year A.D. 500 to about 530, during which period Rhaetia was for the most part at peace under the rule of Amalasuntha and Theodatus in the reign of Theodoric (Ambr. Eichhorn, Episcopat. Curiensis, 1797, p. 9).

[C. H.]

EDDO (2) (Gall. Christ. v. 784; Gams, Scr. Ep. 315), bishop of Strassburg. [ETHO.] [C. H.]

EDDRAN, Irish bishop. [ETHERIAN.]

EDELARD (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 38, ed. Hardy), king of Wessex. [ETHELHARD (1).]

[C. H.]

EDELBALD (1) (Gaimar, Estorie, 1105, in M. H. B. 778), king of Kent. [EADBALD (1).]

[C. H.]

EDELBALD (2) (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. 725 e, 727 e, 728 a, d, e, 729 a, b, 734 d, 735 c; Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 1656, 1730, 1749, 1764, 1765, 1798, in M. H. B. 784, 785, 716), king of Mercia. [ETHELBALD.]

[C. H.]

EDELBERT (1) (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1073, in M. H. B. 777), EDELBERT (Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 955, 977, 1108, in M. H. B. 776, 778), EDELBERTH (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 723 b), king of Kent. [ETHELBERT (1) I.]

[C. H.]

EDELBERT (2) (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 15, ed. Hardy), EDELBRIGHT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 730 b), EDELBRIHT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. M. H. B. 734 b), king of Kent. [ETHELBERT (2) II.]

[C. H.]

EDELBERT (3) (H. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 730 c, 732 e), bishop of Candida Casa (Whithorn), afterwards of Hexham. [ETHELBERT (7).]

[C. H.]

EDELBRIOT (Hen. Hunt. iv. Hist. Angl. in M. H. B. 632 b), king of East Anglia, beheaded by order of Offa. [ETHELBERT (3).]

[C. H.]

EDELBERTH (Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 2210, 2306, in M. H. B. 791, 792), king of Kent. [EADBERT (4) PRAEN.]

[C. H.]

EDELBURG (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1691, M. H. B. 785), EDELBURH (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 724 e), wife of Ina king of Wessex. [ETHELBURGA (5).]

[C. H.]

EDELBURG (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1247, in M. H. B. 779), daughter of Ethelbert king of Kent, wife of Edwin king of Northumbria. [ETHELBURGA (1).]

[C. H.]

EDELBURGA (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 90, ed. Hardy), daughter of Offa king of Mercia, wife of Brithric king of Wessex. [EADBURGA (1).]

[C. H.]

EDELDRUD (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1469, in M. H. B. 782), daughter of Anna king of East

Anglia, wife of Egfrid king of Northumbria. [ETHELDRYTHA.] [C. H.]

EDELFEID, EDELFFED, is given as chorepiscopus of Caerleon or Llandaff; he is also claimed by London, Colchester, and Lincoln, being probably the same as Adelphius, who sat in the council at Arles, A.D. 314. [ADELPHIUS (1).] (Lib. Land. by Rees, 623; Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 154.) [J. G.]

EDELBERT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. in M. H. B. 714 d, e, 715 b, 719 d), EDELFRID (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. in M. H. B. 715 a, c, d; Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 1009, 1141, 1147, 1160, 1258, in M. H. B. 777, 778, 780), EDELFRIT (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1081, in M. H. B. 778), EDELFRIZ (Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 1007, 1017, in M. H. B. 777), king of Northumbria. [ETHELFRID (1).] [C. H.]

EDELHARD (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1761, in M. H. B. 785), king of West Saxons. [ETHELHARD (1).] [C. H.]

EDELHERE (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. in M. H. B. 717 a), king of East Anglia, brother of Anna. [ETHELHERE.] [C. H.]

EDELRED (1) (H. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. iv. in M. H. B. 718 c, 723 c, 724 c, 725 b, 727 d, 735 b; Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 1467, 1653, "EDELRED PENDING," in M. H. B. 782, 784), EDELRET (Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 1423, 1565, in M. H. B. 782, 83), king of Mercia. [ETHELRED (2).] [C. H.]

EDELRED (2) (H. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 730 d, 732 a, b), EDELRET (Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 1977, 2140, 2174, in M. H. B. 788, 790), EDELRETH (Gaimar, Estorie, vv. 2018, 2129, in M. H. B. 788, 790), king of Northumbria, son of Moll. [ETHELRED (4).] [C. H.]

EDELRED (3) (H. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 732 b, 733 a, marg.), archbishop of Canterbury. [ETHELHARD (3).] [C. H.]

EDELWALCH (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 34, ed. Hardy), king of the South Saxons. [ETHELWALCH.] [C. H.]

EDEN, 'Εδέμ, Hippol. Ref. v. 26, pp. 150-159. [JUSTINUS.]

In the system of SIMON (Hippol. vi. 14, p. 168) the account of Eden and its four rivers is explained as allegorically representing the womb in which man is formed, and the veins and arteries which proceed from it, and in the system of the NAASSENES (v. 9, p. 120) there is a speculation apparently derived from this, in which Eden is made to denote the brain. [G. S.]

EDENUS, sixteenth bishop of Meaux, consecrated about A.D. 552. His predecessor and successor were Medoveus and Baudowaldus respectively. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1598; Le Cointe, Ann. Ecol. Franc. ii. 657.) [S. A. B.]

EDESIUS (1), martyr. [AEDESIUS.]

EDESIUS (2), one of the shorthand writers at the inquiry concerning Donatism held before the consul Theophilus, A.D. 320. (Aug. c. Cresc. ii. 29.) [DONATISM, vol. i. p. 882.] [H. W. P.]

EDESIUS (3) (AEDESIUS) shared the romantic fortunes of his brother Frumentius, the first bishop of Auxumis (Axum), in the 4th century. [FRUMENTIUS.] The biographical details at our disposal consist of a lengthy narrative introduced on the authority of Edesius, by Rufinus into his Ecclesiastical History (lib. i. 9). The narrative has been copied, with slight deviation by Socrates (H. E. i. 19), Sozomen (ii. 24), and Theodoret (i. 23, 24). Compare also Baronius (Ann. 327, viii. ix. x.). Frumentius, and Edesius, the young relatives of Meropius, a Syrian philosopher (merchant), accompanied him on a voyage of adventure to India. On their return to Phoenicia by way of the Red Sea, they landed "at a certain port," where there was "a safe haven," and there suffered from the barbarous assault of the "Indians," who murdered every individual of the ship's company, with the exception of the two youths, upon whom the savages looked with compassion, and whom they conveyed as prizes to the king. This personage appointed Frumentius and Edesius to positions of trust, the former becoming the treasurer and the latter the cupbearer of the king. By their means Christianity was introduced among "the Indians." The names they bear in Ethiopian documents given by Ludolf (Hist. Eth. iii. 2) were Fremonatos and Sydvac (Cf. Gesenius, Aethiop. Kirche in Ersch and Gruber, and Hoffmann in Herzog's Encyc.) The word "India" is used with the same indefiniteness as we elsewhere find Ethiopia and Libya used. From the time of Aristotle to those of Eratosthenes and of Hipparchus, India and Africa were believed to unite with each other at some unknown point south of the Indian Ocean. (Dict. Anc. Geography, vol. ii. p. 45, art. India; Plin. vi. 22-24.) These "Indians" were, from the subsequent career of Frumentius, no other than Abyssinians. The king, according to Ludolf's Ethiopian Codex, was called Abreha, and on drawing near his end, offered their liberty to the two youths. The queen mother earnestly besought them to remain, to undertake the education of the young prince Erazanes, and to assist her in the regency during the minority of the heir to the throne. They consented, and moreover lost no opportunity of diffusing knowledge of Christ. They sought and discovered Christian merchants trading in the country, gathered Christian disciples, and built houses of prayer, "that worship might be offered, and the Roman ecclesiastical rule observed." (Sozomen, l.c.) They were, however, destitute of orders, and the infant church was not incorporated into the general organization of the church until their condition had been made known. The two brothers sought permission at length to return to their friends. Edesius remained at Tyre and became a presbyter of the church in that city, where Rufinus came in contact with him. Frumentius, the more energetic of the two, went to Alexandria, and brought the whole case before Athanasius. It is uncertain when this occurred. Theodoret places the visit to Alexandria "about the time" of the persecution of Eustathius, other hints seem to bring the event to the period when Athanasius had returned from his second exile. The consequence of the visit can hardly be doubted. Frumentius himself was appointed bishop of "the Indians" at Auxumis, and received title of Abba Salama, and was regarded as the founder of the church in that country, the Abba deriving his ecclesiastical rank from the patriarch of Alexandria. [ETHIOPIAN CHURCH.] [H. R. R.]

EDESIIUS (4) (ÆDESIIUS), a philosopher in the 4th century, by birth a Cappadocian, of a noble but impoverished family. He was sent by his father to Greece to learn some trade, but applied himself instead to the study of philosophy, his father reluctantly consenting. He travelled to enlarge his knowledge, and went into Syria to hear Jamblichus, and became almost his equal, and succeeded to his school on his death. He was obliged, however, to conceal his talents during the reign of Constantine. In reply to his prayers a god appeared to him in his dreams and uttered an oracle, to the effect that he had two lots open to him, either to dwell in cities and direct the minds of young men, by which he would win immortal fame, or to take a farm and turn shepherd, by which he would be reckoned among the blessed. He chose the latter life, but was compelled by the entreaties of the students who besieged his dwelling to return to the society of men. He accordingly left Cappadocia, and fixed his residence at Pergamus in Asia, where crowds, both of Greeks and natives, came to hear him. He shewed much kindness to Sosipatra, the widow of Eustathius, his successor in Cappadocia, when after her husband's death she came to live at Pergamus. Julian (afterwards emperor), at the age of twenty-three, A.D. 354, was attracted to Pergamus by the fame of Edesius, now advanced in years and in weak health, and wished to remain with him; but Edesius, feeling his health unequal to the task of instructing him, advised him instead to give the greater part of his time to his disciples Eusebius and Chrysanthius, which Julian accordingly did, without however leaving Edesius. He was a man of genial disposition, and would converse with carpenters, smiths, and others whom he met, about their trades, for which he was rebuked by Priscus, one of his disciples, as betraying the dignity of philosophy. (Eunapius, ed. Stephani, 1616, Lives of Edesius, Maximus, and Priscus, 32-66, 69-70, 92.) [F. D.]

EDESIIUS (5), deacon of Cyril of Alexandria, who, with his fellow-deacon Peter, was at Constantinople when Alexander bishop of Antioch came there to urge the restoration of St. Chrysostom's name to the diptychs. Edesius and Peter brought back to Cyril an account of the state of things at Constantinople. When the patriarch Atticus wrote to Cyril to ask him for the sake of peace to restore Chrysostom's name to the sacred diptychs, he wrote also to Peter and Edesius, urging them to use their influence with Cyril on the side of peace, so that the Egyptian bishops might not be the only ones to resist the imperial desires, and to disturb the universal tranquillity. At the end of the letter Atticus hopes they will soon return to Constantinople, as he misses the pleasure of their society, and finds his present companions less agreeable. (Nicephorus Callistus, xiv. c. 26, 491, 494, in Migne, Patr. Gr. cxlvi. 1138-1144; Saillier, Ant. Sacr. viii. 15.) [F. D.]

EDESIIUS (6) (ÆDESIIUS), Christian orator and poet. The only knowledge we possess of this author is derived from the Life of St. Hilarius bishop of Arles (who died A.D. 449), of which Honoratus bishop of Marseilles is supposed by some to be the author. In this Life two quotations occur from Edesius, whom the author honours with the title of saint, and calls "rhetoricae facundiae et metricae artis peritissimus vir." The first quotation describes the writer's astonishment at seeing Hilarius at the same time reading and dictating to his secretary, and also making a net with his hands; the second describes the bishop's sympathy with charity towards the suffering. (Life of St. Hilarius, c. 12, in Migne, Patr. Lat. l. 1233, 1239; Hist. Lit. de la France, 1865, ii. 352.) [F. D.]

EDESSA, MARTYRS OF. In the reign of Trajan a fierce persecution was carried on at Edessa. Barsimaeus was bishop there at the time; he was arrested, subjected to cruel tortures, and according to Baronius was martyred (A.D. 114). In the Menology of Basil, however, the account is that he was flogged and kept in prison, that as soon as the persecution was over he was released, that he died in peace, presiding over the church of Edessa. Sarbelius, together with his sister Barbea, who had both been baptized by Barsimaeus, were martyred during this persecution. Special cruelties were practised towards Sarbelius in consequence of his having been an idol priest before he became a Christian. They are commemorated Jan. 30. (Menol. Bas.; Baron. Anal. 107, 1, 2.) [T. S. B.]

EDESTUS, martyr. [HEDERTUS.]

EDEYRN (1) (EDERN, EDVRN, EDYRN) son of Gwrtheyrn (Vortigern) king of the Britons 449-466). He belonged to the company under St. Cattwg (Cadoc), and gave his name to Llanedyn in Glamorganshire, where he had a community with three hundred members. It has been conjectured that he is the Faustus mentioned by Nennius as a son of Vortigern, and as having his residence on the banks of the river Renis. Faustus was the child of incest, and according to the legend was attributed by Vortigern to St. Germanus (Rees, Welsh Saints, 108, 186, 337; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 12, wks. v. 439-40.) [J. G.]

EDEYRN (2), commemorated January 6; a bard who embraced a life of sanctity, and whose memory is preserved in the chapel of Bodedeyrn, under Holyhead, in Anglesey, and in Edeyrn, county Caernarvon. He was the son, or grandson (by Nudd), of Beli ab Rhun, descended from Cunedda Wledig (Myv. Arch. ii. 23, 40; Rees, Welsh Saints, iii. 298, 323; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 593, 601). In the mediaeval legends he assumes a wholly military garb, and as one of the chivalrous knights of his court, under the name of Hider, accompanies king Arthur in his celebrated expedition to the continent against the Roman emperor (Myv. Arch. ii. 339; Geoff. of Monm. x. 4; cf. Lady Charlotte Guest, Mabinogion, ii. 153-4, et al.). [J. G.]

EDGILS (ÆDGILS), a priest in the monastery of Coldingham, who, after its destruction by fire in A.D. 679, took up his residence at Jarrow, where he died. He was a friend of Bede, and gave him some information about Coldingham and its inmates. (Bed. H. E. iv. 25.)

[J. R.]

EDGUIN (Nenn. Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 75 b), king of Northumbria. [EDWIN.]

[C. H.]

EDGYN, called brother of Cyngar and son of Geraint ab Erbin in the Pedigrees of Welsh Saints, but he does not appear as either of these in Professor Rees's list (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 598; Rees, Welsh Saints, 113).

[J. G.]

EDHAMAIR (AEDAMAIR, AUDOMARA, EADHAMAIR, EUDOMARA), virgin, daughter of Aedh, commemorated Jan. 18. Eadhamair, or Edhamair, is commemorated on this day in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 21), and as Aedamair, in Mart. Tall. (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xiii.), and in both is called daughter of Aedh. But Colgan (Acta SS. 598, c. 3), in classing her among the saints of the house of St. Mochoemocu or Pulcherius (Mar. 13), and race of Conmac, gives both a different form of the name and a different genealogy: "S. Audomara seu Eudomara, filia Eugenii, f. Taly, f. Anlenii, f. Brugacii, f. Caredii, &c., colitur 18 Januarii." Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 112 n. 82) seeks to identify her with the Cethuberis, who appears to be known under so many names in the Lives of St. Patrick [CETHUBERIS] (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 325-26).

[J. G.]

EDHNIUCH (EGNACIUS), son of Erc, abbat of Liath, died A.D. 767 (Four Mast.). His place is supposed by Colgan (Acta SS. 598, c. 4, who calls him Egnacius) to have been Liath-mor-Mochaemhog, now Leamokevoge, in the parish of Two-Mile-Burris, in the barony of Elyogarty, co. Tipperary (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 266 n. b, 371).

EDIBIUS (1), ST., bishop of Soissons A.D. 451, preserved his city from an assault by Attila "through the intercession of the martyrs SS. Crispinus and Crispinianus." Commemorated on Dec. 10. (Gall. Christ. ix. 335; Gams, Ser. Ep. 632.)

EDIBIUS (2), sixth bishop of Amiens, one of the subscribers of the first council of Orleans, held in the year A.D. 511. He followed Audoenus, and was succeeded by Beatus. (Le Cointe, Ann. Ecol. Franc. vol. i. p. 288; Gall. Christ. x. 1152; Labbe, Conc. v. p. 549.)

[S. A. B.]

EDICTIUS (EDICIUS, ECDICIUS, HECDICIUS), ST., said to have been the thirty-fourth occupant of the see of Vienne, between St. Syndulphus and Chalceoldus. Ado, who wrote in the 9th century, says in his Chronicon, "Sindulpho episcopo defuncto, Hecdicus Viennensis Ecclesiae praesulatum suscepit, magnae religionis vir." He goes on to say that Hecdicus died at the close of the reign of Justinian (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 115). But this chronology is generally rejected as extending his life too long. A Necrologium of Vienne (quoted in the Gallia Christiana, xvi. 31) speaks of him as living in the times of Constantine, the ~~son of Constantine~~, while Dagobert II. was still on the throne at the time of the condemnation of Marcellus at Antioch. Dagobert II. died in 675. A curious letter purporting to be addressed to him by pope Agatho is extant. It is commemorated on Oct. 23 (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. x. 71).

[S. A. B.]

EDILALD, "illustrious virgin," commemorated by Mar. O'Gorman at April 21 (Ma Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 107 n. 4).

[J. G.]

EDILBALD (Bed. H. E. v. 24, Adda ann. 740, 750, in M. H. B. 288 b, c), king of Mercia. [ETHELBALD (1).]

EDILBERT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. M. H. B. 724 e), king of Kent, son of Wihtra [ETHELBERT II.]

[C. H.]

EDILBIN, eleventh bishop of Llandaff (Stub. Reg. Sac. Angl. 156), and probably the same Ufelwy, a bishop in Ergyng. [UFELWY.] (L. Land. by Rees, 624; Godwin, de Praesul. Angl. 623).

[J. G.]

EDILFYW appears to have been bishop of Llandaff, and to have died in the middle or late part of the 7th century. Beyond his receiving from Gwrgan and Bonus two pieces of land, voted to God and to St. Dubricius, for the good of their souls, we know nothing of him. He is probably to be distinguished from both ELVOG and EDILBIN (Liber Landav. by Rees, 415, 620).

EDNYFED is said to have been the son of Macsen Wledig (the Roman emperor Maximian) by Elen, daughter of Euddaff, a wealthy lord of Carnarvon; but though he is counted among the Welsh saints, like his brothers Owain and Petlig, he is not remembered in any church or name (Rees, Welsh Saints, 108, Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, ii. c. 27).

[J. G.]

EDOBICUS (EDOVIOUS, EDOCHIMUS, EDOCHUS, EDOBECCUS, ODOBECCUS), a general of reel Constantinus, tyrant of Gaul, in the time of the emperor Honorius, A.D. 407-411.

Constantine was at his court at Arles. Hearing that his general in Spain, Count Gerontius, had revolted from him and invested Maximus with the purple, he sent his general Edobicus across the Rhine to get the aid of the Franks and Alamanni. Meanwhile, the army of the emperor Honorius besieged Arles, under the command of Constantius, the father of Valentinianus Augustus. Tidings arriving that Edobicus and his allies were coming, the imperial generals seem to have lost heart, and to have made preparations for returning to Italy and carrying on the war there. When the camp of Edobicus was already close by, they threw their troops across the Rhone. Their tactics at any rate proved successful. Constantius awaited the enemy with the infantry; Ulfila his colleague lay in ambush with the cavalry. The forces of Edobicus were allowed to pass the ambush, and were beginning to engage with Constantius, when the horsemen of Ulfila broke upon their rear. They were at once scattered; some fled, some were slaughtered, others threw away their arms and begged quarter. Edobicus himself mounted a horse and fled to a country house, where he had a friend named Eodicius, whom he had in past days loaded with benefits. Forgetful of these claims, Eodicius appeared in the imperial camp with the head of the fugitive, hoping for great rewards and honours. Constantius behaved with much good sense. He ordered the head to be received: said that the state owed its thanks to Ulfila for what Eodicius had achieved; and when Eodicius wished to remain with him, ordered him off, expressing his opinion that the company of such a man was servicable neither to himself nor to his army, as he had served his old friend so abominably. "So Eodicius, who had dared the wicked murder of his friend in misfortune, 'gaping in vain,' as the saying is, made away."

(Seson. ix. 13, 14, in Patr. Gr. lxxvii. 1621-1624; Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. ii. 9, p. 61, in Patr. Lat. lxxi. 206, quoting Renatus Profuturus Frigeridus.) [W. M. S.]

EDOCHIMUS. [EDOBICUS.]

EDOLDUS (HELDOLDUS) is placed twenty-fourth in the list of the bishops of Meaux, after St. Ebrigiulus, and preceding Adulfus. His date may be about the close of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1602.) [S. A. B.]

EDOVICUS. [EDOBICUS.]

EDRABORDUS, an unknown or corrupt name of an abbat who attests the reception of the acts of the Legatine Synod of 787 in the northern province. It may represent Ethelhard (afterwards archbishop of Canterbury) or Forthrad, a prominent Mercian abbat of the time. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 462.) [S.]

EDRIC (1) (Bed. H. E. iv. 26, in M. H. B. 342a; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 686, in M. H. B. 537d; Malm. G. R. A. i. §§ 13, 14, ed. Hardy), king of Kent, son of Egbert. [EADRIC (1).] [C. H.]

EDRIC (2) (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 34, ed. Hardy), successor of Ethelwalch king of S. Saxons. [EADRIC (1).] [C. H.]

EDRIC (3), son of Keni and the father of Aldulf (or Ealdwulf) king of the East Angles, according to Nennius, who is the only authority for his existence. He would thus be a brother of Anna king of East Anglia. Lappenberg's pedigree of the East Anglian kings makes Edric uncle, not father, of Ealdwulf. (Nenn. Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 74c; Lappenb. Hist. Engl. i. 287.) [C. H.]

EDULF (Malm. G. P. i. § 7, ed. Hamilton, p. 16; Id. G. R. A. i. § 87, ed. Hardy), bishop of Sidnacester, suffragan of the archbishop of Lichfield. [EADULF (4) II.] [C. H.]

EDUS, ST. (MS. Vita, referred to in Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 189), one of the names of Aidan, Aedhan, or Maidoe, bishop of Ferns. [EDAN.] [C. H.]

EDWALD (Annal. Camb. ann. cccxiii. i.e. A.D. 757, in M. H. B. 833 c, and note), king of the Saxons; perhaps ETHELBALD king of Mercia. [C. H.]

EDWEN, a female saint of Saxon descent, has been allowed a place among the saints of Wales. She is said to have been a daughter or a niece of Edwin of Northumbria, and the statement derives probability from the circumstance that Edwin was brought up in the court of Cadfan king of North Wales, at Caerseiont or Carnarvon (Lappenberg, Hist. Eng. i. 145, transl.). Llanedwen in Anglesey is dedicated to her, and her festival has been kept on Nov. 6 (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 303, 324). She is to be distinguished from Adwen or Edwen, whose name is found in Advent, or St. Adven, Cornwall (Rees, Welsh Saints, 303, 324; Myv. Arch. ii. 40). [C. W. B.]

EDWIN (ÆDGUIN, ÆDWINE, ÆDWINI, EADWINE, EDWINE) was the son of Ella or Alla, who for at least thirty years was king of Deira. On the death of Ella in A.D. 593, Edwin was a child, and was deprived of his inheritance by Ethelric, whose son Ethelfrid had married Acha, the boy's sister. Ethelric reigned three years, and then his son Ethelfrid continued his father's usurpation. Between the brothers-in-law there was naturally much suspicion and jealousy. Edwin was obliged to flee, and for many years was in banishment or retirement. At last he found shelter with Redwald king of East Anglia, who was tempted by Ethelfrid with bribes and threats to surrender him. His faithless host resolved either to kill his guest or give him up. A trusty friend conveyed to Edwin the tidings, and promised to shew him a place of security. Edwin was incredulous, and said that, should his news be true, he had rather perish there than continue his wanderings. The friend retired, and Edwin, sick at heart, was sitting in front of Redwald's palace, when during the night a man came up to him, strange in features and dress. The visitor cheered the sad-hearted prince with his words, suggesting to him the possibility of safety and future power, and seeking and obtaining a promise of the manifestation of the listener's gratitude if his suggestion should be verified. Finally, he asked him what he would do if, in addition, the speaker should be able to put before him a method of life and security better far than any of his kindred had attained to. Edwin at once promised to adopt it. The stranger then laid his hand upon his head, and bade him, when that sign was repeated, remember and keep his pledge. He was gone as suddenly as he had come. The young prince sat still, anxious although less sad than before, and he was sitting there when his friend returned with the happy news that Redwald, at the request of his queen, had now made up his mind to protect his religion. War thereupon broke out between Redwald and Ethelfrid, which ended in the rout and death of the latter in a battle near the river Idle in Nottinghamshire. This was in A.D. 616. By the death of Ethelfrid, Edwin obtained the kingdom of Deira, and that of Bernicia as well. (Bed. H. E. ii. 12.)

During his exile, Edwin married Coenburga, daughter of Cearl king of the Mercians, by whom he had two sons, Osfrid and Eanfrid. In A.D. 625 he took for his second wife Ethelburga or Tatae, daughter of Ethelbert king of Kent. The princess was a Christian; and for a time her brother Eadbald refused to give his sister to a pagan. The difficulty was settled by Edwin undertaking to allow the princess and her suite the most ample use of their own creed. The missionary bishop, Paulinus, accompanied the lady into the North as her chaplain. (Bed. H. E. ii. 9.)

In A.D. 626 a desperate assault was made upon Edwin with a poisoned weapon, by an assassin named Eumer, who was sent on his base errand by Cuichelm king of Wessex. Edwin was at his royal villa on the bank of the Derwent when the attempt was made, which was only frustrated by a faithful servant named Lilla interposing his body and dying in his master's stead. This was on Easter Day. In the evening of the same day the queen bore Edwin a daughter, who was called Eanfled. The king in the presence of Paulinus thanked his gods for the boon, but Paulinus ascribed the mercy to Christ, and said that it was through his intercession that the life of the queen had been preserved. This pleased Edwin, who promised to become a Christian if he could punish Cuichelm for his treachery, and as a pledge of his sincerity he permitted Paulinus to baptize, on Whit Sunday, his new-born child. The victory over Cuichelm was gained; but Edwin, although worshipping idols no longer, shrank from adopting Christianity. Many conferences on the subject took place between the king and his nobles and Paulinus (Bed. H. E. ii. 9.). Every spiritual agency was brought to bear upon the wavering monarch. Bede preserves two letters which pope Boniface addressed to Edwin and his queen, urging on the great religious change (id. ii. 10, 11.). It was at this critical period, as Bede tells us, that the mysterious stranger at Redwald's palace re-appeared in Paulinus, who laid his hand upon Edwin's head, and bade him remember and be faithful. Edwin gave way, but wished to consult his council, that, if possible, the change should be a national one. The opinion of Coifi, the pagan chief priest, swayed the rest, and their idolatry was abandoned. This was evidenced by the destruction of the great heathen temple at Goodman-ham, near York, on which Coifi himself [Coifi] made the first assault (id. ii. 13.).

The barriers were now broken down, and Edwin with his nobles and a vast multitude of his people became Christians. The king was baptized on Easter Day, A.D. 627, in the church of St. Peter, in York, which he had hastily constructed of wood for that purpose, and for catechetical instruction. At the same time he made York the seat of a bishopric for Paulinus, who prevailed upon the king to begin the erection of a larger and grander edifice of stone, enclosing in a square the wooden shrine in which the baptism had recently taken place. Edwin, however, never saw its completion. Meanwhile, the progress of Christianity was most rapid. All the king's children were baptized, and the people flocked in crowds to that holy rite. Every help was given to Paulinus, who was often in attendance upon the court. We hear of him spending thirty-six whole days at Adgefrin (Yevering), in Bernicia, with the king and queen, instructing and baptizing the hosts which came to him. When the missionary baptized in the Trent Edwin was with him. But the details of the conversion of Northumbria must be reserved for the life of PAULINUS (Bed. ii. capp. 14, 16.). Edwin did not confine his religious fervour to his own people. He induced Eorpwald king of East Anglia, the son of his old friend Redwald, to embrace Christianity with his subjects (id. ii. 15.). In A.D. 634, when Honorius became pope, he wrote a letter to Edwin, praising him for his good works and fervour, and urging him to still greater efforts (id. ii. 18.). News travelled slowly in those days, evil or good. When the letter was written, Edwin was dead.

In A.D. 633, Caedwalla, a British king, rose against Edwin in rebellion, aided by Penda king of Mercia, who was eager to release his province from Northumbrian thralldom. The battle was fought at Haethfelth (probably Hatfield Chase), which is called Meican by Nennius, and ended in the utter rout of Edwin's forces and his own death. Nennius says that not one of his men escaped (p. 52). Everything was then disorganized. Edwin's head was brought to York, and buried in the minster, in St. Gregory's porch. His body was interred at Whitby (Bed. H. E. iii. 24.). Paulinus and his royal mistress Ethelburga returned to Kent by sea, conducted by Bassus, a trusty soldier, and brought with them Eanfled and Vuscfrea, the royal children, with Iffi the son of Osfrid, Edwin's grandson (Bed. ii. 20.).

By his first wife Coenburga Edwin had two sons, Osfrid, who fell at Haethfelth (id. ii. 20.), and Eadfrid, who was afterwards put to death by Penda, with whom he had taken refuge (id. ii. 19.). By his second wife, Ethelburga of Kent, Edwin had several children. Ethelhun and Etheldreda, a son and daughter, died young and were buried at York (id. ii. 14.). Vuscfrea, another son, was sent with his sister Eanfled for protection and education to the court of Dagobert king of France, and died there (id. ii. 20.). Eanfled, the only surviving child, married Oswy king of Northumbria, and is interred at Whitby. In an after day the monks of St. Alban's imagined the existence of another daughter, Rosella, who is said to have born baptized at Tynemouth, in a wooden chapel or church which her father had built. There is no early evidence of anything of the kind.

The kingdom of Edwin was small at the first, but grew to a very considerable size. His father Ella was king of Deira, which extended from the Tees to the Humber; the West Riding, or Elmete, being an independent British state. On the death of the intruder Ethelfrid in A.D. 616, Edwin recovered not only his own kingdom of Deira, but acquired that of Bernicia as well. Bernicia extended from the Tees to the Frith-of-Forth, and included Reged. Edwin added to Deira the British kingdom of Elmete, and we hear of his subjugating the Mevanian islands, by which we must understand Anglesey and Man (Bed. H. E. ii. 9; Malmab. de Gestis Regum, i. 69). On the death of Redwald he attained the dignity or office of Bretwalda, which he exercised over the whole of England save Kent, that kingdom being exempted, according to Malmesbury, because Edwin would not exert jurisdiction over the brother of his wife (William of Malmesbury. 68). Over Mercia he was more directly the sovereign, and the native British states generally recognized his over-lordship. He had thus a very large dominion. Still his subjects were composed of various races, especially in Northumbria. More than half the people in this province must have been Britons at this time, particularly in the west, and over these Edwin's hold must at all times have been precarious. That it was so is abundantly shewn by the success of the rebellion which, in spite of a long reign of peace and toleration, not only destroyed Edwin, but brought to an end the rule of his children.

Eborwic, or York, was the chief city in Edwin's dominion, but the principal temple of pagan worship was at Goodmanham, near Market-Weighton; there was a royal town on the Derwent, and another at Campodonum, which is probably the modern Doncaster. Catterick on the Swale was the centre of a large population. In Nottinghamshire there was the city of Tio-wulfingacaester on the Trent. Edwinstow, in the same county, probably derives its name from Edwin, but Edwin's-path, the scene of a council in Wilfrid's days, is changed by the light of modern criticism into Aetswinapath, the swine's path. In the north, the modern Bambrough, king Ida's towers, was a royal residence of renown; there was another at Adgefrin, or Tevering, and the whole neighbourhood of the Cheviots in Edwin's time was densely populated. Still farther northwards, it is probable that Edinburgh is Edwin's-burgh, the town or burgh of Edwin.

The reign of Edwin was eminently prosperous and happy. Bede tells us that so profound was the peace in those days that in the writer's time it was still a proverbial saying that, when Edwin was king, a woman with her new-born child could walk from sea to sea without being molested. It was told of him that at the ~~edges of the~~ highway-sides he fixed posts with ~~in which~~ fastened to them for the use of ~~the~~ ~~posts~~ ~~which~~ none would carry away. Not ~~only~~ ~~the~~ banners borne before him, but ~~the~~ ~~posts~~ ~~of~~ ~~peace~~, whenever he walked abroad, ~~the~~ ~~posts~~ went in advance, bearing an ~~ant~~ ~~a~~ ~~fluy~~, i.e., a tuft of feathers fastened to a spear's point (Bed. H. E. ii. 17). In the days of turmoil which followed, many would look back with longing to the peaceful reign of Edwin.

Edwin's name appears on the calendar on Oct. 4. (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. vi. 108-119, and Capgrave, ff. 116-20.) [J. R.]

EDWINE (EDWINUS, EDA), described by Simeon of Durham as once a dux of the Northumbrians, afterwards abbat of Et-Gegenforda, mighty in the service of God, who died a "miles emeritus," Jan. 15, 801, at his monastery in the presence of the brethren, and was interred with much honour in the church of the monastery (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 801, in M. H. B. 672 b). He may have been the "dux Wada" who was put to flight in the rebellion of 798, as suggested by Mr. Hinde (Sym. Dun. p. 39, ed. Surtees Soc.). A similar instance of a military leader in Northumbria turning ecclesiastic about the same time occurs in the case of "Alric quondam dux," who died a cleric at York in 796 (Sim. Dun. s. a.)

Gegenforda must be the modern Gainford on the Durham side of the Tees, between Darlington and Barnard Castle, described by Camden (ed. Gough, 1789, iii. 112) and Surtees (Hist. Durh. 1840, iv. 8). Shortly after abbat Edwine's time Egred bishop of Lindisfarne (A.D. 821-845) "built a church at the vill which is called Gagnford, and gave it to St. Cuthbert, and all belonging to it from the river Tese as far as the Weor." (Hist. S. Cuthbert, in Sim. Dun. ed. Surtees Soc. p. 142; see also Sim. Dun. Hist. Eccles. Dun. ii. 5.) From this passage Surtees infers that Gainford was thus early considered, what it certainly is found to be afterwards, the head of a district, but he does not notice Simeon's record of Edwine's monastery given above. That passage seems the only one that mentions the existence of a monastery at Gainford. The Chronicle of Melrose (ed. Stevenson, 1835, p. 13), calling him Edwinus and Eda, "quondam dux," and dating his death Jan. 15, 801, states that he was buried in his church at Geinforda, but it says nothing as to a monastery. Tanner and Dugdale are equally silent with Camden and Surtees as to any tradition of one. Birch (Fastes Monastici, p. 71) includes abbat Eda in his list (calling him also "rex," not "dux") without naming his abbey, and referring only to Chron. Mailr. dating his death Jan. 15, 800. Mr. Hinde, in a note on Simeon, remarks (p. 39) that "some interesting remains of an early ecclesiastical settlement have been recently (1867) discovered" at Gainford. [C. H.]

EGBALD (1) (EGBALD, EGBALD, EGBALD), mentioned in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle as third abbat of Peterborough or Medeshamstede (M. H. B. 322). The insertion of the name in the list of abbats is due to the fact that a charter is found in the Peterborough Chartularies in which land at Hogh, in Heburheage in Kent, is granted to an abbat Egbald, and the grant is confirmed at Medeshamstede by Ethelred king of Mercia, and Saxulf his bishop. The charter, which is full of difficulties, would claim a date about A.D. 690; but, even if it is not spurious, it proves no connexion between Egbald and Medeshamstede (Kemble, C. D. 40; Monast.

Angl. i. 384). The fact, however, that an abbat named Egbald flourished about this time is proved by the attestation of a charter by which land is granted to a monastery at Beddenham, and which is confirmed by Sebbi king of Essex, and Erkenwald bishop of London (Kemble, C. D. 35). [S.]

EGBALD (2) (EGBALT, EGWALT, EGILWALD, EGILWARD), a West Saxon abbat, whose monastery was at Waltham (probably Bishop's Waltham in Hampshire), and who flourished early in the 8th century. It was to his care that Willibald, afterwards bishop of Eichstaedt, was committed when five years old. As Willibald was consecrated bishop in 741, in the forty-first year of his age, Egbald's date will fall in the very first years of the century, and he may be the true Egbald (No. 1) to whom the abbacy of Medeshamstede is ascribed. (Vita Willibaldi, Mabillon, AA. SS. O. S. B. saec. iii. pt. 2, p. 334.) [S.]

EGBALD (3), the tenth bishop of Winchester (M. H. B. 619). His name is attached to a charter of Cynewulf king of Wessex, dated 778, and to an act of the synod at Brentford in 781. He was succeeded by Dudda, and Dudda by Kynebert before the year 787. (Kemble, C. D. 133, 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 438, 439.) [S.]

EGBERHT (1) (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 672, in M. H. B. 534 a), presbyter. [EGBERT (5).] [C. H.]

EGBERHT (2) (Flor. Wig. Nom. Archiep. Ebor. in M. H. B. 625 b), archbishop of York. [EGBERT (6).] [C. H.]

EGBERHT (3) (A. S. C. ann. 784, in M. H. B. 336), king of Wessex. [EGBERT (4).] [C. H.]

EGBERT (1) I., king of Kent, son of Earcombert and Sexburga, succeeded his father in 664, and reigned until 673. (See Ann. Cant. in Hardy, i. 364; Pertz, Scr. iv. 2.) Like all the Anglo-Saxon kings of the age, he has a history with two sides, one veritable and the other legendary. The veritable details of his reign we learn from Bede. His father Earcombert having died on the same day as archbishop Deusdedit, July 14, 664, Egbert's first important task was to obtain a new archbishop. The slow development of the episcopate in the south and the scarcely healed division between the Scottish and Roman partisans in the north, made it extremely desirable to obtain for the church a ruler about whose title there could be no question. Accordingly Egbert joined with Oswy king of Northumbria in selecting for the vacant post an English priest, Wighard, whom they sent to Rome for consecration. Wighard died at Rome, and pope Vitalian, thinking it incumbent on him to find a substitute, sent Theodore in his place. Theodore was consecrated in 668, and arrived at Canterbury in 669, accompanied by Raedfrith, whom Egbert had sent to conduct him to Britain (Bede, H. E. iii. 29, iv. 1). During the interval Egbert had invited Wilfrid to Canterbury, where he ordained priests and deacons and discharged other episcopal offices (Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 14, ed. Gale, p. 58). In the year 669, after Theodore's arrival in Kent, Egbert bestowed on his priest Bass land at Reculver for the foundation of a monastery (Chr. S. in M. H. B. 318), which became the burial-place of some of the later Kentish kings. He died in 673, on the 4th of July (Annal. Cantuar. in Pertz, Scriptores, iv. 2; Bede, H. E. iv. 5), leaving by a wife, whose name is not recorded, at least two sons, Eadric and Wihtrud, who ultimately succeeded him. His immediate successor was his brother Hlothre. He is regarded by Eldius as a religious prince, and was certainly a powerful one, for his authority must have extended over Surrey, where Erkenwald bishop of London, partly under his auspices, was founding the monastery of Chertsey. Legend, however, has thrown a dark shadow over the history of Egbert. According to the Canterbury traditions, Earcombert had succeeded to the throne of Kent in spite of the claims of Ethelbert and Ethelred, the infant sons of his brother Eormenred, and had left to Egbert a throne embarrassed by a doubtful title. In order to gain favour with Egbert, Thunor, one of his thegns, murdered the two princes, who were accounted martyrs; and Egbert, who had connived at the murder, or rather had shewn himself negligent in preventing it, gave to their sister Eormenburga or Dompneva as much land as a hind could run round in a day. On this she founded the monastery of Minster in Thanet. [EORMENBURGA (1); ETHELBERT (5); ETHELRED (1).] [S.]

EGBERT (2) II., king of Kent. A second Egberht reigned in Kent, or a part of it, in the latter half of the 8th century. His existence is proved by several charters which are found in the Textus Roffensis, and by coins which apparently can be referred to no other period or country. If these are to be depended upon, Egbert began to reign at least as early as 765, in which he granted land at Rochester to bishop Eardulf in a charter which was confirmed by the kings Heaberht [EADBERT (3)] and Offa (Kemble, C. D. 113; Monast. Angl. i. 166), another king named Sigere claiming half Kent about the same time. Another grant of Egbert is dated at Canterbury in 778; in this he bestows land at Bromgeheg (Bromley) on Rochester (Kem. C. D. 132; Monast. Angl. i. 166); and this is confirmed by another grant of the next year (K. C. D. 135; Monast. Angl. i. 167). Another undated grant, confirmed by Heaberht, bestows land at Halling on the same church (Kem. C. D. 160; Monast. Angl. i. 166). Unfortunately all these documents proceed from the same chartulary, and must stand or fall together. If they stand, Egbert must have retained power longer than any of the other Kentish pretenders of the age, and have even survived the subjugation of the kingdom by Offa in 774. He is noticed by none of our historians, unless he be the Egferth who, according to Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 734), ruled Kent for thirty-four years, after the death of Ethelbert II. His coins are described by Hawkins (English Silver Coins, ed. Kenyon, pp. 31, 32), as struck by two moneyers, Udd and Babba, who also struck coins of Offa; so that all through his reign he may possibly have been under Offa's supremacy. But this must remain conjectural. [S.]

in M. H. B. 721 c; Malm. G. R. A. i. §§ 65, 69, 70, 72), king of Northumbria, son of Eata, also called Eadbert. [EADBERT (5).] [C. H.]

EGBERT (4) (EGBERT, EGBERT), king of the West Saxons 802–839. Although the longer and more important part of the reign of Egbert falls outside of the period comprised in this work, his position and power render the reign itself a mark of an epoch which in English history answers to that furnished by the reign of Charles the Great in the general history of Europe. It is desirable, therefore, to point out briefly the main features of the reign and its special bearing on the unity and continuity of our ecclesiastical and civil history.

Egbert was the son of Ealhmund, who was the great-grandson of Ina's brother Ingild. Since the resignation of Ina in 725 the West-Saxon crown had been worn by a succession of kings who, whatever were their relation to the main line of Cerdic, were not in the direct line of succession. Ethelhard, Cuthred, Sigebert, Cynwulf, and Beorhtric are all described as kinsmen to one another, but in no case is the pedigree preserved. It is probable then that the direct line of Ingild having been set aside in favour of Ethelhard who had to contend likewise with a more distant competitor, Oswald, the restoration of the fortunes of the house was first attempted by Ealhmund, who is said in the Chronicle to have been king in Kent in 784, or perhaps, allowing for two years' variation, in 786. Nothing can be affirmed positively as to his relations to Beorhtric [BEORHTRIC], but it is obvious that if both began to reign in 786, and both claimed to be kings representing the house of Cerdic, their relations could not be friendly. As no more is heard of Ealhmund, it must be inferred that his pretensions to Wessex, if he made any, were defeated; his position in Kent seems to have been taken up ten years later by Eadbert Praen; and his son Egbert, who would probably be a child in 786, appears first in 802, on the death of Beorhtric. Beorhtric was a mere dependant of Offa; and to the agency of the two kings the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and the authorities that followed it ascribe the banishment of Egbert and his exile at the court of Charles. Of the fact there need be no doubt, but the length of the exile is doubtful; the more ancient authorities (Chr. S., Flor. Wig., H. Hunt.) making it three years, William of Malmesbury, who probably had other authorities for the West-Saxon history, making it thirteen. If Egbert returned from exile in 802, three years would be too short, as Offa had then been six years dead; but he may have returned on the death of Offa, and taken his chances with Eadbert Praen; two dates may therefore be suggested, 793–796 and 789–802; the other two, 783–796 and 799–802, being excluded by the mention of Offa and Beorhtric as acting together. As, however, Offa's hold on Wessex was finally established by the marriage of Beorhtric and Eadburga in 789 (Chr. S. 787) and thirteen years from that date bring us to the accession of Egbert in 802, probability, as contrasted with evidence, is in favour of this computation. If this be accepted Egbert must have witnessed some of the most important acts of the career of Charles, especially his assumption of the imperial crown, and must have returned to England qualified by education and experience for the great part which he afterwards played. On the death of Beorhtric, which occurred in 802 (Chr. S. 800), Egbert seems to have succeeded to the throne with little trouble.

England under Kenulf [KENULF] was in a very different condition from that in which it had been under Offa, who had either subjugated all the other kingdoms, or reduced them, by bestowing his daughters on the kings, to the condition of humble allies. Before his death Northumbria had broken away from him, and his son-in-law Ethelred had been murdered; Kent had risen under Eadbert Praen, and Wessex itself was disquieted by the intrigues of Eadburga. Egfrid the son of Offa had reigned only a few months, and Kenulf, who was only a distant kinsman, possessed neither the policy nor the alliances of Offa. Still Kenulf during great part of his reign retained supremacy in Kent and East Anglia, and was the most powerful king in England. What slight opposition was offered to Egbert's succession must have been owing to Kenulf's suggestion. According to the Chronicle, on the day of Egbert's succession, possibly in consequence of something which occurred at his election, Ethelmund, the ealdorman of the Hwicci, made an incursion into Wiltshire. Weoxtan the ealdorman, with the men of Wiltshire, withstood him, and although both leaders fell in the battle the invaders were routed.

From this year to 815 (813 Chr. S.) the annals of the reign of Egbert are blank. There is indeed a legend, or rather fabricated story, that in the first year of his reign Egbert called together his witan at Winchester, and decreed that for the future his kingdom should be called Anglin (Monast. Angl. vi. 608), but the story need only to be mentioned to be rejected; it is clearly a forgery of a late date, at which Egbert had come to be popularly regarded as king of all England. Neither letter, charter, nor legend breaks the silence for fourteen years. Matthew Paris alone seems to antedate the later conquests of Egbert, by placing the conquest of Cornwall in 808, and that of the northern Welsh in 810 and 811. These years were given, if we may argue from the results, to the consolidation of the West-Saxon power at home, and on the western border. Not a word is said of any participation of Egbert in the struggle between Canterbury and Mercia, nor does his name appear in the correspondence of the emperor: there are no West Saxon synods, nor even a monastic charter.

Egbert, in some of his later charters, which are regarded as genuine, adopts with the computation of his regnal years, a method of dating by the years of his "ducatu," dating from 812: in charters of 826 the twenty-fourth year of the reign answers to the fourteenth of the "ducatu." (Kemble, C. D. 1035, 1036, 1038.) It may be inferred from this that the year 812 or 813 was marked by the initiation of hostile measures, probably against the Welsh. Whether the "ducatu" implies the assumption of the character of Bretwalda, or the national hegemony, or whether the charters in which the term occurs are genuine, may be moot questions, but Egbert certainly had not in 812 or 813 performed any historical exploits that entitled him to such a claim; and the form was adopted only in his later years when his succomes had justified the assumption. Anyhow his military activity begins about this time, and in 814 we have the first gleam of light on the ecclesiastical history of the West-Saxon realm. In 814 (Chr. S. 812), bishop Wigthen of Winchester went to Rome in company with archbishop Wulfred. From that period seems to date the gradual coolness between Wulfred and Kenulf, which broke out later into an open quarrel, and possibly also that closer intercourse with Wessex which still later grew into a strong alliance.

In 815 (813, Chr. S.) Egbert laid waste West Wales or Cornwall from east to west. If his victories in this struggle suggested to him the assumption of a new title, as he had seen Charles assume the imperium, he may now have assumed the "ducatu," dating it by the commencement of his expedition. After this another blank of ten years occurs, during which the great synod of Councils in 816 was held, no mention of Egbert being made in it. King Kenulf died in 821 (Chr. S. 819), Ceolwulf his successor was deposed, and Beornwulf was placed on the throne 823. In 824 we have the first notice of a meeting of the West-Saxon witan under Egbert; it was held at Acleah, Oakley (probably the Hampshire Oakley, near Basingstoke), and approved of a grant made by the king to his "praefectus" or reeve Wulfheard (Kemble, C. D. 1031, from the Codex Wintoniensis). The next year he was again at war, and his career of aggrandisement began. As before, his first expedition was against the Britons of Cornwall: the men of Devon fought with them at Camelford, there was great slaughter, but the result is not stated. (Chr. S.; H. Hunt. in M. H. B. 733.) Egbert himself was probably employed in this campaign: for there are two charters drawn up with the date Aug. 19, 825, at Creodantreow, "in hoste quando Egbertus rex Gewissorum movit contra Brittones." (K. C. D. 1033, 1035.) The same year was fought the battle of Ellandune, between Egbert and Beornwulf, which was the first of the decisive encounters between Mercia and Wessex. The place is uncertain, but it was probably not far from Winchester, as Hun the ealdorman of Somerset who fell at Ellandune was buried at Winchester. (Ethelwerd, M. H. B. 810.) If Beornwulf had penetrated so far into Wessex as this, he must have taken advantage of Egbert's absence on the British frontier. The battle was a cruel one, and the streams run with blood. Egbert was completely victorious, and the tottering fabric of Mercian supremacy fell at once. Into Kent Egbert sent his son Ethelwulf with the ealdorman Wulfheard and bishop Ealhstan of Sherborn to recover the kingdom of his father Ealhmund, which, as the Chronicler says, had been unjustly lost. (M. H. B. 845.) Surrey, Sussex, and Essex submitted at once; East Anglia, whither Beornwulf had betaken himself, made overtures to Egbert, and there Beornwulf himself was killed by the people. The Mercians, divided among themselves, continued the unequal struggle for some few years. In 825 or 826 Ludecan succeeded Beornwulf; he fell in an attempt to recover East Anglia, after a reign of two years. (Flor. Wig. in M. H. B. 548.) Wiglaf his successor, who seems to have acquired the throne in 828, was immediately attacked and deposed by Egbert (829, Chr. S. 827). It is at this period that the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle applies the title of Bretwalda to Egbert, two or three years of exile Wiglaf was on the throne of Mercia by Egbert as tary king. (Haddan and Stubbs, li. 557 probably about this time or a little earlier) Egbert gave the kingdom of Kent to Ethelwulf. The Chronicle, under the (corr. 829), mentions an expedition against Northumbria: he advanced (Derbyshire) and there received the support of the nation. Another expedition against North Wales completes this portion of his reign. During these years there is a very little from charters; in 828 Egbert, together with Ethelwulf, whom he calls in the charter "our son," granted to the church at Rochester a community for its estates from public imposition the three regular exactions (Kem. C. D. 224). In 830, as king of the West Saxons and Kentishmen, Egbert gave lands in Kent to the thegn Etheric (Kem. C. D. 224). In 833, and a small estate in Kent to an abbat named and his church at Sandon (Kem. C. D. 224). That year held his court on St. Stephen's, Dorchester, where he decided a cause regarding land in a charter preserved in the Anglo-Saxon bury Cartulary (Kem. C. D. 232).

Shortly after this occurred the first attack on the south coast from the northern sea kings. (corr. 834) Sheppey was ravaged by the heathens in 833 (corr. 835) Egbert, in a battle at the mouth (Carrum), had to contend with thirty ships of the Danes; he was defeated, and in the fray two bishops and two ealdormen were slain. In 835 (837) the Danes and Cornishmen united were defeated by the king at Hengistad (M. H. B. 844, 845.) This was Egbert's last victory, although after the intermission

EGBERT (8) (EGBERT), presbyter, a Northumbrian of noble descent, born in 839 (cf.
Bede, iii. 27, and v. 21), went as a youth (ib.
iv. 3) into Ireland for purposes of study and devotion (ib. iii. 4, 27). Many Englishmen of that age did the like, visiting the "cells" of different Irish teachers, and receiving gratuitous

which he thought he saw the soul of bishop Cedda descend with angels to take the soul of Chad into the "heavenly kingdom" (Bede, iv. 3). Egbert remonstrated with king Egfrid of Northumbria, when in the spring of 684 he was planning an invasion of Ireland (ib. iv. 26): "Why should he attack a country which had done him no harm?" But, says Bede, Egfrid "refused to hearken." Egbert, some two or three years later, was fired with that missionary ardour which at that time so powerfully animated the Irish church: he thought of "sailing round Britain" in order to evangelise some of the German tribes, as Frisians, Old-Saxons, Bo-ructuarrians, &c., or, if this could not be done, he meditated a pilgrimage to the "threshold of the apostles" at Rome (ib. v. 9). He had selected his companions, and provided all necessities for the voyage, when one morning a monk, who had lived at Melrose under Boisil, told him of a dream in which he had been warned by Boisil to say to Egbert, in Christ's name, that he was not able ("non valet") to accomplish the intended journey, and must rather go to teach "the monasteries of Columba." "Say nothing about this," said Egbert, "lest it should prove an illusion." He himself, "considering the matter in silence, feared that it might be true, yet did not like" to give up his missionary enterprise. After a few days the monk told him that he had been rebuked in another dream, for having given the warning negligently and coldly: he must go again and say to Egbert, "that will he, nill he, he must come to the monasteries of Columba, because their ploughs do not go straight: that it is his duty to recall them to the right path." Egbert no longer doubted, and yet according to the story, he made one more attempt to carry out his one purpose. His vessel was laden and was awaiting a fair wind, when a storm arose, destroyed some portion of the freight, though nothing of what belonged to Egbert and his friends, and left the ship "lying amid the waves near the shore." Then, at last, Egbert gave way. He remained, however, in Ireland until 716, and then went to Icolmkill, where, "by his pious and diligent exhortations," he persuaded abbat Dun Chad and the community to adopt the "Catholic Easter" and the crown-like tonsure, and then, in Bede's view, "consecrated" the island afresh "to Christ" by bringing it into "the light of church fellowship" (ib. v. 22). He spent there the remaining thirteen years of his life, dying happily on Easter-day, the 24th of April, A.D. 729. Bede had a special veneration for this "most reverend and holy father," this "servant of Christ and friend, to be named with all honour" (iii. 4, v. 9, 22), who was sometimes commemorated as St. Egbert.

[W. B.]

EGBERT (6) (EAMBERTH, EGGERT, HECHBERTUS), archbishop of York, the son of Eata, and a scion of the royal family of Northumbria. He was sent by his father, in his infancy, to a monastery to be educated, and, when grown up, Egbert went to Rome with his brother Egred, where he was ordained deacon. Egred died there, and Egbert returned home. In A.D. 732, bishop Wilfrid II. died, and Egbert was appointed his successor by king Ceolwulf. (Symeon, H. E. D. i. 2.) The Northumbrian chronology places

Egbert's accession in A.D. 732 (apud Bedam), the Saxon Chron. two years later. Other dates are given, which are manifestly erroneous.

Soon after Egbert's accession, Bede addressed to him a most admirable letter, which gives a clearer insight into the history of the northern church than any other document of that age. In the first place Bede exhorts Egbert not only to personal piety, but to the observance and dissemination of sound doctrine as well. Instead of abrupt changes from grave to gay, instead of seeking after worldly society and amusements, he bids him study God's word, and ordain more priests to preach and administer the sacraments in the country villages; to translate, also, the Creed and the Lord's Prayer out of Latin into Saxon, for the guidance of teachers and listeners. Bede then goes on to speak of the neglected state of the diocese. He says that there are towns and hamlets in the more inaccessible districts, which, although taxed for the support of a bishop, not only never see him from year to year, but are also without any resident teacher or minister. Hitherto the great hindrance to the much-needed subdivision of dioceses has been the greed of bishops. Against this evil a wise and salutary remedy was provided by the prescience of pope Gregory, who directed that there should be twelve bishops in the northern province, and Bede exhorts his friend to obtain for himself the pall, which will give him metropolitan authority, and to obtain the permission of king Ceolwulf to appoint suffragans. The creation of these can be effected by an arrangement with the monasteries, which may be made episcopal centres; the power of election might rest in them, at all events they might facilitate it. Bede then draws a sad picture of the condition of these monasteries. They were hot-beds of vice and iniquity, without discipline or supervision. For the last thirty years and more it had been a habit among the laity to purchase lands for the establishment of monasteries, which, when they were established and freed from secular jurisdiction, became the hereditary property of the founders and their families, who paid no attention to celibacy or anything else. There was scarcely a prefect who had not founded a monastery in this way, and the officers and servants of the king had followed their example, and this prefect or officer called himself an abbat. The whole diocese, Bede said, was full of disorder, corruption, and luxury, and stood in need of the most vigorous and searching reform. (Bede, Opp. ed. Smith, pp. 305-12.)

The advice and the warnings of Bede were not lost upon Egbert. In A.D. 735 he got the pall at Rome from Gregory III., thus becoming the metropolitan of the north, and the first archbishop of York since the time of Paulinus (Saxon Chron.). In A.D. 738 his brother Eadbert became king, so that he could now rely upon the support of the secular arm. There is no record, however, of his making any attempt to increase the number of his suffragans—territorial reasons were probably against this—but there is strong evidence to shew that Egbert was not only a learned, but at the same time a wise and successful ruler. His literary works were of great repute. Alcuin commends him for the way in which he distributed his wealth, especially among the poor. Egbert was evidently a digni-

Sed ecclesiastic, accustomed to patronize and to be looked up to, and yet with more suavity and geniality than might have been expected in a schoolmaster. He had also splendid tastes. He acquired many sacred vessels for his churches made of silver, and ornamented with jewels and gold, together with figured curtains of silk, apparently of foreign manufacture. He was also a reformer of church music, and seems to have introduced the observance of the hours. (Alcuin, de SS. Ebor. Eccl. 1262-1271.)

Egbert's chief claim to the gratitude of posterity was his establishment of the school or university of York, and his commencement of the library in connexion with it. The school was attached to the minster, on which it has conferred an enduring fame. Egbert himself was the moderator or head, and gave the religious instruction, whilst Ethelbert or Albert was the vice-dominus or abbas, and had the charge of grammar and the arts and sciences. Scholars flocked to York from all parts of Europe, and among the pupils was the illustrious Alcuin, who speaks affectionately of the piety and goodness of Egbert, telling us what an excellent instructor he was, how just and yet gentle. We gain also through Alcuin a glimpse of Egbert's scholastic life. It was his wont in the morning, as soon as he was at leisure, to send for some of the young clerks, whom he instructed in succession, sitting on his couch as he did so. At noon he went into his private chapel, and celebrated mass. When dinner was over, at which he ate sparingly, it was a pleasure to him to hear his scholars discuss literary questions. In the evening he said compline with them, and then each received his blessing, kneeling at Egbert's feet. (Vita B. Alcuini, ed. Jaffé, 10-11.)

Towards the close of his life, Egbert resigned to Albert and Alcuin the management of his school, and devoted himself exclusively to his spiritual work. His brother king Eadbert laid aside his crown, and came to live with him in A.D. 757 in religious retirement at York. The archbishop died first, on Nov. 19, A.D. 766; his brother survived him until Aug. 19, A.D. 768. They were laid side by side in one of the porches or chapels of York Minster. (Saxon Chron.; Symeon, H. R. ed. Surtees Soc. 20, 22-3.)

Egbert, in conjunction with his brother, struck coins, of which several types have been discovered. It was the fashion at one time to ascribe them to the kingdom of Kent.

Egbert was the most practically able man that had hitherto ruled the church of York. We do not hear of him as a great reformer; he strove rather to secure the next generation on the side of order and godliness by his educational efforts, and his own gentle yet firm example. His books are class or text books, pointing to what must then have seemed a very ideal state of discipline and purity, and setting up a possible standard of the most exalted kind. He had the advantage of living in a peaceful time, with his own brother on the throne, so that his plans had every reasonable chance of success, and he lived long enough to see them have a fair trial. It is not too much to say that the gentle influences of the school of York and its teachers kept Northumbria together until the close of the century in which Egbert lived. When we mark the political changes, and the violence and bloodshed of the times, we can only wonder that it endured so long. At the last, when Northumbria became hopelessly disorganized, the discipline and the learning of Egbert were enlightening other countries than that which they were intended to humanize. The children of the school of York taught the schools or universities of Italy, Germany, and France.

Among the letters of Boniface there are two addressed to Egbert, in one of which Boniface asks him to send him into Germany a part of Bede's Commentary; in the other he sends Egbert transcripts of the epistles of Gregory made for him at Rome, and unknown, as he thinks, in England. The letters shew that the writer valued the archbishop's opinion, and are very genial and instructive (Epp. ed. Giles, i. 87, 113). York had a great deal to do in the 7th and 8th centuries with the evangelization of Germany. There is also a letter extant, written in A.D. 757, in which Paul I. chides, apparently, both Egbert and his brother Eadbert, for an injustice done to abbat Fordred (Wilkins, Conc. i. 144; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 394). The name of Egbert ought not to have been inserted in it, as the rebuke was intended for the king, not for the archbishop.

Egbert was an author of note and fame, his works having for their aim the elevation of the moral tone of his clergy and diocese generally. They consist of the following.

1. A Pontificale, or volume of episcopal offices, printed for the first time by the Surtees Soc. (vol. xxvii.), from a MS. in the national library at Paris, formerly belonging to the church of Evreux. There are extracts from it in Martene, de Ant. Eccl. Rit. t. ii.; lib. ii. c. xiii.; cf. Maskell's Monum. Ritualia, var. loc.

2. Succinctus Dialogus Ecclesiasticæ Institutionis, a treatise on various points of church discipline, in the form of question and answer; printed first by Sir James Ware, 8vo. Dubl. 1664, pp. 91-114; afterwards by Labbe, vi. 1604-11; Johnson, ed. Baron. i. 161-179; Wilkins, i. 82-86; Mansi, xii. 482-88; Thorpe, Laws and Instit. ii. 87-96; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 403-13; cf. Leland, de Scriptt. Brit. i. 114 Oudin, i. 1796.

3. Excarpsum de Canonibus Catholicorum patrum, vel Poenitentiale ad remedium animarum, printed in Martene and Durand, Ampl. Coll. vii. coll. 40-8; Wasserschleben, Bussordnungen, etc., pp. 231-247; Haddan and Stubbs, Conc. iii. 413-31, where there is a learned and exhaustive note on the history of this work. The text printed by H. and S., and derived from Wasserschleben, seems to be the original work of Egbert, but it was subsequently overlaid with added materials from other sources, which are sometimes called a Confessionale and Poenitentiale. These are printed in a variety of forms by Labbe, vi. coll. 1611-19; Spelman, 281-8; Wilkins, i. 113-44, Mansi, xii. 459; Thorpe, ii. 128-239; cf. Wanley, ii. 109; Lel. de Scriptt. Brit. i. 114; Oudin, i. 1796; Wright, Biogr. Lit. i. 305; see also Fuller, Ch. Hist. b. ii. 101.

To Egbert there are also ascribed a series of Excerptiones, or extracts from the fathers and canons of the church, on matters of discipline. Wasserschleben, however, has shewn that they cannot be Egbert's, as they contain extracts from the Capitularia of Charlemagne (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 415). They are printed as Egbert's work by Spelman, pp. 258-80; Labbe, vi. ca. 1586-1604; Johnson, ed. Baron, i. 104-238; Wilkins, i. 101-12; Thorpe, ii. 326-43, cf. Wansley, ii. 100; Mabillon, Ann. Ben. ii. 210-11; Oudin, i. 1796.

Bale and his followers ascribe to Egbert other works, sc.:—Eremiticum Discipulorum, lib. i.; Homilies et Lectiones, lib. i.; Ad Ecclesiarum pastores, lib. i.; Ad Zachariam pro pallio, epist. 1; Ad Eadbertum fratrem regum, epist. 1; Ad Atinum diaconum epist. plur., sec. (Bale, Scriptt. Brit. cent. ii. 109; Pitsaeus, 133-4); cf. Smith's Flora Hist. Eccl. 153; Harjufeld, 148; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 627; Oudin, i. 1796; Wright, Biogr. Brit. Lit. i. 297-303; Dixon and Balin, Lives of Archbishops of York, i. 94-100.

EGBERT (T), bishop of Lindisfarne. Florence of Worcester (ann. 803) says that Egbert being elected on the death of Higbald was consecrated on June 11 by archbishop Eanbald. Simeon of Durham (Twysd. Scriptt. col. 119) writes: "Anno dcciii. Higbaldus episcopus obiit et Egbertus ei succedit." The MS. however, has an hiatus after "Egbertus," and "ei succedit" is supplied by Twysden from the continuation (see note in Sym. Dun. ed. Surtees Soc. p. 42, and M. H. B. 673 a), but this fault in the manuscript affects Egbert's succession less than that of Ceolnoth archbishop of Canterbury. June 11, 803, was probably the day of Egbert's consecration, as that day was Trinity Sunday, and this is the date adopted by Wharton (Angl. Sac. i. 696) and Stubbs (Regist. Sac. 9). Wendover also gives 803. We are indebted to Simeon of Durham (Dunelm. Eccl. ii. 5, Twysd. 13) for the information that Egbert was ordained bishop at Biguella, and that the assisting bishops were Eanbert of Hexham and Radulf of Whithorn. Biguella is identified with Bywell on the north bank of the Tyne (Sym. Dun. ut sup. ed. Stevenson), an account of which spot is given in E. Mackenzie's Northumberland, li. 350, ed. 1825.

Egbert's successor was Heathored, A.D. 821. His metropolitans were therefore Eanbald II. and Wulfy; the kings of Northumbria contemporary with him were Eardulf and Eanred. [ETHELWULF (3).] who writes to Ep. 32 in Patr.

Lat. lxxxix. 732; Mon. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, p. 68. She is "ultima discipulorum vel discipularum eius"; she describes her regard for him in enthusiastic and almost fond terms, telling him how she has transferred to him, her abbat and her brother, all her sisterly affection since the death of his friend her brother Osbert. A new bereavement has befallen her, by her beloved Wetburga's incarceration at Rome. But Wetburga is a happy confessor; Winfrid too is an honoured apostle; while she, the miserable Egburga, not deemed worthy of being a companion with such servants of God, is left to bemoan her own selfishness in the vale of tears. Deprived of the privilege of seeing Winfrid in the flesh, she implores him, on whom alone she leans, to place her upon the rock of his supplications, and moreover to send her some relics, a few written lines also, that by these tokens she may be able to think of him as present with her. Her amanuensis Eadbeorhth may be responsible for the Latin and for some of the exuberance of style; but the sentiments are those of one who has wound herself up to believe she cannot serve God in the common round, despairing of being anything because her lot is not an heroic one. One of the variants of Eadburga abbat of Repton [EADBURGA (3)] is Aegberga; but whether Boniface's correspondent was any of the known Eadburgas may be questioned. [C. H.]

EGCBALD (Kemble, C. D. 38), presbyter and abbat. [EABALD (1).]

[C. H.]

EGCLAF (Kemble, C. D. 87), bishop of Dunwich. [EOLAF.]

[C. H.]

[M. A. W.]

EGFRID (1) (ECFRID, ECGFRITH, EONGFRID, EGFRED, EGFERTH, EGFRED), one of the younger sons of Oswy king of Northumbria and Eanfleda daughter of king Edwin. In A.D. 655, when his father was in the midst of his bitter struggle with Penda king of Mercia, Egfrid, then about five years of age, was kept as a hostage in Mercia by Cynwisa the queen (Bed. H. E. iii. 24). After this we hear nothing of him until A.D. 670, when he succeeded his father on the Northumbrian throne as his eldest surviving son (ibid. iv. 5). He was in every way fitted to rule, and inherited a kingdom which his father at his death had left in profound peace.

Egfrid's first wife was Etheldreda, a daughter of Anna king of East Anglia, and widow of Tonbert, one of the rulers of that kingdom. The alliance with Egfrid was forced upon her, as she was under a vow of virginity, to which during her twelve years' alliance with him she carefully adhered. Wilfrid was high in the favour of both husband and wife, and Egfrid is said to have solicited the bishop's aid to enable him to overcome the objections of his wife, but to no purpose. The ill-matched couple were divorced, and Etheldreda became a nun at Coldingham, whilst Egfrid took as his second wife Ermenburga, sister-in-law of Centwine king of Wessex. They had no children. (Bed. H. E. iv. 19.)

The part which Wilfrid had taken in the domestic affairs of the Northumbrian palace was partly, no doubt, the cause of the trouble in which he was afterwards involved. In queen Ermenburga he had a determined and energetic foe, and her influence soon brought over her husband to her side. The wealth, the love of splendour, the wide-spread popularity of Wilfrid, and, above all, his success made the queen and her husband look upon him with suspicion and dislike. An opportunity soon occurred for diminishing Wilfrid's power. Archbishop Theodore was invited into Northumbria by Egfrid, and without Wilfrid's consent his large diocese was subdivided. A bishop was placed at Hexham, and another in Lindsey. To these changes Wilfrid made a vehement but unsuccessful resistance, and finally appealed to Rome in defence of his rights. After a long journey thither and many delays, he came back to the Northumbrian court with a papal decree in his favour, to find it treated with derision and contempt. He was robbed, cast into prison, and finally banished. The dread of Egfrid's revenge denied him also a shelter in Mercia and Wessex, and it was in heathen Sussex at last that he found a temporary home. In the meanwhile other changes were made in the Northumbrian diocese. Bosa became bishop of York, Eadbed came back from Lindsey to Ripon, whilst Trumbert, Eata, and Trumwin were also prelates in the province. Wilfrid was thus excluded from his diocese, and as long as he lived Egfrid denied him access to his kingdom.

In the management of Northumbria Egfrid was a bold and vigorous ruler. He made but few additions to his kingdom towards the south, Mercia being in his way. He held indeed Lindsey for a short time, but soon lost it. With Ethelred of Mercia he waged, in A.D. 679, a bloody war, in the course of which Egfrid's own brother Elfwine, was unhappily slain, and a long struggle seemed to be imminent when peace fortunately was restored by the intervention of Theodore.

Egfrid was thus enabled to turn his arm with greater success in a different direction. He consolidated his power far and wide by treaties or annexation, subjecting to his rule the independent states of Cumberland, North Lancashire, and Galloway. Strathclyde would also have been secured had Egfrid lived.

Egfrid was a true and generous friend to the Northumbrian church. In its management and welfare he took the greatest interest. He was present at the ecclesiastical synod at Haethfelth (Bed. H. E. iv. 17). In A.D. 684 he was at the synod at Twyford on the Alne, at which Cuthbert was elected bishop of Lindisfarne in his absence. Egfrid tried in vain to induce him to accept the office. At last he went himself, and with great persuasion and difficulty obtained his assent and brought Cuthbert back to the synod (H. E. iv. 28). Egfrid was afterwards present when Cuthbert was consecrated at York (Symeon, H. E. D. i. c. 9). Between Cuthbert and Egfrid there existed the most intimate and affectionate relations. The king and archbishop Theodore gave the saint divers lands in the city of York, where there is still a church which bears his name. They gave him also the village of Crayke near York, and the country around it three miles in circuit, that Cuthbert might be able to halt there as he went to and from York. The charter, however, which professes to record the gift is a fictitious one (Beda, ed. Smith, App. 782). As this benefaction was small, Egfrid added to it the city of Luel or Carlisle, with a circuit of fifteen miles. He also gave him Cartmel in North Lancashire and all its Britons, and the vill of Suthgedliut, together with Carham in Northumberland (Hist. de S. Cuth. ed. Surtees Soc. 140-1). Benedict Biscop also experienced Egfrid's bounty. The king gave him the land at the mouth of the Wear on which Benedict erected his monastery of Wearmouth (Vitae Abb. auct. Beda). He was also, no doubt, connected with the building of Jarrow, the dedication stone of which still exists, stating that it was put there in the fifteenth year of king Egfrid's reign (Jarrow and Wearmouth, ed. Surtees Soc. pref. 26). The place itself, which is situated at the confluence of the rivulet Don with the Tyne, was called Portus Egfridi (Symeon, H. E. D. ii. c. 5). Well might the memory of Egfrid be dear to the Cuthbertines and the houses of Wearmouth and Jarrow.

In A.D. 684 the lust of empire induced Egfrid to send an expedition under Berctus to Ireland, Christian country although it was. The outrage evoked the expostulations of Egbert [EGBERT (5)] for the unjust onslaught upon a peaceful and friendly people. The expedition seems to have failed, but it caused much misery and destruction of sacred places, and generated a bitter feeling, which was more injurious to Egfrid than a reverse in the field (Bed. H. E. iv. 26).

In the following year Egfrid attacked the Picts, whose king, as Nennius (p. 50) says, was his kinsman, contrary to the entreaties of Cuthbert and his own friends and advisers. The Picts lured him on until they got him entangled among the hills, and then they fell upon him and slew the invader and most of his army at a place called Nechtane's Mere or the Pool of Nechtan. The king's body was interred at Hii, or Iona (Bed. H. E. iv. 26; Symeon, H. E. D.

i. 9). Bede tells us that the disaster was known beforehand to Cuthbert. In the preceding year he made Egfrid's sister, Elfleda abbess of Whitby, acquainted with the approaching termination of her brother's life and dominion (Vita S. Cuth. c. 24). At the time of the defeat in Pictland Cuthbert was at Carlisle, his own town, where Ermenburga the queen was anxiously awaiting some news from the north in a monastery, recently founded by Cuthbert, of which her sister was the abbess. The inhabitants escorted the saint over the city to shew him the walls and a fountain, built by the Romans, of wonderful construction. All at once Cuthbert bent over his staff, turning a saddened face to the ground. A vision seemed to pass before him. He raised his eyes and groaned as he spake aloud, "Perhaps now the crisis is over." "Whence knowest thou?" asked a priest near him; he would reveal no more; but went quickly to the anxious queen and bade her return with speed to the royal city in case the battle should have gone ill with her lord (Vita S. Cuth. c. 27). The spite of one of the biographers of Wilfrid represents that saint as beholding in Sussex, whilst he was celebrating mass, two demons carrying off the soul of the slaughtered monarch from the battle-field to the abode of the lost (Vita S. Wulf. auct. Eadmer. cap. 43). Bede, however, speaks of Egfrid as "piissimus rex!"

Egfrid was in many respects a great king. He possessed the power of organization which was so rare among the princes of his time, and had he only been free from restlessness, he would perhaps have established on the firmest and most lasting foundations the overlordship of Northumbria. Egfrid was most munificent to the church. In every territory which he acquired he seems to have planted bishops and set apart lands for ecclesiastical purposes. With men of Cuthbert's stamp Egfrid was always on the best of terms, although he did not always listen to their advice; but he was strictly in favour of the position and rights of a national church, and on that account the Ultramontanism of Wilfrid was excessively distasteful to him. He set his face against it once and for all. It was upon Egfrid's force of character and personal influence, often overstrained, that the cohesion of his dominions depended. As soon as he felt the process of dissolution began, "Spes caepit et virtus regni Anglorum fluere, ac retro sublapsa referri," says Bede. The Picts, flushed with victory, recovered what they had lost in the north, and bishop Trumwin retired from Whithern to Whitby to die. We hear no more of Cartmel and Carlisle as belonging to Cuthbert and Lindisfarne. Lindsey went irrevocably to Mercia, and the supremacy of Northumbria, which had lasted for more than a century, came to an end for ever.

About the beginning of this century a small hoard of copper coins, which have been ascribed to Egfrid, was found in the churchyard of Jarrow. On the reverse was the word LV or LVX. In the York Museum there are two other coins of the same monarch, but of a different type. [J. R.]

EGFRID (2) (EGGFERTH, ECGFRITH, EGFERD, EGFERT, EGFERTH), king of Mercia. He was the only son of Offa and Cynethritha, and was from an early age destined to be the heir to his father's extensive power. In the year 787

(Chr. S. 785; M. H. B. 336) he received the royal consecration, the projected arrangement being probably one of the matters which were discussed at the legatine council held by the Roman legates George and Theophylact in that year. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 444, 446.) Henry of Huntingdon (M. H. B. 731) supposed that Egfrid was made king of Kent on this occasion, but the assumption is not borne out by the charters, and it is far more probable that he was thus admitted to a share, or prospective share, of his father's full power. From the year 787 Egfrid frequently attests his father's charters as king; thus in 788 he, as "rex Merciorum," consents to a grant to Rochester (Kemble, C. D. 152); as "Ecgrith rex," he sanctions other grants to Rochester in 789 (ib. 155 and 157) at the council of Cealchyth. In two charters of Worcester (K. C. D. 164, 167) of the year 794, he signs as "filius regis." His attestations as king are not, however, confined to Kentish charters, as would be the case if he were king of Kent, for he attests a Peterborough charter of abbat Beonna (787-796), K. C. D. 165, as "rex Merciorum." Nothing particular seems to be known about him during his father's lifetime. On Offa's death, July 29, 796, Egfrid succeeded him, but retained his royal power for a few months only, dying before the end of the year. (Chr. S. 794; M. H. B. 338.) William of Malmesbury (G. R. lib. i. § 94) says that during his short reign he shewed himself anxious to redress the evils that his father's cruelty had wrought, that he restored the monastic charters which his father had annulled, and in particular gave back an estate which had been alienated from Malmesbury. Several charters were issued by him during his short reign, one granted at Bath to Ethelmund, ealdorman of the Hwicci (Kemble, C. D. 170, 171), one to Malmesbury (Kem. C. D. 174; Malmesb. G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 388), besides two questionable or spurious grants to St. Albans (Kem. C. D. 172, 173), dated in synod at Cealchyth. There can be no doubt that the break-up of Offa's empire had begun even before his death, and that Egfrid's reign comprised some part of the Kentish troubles under Eadbert Praen. But there are no other traces of personal action. Alcuin, in a letter to the Northumbrian ealdorman Osberht, expressed his belief that Egfrid's early death was a sign of divine judgment on the bloody means by which Offa had procured his advancement. (Mon. Alcuin. ed. Jaffé, p. 350.) Florence of Worcester gives the exact length of his reign as 141 days, which would fix the day of his death at about Dec. 17. He was succeeded by his distant relation Coenulf. [KENULF.] [S.]

EGHLIONNA, virgin, commemorated Jan. 21. She is commemorated along with Faincher a virgin, and they are both in Cluain-Caoi or Cluain-Caein, in Eoghanacht, of Cashel (Mart. Doneg.; Mart. Tall.). This is now Clonkeen, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, co. of Limerick, and the living is a mensal to the see of Cashel; it is probably the same as the Cluain-caein-Modimog (Four Mast. ii. 936, n. 2, 937), which O'Donovan says was in the territory of Eoghanacht Chaisil, which he considers to be the present barony of Middlethird, in the county of Tipperary. The barony of Middlethird is contiguous to that of Clanwilliam on the east (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 395-96). [J. G.]

EGIALEUS (ÆGIALEUS), Grammaticus, one of the judges between Manes and bishop Arcebas (Baron. Ann. 277. 13). [C. H.]

EGIOA (1), bishop of Segontia (Signenza) in A.D. 655. His signature appears last but one among those of the eleventh council of Toledo. He died before 680. (Esp. Sagr. viii. 126; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 247.) [M. A. W.]

EGICA (2), Gothic king of Spain, from A.D. 687 to 701. He was the son-in-law of his predecessor Ervig (q.v.), having married his daughter Gxilo. Lucas of Tuy makes him the nephew of Wamba (iii. 69, apud Schott, Hisp. Illus.), while Sebastian of Salamanca (Esp. Sagr. xiii. 477) speaks of him as Wamba's cousin (consobrinus). It is tolerably certain, from the contemporary evidence that remains, that he belonged either to the family or party of Wamba, and that his elevation to the throne may be regarded on the one hand as an atonement on Ervig's part ("Zeichen . . . schlechten Gewissens," Dahn, v. 218) for the treatment which Wamba and his adherents had received [ERVIG, WAMBA], and on the other as a triumph of the less over the more strongly ecclesiastical forces of the Gothic state.

Egica was anointed king by Julian, the metropolitan of Toledo, Nov. 24, 687. Six months later, May 11, 688, the fifteenth council of Toledo met in the church of the Holy Apostles, under the presidency of Julian. The ceremonial observed was exactly the same as under Ervig. The king appears, asks, kneeling (humo prostratus), for the prayers of the bishops, and then hands to them the tomus, in which his wishes and his reasons for summoning the council are contained. He asks the advice of the bishops upon a point of conscience—How is he to reconcile two contradictory oaths? At the time of his marriage with Ervig's daughter (her name does not appear until the seventeenth council in 694) Ervig had obliged him to swear that he would at all future times, and on all possible occasions, protect the lives and property, and further the interests of Ervig's children and his wife's relations. The text of this curious oath is given later on in the acts, and is well worth attention. (Tejada y Ramiro, Collec. de Can. ii. 545.) Afterwards, when he became king he had taken the usual constitutional oath of justice and fidelity towards his people, also in the presence and with the knowledge of Ervig, and he now complains that it is impossible for him to keep both oaths. On the one hand he fears to incur the guilt of perjury by unjustly defending the family of Ervig against the just claims of his people, or on the other by dealing justly with his people at the expense of those whose interests he had sworn to advance and protect. Ervig is said (ut fertur) to have treated many with injustice and cruelty, degrading some from the condition of nobles to that of slaves, torturing and oppressing others, but all complaints are suspended because of the royal oath, and because also of the general oath, which Ervig had extracted from the whole nation on behalf of his family. Reference is here made to can. 4 of C. Tol. xiii. de Munitione Pro's Regis, a solemn engagement on the part of the council, and of the people as represented by them, which was repeated almost verbatim at the sixteenth council (can. 8), in the interests of Egica's family, and was a common constitutional formula (conf. C. Tol. v. 2, and vi. 16). The council after the profession of faith and after approbation of the second apologetic of Julian of Toledo addressed to Rome on the Apollinarist heresy [JULIAN OF TOLEDO], which is inserted entire in the text of the acts, proceeded to deliver judgment on the king's case. After a skilful explanation and defence of the general oath, in which they saw nothing contrary to justice and equity, and which was only meant to secure the royal family from malicious and factious attacks, the council absolved the king (ab illis vinculis juramenti, quibus socero ante juravit), so wording the dispensation, however, as to avoid as much as possible giving offence to Ervig's adherents, who were still no doubt a formidable political party. The acuteness and plausibility with which the whole subject is treated betray the clear head and practised hand of Julian of Toledo, who presided at the council, and by whom in all probability the acts were drawn up. Sixty-one bishops, five vicars, eight abbats, and seventeen virii illustres were present.

Five years later, May 2, 693, the sixteenth council of Toledo assembled in the church of SS. Peter and Paul, the last council of Toledo, of which both acts and subscriptions have come down to us. The tomus, which seems to have answered tolerably closely to our speech from the throne, pointed out five subjects for legislation, the repair of churches, many in the kingdom being in a ruinous condition, the defence of parochial churches against unjust episcopal exaction, the extirpation of idolatrous rites, such as stone-worship, tree- and fountain-worship, divination, &c., the position of the Jews, and the frequency of conspiracy against the king's life and family. With regard to the last point the expressions in the tomus are unusually emphatic, and remind the reader of the famous Julian conspiracy, which did indeed accomplish eighteen years later what is here foreboded. "And since," says the tomus, "there are some swollen with pride who do not aspire to the throne by the concession of God, but think to obtain it by insolence and boasting, you will ordain that whosoever of the palatini, of whatever rank or honour, shall have attempted to compass the slaying of the king, or the ruin of the race and country of the Goths (excidium gentis et patriae Gothorum), or who within the bounds of Spain shall have endeavoured to stir up any tumult, shall be, together with their posterity, expelled from all the palatine offices, and obliged to serve the treasury as tributaries, losing, moreover, all their personal property except such as the clemency of the king shall preserve to them." (Comp. can. 65 of C. Tol. iv. on the same subject, where only ecclesiastical penalties are threatened.)

After the retirement of the king, and the recital of the confession of faith, ten canons were promulgated. The first against the Jews prescribed the careful execution by the judges of all previous laws on the subject. The Jews must either abjure or be destroyed ("quo aut tandem corrigantur inviti aut valide sic atterantur ex Domini in aeternum judicio perituri"). To ness, however, who are willing to forsake their errors various rewards and inducements are held out, and nothing is said of the specially atrocious provisions which disgrace the succeeding councils. (For a discussion of the Jew-laws of Ervig and Egica see Helfferich, Entstehung und Geschichte des Westgothen-Rechts, 192-207.) Canon 5, De Reparatione Ecclesiarum, &c. provides that the thirds (tertias quas antiqui canones de parochiis suis habendas episcopis censuerunt) shall be applied to the repairs of the church fabrics. Only if the church is in proper order is the bishop to appropriate them, and in no case is he to exact from the parochial churches more than the thirds either for the payment of the royal taxes (pro regis inquisitionibus), or for the salaries of officials (causa stipendii). It is also forbidden that one presbyter shall under any pretext take charge of several churches. Every church which possesses ten slaves (the meaning of this condition is doubtful, Dahn, Vlto Abth. 492; Tejada y Ramiro, note to C. Tol. xvi. 5) must have a presbyter of its own.

Canon vi. corrects certain errors in the Eucharistic ceremonial. The clergy are commanded to use bread specially prepared, and not to cut pieces from the ordinary bread made for their own use. In the seventh canon we get a glimpse into the procedure by which the acts of these national councils were made known and enforced throughout the country. The bishops are ordered on their return home, within six months at the latest, to gather together all the abbats, presbyters, deacons, and clerks of their dioceses, in order to read to them publicly the acts of the council, and make them fully known and understood by them. And whoever shall despise the acts, or shall endeavour to discredit them, or excite others to rebellion against them, is to be punished with two months' excommunication. In canon viii. we have a repetition of the oath de Munimine Prole Regie, referred to in the preceding council as having been sworn to Ervig on behalf of his family, and now renewed in the case of Egica's children. The council enumerates the king's many virtues, his gifts to churches, his moderation in matters of taxation, his magnanimity towards his enemies, and his generosity in restoring those who had forfeited their liberty to a free condition, and out of gratitude, not only grants him the oath of protection, but decrees that in future in all churches whenever mass is celebrated prayer shall be made for the king and his children, his grandchildren, and all who belong to him. Canon ix. decrees the deposition and excommunication of Sisebert, the traitor metropolitan of Toledo, who had plotted the destruction of the whole royal family—king, queen, sons, and daughters. [SISEBERT.] Before the opening of the council Sisebert's case had been adjudicated upon and his successor appointed, in order that the council might not begin without a president. (Since JULIAN, q. v., the metropolitan of Toledo had presided irrespective of antiquity of ordination.) This is proved by the Decretum Judicii annexed to the acts. The decision is, however, now repeated so far as it concerned Sisebert, omitting the various translations of bishops [FELIX OF TOLEDO], and is then fitly followed by the tenth canon, De his qui juramenti sui profanatores extiterint, modelled upon C. Tol. v. 75, and repeating three times by common acclamation, as in the earlier canon, the council's anathema upon those who shall plan the death of the king, or the forcible seizure of the kingdom. Then with thanksgiving to the omnipotent and indivisible Trinity the proceedings of the council come to an end. The decree concerning Sisebert is inscribed immediately after the acts, and the royal confirmation of the acts follows. It is given in the form of a speech from Egica (Ecce sanctissimi in Christo patres, &c.), and contains one or two curious points. Egica represents himself as inclined to treat those who have rebelled against him with gentleness, and he asks the council's opinion as to the advisability of clemency. They know how many times he has been the victim of treachery, and how many disturbances have been raised in the state. Let them say whether the authors them can be fitly pardoned. But although the council is asked for its opinion upon exceptional cases, the king reserves full liberty of action for himself and his descendants in all future cases of conspiracy. (For the case of Theudemund Spatarius noster, also mentioned in Egica's speech, see FISTULA.) The answer of the council upon the points thus raised has not come down to us. Sixty bishops, of whom five were metropolitans, three vicars of the sees of Denia, Pampelona, and Ossonoba, five abbats and sixteen comites et viri illustres, attended the synod.

Nearly two years later, Nov. 4, 694, the seventeenth council of Toledo met in the church of St. Leocadia without the walls of the city. The king appeared et in medio nostri consistens inclitum caput reclinans, commended himself to the blessing and prayers of the council. The royal speech, drawn up probably, like that delivered at the sixteenth council, by the metropolitan Felix, puts forward in the first place among the matters to be dealt with by the council a conspiracy lately discovered between the Spanish and African Jews against the Gothic government. "Praesertim quia nuper manifestis confessionibus indubie invenimus hos in transmarinis partibus hebraeos alios consuluisse ut unanimiter contra genus christianum agerent." Egica recalls his mild treatment of the Jews in making all possible efforts for their conversion, and in allowing them the use of Christian slaves, which had been previously forbidden to them. Now, however, seeing that all such efforts are in vain, the council is invited to proceed to extremities against them. From their decrees, however, are to be exempted the Jews living in the mountainous parts of Gallia Gothica (Galliae provinciae—intra clausuras—habitatores), because of the depopulation of that region by pestilence (plagae inguinalis interitu) and invasion (externae gentis incursu), and because also no doubt of the unlikelihood of their being concerned in the plot of their southern brethren. For the connexion of this passage with a war with the Franks mentioned only by Sebastian of Salamanca see below. Next among the subjects for legislation comes the crime of those priests who say masses for the dead in the case of men still living, meaning thus to bring harm upon persons who have injured or offended them, a strange point, which throws light upon the debased condition of the lower Spanish clergy at the time; and finally, the council is exhorted to revive the custom of mouthly litanies, with the especial object apparently of counteracting the seditious tendencies of the time. (Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 595.)

The first canon of the council, which ordains that only spiritual and ecclesiastical subjects are to be discussed during the first three days of the council, seems to indicate a feeling on the part of those composing these synods that the councils had of late become too much secularised. The growing preponderance of the secular element in the councils of Toledo, from the eighth onwards when we first find the signatures of the palatini is indeed evident to any student of these much-debated assemblies. The seventeenth council, the last which has come down to us, has to some extent the air of an attempt to return to the earlier and more purely ecclesiastical traditions. Of its eight canons six are concerned with ecclesiastical matters, the closing of the gates of the baptistery at the beginning of Lent, can. 2, the washing of feet on Holy Thursday, the misuse of the ornaments and properties of churches, the celebration of the missa defunctorum for those who are still living, and the monthly celebration of litanies (which is enjoined upon all the churches of Spain and Gothic Gaul, as a practice prescribed by ancient canons, and now revived because of the prevalence of crime and perjury). Of the two other canons the first provides for the safety of the queen and the royal children in case of Egica's death, and the second deals with the Jews. The canon de Munitione Conjugis atque Proles Regiæ, is partly a repetition of a formula with which preceding councils have made us familiar (C. Tol. xvi. 8 and C. Tol. xiii. 4), and partly a special provision for Cixilo, Egica's wife, and (according to later chroniclers) Ervig's daughter. The canon de Judæorum Damnatione, the last canon of a Gothic council remaining to us, is a striking witness to the spirit of intolerance, cruelty, and persecution which marked the later years of Gothic Christianity. All Jews in all the provinces of Spain (with the exception, however, made in the tomus!) are condemned to perpetual slavery, together with their wives, children, and descendants. They are to be exiled from their homes, and dispersed wherever the king pleased. The Christian slaves of the Jews are to receive from their property whatever the king may choose to assign to them. Those to whom Jews are given as slaves are to watch them strictly lest they observe any of their own ceremonies or follow in any way the "perfidy" of their fathers. Finally, as soon as Jewish children of both sexes reach the age of seven they are to be taken from their parents and given to Christians to bring up in the Christian faith, with the object of marrying them, when grown up, to Christian wives and husbands. Then with the customary thanksgiving and lex de confirmatione concilii, the proceedings of the council come to an end.

The acts of the seventeenth council of Toledo bring us to an end of the historical material available for these last years of the Gothic state. Just as the plot thickens and the interest reaches its highest point all information fails us. The nearest chronicler to the events of the last seventeen years of the Gothic rule is Isidore of Beja (circa 750), from whom only very scanty details are to be gleaned of the three last reigns. We learn from him, however, that in the æra 736, A.D. 698, Egica associated his son Wittiza with him in the government, and that in 701 Egica died at Toledo, and Wittiza succeeded to the kingdom. Later chroniclers add that Egica assigned Tuy in Galicia on the Minho to Wittiza as his place of residence, perhaps in order to keep the scarcely amalgamated Suevi in order. Coins are extant bearing the joint names of father and son, which is the case also with various laws in the Fuero Juzgo (Madsen, ix. 33-36; Helfferich, 217, note).

The repudiation of his wife Cixilo by Egica is not mentioned before the 9th century (Chron. Albeld. Esp. Sag. xiii. 449), and is sufficiently contradicted by C. Tol. xvii. 7. The war with the Franks appears first in Sebastian of Salamanca — "adversus Francos inrumpentes Gallias, ter praelium egit, sed triumphum nullum cepit" (apud Esp. Sag. xiii. 477). Sebastian seems to be supported by the externas gentis incursum of C. Tol. xvii. mentioned above, and it may be easily supposed that some forays of Eudes of Aquitaine into Gallia Gothica may have led to these indecisive hostilities.

With regard to the general political meaning of the reign, it may perhaps be inferred from the acts of the three councils, and from the relation of Egica's legislation generally to that of Ervig (Helfferich, 206 seq.; Dahn, Vte Abth. 486), that Egica represented the Gothic party as opposed to what Helfferich calls the Byzantine-Roman party of Ervig and Julian, and that his relation to the church was not so docile a one as that of his predecessor. He appointed a Goth (Sisebert) for the first time to the see of Toledo upon Julian's death in 690, an experiment repeated later in the appointment of Guntherich or Guntherich, about 699. We may suppose him to have been less Romanised than Ervig—more of a barbarian, and Ervig certainly appears to have recognised him as the head of Wamba's party, the Gothic and comparatively speaking anti-clerical party, when he attempted to buy his support by the hand of his daughter, and exacted from him the oath of protection towards his wife's relations. But in the darkness of these times it is rash to attempt to lay down with any certainty lines of general politics, though no doubt by a careful sifting and comparison of all materials much has been done of late years in Germany to clear up difficulties, and more light may still be hoped for. EGIDIUS (ÆGIDIUS, GILLES), nineteenth occupant of the see of Rheims, succeeding Mapinius (A.D. 565), not to be confused with the popular St. Giles. [ÆGIDIUS.] He was a liberal benefactor of his church, and hospitably received at Rheims Gregory of Tours, whom he consecrated to the office of bishop. But despite the zeal for his flock, eloquence, learning, and benevolence which Venantius Fortunatus discovered in him (iii. 20 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 141), and his "admiranda sanctitas," commemorated by the biographer of St. Basolus (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 65, Paris, 1733), he was one of the most ambitious and intriguing prelates of his time. One of the first known acts of his episcopate was the consecration of Promotus as bishop of Châteaudun, in contempt of the rights of Pappolus of Chartres, in whose diocese Châteaudun was situated. This was the occasion of the fourth council of Paris, from which emanated a letter of grave reproof to Egidius, and another of remonstrance to king Sigebert, who had encouraged the infringement. Upon the death of Sigebert in 575, and the accession of his infant son Childeric II. to the throne of Austrasia, he became largely mixed up with the plots and intrigues of the several Frank kingdoms. Employed on embassies, ostensibly on behalf of the young king, to his uncle Chilperic, to concert measures of hostility against Guntram, he contrived to ingratiate himself with Chilperic and the notorious Fredegund, in whose behalf he appears to have plotted against his master. To the queen his wily and unscrupulous nature especially commended him, and he was universally credited with aiding her in the murder of her stepson Merovechus (A.D. 577). In the end, however, he overreached himself, and became an object of suspicion. In A.D. 583 or 584, while he was in attendance upon Childeric in his camp, the soldiery rose against him and the other counsellors of the young king, and his life was saved only by instant flight to Rheims. A little later, being sent by Childeric on an embassy to Guntram, the latter openly upbraided him, and sent to his nephew to warn him against one who was forsworn, both to him and his father before him. The occasion of his downfall, however, was the conspiracy against Childeric of Rauchinus and Ursio, which he was suspected of having favoured. For the time, by dint of his persuasive tongue and rich gifts, he reconciled himself to the king, but a little later, one of the conspirators, under the influence of torture, implicated him. He was arrested, but released again upon the remonstrances of the bishops against this indignity, and summoned to appear at the council of Metz, in the autumn of 590. The office of accuser was delegated to Ennodius count of Tours, who charged him with being a friend and ally of Chilperic against his master and queen Brunehilde, and with receiving large sums of money as the price of treason. The bishop stoutly denied the charges, but the proofs derived from his letters and the evidence of his subordinates left no room for doubt. At evening the council was adjourned till the third day, to hear anything he might have to say in justification. Upon its reassembling Egidius, despairing of acquittal, pleaded guilty to the charge of high treason. Upon the intercession of the bishops his life was spared, but he was deposed from his see and exiled to Strassburg. The large treasure discovered in his palace was duly apportioned between the church and the royal treasury. He was succeeded by Romulfus (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 19, vi. 3, 31, vii. 14, 33, ix. 14, x. 19; Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rom. ii.

EGILA (1), bishop of Oama from about A.D. 633 to 656. His signatures appear among those of the fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh councils of Toledo. To the eighth, being then probably old, he sent a priest, Godescalcus, to represent him. There is no trace of him in the ninth council, but in the tenth, A.D. 656, an abbat, Argefredus, signs for him. (Esp. Sagrada, vii. 289; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385, 405, 413, 423.) [M. A. W.]

EGILA (2), bishop of Eliberi (?). In the Codex Emilianensis, a MS. of the 10th century, used by Florez in the España Sagrada, as one of his main authorities for the episcopal catalogues of the various sees up to that time (see Esp. Sagr. iii. appendix xxxiii. for a description of it) the name of Egila appears in the catalogue of Eliberi in a position which seems to suit with the end of the 8th century. On these grounds only, the Egila of Eliberi has been identified with the Egila to whom pope Adrian I. addressed two letters in the years 781 and 782, and of whom he speaks in his letter to the Spanish bishops (785) in which the first mention of Adoptionism occurs. [ADOPTIONISTS.] Egila, however, was a common Gothic name, and on the whole the balance of evidence inclines against the identification of the Egila of Eliberi with the Egila of Adrian's letters. Very little is known of this last Egila, but that little raises one or two interesting points. According to Adrian's second letter (the second in order in the Cod. Carol. Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 326, but the first in date, as it was a copy of one previously sent and lost on the way) Egila was ordained bishop by Wulcharius, archiepiscopus Galliarum (identified by Florez and others with Wilchar, archbishop of Sens, who signed the Lateran council of 769, and journeyed to Rome in 777. On this subject see Cenni's notes in a contrary sense to Cod. Car. Migne, xcvi. pp. 326, 337 n.). "Cui et licentiam dedimus," says Adrian, "de vestris ordinationibus, atque auctoritatem dirigere vos pro orthodoxae fidei, Sanctae Catholicae Ecclesiae praedicatione in partibus Spaniensis Provinciae." As to the nationality of Egila and the history and purpose of his consecration we shall have more to say presently. In the letter to the Spanish bishops the pope adds that he made it a condition of the consecration that Egila should act only as regionary bishop "et nullam quamlibet sedem ambiret vel usurparet." After his arrival in Mohammedan Spain, the date of which is uncertain, Egila addressed a letter to Adrian, giving an account of his work, and asking for advice upon certain points. This letter, which is not extant, was carried to Rome by two messengers, who were to bring back the answer. From some unknown reason, the answer never reached Egila, and Egila applied to Charles the Great for help in the matter. Charles, through his Missus Peter, bishop of Pavia, requested the pope to send a copy of the former letter. Adrian did so in 782, writing also a fresh letter, in which he shortly admonished Egila to resist the attempts of the heretics who would overthrow his faith, and to observe the Saturday fast. The first letter, of which a copy was enclosed, and which was in answer to one from Egila, now lost, contained instructions on the following points: (1) the observance of Easter, with regard to which Adrian is informed that certain persons in Spain refuse to follow the rule laid down by the council of Nicaea, and that when the full moon falls on a Saturday, instead of celebrating Easter on the following Sunday, they postpone it to the Sunday after. (Hefele, Conc. Gesch. i. 315, ii. 591.) (2) The eating of things strangled, and of the blood of swine and other animals. The pope reports on Egila's authority that certain persons in Spain had denounced any one who refused to eat such things as "rudis aut ineruditus." [EVANTIUS.] Adrian, however, forbids the practices. (3) Intercourse between believers and unbelievers. "Many calling themselves Catholics lead a common life with Jews and unbaptized pagans, both in eating and drinking, and in divers false doctrine, declaring that they are thereby in no way polluted." Such persons give their daughters in marriage "infidelibus," and their pseudo-sacerdotes ordained without preparation, marry women whose husbands are still living. All these, says Adrian, are Priscillianist errors. (4) Predestination and free will. Some say, "Why should we trouble ourselves to win everlasting life if, notwithstanding, all depends upon God only?"—and others, "Why do we pray to God, Lead us not into temptation, when our will is free?" Adrian lays down the orthodox doctrine. The letter winds up with an exhortation to Egila to be watchful and constant, lest old errors should break out afresh, and his own faith be overthrown. The next mention of Egila occurs in Adrian's letter to the Spanish bishops in 785. (Esp. Sagr. v. app. or Migne, l.c.) From this we learn that Egila, whom Wulcharius, according to Adrian, had "too much praised," had been led away by the errors "of his master, Migetius" [MIGETIUS], and the Spanish bishops are warned to grant him no authority or obedience.

Until 1759 this was all that was known of Egila. In that year Florez discovered a MS. in the cathedral library of Leon, containing the acts of a synod held at Cordova in 839 in consequence of certain complaints made by Recafred, bishop of Cordova, and (temporarily) of Aegabro (Cabra), and by Quiricus, bishop of Accitua dir, as to the proceedings of a heretical sect, "nomine Casianorum," within their dioceses. The tenets described in the acts are evidently those of the Migetians, though some new points are added which are not to be found in Elipandus's letter to Migetius. (Esp. Sagr. v. appendix, or Hefele, Conc. Gesch. iii. 586.) The heretics are described as Acephalos, i.e. separatists, vagi clerici. [ACEPHALI.] (Isidore gives two definitions of the word. It seems to be used here in the sense described in cap. 3, lib. ii. of the De Off. Eccl.) "Advancing little by little, by a tortuous road, from the seashore, they have entered Epagro in the territory of Aegabro (Esp. Sagr. xii. 2), and have there practised their abominable rites in corners and caves, the authors of the evil-doing giving themselves out as sent from Rome (proponentes se a Roma missos) with their traditions, which are not agreeable to our doctrines. The passage which follows is extremely corrupt and defective, but it appears to be an argument against one who had assumed the position of bishop of the sect. The council declares that no one can be a bishop

"quem nec clerus nec civium conventus eligit." It is a crime to believe that anyone can be a bishop who is without place and city, "quem nec clerus nec populus propriae civitatis exquisivit." The tenets of the heretics are then described. They refuse to eat and drink with Gentiles (compare Adrian to Egila (3), and Elipandus to Migetius, Esp. Sagr. v. 543, or Hefele, Conc. Gesch. iii. 586). They fast on Christmas Day should it fall on a Friday. They separate themselves from the Catholic church, thus following the example of Dathan and Abiron. They refuse to venerate the relics of the saints. They baptize with saliva, saying effeta, in imitation of the miracle performed by Christ upon the deaf man. They boast of being saints, "se jactant esse Sancti" (conf. Elipandus to Migetius, l.c.), refuse to eat with others, and communicate out of different chalices at the sacrament. They are not to be admitted into the ministry of the church, for the synod cannot hold those to have been rightly ordained who say that Agila of Ementia or Emerita (Florez, printed "Abafilanen Ementiae," which Gams, Kirchengesch. von Spanien, ii. 2, 314, reads "ab Agilanem Emeritae") had alone the right of conferring ordinations, which is against all sound doctrine. (Such seems to be the general sense of an extremely corrupt passage.) Further on the synod anathematizes, "damnabilem illam doctrinam cum suorum auctores, vel Antifrasium illum Quinericum cum socios suos," and we are told that the sect had a church in the sandy waste lands near Epagro (arenas) dedicated to St. Casian, who in the beginning of the acts is spoken of as "auctor eorum Casianus."

In this curious and almost unintelligible document (fast unbekannt, as Helfferich says, and not used by Hefele) it seems tolerably clear that Egila's followers are described, and that he himself and his successor, Hunerich or Gunerich, ordained by him are mentioned. The bishop of the sect has no particular see, his followers speak of themselves as sent from Rome, and the sect maintain the asceticism preached by Migetius, and controverted by Elipandus, but very possibly supported in their eyes by the passages in Adrian's letter to Egila, in which those who eat unlawful foods, and those also who eat and drink with Jews and unbaptized pagans are anathematized. Two things may be inferred from these acts with regard to Egila; (1) that he was dead in 839; (2) that in all probability the tradition which connects him with the see of Eliberi is a mistaken one, though what the word Ementiae is to be taken to mean is very doubtful. The name Casianisti, applied to the sect and their church of "St. Casian," are not altogether easy to explain. Elipandus, however, calls Migetius "magister Casianorum et Salibanorum," which Hefele, taking it in connexion with the predestination errors mentioned by Adrian in his letter to the Spanish bishops in the same breath with Migetianism, interprets as referring to Cassian the semi-Pelagian. (The author of the Collationes was well known in Spain. Braulio possessed his works, and Fructuosus had some of the Collationes, and asked Braulio for a loan of the rest [FRUCTUOSUS, ST.].) Gams mentions two recognised saints of the name (K. G. ii. 2, 315), to one of whom he supposes the church to have been dedicated, but considering that the council expressly mentions Casianus as auctor eorum, it seems most probable that their church was really dedicated to the founder of the semi-Pelagianists, whom they had made their patron saint. With regard to the connexion with Rome put forward by the sect, it should be remembered that Migetius taught that Rome was the centre of holiness, from which all good things came (Elip. to Migetius, l. c.) and that Egila was the envoy of Adrian. Elipandus shews great jealousy of the Roman claims in his letter to Migetius, and Egila, a bishop consecrated abroad by permission from Rome, and appearing in their midst with an undefined position, and claims to superior authority, was probably extremely unpopular with the majority of the Spanish episcopate, which was at that time thrown into an attitude of hostility towards Rome and the empire by the influence of Adoptionism.

Of what country was Egila a native, and what is the real history of his consecration? Florez holds him to have been a member of one of the Gothic families of Gallia Narbonensis. Ferreras—in defiance of the documents—boldly makes him a priest of Eliberi, who journeys into France on the death of bishop Baldwig, to seek consecration from Wulcharius (Hist. Gén. d'Espagne, ed. D'Hermilly, ii. 511). It is at least a plausible conjecture that Egila may have been a native of Seville (or of the neighbouring Emerita?) the home of Migetianism, and that his connexion with Migetius may have begun before his journey to France, and may, in fact, have prompted it. The Spanish episcopate at the time was in a most unsatisfactory state. The right of nominating bishops had passed from the Visigothic kings to the Omeyyades (Dozy, Hist. des Musulmans d'Espagne, ii. 47), and the office was frequently sold to the highest bidder, with the natural result that many of the sees were filled with men of heretical beliefs and immoral lives. Alvaro of Cordova, in the 9th century, accuses Saul of Cordova of having paid a large sum to the eunuchs of the palace for his post (Ep. 13, Esp. Sag. xi. 169), and Samuel I. of Eliberi (Esp. Sag. xii. 167), and Hostegesis of Malaga (Dozy, l. c.) are further instances of the degradation of the episcopate. On the other hand we have the renown of Charles the Great as the champion of the church and of Christendom. Elipandus's letter to him on behalf of Felix of Urgel (Esp. Sagr. v. 556) is a sufficient proof of the respect with which even the isolated and disaffected Adoptionist bishops regarded his position. It seems allowable, therefore, to take Egila's career, and to some extent Migetianism in general—as a protest against the disorganised and corrupt state of the Spanish church under the Mohammedans. He belonged apparently to a strict ascetic party, which disapproved of the various compromises effected between the rival religions, and especially resented the manner of episcopal elections. Hence the journey into Charles's dominions, the consecration by Wulcharius, and the close connexion both with Charles and Rome, which the various Egila documents disclose. The whole story, with its strange sequel, throws a ray of curious light on Spanish ecclesiastical history during the 8th and 9th centuries.

EGILBART, EGILBERT, bishop of Würzburg. [EGILWALD.]

EGILO, EGILONA, the wife of Roderic, last Gothic king of Spain. Our only information about her comes from Isidore of Beja (Isid. Pacensis, cap. 42, apud Esp. Sagr. viii.), where the best sense of a corrupt passage seems to be: "In the era 753, the ninth year of his rule, and the ninety-seventh of the Arabs, Abdallaziz, after having kept Spain quiet under his tributary yoke for three years, while at Seville, surrounded by riches and honours, and having taken in marriage the queen of Spain (regina Hispanie in conjugio copulata), corrupted and shamelessly carried off the daughters of kings and princes. A conspiracy was made against him, and while at prayers he was slain by the advice and plot of Ajub. He (Ajub) holding Spain (we read retinente here for renitente) after a month had gone by, Alahor succeeded to the government (in regno Hesperiae, if Florez's reading is the right one), and was informed concerning the death of Abdallaziz, that he was endeavouring by the advice of queen Egilo, his wife, formerly the wife of king Roderic, to throw off the yoke of the Arabs (i.e. of the Caliphs), and to recover for himself the conquered kingdom of Iberia." This Abdallaziz was the son of Mousi-ibn-Nocair, the Yemenite governor of Africa, whose Berber lieutenant Taric, won the battle of the Guadalete (July 19, 711), and who arrived in Spain to reap the fruits of Taric's campaigns in June 712. Abdallaziz came with his father, and assisted in the conquest of Medina-Sidonia, Carmona, Merida, and Seville (Dozy's Hist. des Musulmans d'Espagne, i. 37, 43, and Recherches, &c. i. 59). Egilo is said to have been captured among the prisoners made at Merida in June, 713 (Lucas Tud. conf. Lafuente, Hist. de España, iii. 30, 42). In September, 714, Mousa left Spain to give an account of himself to the caliph Walid. He left his son Abdallaziz behind him as governor of the conquered province, assigning Seville as his place of residence. Here then Abdallaziz lived with Egilo, and here he was murdered in 715.

What influence this marriage may have had (if any) upon Abdallaziz's government of the Christian population, what kind of general relation it implies between the conquerors and those of the ruling Gothic class who had not sought refuge in the northern mountains or in France, who Egilo was and what were her relations to the old Gothic parties?—these are questions to which one would like to find answers, but none remain, and, as ill luck will have it, this is perhaps the only story of the conquest which has not received comment and illustration at Prof. Dozy's hands. For the later legends on the subject see Lafuente l. c. and the extract from the old Spanish translation of the Moor Rasis given in Florez, Reynas de España, i. 27.

EGILULFUS, bishop of Asta. [GILULFUS.]

EGILWALD, abbat. [ECGWALD.]

EGILWARD (1) (Anon. Vit. Willibadi, c. 1.

§ 2 in Boll. Acta SS. 7 Jul. ii. 512 D), abbat of Waltham. [EGBALD (2).] [C. H.]

EGILWARD (2) (EIGILWARD, AGILWARD, EGILBERT, EGILBART), fifth bishop of Würzburg, succeeding Liuterich, and followed by Wolfgar. Little is known of him. He is stated to have received the episcopal office (episcopale munus) on June 16, 803, and Ussermann understanding this expression to mean his episcopal consecration, assumes that the year must have been 804, when (and not in 803) June 16 was a Sunday. According to the same authority he died April 24, 810. Gams also accepts these dates. (Ussermann, Episcopatus Wirzburgensis, 1794, i. 18; Gams, Ser. Episc. 324.) [C. H.]

EGINHARD, biographer of Charlemagne. [EGINHARDUS.]

EGINO, twenty-first bishop of Constance, succeeded Johannes III. and was followed by Wolfoz (A.D. 781 to 813). At this time the traditional policy of the see was the annexation of the monastery of St. Gall. Eginno threw himself into the contest with unscrupulous energy. By heavily bribing the nobles about the king he influenced Charlemagne in his favour, who tried to settle the quarrel by subjecting Waldo, the abbat, to the jurisdiction of the bishop. But Waldo refused to exchange the fealty he owed to the king alone for obedience to any "vilior persona," and preferred to withdraw to a neighbouring monastery, of which he afterwards became abbat. Eginno thereupon appointed a secular priest ("presbyterum forensem"), a tool of his own, to the abbey. The monks demurred, and Werdo, yielding, adopted the garb of a monk, and was then received. Henceforth the bishop and abbat together did very much as they wished with the monastery. (Ratpertus, de Casibus Mon. S. Galli, cap. iv. v.; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxvi. 1062.)

We know nothing more of him than that he gave to the church of Constance a cross made of gold and silver and set with precious stones, on which were three dedicatory lines in Latin to the Virgin (Chronicon Constant. Jac. Maaili, to be found in Pistorius, Rerum German. Scriptores, tom. iii. p. 704; Gall. Christ. v. 696). [S. A. B.]

EGINO, bishop of Verona in 796. He gave up his see and retired to the monastery of Reichenau in 799, and died there in 802. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 753.) He built and dedicated the church of St. Peter at Augia (Reichenau), where he was buried. (Herimanni Augiensis Chronicon, in Pertz, Monum. v. 101; Bonquet, v. 365 C, E.) [A. H. D. A.]

EGLAF (Stubbs, Regist. Sac. 168), bishop of Dunwich. [EOGLAF.] [C. H.]

EGNACIUS (Colgan, Acta SS. 598, c. 4, Irish saint. [EDHNIUCM.] [J. G.]

EGNATIUS (Cypr. Ep. 34, ed. Migne), uncle of Celerinus, martyr. [IGNATIUS.] [C. H.]

EGOALDUS (EPPOALDUS), twenty-fifth bishop of Geneva, succeeding Aridanus and followed by Albo. The compilers of the Gallia

Christiana mention an unauthenticated tradition that he was expelled from his see by Chilperic II., but restored later on, between 660 and 672, at the bidding of pope Vitalian. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 383.) [S. A. B.]

EGREAS (EIGRAD, EUGRAD) appears in Caradoc's Life of Gildas (Albanus), as brother of St. Gildas [GILDAS], son of Caw. With his brother Allaecus and sister Peteona, he renounced the world and retired into Radnorshire; there the three built monasteries for themselves near each other, and all at some distance from the monastery of their brother St. Maelog or Meilig, at Llowes, in the rural deanery of Elfael ("I.yuhes in pago Elmail"). But Professor Rees is of opinion that Egreas, his brother, and sister, when they withdrew "in extrema parte regionis illius," went to Anglesey, in the extreme north-west of Wales, and are known as Eigrad, Gallgo, and Peithien, their names being given to Llaneligrad, Llanallgo, and perhaps Llugwy. In Myv. Arch. ii. 42, 51, he is called Eugrad, brother of Peirio at Rhosbeirio. (Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 15, wks. vi. 217; Rees, Welsh Saints, 228, 230, 324; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 476; Lib. Landav. 392, 523; Skene, Celt. Scot. i. 116-118.) [J. G.]

EGRED, a son of Eata, and brother of Egbert archbishop of York, and Eadbert king of Northumbria. When his brother Egbert went to Rome in early life, Egred accompanied him and died there. (Symeon, Hist. E. D. i. ii. cap. iii.) [J. R.]

EGREGORI (ἐγρηγόροι, watchers), a name for angels, derived from Dan. iv. 13 (versions of Aquila and Symmachus) and used by Clement of Alexandria (I'aed. ii. 9, p. 218). In the book of Enoch (Cedrenus, Comp. Hist. vii.) this title is given to the band of angels who matched with the daughters of men (Gen. vi. 2), and so Suidas interprets ἐγρηγόροι as denoting the sons of Seth. For the patristic references as to the names of the different orders of angels, see Cotelier (Const. Ap. viii. 12), and as to the interpretation of Gen. vi. 2, see Suicer (s. v. Ἄγγελος, p. 38). [G. S.]

EGRIC (1), king of the East Angles. He was allowed by his kinsman Sigebert, who acquired the kingdom after the usurpation of Ricbert, to share his authority, and when Sigebert retired to his monastery, obtained the entire sway. When Penda invaded East Anglia, the people drew Sigebert from his monastery to assist them in battle, but he was slain, and Egric with him. Anna succeeded to the kingdom (Bed. H. E. iii. 18). There is great uncertainty about the dates of these events; they are noted by Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 529) under the year 638, which may, perhaps, be the year of Anna's succession. Smith (on Bede, H. E. iii. 19) places the death of Egric and Sigebert in 635; and the same may be inferred from the evidence of the Liber Eliensis, which gives Anna, who fell in 654, a reign of 19 years (Lib. Eliens. ed. Stewart, p. 23), but places the fall of Egric in 637 (ib. p. 14). If, as seems probable, bishop Felix began his ministry in East Anglia as early as 630, the whole reign of Egric will fall within the period of his episcopate. [S.]

EGRIC (2) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 71 in

M. H. B. 364 a, also in Twysd. x Scriptt. col. 107, "Egric et Lector;" Chron. de Mailros, ed. Stevenson, "Egric lector"), reader. [EGRIC.] [C. H.]

EGRILIUS (AGRICOLA), martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia, commemorated Nov. 2 (Hieron. Mart.; Tillem. Mém. iv. 312; Migne, Hagiog.) [C. H.]

EGRYN is given by Professor Rees (Welsh Saints, 71, 304) among the Welsh saints of the latter half of the 7th century, as the son of Gwrydr Drwm ab Gwedrog of the line of Cadell Deyrnllug, and founder of Llanegryn, Merionethshire (Myv. Arch. ii. 40). [J. G.]

EGTAN, king of the Scoti (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1013, in M. H. B. 777). [AIDAN.] [C. H.]

EGULF (Wend. F. H. ann. 675, ed. Coxe), bishop of London. [EGWULF.] [C. H.]

EGUUALD (1), a bishop witnessing a spurious charter of Caedwalla, king of Wessex, Aug. 3, 683, bestowing land at Selsey on Wilfrid for a monastery. The charter bears the signature also of archbishop Brihtwald, who was not consecrated until 693 (Kemble, C. D. 902). Perhaps the forger intended ERKENWALD bishop of London. [C. H.]

EGUUALD (2) (Kemble, C. D. 104), abbat. [ECGWALD.] [C. H.]

EGWAD is placed by Professor Rees (Welsh Saints, 298, 330) among the Welsh saints of the first part of the 7th century, as son of Cynddilig ab Cennydd ab Gildas, and as founder of Llanegwad and Llanfynydd, Carmarthenshire. [J. G.]

EGWALT, abbat. [EGBALD (2).]

EGWIN (ECGWINE, EGUINE, EGWINE), third bishop of Worcester (M. H. B. 623), and founder of the abbey of Evesham. He is not mentioned by Bede; his history has therefore to be made out of the very questionable biographies, the Chronicles and Cartulary of Worcester, and the History of Evesham.

According to Florence of Worcester, he succeeded to the see in 692 (M. H. B. 539), and died in 717 (ib. 541). The first date probably requires correction, as the names of Brihtwald archbishop of Canterbury and Otfor bishop of Worcester occur in the same charter of Oshere (Kemble, C. D. 36; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 232); Brihtwald only returned from France in 693, and must have been archbishop when Egwin was appointed. Egwin's name does not appear in dated charters before the year 704, in which the ealdorman Ethelward, with the consent of Coenred, king of Mercia, granted him lands at Ambersley for his church at Cronuchome (Kemble, C. D. 56; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 279). All the Evesham charters are liable to the charge of spuriousness, and cannot be cited safely. The name of Egwin appears, however, in some Worcester grants which are of better authority: in a grant of Ethelward and Ethelheard to Cudswitha, which is also attested by Coenred (Kemble, C. D. 53); and in a gift of Ethelbald to the "family" at Worcester of land at Salwarp, which must belong to 716 or 717, as Ethelbald's reign began in the former year, and Wilfrid, Egwin's successor, was in office in 718 (Kemble, C. D. 67, 69). The evidence is thus very slender, but so far as it goes, it tends to establish the dates given by Florence. Egwin took part in the council of Clovesho in 716, in which the privilege of Wihtred was confirmed (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300).

The biographers are much more circumstantial. According to these, Egwin was a member of a royal house in Mercia, who had quitted the world and become a priest in the days of Ethelred, and, against his will, was appointed by the wishes of king, clergy, and people to the see of Worcester. In this office he was very zealous, converted the heathen, enforced the sanctity of marriage, and preached strongly in favour of reform in morals. By his strictness in the last point he lost his popularity, and complaints against him were laid before both the king and the pope. He determined to clear himself at Rome, and therefore set out thither, having first bound his feet with iron fetters, fastened by a key which he threw into the Avon. On his arrival at Rome he went to pray at St. Peter's, and prepared to celebrate Mass; whilst he was doing so, his servants brought a fish in the belly of which the key was found. Egwin then released himself from his fetters, presented himself to the pope, and, having obtained from him a favourable determination of his cause, returned home, where he was immediately restored to his see, and undertook the tuition of the king's sons. His next act was to obtain from Ethelred a gift of land on which he built the monastery of Evesham, so called from the shepherd Eovea, who had seen in the wood where the monastery was built a vision of three holy virgins, one of whom was the Blessed Virgin Mary. The apparition was reported to Egwin, who went to the place, saw the same vision, and determined to build there. From Ethelred he obtained also the gift of an old monastery at Fladbury. Coenred, Ethelred's successor, was a close friend of Egwin, and gave him more land in the vicinity of his monastery. After the death of Aldhelm, whom he buried at Malmesbury, Egwin went to Rome in 709 with Coenred of Mercia and Offa of Essex. On this second journey he obtained from pope Constantine a great privilege of exemption for Evesham. In the consecration of his monastery Egwin is said to have been assisted by St. Wilfrid, a story which, if it contains any vestige of truth, shews that Evesham was dedicated before the second visit to Rome, and not in 714, to which year it is referred by the biographer. After this work was completed, Egwin devoted himself to sacred studies and preaching. The castle of Alcester, which was inhabited by men who despised his preaching, was destroyed by an earthquake. The biographer gives his last words to his disciples, and gives as the day of his death Dec. 30, about the year 720. Such is a sketch of Egwin's career as described in the life written by a monk of the 11th century, and printed by Mabillon. There is another life, ascribed without authority to one Brihtwald, who was not, as has been supposed, the archbishop of that name, which is said to have been based on Egwin's own narration; this is still unprinted, but fragments are given by Mabillon, and in Wright's Biographia Literaria, pp. 228, 229. It seems to contain much the same matter but more copiously told, and apparently with more regard for chronological probabilities. It is described by Macray in his preface to the Chronicle of Evesham (pp. xiii. sq.), where also is a full account of the legendary materials for Egwin's life.

According to Florence of Worcester, Egwin died Dec. 30, 717, Wilfrid, his successor, having been appointed before his death (M. H. B. 541).

EGWULF, the seventh bishop of London (H. M. B. 617), and successor of Ingwald, who died in 745 (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 662). Egwulf was present at the council held at Clovesho in 747 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360); and his name appears among the subscriptions to charters of 748 and 758 (Kemble, C. D. 98, 193), and to a grant of Offa to Worcester, which, being attested also by archbishop Jaenbert, must be dated as late as 766. His successor, Wighed, is first heard of in 772. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 402.) [S.]

EGYPTIANS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO. [GOSPELS, APOCRYPHAL]

EHOARN, hermit and martyr in Brittany, cir. A.D. 520, mentioned in the anonymous Vita of Gildas Sapiens (cap. vii. § 40, in Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 965). He dwelt in a cell adjoining the church of the monastery of St. Gildas de Rhuis in the diocese of Vannes, placed by the Samaritani on the coast south of Vannes (Gall. Christ. xiv. 1, map), but by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 568) on the left bank of the Blavet. Ehoarn's abode was broken into by a band of robbers, one of whom, Leopardus, dashed out the hermit's brains with an axe on the threshold of the church. He was commemorated Feb. 11. [C. H.]

EHRENFRIED (Gama, Ser. Episc. 271), bishop of Constance. [ERNFRIDUS.] [C. H.]

EIBEACHTA, one of St. Patrick's attendants (Four Mast. A.D. 448). [J. G.]

EICHBERICHT (Ann. Ul. A.D. 728), Egbert the priest. [EOBERT (5).] [J. G.]

EIDDIGIRN, abbat of the monastery of Docunus, in the diocese of Llandaff. He witnessed several grants to that see in the time of St. Oudoceus, but the site of his monastery is unknown (Lib. Land. by Rees, 381-87). [J. G.]

EIDDILFFRED, clerical witness to the grant of the village of Is-pant by Cuchein, son of Glywi, to Guodoloiu bishop of Llandaff in the 6th century (Lib. Land. by Rees, 415). [J. G.]

EIDDILIG, Welsh saint. [IDDAWE.]

EIELBRIHT (Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, § 170, p. 305), king of the East Angles. [EILBERT (3).] [C. H.]

EIGEN, in the legendary accounts of Wales, has the honour of being regarded as the first female saint among the Britons. She was the daughter of Caradog (Caractacus) ab Bran, the chief of the Silures, who fought so long and manfully against the Roman legions in the middle of the 1st century, and obtained the favour of the emperor Claudius, who carried him a captive to Rome to grace the imperial triumph. Eigen was married to Sarllog, lord of Caer-Sarllog, now Old Sarum. If any reliance is to be put upon the legend (and difficulties surround it on all sides), Eigen was the daughter who, with her mother and uncles, was made captive and conveyed to Rome, as related by Tacitus (Ann. Lib. xii. c. 33 sq.), and was liberated with her father and friends. (On the whole question, as treated in the Welsh Triads, see Rees, Welsh Saints, sec. iv. 77 sq.) [J. G.]

EIGILWARD, bishop of Würzburg. [EGILWARD.]

EIGRAD, Welsh saint. [EGREAS.]

EIGRON is enumerated among the many sons of Caw the father of Gildas, and founded a church in Cornwall in the 6th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 230). [J. G.]

EILUNWY, a Welsh saint in the first half of the 7th century, was brother of Drydaw, and son of Helig Foel ab Glanawg; he thus belonged to Carnarvonshire, but has left no trace in feast or church dedication (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 599; Rees, Welsh Saints, 298). [J. G.]

EIMBETHA (EINBETTA), ST., a virgin, commemorated with two others, Vorbetta and Villibetta, on the 16th of September. They are unknown to the older martyrologies, but in the Auctaria of Molanus to that of Usuard occur the words "In territorio Argentinensi (in Alsace) sanctae Einbeth virginis, praeclaræ sanctitatis" (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 478). The legend is that they were three of the companions of St. Ursula left by her to tend St. Aurelia when she fell sick of a fever on the return journey from Rome to Cologne (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. v. 315). [S. A. B.]

EIMHIN (EMIN, EVIN), son of Eoghan, bishop of Ros-glas and Ros-mic-Triuin, commemorated Dec. 22. The name is evidently a phonetic form of the Irish aébhinn [pron. eevin], joyous, delightful, beautiful, written with m aspirated (Eimh), instead of b, or without aspiration (Aimh and Emh) (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. p. 63). An account of this saint is given in the Life of St. Corbmac (Mar. 26), his brother, which Colgan (Acta SS. 751) has abridged from the Book of Lecan and rendered into Latin. [CORBMAC (5).] He belonged to Munster by birth, and was son of Eoghan, son of Murcadh, of the race of Fiacha Muillethan, son of Eoghan Mor, son of Oillill Olum; his mother was Iamhnat, daughter of Sinell (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 345). According to the Life of St. Corbmac, he left Munster for the province of Leinster, and on the banks of the Barrow, in a town near the top of the frith, he built his noble monastery, the place being formerly called Ros-mic-Treoin or Ros-mic-Triuin, and now New Ross, in the county of Wexford. There he formed a numerously attended school, mostly gathered from his native province, and such was the reverence shown to the memory of the first founder that after his death it was regarded as a sure asylum and place of sanctuary. His bell, called Bernan-Emhin, or bell of St. Evan, was used long after for taking oaths and determining disputes. But some doubt its foundation by St. Evin, as in the Life of St. Abban (Colgan, Acta SS. 617, c. 261; 623 n. 3), it is said that it was St. Abban (Mar. 13) who built the monastery of Ros-mic-Triuin, and that St. Eimhin was only abbat there in the lifetime of St. Molua (Aug. 4), and perhaps also of St. Abban. He also built a monastery at Ros-glas, in Ui Failghe, now called from him Mainister-Eimhin or Monasterevan, a parish, post-town and market-town, in the barony of West Offaly, co. Kildare. His chief feast is Dec. 22, and the commemorations at Jan. 7 and Dec. 18 may also be his. According to Ussher he flourished A.D. 580, and Joceline says he wrote a Life of St. Patrick, partly in Irish and partly in Latin. This is the seventh or tripartite life as given by Colgan (in Tr. Thaum. 117-169), or at least, Colgan gives it as the one referred to by Ussher and Joceline (cap. 186), discusses (Ib. 170 n. 1, 217, col. 2) the question of authorship, and argues for attributing it to St. Evinus of Ros-mic-triuin, giving his reasons and replying to objections. Ware and others refer to it as generally attributed to St. Evin in the sixth or seventh century; while O'Donovan accepts more definitely of St. Evin as the original author, and adduces many easily assignable reasons for the interpolation of the work by later writers according to the exigencies of the times. But Lanigan cannot in any way receive the Tripartite Life as the work of St. Eimhin of Ros-mic-triuin, and thinks it rather belongs to some part of the 10th century; in this, however, Lanigan appears to assign far too late a date. Eimhin is also said to have written a Life of St. Muidoc, bishop of Ferns, but Colgan considers this most unlikely; also a Life of S. Comyall, and the so-called Book of Kilkeny, but the latter is evidently much later. (Gen. Hy-Fiach, by O'Donovan, 140 n. " ; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 132, 156; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. i. c. 3, § 4, ii. c. 14, § 3; Tanner, Bibl. 271; Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. ii. 783; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 522; Archdall, Mon. Hib. 180; Ware, Irish Writ. i. c. 4.) [J. G.]

EINBETTA. [EIMBETHA.]

EINGAN (ENEAN) is commemorated on Apr. 21, and styled "king of Scots," about A.D. 590. This is probably Aidan, son of Gauran, whom St. Columba inaugurated as king of the Dalriadic Scots (A.D. 571-605, ap. Chalmers), and accompanied to the synod of Drumceatt [COLUMBA (1)] (Adamnan, Vit. S. Columbae, i. cc. 8-34, iii. c. 6); he was buried in the church of Kilcheran, in Campbelton (Chambers's Book of Days, i. 531). Or it may be Aidan's son, Eochain, who fell at the battle of Leithredh in 590. [J. G.]

EINHARD (EYNARDUS), ST., a solitary. In the Auctaria of Grevenus to the Martyrology of Usuard these words occur: "In Altona castro, comitatus de Marka, sancti Eynardi eremitae et confessoris" (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 876) Altona was in Westphalia. He is commemorated on the 25th of March (Boll. Acta SS. Mar. iii. 587). [S. A. B.]

EINHARDUS, EINHARD (EGINHARD is not found in contemporary documents), biographer of Charlemagne. He was the son of Einhard and Engilfrita, persons of good birth and station in Franconia, was born circa 770, and received his education in the monastery of Fulda. He is described as of small stature "homuncio," "statura despicabilis" (Walafrid, Prol. in Einhardi Vitam Car. ap. Jaffé, Monim. Car. 507-8), and there are epigrams extant by Alcuin and others directed against him on this account. (Mon. Car. 492, and Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, vol. i. 139.) He married Emma or Imma, sister of Bernhard bishop of Worms. (Einhard. Epist. 3, Jaffé.) The tradition that Emma was the daughter of Charlemagne, and the romance of Eginhard and Emma do not date before the 12th century. (Mon. Car. 492, note 6; Hist. Poet. de Charlemagne, par Gaston Paris, pp. 404-5.)

His intelligence and industry soon made him known at Fulda, and he was sent by the abbat Baugulf to the court of Charles. There he quickly became most intimate with the king, who looked upon him as a son. He was distinguished also as a craftsman, probably in the precious metals, whence he got the literary name of Bezaleel (Exodus xxxi. 2, xxxv. 30) at Charles's court. In one of his letters he speaks (Ep. 56, Jaffé) of his studies in Vitruvius, and appears to have superintended some of Charles's architectural works, though it is doubtful whether he possessed any architectural skill himself (cf. Jaffé, 490 note, and Wattenbach, i. 140). His removal to Charles's court probably took place after 791, for there are six documents in the Codex Dipl. Fuldensis (cited by Jaffé, 488) written by Einhard, the latest of which is dated Sept. 12, 791. Einhard was an important personage at the Frankish court, and was charged, amongst other duties, with editing the official annals of the court (see below). In 806 he went on a mission to the pope with regard to a proposed scheme for the division of the empire (Einhard. Ann. s. a.), and in 813 it was at his advice that Lewis was nominated emperor (Niggellii Carm. ap. Pertz, Script. ii. 479).

Einhard's position suffered no diminution on Charles's death. Lewis made him counsellor to Lothar, the young emperor, in 817, and in 830 he acted as a mediator between father and son. His public life, however, had become less active during these latter years; several abbeyes had at different times been conferred upon him (Mon. Car. 493-494), especially that of Michelstadt in the Odenwald, to which, and from 828 onward to Mulinheim (Seligenstadt on the Main), he began to retire more and more from court life.

To the latter place he had transferred his precious relics of SS. Marcellinus and Petrus, and there his wife Emma died in 836, and Einhard himself on March 14, 840. (For the date, Jaffé, 499, note 6.) His epitaph by Raban Maurus is extant, e.g. in Jaffé, 500. Besides the Vita Caroli and the Annals attributed to him Einhard was the author of a Libellus de adoranda cruce (not now extant), and a treatise De trans- limes et miraculis SS. Marcellini et Petri (ap. Teulet, Œuvres d'Eginhard, ii. 175-376; cf. Wattenbach, 154-5). Teulet (ii. 397) is inclined to follow Mabillon in attributing also to Einhard the Rhythmus de passione Christi martyrum Marcellini et Petri. Of Einhard's letters, seventy-one are extant, many imperfect; they are to be found ap. Duchesne, Teulet, and Jaffé, pp. 440-86. Einhard was author or editor of the official annals of the court, known as the Annales Laurentius Majores [CHARLES, p. 456], from 796 to 829, when he permanently retired to his abbey. (So Wattenbach, Einhard's editorship lasted only till 814 according to Giesebrecht.) The Annales Einhardi are a re-edition of the official annals for this period, possibly also by Einhard's hand. The whole question with regard to the official court chronicle, and its authorship is very obscure. (See Ranke, Zur Kritik fränkisch-deutscher Reichsannalen, Berlin, 1855; Giesebrecht, Die Fränkischen Königsannalen und ihr Ursprung, in Münchener Hist. Jahrbuch, 1864, pp. 186-238; Wattenbach, vol. i. pp. 142 sq.)

It is as the author of the Life of Charles that Einhard has obtained his greatest fame. He appears to have begun that work very shortly after the emperor's death, for it is mentioned by contemporaries as early as 820 (Wattenb. 152) and Walafrid (died 849) divides it into chapters, and wrote the prologue above referred to. It very early became the most widely read book of the middle ages. More than sixty MSS. of it are extant, and more than twenty editions have been published of it, the best is that by Jaffé, including the prologue of Walafrid, ap. Mon. Car. pp. 507 sq. As is well known, in form and language it is a very close imitation of Suetonius. Jaffé, in his preface (Mon. Car. pp. 502-3) and in the notes has elaborated the comparison, and the imitation detracts to a certain degree from the historical value of the work. As has often been pointed out, the Vita is not so much a biography as an attempt at giving a genuine living consistent picture of what Charles was; and although there are many inaccuracies of fact there can be no doubt that the general picture is a true one. Comp. Ranke ap. Wattenb. i. pp. 150-3. Besides the works above referred to, Ideler's Leben und Wandel Karls des Grossen beschrieben von Einhard (2 vols. Hamburg, 1839) contains the Vita by Einhard, with an elaborate commentary and illustrative documents. The life of Einhard by Otto Abel prefixed to his translation of the Vita in the Geschichtschreiber der deutschen Vorzeit is also valuable. For other literature connected with the subject see Potthast, s.v. [T. K. B.]

EINION (EINNYAWN, EINYAUN), surnamed Frenhin, is called "King in Lleyrn," in the pedigrees of the Welsh saints, and was son of Owain Iarwyn ab Einion Yrth ab Cunedda Wledig; his brothers were SS. Seiriol and Meirion. He founded the church of Llanengan, or Llaneinion Frenhin, in his own district in Carnarvonshire, the college of Penmon in Anglesey, over which he placed Seiriol as first president, and a monastery in the island of Bardsey, whose first abbat was St. Cadfan. His festival is February 9, and his date about the first half of the 6th century [CADFAN (1)] (Myr. Arch. Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 205; Rees, Welsh Saints, 111, 212, 332; Williams, Rees's Welshm. 137). [J. G.]

There was a late inscription on the tower of Llanengan containing the words Eneanus rex Wallias, and the name Enniaun occurs on an inscribed cross at Margam in Glamorganshire (Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Christ. No. 73): "Enniaun pro anima Guorgoret fecit." Einion's festival day was February 9. [C. W. B.]

EIRENACH. [ERNADHACH.]

EIRENE, according to Basilides daughter of Dikaosyne, having with her mother her abode in the Ogdoad (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 25, p. 637). [G. S.]

EITHNE (ETHNE, ETHNEA) appears to have been a common name among the women of Ireland, so that we find it often among the saints and the mothers of the saints (Colgan, Acta SS. 416; Reeves, Adamnan, p. lxx.).

(1) Daughter of Bait, Mar. 29. On this day are commemorated in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 89) "Eithne and Sodhealb, two daughters of Bait, by the side of Sord Coluim Cille;" the entry in Mart. Tallucht (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. xx.) is "Ingina Baite, quae nutriebant Christum, Ethne oculus Sodelbia nomina earum." Colgan (Acta SS. 785) gives some account of the two virgins Ethnea and Sodelbia, daughters of Aidh, king of Leinster, and says they flourished about or after the middle of the 6th century, but he thinks that Bait may have been a surname of Cairbre their grandfather (Ib. 416 n. 1), or that "daughters of Bait" should be interpreted as "daughters of ardent charity," from the love they bore to Christ, who is said by Cath. Maguire, in his Additions and Scholia to the Felire of Aengus, to have come into their arms in the form of an infant to be embraced and kissed. They and their sister Cumania were daughters of Aidh, son of Cairbre, king of Leinster; and we read in the Life of St. Maedhog (Jan. 31), bishop of Ferns, how that bishop visited them, and how the ox he brought with him to plough their land, and gave to a leprous woman, had its place supplied by another that daily came up from the sea. No account is given of their own dates, but their grandfather Cairbre, son of Cormac, died A.D. 546 according to the Four Mast. Their chief festival is Mar. 29, but others are appropriated to them. Their abode called Tech-ingen-baithe, or the House of the daughters of Bait or Charity, was near Swords in the barony of Nethercross, co. Dublin, and Killnais, another place where their memory was honoured, seems to have been near the same (Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, 108). Lanigan (Eccol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 7) affirms only the certainty of their being distinguished by their piety, and of their living in a nunnery, "but the history of Ethnea, Sodelbia, and Cumania, and whether such were the names of the holy daughters of king Aidus, or how many were these daughters, is so involved in the obscurity of jarring documents, that I shall do no more than refer to Colgan who treats of them at Mar. 29."

(2) The Fair, daughter of Laeghaire. Colgan (Acta SS. 54-6, 415-6) at Jan. 11, and Feb. 26, has given extracts from the Lives of St. Patrick regarding the two daughters of king Laeghaire, named Ethnea the Fair and Fedelma the Ruddy, who, he thinks, may be commemorated on these days, though in the calendars there are merely the names, without place or parentage. The story of the two sisters Ethnea and Fedelmia is given at less or greater length in Colgan's Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Lives of St. Patrick, and is recorded by Tirechan (Book of Armagh, fol. 12 A A). Colgan places it in A.D. 492. King Laeghaire had sent his two daughters to Connaught to be under the charge of two Druids or Magi, named Mael and Caplit. St. Patrick had come to the royal cemetery of Crochan or Cruachan, now Rathcroghan, the very ancient residence of the kings of Connaught in Roscommon. On the side of the fort there was a well called Clebach, and when St. Patrick and his attendants or synod of bishops were assembled there one morning at sunrise, the two virgins came early to the well to wash, and, finding St. Patrick and his companions there, the young maidens thought they were supernatural beings. St. Patrick, however, entered into conversation with them, as related by Tirechan, and the result was that they believed and were baptized; and on their desiring to see the Lord's face, they received the sacrifice of Christ and soon passed in death to see the Unseen. They were buried beside the well of Clebach, and upon them was placed a Ferta, Relec, or sepulchral mound, which became the property of St. Patrick and his successors. The two Druids, their guardians, were also converted by St. Patrick. (Todd, St. Patrick, 451-55; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 163-71, ii. 716; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 108-9; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. ii. 201-2.)

(3) Daughter of Cormac or of Manius, virgin, commemorated July 6. The Mart. Tallaght. (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. xxviii.) has on this day "Tri ingena Maine in Airiud-Boinne, i.e. Dermorocus Etneocus Cumman," and Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 189) has "Dermor, daughter of Maine, of Airiudh Bainne," also as a separate entry "Ethne, and Cumman." To this last Dr. Todd (ib. p. 189 n. 2) has appended the note, "Ethne and Cumman were both virgins and sisters, daughters of Cormac, son of Ailill, of the race of Cathair Mór, king of Ireland (Sanct. Gen., B. of Lecan)." But Colgan in his note, commenting upon the story, in the Tripartite Life, concerning the chieftain Manius and his wife being converted, and of the latter, when blessed by St. Patrick, bearing "duas proles foemellas," accepts the reading of the Martyrology of Tallaght that there were three daughters, and that July 6 was their feast (Tr. Thaum. 149, c. 2, 184 n. 6, 270, col. 1). Cormac, son of Ailill, died A.D. 535, according to the Four Masters. [J. G.]

EITHRAS has no pedigree given him among the Welsh saints; it is merely stated that he was one of Cadfan's companions, when the latter came from Armorica into Britain in the beginning of the 6th century, and that afterwards he was with Hennwyen in Bardsey (Myv. Arch. ii. 24, 40; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 594, 598; Rees, Welsh Saints, 213, 224). [J. G.]

ELADIUS, ST. (HELADIUS), fourth bishop of Auxerre, cir. A.D. 387. He followed St. Valerianus, ruled for twenty-three years, and was succeeded by St. Amator, whom he had admitted to the priesthood, and who wrote his Acta. He is commemorated on May 8. (Gall. Christ. xii. 262; Acta SS. Mai. viii. 300.)

[R. T. S.]

ELAETH, surnamed Frenhin or Vrenin "the king," was a bard and saint, but though his genealogy is traced to Coel Godebog, and thus is purely Welsh, Elaeth is only found in his latter days living in Wales. In the Pedigrees of the Saints it is said:—"Elaeth (king) was the son of Meyric, the son of Idno; and Onnengrec, daughter of Gwallawg, son of Lleenawg, was his mother." He seems to have been in early life a chieftain in the north, and, on being driven from his possessions, to have found refuge in the monastery of Bangor, or in Seiriol's College at Penmon in Anglesey, in the middle of the sixth century, or, according to others, in the seventh. He was founder and patron of the parish church of Amlwch on the north coast of Anglesey. His festival is November 10. As a bard there are several poems attributed to him. The Myvyrian Archæology, i. 161, has a collection of Moral Triplets. From the Black Book of Caermarthen (fol. 35 b), Dr. Skene (Four Ancient Books of Wales, i. 501-503, ii. 35-37) has printed The Cynghogion of Elaeth, of seven stanzas, and another poem of the same length, both written in a strain of deepest piety; in the latter he says he loves "to praise Peter, who can bestow true peace," and, "in every language is, with hope acknowledged as the gentle, high-famed, generous porter of heaven." (Myv. Arch. ii. 25, 40-1; Rees, Welsh Saints, 271; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 596; Skene, Four Anc. Books of Wales, i. 19, ii. 344.)

[J. G.]

ELAFIUS (1), a British chief who appears in the story of Germanus returning to Britain to put down the Pelagian heresy. Hearing a rumour of the saint's coming, Elafius went to meet him, taking his son, who was suffering from a withered leg, and all the country flocked after him. Germanus and his company of priests arrived; the youth was healed by their prayers, and by this miracle the Catholic faith was confirmed in the minds of the people. See the life of Germanus by Constantius, copied by Bede and subsequent writers. (Bede, H. E. i. 21; Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. in M.H.B. 709; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vii. 216; Baron. Annal. ann. 435, xvii.)

[C. H.]

ELAFIUS (2) (Ruricius, Epp. ii. 7, in Patr. Lat. lviii. 86), founder of a church. [ELAPHIUS.] [C. H.]

ELAFIUS (3) (Greg. Tur. H. F. v. 41), bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne. [ELASIUS.] [C. H.]

ELAGABALUS. The short reign of this feeble and profligate emperor, though not presenting any points of direct connexion with the history of the Christian church, is not without interest as a phase of the religious condition of the empire. His grandmother, Julia Moesa, was the daughter of a Phœnician named Bassianus. Her sister, Julia Domna, became the second wife of the emperor Septimius Severus, and was the mother of M. Aurelius Antoninus Augustus, commonly known as Caracalla, and of Geta. By her husband, Julius Avitus, Moesa had two daughters, Julia Soëmia and Julia Mamaea, of whom the former became the mother of Elagabalus by Sextus Varius Marcellus, and the latter the mother of Alexander Severus by Gessius Marcianus.

The name given to the young prince on his birth, Varius Avitus Bassianus, recorded the main facts in the genealogy just given. He was born at Emesa, in Syria, about A.D. 205. Both his mother and his aunt were devoted to the worship of El-gabal (= God the Creator, or, according to another but less probable etymology, God of the Mountains), and he and his cousin Alexander Severus were in early childhood consecrated as priests in the temple of that deity in his native city, and the young Bassianus took the name of the god to whom he ministered. On the murder of Caracalla by Macrinus, his grandmother, who had shared with her sister Julia Domna the splendour of the imperial court, was compelled to retire into Syria, where she watched for an opportunity of revenging herself on the usurper and regaining her lost power. The discontent caused among the troops of the empire by the rigid discipline of Macrinus presented an opening which she was not slow to use. A report was circulated that Caracalla was the real father of the son of Soëmia. Largesses were freely given to the soldiers stationed on the Phœnician border, and they received the boy-prince, with his mother and grandmother, into their camp, and saluted him by the title of M. Aurelius Antoninus, on the 16th of May, A.D. 218. Macrinus, after an unsuccessful attempt to quell the revolt by sending Julianus with a body of troops, came in person, was defeated in a pitched battle on the border of Syria in Phœnicia, and after an attempt to escape in disguise was taken and put to death. A letter was at once despatched in the name of the young prince to the Roman senate, in which, without even waiting for their formal consent, he assumed all the titles of imperial sovereignty, Caesar, Imperator, Pius, Felix, Augustus with the tribunitian authority, and soon vague promises of reform declared that he proposed to himself to follow in the footsteps of the first and greatest of the emperors. Neither senate nor people offered the slightest opposition; and when the Fratres Arvales met in the Capitol on the 14th of July, within five weeks after the death of Macrinus, they offered up their prayers for the welfare of the new emperor.

The letter was written from Antioch, where the young emperor for some time held his court. His mother would seem to have been simply a devotee of the Syrian sun-god, but his aunt Julia Mamaea had more eclectic tendencies, and by her invitation the great Origen came to Antioch (probably, however, after the death of Elagabalus), and was received with many marks of honour. Eusebius, who relates the fact (H. E. vi. 21), speaks of her as a woman of exceptional piety (γυνὴ θεοσεβειστὴν ἐλ καὶ τὴν βασιλίσσαν γυναικῶν), and we may legitimately trace her influence in the character of her son Alexander Severus. [SEVERUS.]

After spending some time at Nicomedeia, where he entered on his second consulship, the young emperor proceeded in A.D. 219 (we may note, in passing, that it was the year in which Callistus succeeded Zephyrinus as bishop of Rome) to the capital. His short reign there may be described as a frenzy of idolatrous impurity. He laid the foundation of a splendid temple on the Palatine in honour of his patron-god, and transferred thither the conical stone which had been the symbol of his divinity at Emesa, and which was now carried to its new abode in a triumphal chariot, drawn by the six white horses and driven by the emperor himself. To that temple was also brought the sacred stone of Cybele from Pessinus, and the image of the Syrian Astarte from Carthage. Preparations were made for celebrating the nuptials of that goddess with the sun, and a heavy tax was levied on the people of Rome to defray its expenses. The dignity of the senate was outraged by his nominating a council of women, over which his mother was to preside. As if disposed to recognise the religion of his Jewish subjects, he abstained from swine's flesh and accepted the rite of circumcision, while, at the same time, dark stories were current as to his offering boys in sacrifice, in order that he might divine the future by the inspection of their viscera.

The subserviency of the senate and people of Rome to the master of the legions, so long as he could count on the support of the Praetorian soldiers, led them to tolerate even these enormities. His jealousy and suspicion led him to imprison his cousin Alexander Severus, whose virtue attracted the admiration both of soldiers and people, and whom, in deference to his mother's advice, he had adopted and proclaimed as Caesar soon after his arrival in Rome, and the troops rose and rescued their favourite. The two sisters, each with her son, appeared at the head of their supporters, and the followers of Severus were victorious. Soëmia and the boy-emperor were thrown into the Tiber (hence the epithet Tiberinus afterwards attached to him in derision), and the senate met and branded his name with eternal infamy. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 30-41, lxxix.; Herodian, v. 4-23; Lamprid. Elagab.; Capitolin. Macrinus; Eutrop. viii. 13; Aurei. Victor, de Caes. xxiii., Epit. xxiii.)

[E. H. P.]

ELAIR (ELARIUS, HELLARIUS, HILLARIUS), of Inis Locha-Cre, commemorated Sept. 7. This saint is commemorated in the Mart. Doneg. and Mart. Tallaght on this day. To him was dedicated the church built upon the island in Lough Cre; this lough is now a bog, with the ruins of the church still standing in it, in the townland of Monaincha or Monahincha, from which the bog takes its name, in the parish of Corbally, barony of Ikerrin, and county of Tipperary. The ruins stand about two miles south-east of Roscrea. St. Elair, anchorite and scribe of Loch-Crea, died A.D. 802 (recte 807) according to the Four Mast. (by O'Donovan, 412 n. 1, 413, the note giving an account of Loch-Crea and its ruins; Irish Nennius, by Todd and Herbert. 216 n. 1; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iv. c. 30, § 15; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 253). But Colgan treats Elair or Loch-Crea as one with Elair or Hilary, nephew of St. Columba by Sinech St. Columba's sister. This other Elair was son of Fintan, descended from Cian, son of Oilill Olum, and hence was one of the Mocukein; but though placed by Colgan on Sept. 7, both this and the connecting him with Loch-Crea have sprung from Colgan's desire to find a place in the calendars for the nephew of St. Columba. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 478 n. 6, 479 n. 22, 490 n. 11.)

[J. G.]

ELANC, bishop of Menevia, now St. David's, but possibly the same as ELVAED (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 155).

[J. G.]

ELAPHIUS (1), a notary to whom, in reward for his services, Gregory Nazianzen bequeathed some articles of clothing and twenty pieces of gold. (Greg. Naz. Testam. 203, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 394.) [E. V.]

ELAPHIUS (2), a gentleman residing in a castle among craggy rocks, in the diocese of the Rutheni (Rodez), addressed by Sidonius Apollinarius bishop of Auvergne (Sid. Apol. Epp. iv. 15, in Patr. Lat. lviii. 520). Elaphius had built a church on his estate, but as the diocese was without a bishop, like many other dioceses in the south of Gaul then in Gothic occupation (ib. vii. 6), he requests Sidonius to come and consecrate it. Sidonius consents, and hopes, in common with the Ruthenians, that Elaphius, now offering altars for himself, may one day offer sacrifices for them. This was a hint of the priestly office, or even perhaps, considering Elaphius's rank and the dearth of bishops, of the episcopate, and so Ceillier understands it, who adduces in confirmation an epistle of Ruricius bishop of Limoges, addressed "Domno sublimi semperque magnifico fratri Elafio" (Rur. Epp. ii. 7, in Patr. Lat. lviii. 86). The lists do not sustain the inference (Ceillier, Aut. Sacr. x. 382). [C. H.]

ELAPHIUS (3), bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne. [ELASIUS.]

ELAPIUS (ELAPHIUS), fifteenth bishop of Poitiers, succeeding Adelphius and followed by Daniel, about A.D. 535 to 540. His name only appears in the list of the bishops of that diocese (Gall. Christ. ii. 1154; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. ann. 533, n. xli., tom. i. p. 402). [S. A. B.]

ELASIPPUS, Melasippus, and Speusippus, "tergemini fratres," were Cappadocians by birth, horse-breakers by profession, and martyrs in the reign of Aurelian. They were still heathens at the age of 25, when, having invited their grandmother Necnilla to a feast, she discoursed of Christ while they made offerings to Jupiter. Convinced by her words, they rose from table and broke their idols in pieces. In vain their masters sought to reconvert them, and after cruel tortures the brothers suffered death in a furnace. They were commemorated on Jan. 17 in the church of Langres, whither their relics were subsequently conveyed (Bas. Menol.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.; Acta SS. Jan. ii. 76-80). [C. H.]

ELASIUS (ELAPHIUS), ST., seventeenth bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, succeeding Tattinodus and followed by his brother, St. Leudomer, was a native of Limoges. He is said to have granted large estates to his church, and to have obtained the subscription of Egidius, archbishop of Rheims to the deed of gift (see Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 747). He died of fever, with which he was seized while on an embassy from queen Brunichild to Spain, cir. A.D. 580. His remains were brought back to Châlons for burial, and were translated in A.D. 1164 to the church of St. Pierre-aux-Monts in the same diocese. He is commemorated Aug. 19. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 41; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 747; Gall. Christ. ix. 862.) [S. A. B.]

ELAVE, bishop of Menevia, possibly the same as ELVAED (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 155). [J. G.]

ELBODG (Annal. Camb'r. ann. ccclxv. i.e. A.D. 809, in M.H.B. 834), ELBODUGUS (Annal. Camb'r. ann. cccxxiv. i.e. A.D. 768, in M.H.B. 834), ELBOT (Brut y Tyrysog. in M.H.B. 843; Nenn. Hist. init. in M.H.B. 47 b), archbishop of Gwynedd. [ELBOD.] [C. H.]

ELBODUS, ST., became bishop (or archbishop) of Bangor in 755, and induced the people of North Wales to adopt the Roman cycle of Easter, the one really important revolution in the Welsh church from the 5th century to the 12th. The bishops of South Wales refused to comply, and the dispute continued until 777, when the time of Easter was altered there also. On Elbodus' death, in 809, the controversy was again renewed, and there is reason to think that the Welsh were still slow to surrender their ancient custom (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 148, 203-4).

Nennius used the nineteen years' cycle which Elbod had introduced; but it is first used in the Liber Landavensis under the year 1022, and by the Brut y Tyrysogion, 1005, and by both erroneously. Ussher traces the last echo of the British Easter controversy in a statement of the anonymous Life of St. Chrysostom, written about 950, which says that certain clerics of those who dwell at the ends of the earth amid the ocean, came to Constantinople in the days of the patriarch Methodius (842-847), to inquire of certain ecclesiastical traditions, and the perfect and exact computation of Easter. [C. W. B.]

ELBWALD, king of the East Angles. [ELFWALD.]

ELCHASAI. [ELKESAI.]

ELCWOLD, stated by William of Malmesbury (G.R.A. i. § 97, ed. Hardy) to have been king of East Anglia, the brother of Aldulf [ALDULF (1)] in the latter part of the 7th century. They were the sons of Ethelhere king of East Anglia and St. Hereswitha, succeeded their uncle Ethelwald, and according to Malmesbury were succeeded by Beorna. Wendover calls him Eadwald. (Flor. Wig. Geneal. in M.H.B. 628; Id. Ad Chron. App. in M.H.B. 636 c; Wend. F. H. ann. 655, ed. Coxe, note.) [ELFWALD.] [C. H.]

ELDAD (HELDAN) is the name of two Welsh saints mentioned by Prof. Rees.

(1) Son of Arth. This person, whose pedigree the Welsh genealogists profess to trace in an unbroken line from Caractacus, the British chieftain in the time of the emperor Claudius, was son of Arth ab Arthwg Frych ab Cystennyn Goronog (A.D. 542). He is said by Rees to have been a member of the college of St. Illtyd, at Llantwit Major, and is classed among the Welsh saints of the beginning of the 7th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 89, 298).

(2) Son of Geraint ab Carannog. He was in the fifth degree of descent from Cadell Deyrnllug, and a member of St. Illtyd's College. He afterwards became bishop of Gloucester, and is said to have given Christian burial to the followers of Vortigern when they were slain by the treachery of Hengist and his Saxons near Salisbury

Pitæus attributes to him Orationes insectorias, lib. i. and places him after A.D. 490, but Rees includes him in the list of the Welsh saints who flourished from A.D. 600 to A.D. 634; he was slain by the pagan Saxons. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 161, 298; Usaber, Ecc. Ant. c. 12, wks. v. 475-476; Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 153; Pitæus, de Ill. Brit. Scrip. 91.) [J. G.]

He is mentioned by Geoffrey of Monmouth as having buried the British nobles slain by Hengist (lib. vi. 15), and as urging his brother Eldol to kill Hengist and spare his son Octa. (Id. viii. 7, 8.)

He deserves a place here only as having sometimes been identified with St. Aldate, an unknown saint, to whom churches in Oxford and Gloucester are dedicated. He is commemorated on June 14. (Parker, Angl. Kalend. p. 181; Peshall, Hist. Ox. p. 144.) [S.]

ELDEBERT, impostor. [ALDEBERT.]

ELDULF (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 732, in M. H. B. 657 c), bishop of Rochester. [ALDULF (2).] [C. H.]

ELDUNEN, ELDUVEN, fifteenth bishop of Menevia or St. David's (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 155; Girald. Camb. Itin. Camb. ii. c. 1, wks. vi. 105.) [J. G.]

ELEAZARUS, martyred with eight sons at Lyons, in company with Minervius; commemorated Aug. 23. The Martyrologies give the names only in the genitive, Eleazari being the form in Ado and Eleazarii in Usuard. Grevenus and Molanus in their notes to Usuard alter (but on conjecture alone, and contrary to manuscript authority) "cum filiis octo" into "cum aliis octo" on the ground that "filiis" makes Minervius and Eleazarus husband and wife; while Migne's annotator defends "filiis" on the ground that the true nominative is Eleazarum, denoting a woman. But this criticism seems doubtful, and the received reading gives sufficient sense (Mart. Adon., Usuard, ed. Migne; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 561-565.) [T. S. B.]

ELECTI, ELECTAE, one of the two classes into which the Manichaeans were divided, the other being called "Auditores" (Possidius, Vit. Augustin. xvi.; Augustin. de Hueres. xlv.; Prosper, Anathem. ap. Labbe et Cossart, iv. 1658). The Electi were regarded as being more holy than the Auditores, and seem to have been under restrictions from which the Auditores were exempt (Augustin. de Morib. Manich. ii. 18; Contr. Faustum, xx. 23). It was from the Electi that the Manichaeans chose their officials; "Princeps," "Magistri," "Episcopi," "Presbyteri," and "Diaconi" (Praedestinat. de Haeres. xlv.). Augustine was one of these Electi for some time (Possidius, u.s.). [MANICHAEANS.] There are traces of similar classes among the Catholics. (Electi, Sacramentale Rom. c. 26; Missale Gallic. Vet. p. 449. Auditores, Audientes, Catechumeni, Isid. Orig. c. 4: Tertullian, de Penitentia; Nicolaus, P. ad Rivolard. A.D. 858 x 867; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 252, Mansi, xv. 388, "Dominici gregis." Du Fresne s. v. Electi, Auditores.) [T. W. D.]

ELECTION. [PREDESTINATION, VOCATION.]

ELECTUS, chamberlain. [ECLECTUS.]

ELEDANIUS, legendary bishop of Alclud or Dumbarton, said to have been appointed by king Arthur in 519 (Galf. Monum. ix. 15; Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 153). [J. G.]

ELEEMOSINARIUS. [INDEARCAIGH.] [J. G.]

ELEFANTUS, bishops. [ELEPHANTUS, ELIFANTUS.]

ELELETH, one of the four luminaries in the Barbeliot system (Irenaeus, i. 29, p. 108). [G. S.]

ELEN (HELENA). Elen or Helen Llywyddaw, daughter of Coel Coedhebawg, has been represented in monkish legend, the Welsh Bruts, and the equally fabulous history of Geoffrey of Monmouth, as the wife of Constantius Chlorus and mother of the Emperor Constantine the Great. Eglwys Ilan, co. Glamorgan, Tref Ilan, co. Cardigan, and Llanelen, co. Monmouth, may be dedications to Elenor or St. Helena (Myo. Arch. ii. 207; Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. v. 12; Williams, Emin. Welsh. 80, 138; Tanner, Bibl. 388-90). [J. G.]

ELENARA (ELEVARA), martyr with Sponsaria, virgins, in Gaul, under Rictiovarus in the reign of Diocletian; commemorated at St. Riquier, May 2. (Chron. Centulens. lib. iii. c. 29, in D'Achery, Spicileg. ii. 329, ed. 1723; Boll. Acta SS. 2 Mai. i. 181.) [C. H.]

ELENOG, a Welsh saint of the 7th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 307). He might be the same as Elnog son of St. Tudglyd of Holyhead, but that the latter must have flourished in the preceding century (Rees, Camb. Brit. Saints, 599). [J. G.]

ELEOCADIUS (Ughell. Ital. Sac. ii. 327).

ELEOCHADIUS (Gams, Ser. Episcop. 716), bishop of Ravenna. [ELEUCHADIUS.] [C. H.]

ELEPHANTUS (ELEFANTUS) I., eleventh bishop of Uzès, succeeding Arimundus and succeeded by Walafridus, is said by the compilers of the Gallia Christiana (vi. 616) to have been living in A.D. 800. All we know of him is that in the year following the death of Louis the Pious he was commissioned by Bernard duke of Septimania to conduct his infant son from Uzès, where he had been lately born, to his presence in Aquitaine. (See the praefatio to the Liber Manualis given by Dodana the wife of Bernardus to her son, quoted by Bouquet, tom. vii. p. 23 n., and Migne, Patr. Lat. cvi. 109). [S. A. B.]

ELEPHAS has been placed seventh in the list of the bishops of Valence, succeeding Ragnoaldus and followed by Salvius I., at the close of the sixth century. But the old authorities are silent, and his existence is very doubtful (Gall. Christ. xvi. 294; Gams, Series Episc. 648). [S. A. B.]

ELERI (ELIRI, MELERI) (1). In the Pedigrees of the Welsh Saints, Eleri is entered as "daughter of Brychan, and wife of Ceredig, the son of Cunedda Wledig, and mother of Sandde, the father of Dewi" (St. David). As belonging to the family of Brychan, one of the "three stocks of saints of the island of Britain," Eleri is numbered among the saints, and is placed by Prof. Rees in the middle of the 5th century.

In the Account of Brychan of Brycheiniog she is called Meleri (Myo. Arch. ii. 41; Rees, Welsh Saints, iii. 137, 147; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600, 604).

(2) Another is placed among the saints of the end of the 6th century, and lived at Pennant, in Gwytherin, Denbighshire. She was daughter of Dingad ab Nudd Hael, and has her genealogy traced from Macsen Wledig, i.e. Maximus the Roman emperor of the West; her mother was Thenci, Tlevoc, or Tonwy, daughter of Llewddyn Llueddawg, of Dinas Eiddin or Edinburgh, and she had five brothers, saints and members with her of the college of Bardsey (Myo. Arch. ii. 24, 42; Rees, Welsh Saints, 108, 275; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 594). [J. G.]

ELERIUS was a Cambrian monk, who lived in the vale of Clwyd, Denbighshire, and is to be distinguished from Elerius or Helerius, a martyr in Jersey. In the legendary Life of St. Winefred (Nov. 3), she is represented as receiving the veil from St. Elerius at her monastery of Gwytherin in the county of Denbigh, and as being soon afterwards buried by him there. The Vita S. Wenefredae Virginis et Martyris (in MS. Cott. Claud. A. v. ff. 138-141, and printed by Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 191-209) is said to have been written by Elerius, and is only slightly different from that published by Surius and Capgrave, and attributed to Robert, monk and prior of Shrewsbury, who flourished about A.D. 1140. [WINEFRED.] Elerius died about A.D. 660, and is commemorated on June 13 (Pitseus, de Illust. Brit. Scrip. 109; Tanner, Biblioth. 258; Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. 179-184; Rees, Welsh Saints, 297, 321; Bp. Nicolson, Engl. Hist. Libr. 97, 3rd ed.; Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. xvi. 8).

ELESBAAN. The difficulties which beset the biography of this king, hermit, and saint (Rome, Oct. 27; Ethiopia, Ginbot, xx. May 15; cf. Ludolphus, p. 415), are acknowledged by all who have tried to trace consistency in the history of Ethiopia during the 6th century. (Cf. Ludolphus, History of Ethiopia, ed. 1684, p. 167. Lebeau, Histoire du Bas Empire, ed. 1827, viii. 47, note 4. Walch, in Novi Commentarii Soc. Reg. Gottingen. tom. iv. Historia Rerum in Homeritide Saec. vi. Gestarum, p. 4.) The importance of those crusades on which his fame rests is attested by Gibbon, who justifies the mention of his wars by the assertion that, had their purpose been attained, "Mahomet must have been crushed in his cradle, and Abyssinia would have prevented a revolution which has changed the civil and religious state of the world." (Decline and Fall, ch. xlii. sub fin.)

It may be well to mention, and very briefly to estimate, the authorities from whom come both the records of his life and the confusion in which they are involved. First in importance are two Syriac writers, of whose work fragments are extant in manuscripts in the Vatican library and edited by Asseman, with a Latin translation, in the first volume of the Bibliotheca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana, pp. 341 seq.; Simeon, surnamed Sophistes, bishop of Beth-Arsam in Persia, between 510 and 525 A.D., a Catholic according to Asseman's estimate, though he accepted the Henoticon; and John, the Monophysite bishop of Asia (for his life cf. Bibliotheca Orientalis, tom. ii. pp. 83 seq.), a native of Amida in Mesopotamia, during the latter half of the 6th century, and the author of an ecclesiastical history, begun from the reign of Theodosius the younger, and carried on to the death of Justinian. To these must be added Procopius, Theophanes, and Joannes Malala: (cf. Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, Bonn., pt. x. vol. i. p. 104 seq.; Id. pt. viii. p. 433 seq.; Id. pt. xvi. pp. 346-7); but the witness of the first, though contemporary, is incomplete, and becomes untrustworthy if his notorious inconsistency and secret attachment to Paganism be considered (cf. Gibbon's Decline and Fall, ch. xl.): while Theophanes (who only contributes an evident blunder in saying that the king of Ethiopia was a Jew), and Malala, a native of Antioch, in the earlier and more important part of this period, closely and uncritically follow John of Asia; the importance of the last being further impaired by the great uncertainty of his own antiquity and position, Walch placing him later than Theophanes, while others hold him to be contemporary with Justinian. A most valuable fragment is the record of Nonnosus, himself an ambassador to Elesbaan, preserved in the Bibliotheca of Photius (Cod. 3.). But the details of the saint's wars and character are drawn from the Acta S. Arethas, extant in two forms: of which the earlier and more authentic, found by Lequien in the Colbert Library (Oriens Christianus, ii. 428) is referred by the Jesuit author of the Acta Sanctorum, to a date not later than the 7th century; while the later is, at best, but the recension of Simeon Metaphrastes, in the 10th century. Not much is contributed for the elucidation of the period by the Arabian historians adduced by Walch; and very little by the Ethiopian documents to which Job Ludolphus had access in the 17th century. (Cf. the translations from the Senkessar appended to the life of Elesbaan in the Bollandist Acta; October vol. xii.)

Of the majority of the later writers who have used or abused these authorities (as Baronius, Geddes, Migne, Gieseler, Rohrbacher, Alban Butler) it is not necessary to speak; but three among them are eminent, by their sense of the difficulty of the period, and their critical treatment of its records. First should be cited J. G. Walch as author of two papers, contributed to the Novi Commentarii of the Royal Society of Göttinge (vol. iv.), and entitled "Historia Rerum in Homeritide Saeculo vi. Gestarum." Lebeau's history of the period has been greatly increased in value by the careful annotations of his editor St. Martin. (Histoire du Bas Empire, vol. vi.) It may be noted that Baronius and Pagi have access only to the Greek authors, and are therefore useless.) Lastly, the Bollandist Acta Sanctorum give, under the name of St. Elesbaan at the date of October 27, a very full and fair critical account of all the evidence which has yet been gathered. (Cf. also their history of St. Arethas and his fellow-martyrs: Oct. vol. x.) It is here impossible to follow at length the arguments which these writers confute and urge: it is therefore intended in this article to give those facts in the life of Elesbaan which seem most clearly attested; and to speak par-thetically of the mistakes by which it has been obscured, and whose correction must presuppose a knowledge of the disputed events.

One confusion must however be resolved at the outset. The wars against the Homeritæ which form the central interest of Elesbaan's reign in Ethiopia are associated by different historians with at least ten different names; nor can these be corruptions of less than three originals. The hero of these wars is called Caleb in the Ethiopian Senkessar (cf. Acta Sanctorum, Octob. xii. p. 328), Caled, by Gibbon: Ellatzobæ by Cosmas Indicopleustes, a contemporary writer: Elesbaas, Elesboas, and Elesbaan, by other Greek writers; Elaatzbah, in the Ethiopian rendering of his name given in the Bollandist Acta: Hellestheæus by Procopius: Aidog, by John of Asia: Andas, by John Malala, and Adad by Theophanes. It seems probable that the first two forms express his proper name, which may be written Caleb; the following six are variants of Ela-Atzbah (i.e. benedictus), the vernacular title of canonization;* the last three misrepresent Ela-Ameda, the name of his grandfather, with whom, as will be seen, he was confounded by John of Asia and his followers. The name Elesbaan will be most convenient for uniform use, since it has supplanted in most writings the more distinctive name of Caleb.

It was probably during the later years of Anastasius's reign, and shortly before the accession of Justin in 518, that Elesbaan succeeded his father Tazena on the throne of Ethiopia.^b The diverse lists of the Ethiopian kings have been reduced by Dillmann to three originals, whereof one is confused at this period; the other two give the following order of succession:—

Saladoba,
His son Al-Ameda,
His son Tazena,
His son Caleb,
His son Gabra Masqal.

(Cf. Dillmann, Cod. Acth. Musæi Britannici, p. 348.) In two inscriptions of Tazena, discovered at Axum in 1830, and translated by Sapeto and by Dillmann, the king calls himself the son of El-Amida; and in the second he uses language which could only be used by a Christian. It will presently be seen that there are reasons for thinking that the faith was restored throughout Ethiopia in the reign of his father, Al-Ameda, the grandfather of Elesbaan.

The kingdom of Elesbaan was greatly dependent for its welfare upon the good will and good order of the people of Yemen, the Homeritæ, from whom it was separated by the narrow strait of Bab-el-Mandeb: for through the territory of the Homeritæ the merchants of Syria and of Rome came to the great port of Adulis (cf. Assemani Bibl. Orientalis, i. p. 360), near whose ruins in Annesley Bay the Arabian traders still unlade their ships (cf. Henry Salt, A Voyage to Abyssinia, ch. ix. p. 451). A Greek inscription discovered at Axum, and a law of Constantius bearing date in the year 356, prove that even in the 4th century the princes of Axum bore the style "King of the Homeritæ" (cf. Id. ib. p. 411; Lebeau, Bas Empire, viii. 46, n. 2); but the range and reality of their power in Arabia seems very uncertain; Letronne (Matériaux pour l'Histoire du Christianisme en Nubie, p. 39) speaks slightly of the "fanfaronnades communes chez ces rois barbares." When Elesbaan became king of Ethiopia, the Homeritæ had greatly obscured the Christianity which they had received in the reign of Constantius, but the language of Cosmas Indicopleustes (Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. lxxxviii. p. 170), shews that it was not wholly extinct. They were subject to a king whose name is variously written as Dunaan and Dhu Nowas; also by John of Asia as Dimion; by Theophanes as Damian. He had been raised to the throne about 490, by the people whom he had freed from their gross tyrant Laknia Dhu Sjenatir; and having shortly after his accession forsworn idolatry and embraced Judaism, he determined to enforce his new creed with the sword (cf. Acta Sanctorum, Oct. vol. x. p. 698). Professing a zeal of retaliation for the sufferings of the Jews throughout the Christian empire, he exacted heavy tolls from all Christian merchants who came through his territory to the port of Aden and the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, and, according to the account given by John of Asia (cf. Assemani Bibl. Orientalis, i. 360), put many Christians to death. The effects of this action were felt in the commerce of all the neighbouring peoples, but nowhere so injuriously as in the kingdom of Ethiopia; and Elesbaan soon after his accession sent to Dhu Nowas an useless remonstrance, and then prepared for war. About the year 519 he crossed the straits, attacked and utterly defeated the Arabian forces, and driving the Jew to refuge in the hills, left a viceroy to bear Christian rule over the Homeritæ, and returned to Ethiopia (Assemani, ib. p. 362). Of this expedition and victory no details are recorded; its time is incidentally and approximately marked by Cosmas Indicopleustes, who tells us that he was at Adulis "ἐν τῇ ἀρχῇ τῆς βασιλείας Ἰουστινίου τοῦ Πρωτοῦ βασιλέως" (A.D. 518–527), when the king of the people of Axum, being about to undertake an expedition of war against the Homeritæ, sent to the governor of Adulis to ask for a copy of a certain inscription; which copy Cosmas and another monk were charged to make (Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. lxxxviii. p. 102).

It is necessary at this point to consider the first great error by which the witness of the bishop of Asia and of those who follow him in regard to these events is marred (Johannes Malala, and Theophanes). The conqueror in this war, while proved by the sequel of their story to be identical with Elesbaan, is called by them Aidog, Adad, or Andas: he is said to have vowed before leaving Ethiopia that, since he fought as the champion of Christ, he would, if victorious, renounce his false faith and become a Christian; and after the defeat of Dhu Nowas it is told how, in fulfilment of this vow, he sent to Alexandria to pray that a bishop and clergy

* Some doubt may be entertained as to Hellestheæus, but it seems most likely that the majority of critics are right in tracing it to a confusion between β and ε. Cf. R. Martin's note on Lebeau, Histoire du Bas Empire, tom. viii. p. 49, note 4. According to Ludolphus (Hist. of Ethiopia, p. 165) Atzbah is the Ethiopic name of Baptism. It is hardly necessary to notice that Nicephorus calls the king David.

^b The Bollandist Acta adopt with hesitation a conjectural date, 512. The kingdom is variously called Ethiopia, Abyssinia, and Axum.

might come to form the church of Christ in Ethiopia. Then John of Asia goes on to record that this message was forwarded from Alexandria by one Licinius to the emperor, who bade the ambassadors choose a bishop; that they chose John, the Paramoniarus of the church of St. John, at Alexandria, by whom Aidog and all his princes were presently baptized, and the church, which St. Frumentius had founded in the 4th century, was quickened afresh (Assemani Biblioth. Orientalis, i. 362-3).

But this is scarcely consistent with the language of the Acta S. Arethae, which speak of Elesbaan at the time of his first war as Rex Christianissimus (cf. Bollandist Acta, October x. p. 697). Or with the inscription of Tazena discovered at Axum, and shewing that he, the father of Elesbaan, was a Christian; or with the Ethiopian Senkessar, which tells that Elesbaan about the year 525 consulted St. Pantaleon, who had at that date lived forty-five years in Ethiopia (cf. the translation from the Senkessar, jointly with the Acta S. Arethae in the Bollandist Acta, October xii. 331); or lastly, with the Ethiopian chronicle of great antiquity, extant in MSS. in the Bodleian Library and British Museum, which says that in the reign of Alameda, son of Saladoba, nine saints, whose names are especially commemorated in the Senkessar, came to Ethiopia and brought the true faith; while another copy says that in that reign many monks came from Rûm, or the Graeco-Roman empire.^c All these authorities would make it clear that Elesbaan was from the first, and by birth, a Christian; and that there must be some error in the accounts which make his victory over Dhu Nowas the occasion of his baptism.

The error may probably be traced to a confusion of the exploits of Elesbaan with a previous defeat of the Homeritae by his grandfather Al-Ameda, and the consequent conversion of that king and of his people. The evidence of these events is fragmentary and inconclusive: but the balance of probability seems in favour of the belief that they occurred. No slight force must be allowed to the connexion of names which seem to represent that of Al-Ameda with the victories of Elesbaan over the Homeritae: for such a connexion would be inexplicable unless like exploits had been associated with the earlier reign. Again, it appears from a letter written by Justin to Elesbaan in 523 or 524, that Dhu Nowas' accession to the throne of the Homeritae had required and received the sanction of the king of Ethiopia (cf. Bolland. Acta Sanctorum, Oct. xii. p. 311): and a phrase in a letter of Dhu Nowas to Mundhir III., king of the Arabs of Hira, on the skirts of Arabia Deserta,^d seems to imply a like relation of dependence: a relation such as would ensue upon a recent defeat. But two stronger reasons remain to be urged in support of this theory: it solves two difficulties with a simplicity which greatly commends it. For first,

A seeming contradiction in the life of St. Za-Michael is invalidated by a lacuna. Cf. Dillmann, Catalogus Codd. MSS. Orient. in Museo Britann. pt. iii. p. 50.

^d "Ut Christianum Regem de more constituerat." The letter is extant in the Syriac MS. of Simeon of Beth-Araam, Assemani Bibl. Orientalis, i. 365.

John of Asia ends his account of this expedition with the death of the Arabian king whom he calls Dimion, and for whom no place can be found in the list of the Arabian kings at this time, unless he be identified with Dhu Nowas.^e But Dhu Nowas reappears in the persecution which provokes Elesbaan's second expedition in 525, an event attributed to him alike by Greek, Syriac, and Arabic historians. Here then the story of John of Asia seems unaccountably wrong, save on this supposition of the defeat and slaughter by Al-Ameda (or Andas) of a previous king of the Homeritae, whom John has confused with Dhu Nowas just as he confuses Al-Ameda himself with Elesbaan. And this supposition is at once confirmed by the Arabic historians, who hide in significant silence the end of Hassan, second from Dhu Nowas on the throne of Yemen, the last of a long dynasty, and succeeded by the despot Dhu Sjenatir; while the time of his death is marked by a revolt of the Maaddeni, a frequent sign of weakness among the Homeritae (Bollandist Acta, October, vol. x. p. 310), and a likely result of such a blow as they may have received by the defeat and death of Hassan at the hands of Al-Ameda. Secondly and lastly, the supposition that it was Al-Ameda's victory over Hassan which led to the mission of the bishop and clergy from Alexandria, John the Paramoniarus and his companions, exactly coincides with the witness of the Ethiopian Senkessar, telling how in that reign the nine great saints came from the Graeco-Roman empire to revive the church of Ethiopia; and also with the statement of Theodorus Lector (ii. 58) that Christianity was introduced among the Homeritae in the reign of Anastasius; for the new faith of Al-Ameda would not be slow to reach across the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb towards the people whose conquest had given it birth.

These convergent lines of circumstantial evidence seem to point to the belief that those parts of the bishop of Asia's story of Elesbaan's life, which are irreconcilable with other authorities, are taken from an imperfect knowledge of an expedition into Arabia, wherein the grandfather of Elesbaan defeated and killed Hassan, predecessor of Dhu Sjenatir, predecessor of Dhu Nowas; and that to this earlier date, towards the close of the 5th century, must be referred the name of Aidog or Andas, the religious revival in Ethiopia and Yemen, and the death in battle of the Arabian king, so much of the bishop's account being retained as was given before this long digression, which might well be lengthened by the consideration of the probable orthodoxy of John the Paramoniarus.^f Henceforward the historians are more nearly consistent.

It was probably in the year 522 or 523 that the death of the viceroy whom Elesbaan had left in Yemen, encouraged Dhu Nowas to come down from his hiding place in the hills ("tanquam daemon carne indutus," Acta Sanctorum, Oct. xii. 316), and reassert himself as king of the Homeritae and champion of Judaism. Choosing a season when the Arabian Gulf would be an impassable barrier to the intervention of Elesbaan, he gathered a force which presently numbered 120,000 men, and having put to death all the Christians whom he could find, and turned their church into a synagogue, he pressed on to Negran, the head-quarters of the Ethiopian viceroyalty, and held at this time by Arethas, the phylarch.⁸ Here he found the garrison forewarned and the gates closed: nor were they opened to the terror of his threats, when coming to the wall and holding up a wooden cross he swore that all who would not blaspheme the Crucified and insult the sign of His suffering should die. At last by treachery Dhu Nowas won an entrance, promising that he would hurt none of the citizens, and demanding nothing harder to be yielded than an exorbitant tribute: having entered he began at once the reckless massacre which has won him a title in Arabian history, and left its mark even in the Koran (cf. Walch's paper in the Göttingen Commentarii, p. 25, and article ETHIOPIAN CHURCH, p. 250). Arethas and Ruma his wife died with a defiant confession on their lips: more than four thousand Christian men, women, and children were killed (commemorated in the Roman calendar on October 24); and from the fiery dyke into which the victims were thrown, Dhu Nowas received the name Saheb-el-Okhdud, "Lord of the Trench."⁹

It happened that at this time, probably in the January of 524, Simeon, the bishop of Beth-Arsam, had been sent by Justin, together with one Abraham, a priest of Constantinople, to gain the alliance of Mundhir III., king of the Arabians of Hira, a friend valuable alike for reasons of commerce and in regard to the war with Persia. As the ambassadors drew near to the royal presence (the story is told by Simeon in a letter to the abbat of Gabula) they were met by a crowd of Arabs crying that Christ was driven out of Rome and Persia and Homeritis; and they learnt that messengers were present from Dhu Nowas with letters to king Mundhir, which presently they heard read. They heard at great length the recital of the treachery by which Negran had been taken, of the insult done to the bishop's tomb, of the slaughter of the Christians, of the triumph of Judaism; they heard the confession of the martyr Arethas, and the speech wherewith Ruma urged the women of Negran to follow her to the abiding city of the divine Bridegroom, praying that the blood of the martyrs might be the wall of Negran while it continued in the faith, and that she might be forgiven for that Arethas had died first. They heard the story of her brutal murder, and then the appeal of Dhu Nowas that Mundhir should at once enact a like massacre throughout his kingdom. For a moment their own end must have seemed very near; but the courage of a soldier who stood forth as spokesman of the many Christians in Mundhir's army decided the hesitation of the king, and the ambassadors went on their way unhurt (but apparently unanswered) to Naaman, a port in the Arabian

Gulf. There they heard more fully the story of the massacre, especially in regard to the constancy of a boy, who was afterwards known to the bishop of Asia at Justinian's court. Simeon of Beth-Arsam thus closes his letter, praying that the news of the martyrdom may be spread throughout the church, and the martyrs receive the honour of commemoration, and that the king of Ethiopia may be urged to help the Homeritae against the oppression of the Jew. (Cf. Assemani Bibl. Or. i. 364-379.)

When this message reached Elesbaan, it was reinforced by a letter from the emperor Justin, elicited by the entreaties of Dous Ibn Dzi Thaleban, one of the few Christians who had escaped the persecution of Dhu Nowas (cf. Wright, Early Christianity in Arabia, p. 56). This letter is given in the Acta S. Arethae; where also it is told how the patriarch of Alexandria, at the request of Justin, urged Elesbaan to invade Yemen, offering up a litany and appointing a vigil on his behalf, and sending to him the Eucharist in a silver vessel. Without delay Elesbaan collected a great army, which he divided into two parts; 15,000 men he sent southwards, in order that they might cross at Bab-el-Mandeb, and marching through Yemen divert the strength of Dhu Nowas's forces from the movements of the main body of the Ethiopians, which Elesbaan intended to send by sea to some place on the south coast of Arabia. For the transport of these latter he appropriated sixty merchant vessels then anchored in his ports, adding ten more, built after the native fashion, the planks being held together by ropes. On the eve of the enterprise he went in procession to the great church of Axum, and there, laying aside his royalty, he sued in forma pauperis for the favour of Him whose war he dared to wage; praying that his sins might be visited on himself, and not on his people. Then he sought the blessing, the counsel, and the prayers of St. Pantaleon; and received from within the doorless and windowless tower, where the hermit had lived for forty five years, the answer, "Ἔστω σὺν σοὶ ὁ συμβασιλεύων σοι," and again, "Ἡ εὐχή τοῦ ἀρχιεπισκόπου Ἀλεξανδρείας, καὶ τὰ δάκρυα Ἰουστίνου καὶ ἡ θυσία ἡ εὐσεβεστάτη τῶν μαρτύρων ἀνέβη ἐπὶ τοῦ νοεροῦ θυσιαστηρίου." And so the armament was sent on its twofold route.

In regard to the chief facts of this expedition, the Arabic historians quoted by Wright and Walch agree fairly well¹ with the Greek writers and with the brief account of the bishop of Asia; differing chiefly in regard to the presence of Elesbaan himself, which is asserted by the Greeks, denied by the Arabians, and in regard to the manner of Dhu Nowas's end. For the 15,000 Bab-el-Mandeb was indeed a gate of tears: they died of hunger, wandering in the desert. The rest of the force were safely embarked, and sailed southwards down the Gulf of Arabia towards the straits; which Dhu Nowas had barred by a huge chain, stretched across the space of two furlongs from side to side. Over this chain, however, first ten ships and then seven more, were lifted by the waves, the Ethiopian admiral being on board one of the seven; the rest were driven back by stress of weather up the Gulf, but presently, the chain being, according to one account, broken, forced the passage, and, passing the smaller detachment of seventeen, cast anchor farther along the coast. Meanwhile Dhu Nowas, having first encamped on the western shore, where he thought the hindrance of his chain would force the Ethiopians to land, hurried from his position, and leaving but a few men to resist the smaller fleet watched with his main army the movements of the rest. Those on board the seventeen ships under the command of the Ethiopian admiral easily effected a landing near the port of Aden, and defeating the troops opposed to them, pressed on to the chief city, Taphar, or Taphran, which surrendered immediately. (Cf. Wright, Early Christianity in Arabia, 58-60.) Broken in courage by the news of this disaster, the main body of the Arabians offered a feeble resistance to the rest of the Ethiopian armament: and Dhu Nowas saw that the end of his reign and of his life was very near. According to the Arabic historians he threw himself from the cliff and died in the waves; according to the Acta S. Arethas, he bound his seven kinsmen in chains, and fastened them to the throne on which he sat, lest they should fail to share his fate; and so awaited the death which Elesbaan inflicted with his own hand. The Arabic writers are unsupported in their story of the useless resistance of a successor Dhu Giadan; it was probably at the death of Dhu Nowas that the kingdom of the Homeritae ended, and Yemen became a province of Ethiopia. At Taphar Elesbaan is said to have built a church, digging the foundations for seven days with his own hands: and from Taphar he wrote to tell the patriarch of Alexandria the news of his victory. A bishop was sent from Alexandria and appointed to the see of Negrin, where again questions are raised both as to the orthodoxy and as to the identity of this bishop. This town the king restored, and entrusted to the care of Arethas's son; rebuilding and endowing the great Church, and granting perpetual right of asylum to the place where the bodies of the martyrs had lain. And so Elesbaan returned to Ethiopia. (Boll. Acta SS. October, xii. 322.)

Here again begins a period of confusion and inconsistency, such as may justify the complaint of the Arabs that among all other histories that of the Homeritae is the most imperfect (Ludolphus, p. 167): it is impossible to harmonize the diverse accounts of the course of events in Homeritis after the departure of Elesbaan. The great preponderance of authority is with Procopius, who is here at one with the Arabic writers, and followed by Walch, Ritter, and for the most part by the Bollandist Acta. It may be enough therefore to give his account, since reconciliation is impossible, and since the events bear only indirectly upon Elesbaan's life.

It would seem then, that the king, when he returned to Ethiopia, left a Christian Arab, named Esimiphaeus, otherwise known as Ariathus to be his viceroy over the conquered people.¹ But he also left an element of discord, a part of his army being detained by the luxury of Arabia Felix, and refusing to leave the land which they had won. These soldiers not long after set up a rival to Esimiphaeus, in the person of Abrahah or Abraham, the Christian slave of a Roman merchant, who was strong enough to shut up the viceroy in a fort and seize the throne of Yemen. A force of 3000 men was sent by Elesbaan, under the command of a prince of his house, whom some call Aryates or Arethas, to depose the usurper; and it seems that Abrahah, like Dhu Nowas, sought safety among the mountains. But his retreat too was only for a time: about the year 540 he came down and confronted the representative of Elesbaan; and at the critical moment the Ethiopian troops deserted and murdered their general.¹ Determined to maintain his supremacy and avenge his kinsman, Elesbaan sent a second army; but this, loyally fighting with Abrahah, was utterly defeated, and only a handful of men returned to Ethiopia. The Arabic historians record the great oath with which Elesbaan swore that he would yet lay hold of the land of the Homeritae, both mountain and plain; and that he would pluck the forelock from the rebel's head, and take his blood as the price of Aryates' death; and they tell of the mixed cunning and cowardice by which Abrahah satisfied the Ethiopian's oath, and evaded his anger; winning at last a recognition of his dignity. Procopius adds that Abrahah paid tribute to Elesbaan's successor; and the Homeritae remained in free subjection to the kings of Ethiopia till the century had almost ended.

In this continuous history of those relations between Elesbaan and the Homeritae, which are the most vivid part of his life, no mention has been made of the two occasions at which he appears near the main course of the life of his age, in contact with the history of the Roman empire. For two reasons the alliance of Ethiopia and Yemen was attractive to Justinian; for not only might their armies do good service in the Persian war, but it was also possible that their merchants might draw the silk-trade of China from its normal course through Persia, so that the Byzantine court might neither lose its supply in time of war nor in time of peace enrich its enemies. Records are extant of two embassies sent by Justinian to Elesbaan, records almost in the very words of the ambassadors.² Joannes Malala, in writing the history of the first, had before him the autograph of the envoy whom Procopius (de Bello Persico, i. 20) calls Julian: Photius has preserved in the third codex of his Bibliotheca his fresh memory of Nonnosus's story of his experience in the second mission. Julian must have been sent before 531, for Cabades was still living, and according to Procopius Esimiphaeus was viceroy of Homeritis. He was received by Elesbaan, according to his own account, with the silence of an intense joy; for the alliance of Rome had long been the great desire of the Ethiopians. The king was seated on a high chariot, drawn by four elephants adorned with gold: he wore on his shoulders a loose robe studded with pearls, and round his loins a covering of linen embroidered with gold. He received Justinian's letter with every sign of respect, and on learning that he was called to take part in the Persian war, he began to prepare his forces even before Julian was dismissed from his court with the kiss of peace. (Johannis Malalae Chronographia, xviii. Bonn. edit. pp. 457, 458.) Malala records no sequel of these preparations, Procopius complains that none occurred.

The second embassy, which was sent primarily to Kaisus or Imrulcays, the prince of the Chindini and Maaddeni, and only secondarily to the Homeritae and the Ethiopians, seems to belong to the last years of Elesbaan's reign. Nonnus the envoy belonged to a family of diplomatists, for his father and grandfather had been employed in like missions. But Photius has copied from his manuscript no details of the purpose or result of this journey: only telling of the great herd of 5000 elephants which Nonnus saw between Adulis and Axum, and the pigmy negroes who met him on an island as he sailed away from Pharsan. (Photii Bibliotheca; Bekker's edit. pp. 2, 3.)

The story of Elesbaan's abdication and seclusion is told in the Acta S. Aethias: the last years of his life are embellished in Ethiopian hagiography, with many strange miracles which their Jesuit critic unhesitatingly disbelieves.* Having accepted the fealty and recognized the royalty of Abraham, and having confirmed the faith of Christ in Homeritis, "pro tanta Dei benedictione nihil se dignum reddere posse aiebat rex Elesbaas: hoc tantum invenit ut coronam regiam deponeret et indueret vestem monasticam." The cell to which he betook himself is still shewn to the traveller: it was visited in 1805 by Henry Salt, and has been elaborately described by Mendez and Lefevre. There the king remained in solitude and great rigour of asceticism: and the year of his death is lost in the darkness of his hermit's life. His crown he sent to Jerusalem, praying that it might be hung "in conspectu januae vivifici sepulchri; in quo principium resurrectionis et incorruptionis nobis ostendit Christus Filius Dei a mortuis resurgens: cui gloria cum Patre et Spiritu Sancto nunc et semper in saecula saeculorum." [F. P.]

ELEUCHADIUS, 100 A.D., bishop of Ravenna; commemorated on the 14th of February. He is the subject of the sixth sermon of Peter Damianus, in the 11th century. His name is also given in the Martyrologium Romanum, and in Hermann Craven's Additions to Usuard. His life is given by Johannes Camansius (Bolland. AA. SS. Feb. 747) from a MS. in a monastery in Westphalia; and by Hieronymus Rubeus (Historicum Ravennatum, libri decem. Venice, 1572, folio). By these he is said to have been one of the four pupils of St. Apollinaris who succeeded him in his see, the line being Aderitus, Eleuchadius, Martianus, Calocerus. He is described as an eminent Platonic philosopher, converted by Apollinaris on a visit to Rome. He accompanied his master and fellow disciples to Ravenna, to rule the church in that place. Apollinaris was martyred under Vespasian, and Eleuchadius succeeded Aderitus A.D. 100. He died A.D. 112, and his remains were buried outside the walls, where a church was afterwards dedicated to his memory, existing in the time of Peter Damianus. It is thought that his bones were carried by king Astulf to Ticinum. Peter Damianus believed him to have written books on the Old and New Testament, and probably on the Incarnation and Passion. He was not actually a martyr. (Pit. Dam. Opp. part ii. 29, etc.; Patr. Lat. cxliv. 534, etc., Ughell. Ital. Sacr. ii. 327.) [W. M. S.]

ELEUSINIUS (1), a very reverend person (αἰδοσιμώτατος) despatched by Eustathius of Sebaste, A.D. 371, to apprise Basil of the approach of the Emperor Valens, and to express the apprehension he felt for the safety of the Catholics at Caesarea, and especially for Basil himself. Basil wrote thanking Eustathius for sending him such an ally and supporter in the spiritual contests he was engaged in. (Basil, Epist. 79 [318], p. 300.) [E. V.]

ELEUSINIUS (2), (ELEUSIUS, Baron. A. E., ann. 449, xii.), one of the deacons in the monastery of Eutyches at Constantinople. At the meeting in November, A.D. 448, of the council of bishops by whom he was eventually condemned, Eutyches sent round a "tome" or doctrinal treatise, by the hands of Eleusinius and a brother deacon, Constantine, to be signed by the heads of the chief monastic establishments of the city, with the view of committing them to his cause against Flavian, their bishop. In this they met with but little success. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 198, 210.) When the messengers of the synod presented themselves at Eutyches' convent, demanding to see him, Eleusinius came forward to receive their message, and on their refusing to give it to any one but the archimandrite himself, they were conveyed by him to Eutyches' presence. (Ib. 200.) Eutyches refusing to appear before the council on the plea of illness, Eleusinius was commissioned with Abraham and others, to represent him at the fourth session. (Ib. 204-207.) Eleusinius was cited at the sixth session of the council to substantiate the charges brought against Eutyches by Eusebius of Dorylaeum (Ib. 213). He successfully urged a claim to be present, with other members of Eutyches' monastery, when sentence of excommunication and deposition was pronounced. (Ib. 239.) On the meeting of the "Latrocinium" at Ephesus, A.D. 449, Eleusinius was one of the monks who lodged a formal complaint against Flavian for the condemnation of Eutyches at Constantinople. (Ib. 280.) [E. V.]

ELEUSINUS (1), tribune of Thamugada, in Numidia, bearer of a request from the people of that place to St. Augustine that he would reply to the letter of Gaudentius concerning Donatism. (Aug. Ep. 204, 9.) [H. W. P.]

ELEUSINUS (2), (Baron. Annal. 512, xxiii.), bishop of Sasima. [ELEUSIUS (5).] [C. H.]

ELEUSIPPUS (Baron. Annal. ann. 179, xxxvii.; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 716, in M. H. B. 541a; Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 653 d), martyr. [ELASIPPUS.] [C. H.]

* "Ad hoc legenda est ignorantia Habessinorum hoc vero ut pigrit referre quae de sanctis suis ac viris illustribus commendantur."

ELEUSIUS (1), a deacon and philosopher in the reign of Constantine, quoted by Codinus as one of the authorities for the events at the foundation of Constantinople. (Codinus, p. 9, A.B.)

[J. W.]

ELEUSIUS (2), bishop of Cyzicus, one of the most prominent and influential members of the Semiarian party in the second half of the 4th century, intimately connected with Basil of Ancyra, Eustathius of Sebaste, Sophronius of Pompeiopolis, and other leaders of the Macedonian party. He is uniformly described as a man of high personal character, holy in life, rigid in self-discipline, untiring in his exertions for what he believed to be the truth, and, according to St. Hilary, more nearly identified with the orthodox doctrine than most of his associates (Hilar. de Synod. p. 133). The people of his diocese are described by Theodoret as zealous for the orthodox faith, and well instructed in the Holy Scriptures and in the doctrines of the church, and he himself as a man worthy of all praise. (Theod. H. E. ii. 25; Haeret. Fab. iv. 3.) Though usually found acting with the tyrannical and unscrupulous party, of which Macedonius was the original leader, and sharing in the discredit of the measures directed by them against the holders of the Homoousian faith, Eleusius was uncompromising in his opposition to the pronounced Arians, by whom he was persecuted and deposed; and a calm view of his career, as far as we know it, leads us to acquiesce in the substantial justice of the commendation passed upon him by the voice of antiquity.

Eleusius had held a military office in the Imperial household with considerable distinction, when he was suddenly elevated to the episcopate by the notorious Macedonius, the bishop of Constantinople. He was appointed bishop of Cyzicus, on the Propontis, at the same time that Marathonius, paymaster of the prefects of the Praetorian Guard, was appointed to the see of Nicomedia, c. A.D. 356 (Soz. H. E. iv. 20; Suidas, sub voc. 'Ελεῦσιος). Eleusius signaled the entrance on his episcopal office with a vehement outburst of zeal against the relics of paganism at Cyzicus. He demolished the temples, heaped contempt on their gods and their ritual, and used his authority to harass the worshippers. This, as will be seen, was remembered against him on the accession of Julian. He shewed no less decision in dealing with the Novatians, with whom a community of persecution had caused the Catholics to unite. He destroyed their church, and forbade their assemblies for worship. (Socr. H. E. ii. 38; Soz. H. E. iv. 21. v. 15.) He soon acquired great influence over his people, not by any eloquence of speech, of which he was destitute, but by his religious zeal, the austerity of his life, and the consistent gravity of his manners. He established in his diocese a large number of monasteries, both for males and females (Suidas, u. s.) He took part in the semi-Arian council which met at Ancyra 358 A.D. (Hilar. de Synod. p. 127), and was one of the members deputed, with Basil of Ancyra, Eustathius of Sebaste, and Leontius, to lay before Constantius at Sirmium the decrees they had passed, condemnatory of the Anomoeans, and obtain their ratification. (Hilar. u. s.; Soz. H. E. iv. 13; Labbe, Concil. ii. 790.) We find Eleusius again taking part in the indecisive

Council of Seleucia, A.D. 359 (Socr. H. E. ii. 39-40), at which he met the proposition of the Acacians to draw up a new confession of faith, by the assertion that they had not met to learn anything they had not been previously taught, nor to receive a new faith, but to pledge themselves for death to that laid down by the fathers (Socr. H. E. ii. 40). Having been commissioned with Eustathius of Sebaste, Basil of Ancyra, and others, to communicate the result of the synod to Constantius, Eleusius denounced the blasphemies attributed to Eudoxius so vigorously that he was compelled by the emperor's threats to retract them (Theod. H. E. ii. 23). [EUDOXIUS; EUSTATHIUS OF SEBASTE]. The wily Acacians speedily gained the ear of Constantius, and, turning the tables on them, secured the deposition of their semi-Arian rivals, of whom Eleusius was one, A.D. 360. The nominal charge against him was that he had, without due examination, baptized and ordained one Heraclius of Tyre, who, being accused of magic, had fled to Cyzicus, and that when the facts came to his knowledge he had refused to depose him. He was also charged with having admitted to holy orders persons who had been condemned by his neighbour, Maris of Chalcedon (Soz. H. E. iv. 24; Socr. H. E. ii. 42). His old patron, Macedonius of Constantinople, who had been got rid of at the same time on equally frivolous grounds, wrote to encourage him and the other deposed prelates in their adherence to the Antiochene formula, and to maintain the "Homoiousian" as the watchword of their party (Socr. H. E. ii. 45; Soz. H. E. iv. 27). The subtle Anomoean Eunomius was made bishop of Cyzicus in his room by Eudoxius, who had succeeded Macedonius as bishop of Constantinople (Socr. H. E. iv. 7; Philost. H. E. v. 3). Eunomius, however, failed to secure the goodwill of the people who refused to attend the church where he officiated, and built a church for themselves outside the town. On the accession of Julian, A.D. 361, Eleusius, in common with the other deposed prelates, returned to his see, from which he was soon expelled a second time by Julian, on the representation of the heathen inhabitants of Cyzicus, on account of the zeal he had shewn against paganism (Soz. H. E. v. 15). Julian's death having removed the interdict, Eleusius regained possession of his see. He took the lead at the Macedonian council of Lampsacus, A.D. 365 (Socr. H. E. iv. 4). At Nicomedia, A.D. 366, he weakly succumbed to Valens' threats of banishment and confiscation, and declared his acceptance of the Arian creed. Full of remorse at his cowardly submission, on his return to Cyzicus, he assembled his people, confessed and deplored his crime, and expressed his desire, since he had denied his faith, to resign his charge into the hands of a worthier bishop. The people of Cyzicus, who were devotedly attached to him, refused to accept his resignation (Socr. H. E. iv. 6; Philost. H. E. ix. 13). In A.D. 381 Eleusius was the chief of the thirty-six bishops of Macedonian tenets summoned by Theodosius to the oecumenical Council of Constantinople in the hope of bringing them back to Catholic doctrine. This anticipation proved nugatory, and Eleusius and his adherents obstinately refused all reconciliation, and maintained their heretical views on the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, in spite of their condemnation by the council. (Socr. H. E. v. 8;

Sec. H. E. vii. 7.) The result of the conference of bishops of all parties in A.D. 383, to which Eleusius was also invited as chief of the Macedonians, was equally adverse to the emperor's desire to establish unity of religion. The differences proved irreconcilable, and the emperor manifested his disappointment by a series of severe edicts directed against the Macedonians, Eunomians, Arians, and other classes of heretics. How far these edicts were put in execution, and to what extent Eleusius was a sufferer from them, we are unable to determine. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. vol. vi. passim.) [E. V.]

ELEUSIUS (3), a Donatist, to whom, together with Felix, Glorius, and, if the reading be correct, Grammaticus, St. Augustine addressed two letters, Nos. 43, 44. The first of these, A.D. 397 or 398, relates in detail the inconsistencies and excesses of the Donatists and Circumcellions, earnestly remonstrates with them, and entreats them to submit to reason, to Scripture, and to the decision of the judges, both ecclesiastical and civil, before whom their cause has been repeatedly tried. In the second, he relates a controversy between himself and Fortunius, the Donatist bishop of Tibursicus, in Numidia, which had been interrupted by the noisy violence of an intruding crowd. He proposes to renew the conference at another and more quiet place, in order that a matter so important may be calmly discussed. (Aug. Ep. 43, 44.)

ELEUSIUS (4) (Baron. Annal. ann. 449, xii.), procurator of Eutyches. [ELEUSINIUS.]

[T. W. D.]

ELEUSIUS (5) (ELEUSINUS), a "bishop in the second Cappadocia," is mentioned in the letter of certain Palestinian monks to Alcison bishop of Nicopolis, the metropolis of Vetus Epirus, as shewing hostility to the faith of Chalcedon, c. A.D. 516 (Evagrius, H. E. iii. 31). He is supposed to have been bishop of Sasima (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 405; Gama, Ser. Episc. 440).

ELEUSIUS (6), bishop of Trajanopolis in central Thracia, near the Hebrus, was present at the fifth general council at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 395; and Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1195.)

[J. de S.]

ELEUSIUS (7) (otherwise GEORGIUS), a monk and a presbyter of Siceon, in the ecclesiastical diocese of Anastasiopolis, in the province of Galatia Prima, in the 7th century. He was a disciple of Theodorus Siceotes, and wrote his life, which is published by the Bollandists. (Act. Sanct. 22 April, iii. 33.)

[T. W. D.]

ELEUTERIUS (Gama, Ser. Episc. 731), bishop of Terracina. [ELEUTHERIUS (6).]

[C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (1), bishop of Rome. [ELEUTHERUS (1).]

ELEUTHERIUS (2), a bishop of Illyricum, the son of Anthia and the consul Eugenius, martyred, together with his mother, during the reign of Hadrian. He was commemorated Ap. 13 (Mon. Bax.), or April 18 (Mart. Usuard.)

[T. S. B.]

ELEUTHERIUS (3), one of the fourteen bishops (of sees unnamed) mentioned by Augustine as composing the synod of Diospolis (Lydda) on Pelagianism, A.D. 415 (Aug. contr. Julianum, i. 5, § 19, in Patr. Lat. xlv. 652). In that list was also a bishop Eutonium. There was at the same time at Diospolis the presbyter Julianus, known for the invention of the body of St. Stephen, and in his account of that matter (in Lipomani ut inf.) he mentions two bishops that accompanied him from Diospolis to the place of the invention, Eleutherius of Sebaste, and Eleutherius of Jericho. Their identification among the fourteen synodal bishops (one only of whom is called Eleutherius by Augustine) is made out by supposing that Eutonium was otherwise or properly Eleutherius. It then remained to conjecture which of the two was the bishop of Sebaste and which of Jericho. Mansi assigns Eleutherius to Jericho and Eutonium "sive Eleutherius" to Sebaste; Le Quien, vice versa; (Lipomani, de Vitis SS. ed. Surius, Aug. 3, iv. 147, Venet. 1581; Mansi, iv. 315, 316; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 652; Baron. 415, xix.)

[C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (4), bishop of Geneva in the 5th century. No credit is due to the story of the abbé Besson, the historian of the diocese of Geneva, that he was a native of Britain contemporary with Constantine, and died in 334. He is placed between Cassianus and Domitianus I. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 378; Gama, Ser. Ep. 277.)

ELEUTHERIUS (5) (Gall. Christ. i. 863), archbishop of Avignon. [ELOTHERUS.] [C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (6), ST., 8th in the list of bishops of Terracina, about A.D. 443. He was an African by birth, and succeeded his son St. Silvanus. He governed the see for "some years," and died Sept. 6, on which day he was commemorated at Terracina. The next bishop in the list, Martyrius, was living in the year 502. (Ughel. Ital. Sac. i. 1290.)

[C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (7), a bishop addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris (vi. 11), who recommends to his notice a Jew, on the ground that there is hope while a Jew lives that he may become our brother. (Ceill. Aut. Eccl. x. 390.)

ELEUTHERIUS (8), bishop of Chalcedon, at the time of the council A.D. 451, whose decrees he signed among the metropolitans. He also signed the synodal decree of Gennadius of Constantinople against the simoniacs, A.D. 459. He received a letter from the emperor Leo concerning the murder of St. Proterius of Alexandria, as if he held metropolitan rank, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 602; Mansi, vii. 137, 523, 917.)

ELEUTHERIUS (9), said to have been elected patriarch of Constantinople, by the orthodox A.D. 484, in the time of the Eutychian Acacius and the emperor Zeno. Acacius had been excommunicated by pope Felix III. and a council at Rome. Eleutherius is said to have suffered much from Acacius and Zeno, and after a rule of seven years to have died towards the close of that reign (Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. 815). Fravitta succeeded Acacius; and no mention of

Eleutherius occurs in Theophanes, Baronius, or Pagius's notes. [W. M. S.]

ELEUTHERIUS (10), ST., commemorated Feb. 20, was the third bishop of Tournai, succeeding Theodorus and followed by St. Medardus. The authorities for his life are of a late date, the earliest of them an anonymous one (to be found in Boll. Acta SS., Feb. iii. 187), being probably of the 8th or 9th century, and the recital is overlaid with legend. He was born at Tournai in the year A.D. 456, of Christian parents named Serenus and Blanda, whom the legends, ignoring the interval of about 150 years, call converts of St. Piatius. While he was still a young man a persecution of the Christians arose in Tournai, and the Franks, who were not yet converted, expelled the whole of them from the city. Eleutherius and his family, with many others, settled at Blandinium (presumably Blandain), a village a few leagues distant, where a church was built and Theodorus consecrated bishop. Upon his death Eleutherius, having first been sent by the Christians to Rome to obtain the sanction of the pope, was consecrated to the see. The date is variously given in 470, 483, 484, 487, 501, and 502. The weight of authority seems, however, in favour of the year 487. The first nine years of his bishopric were spent at Blandinium, but the conversion of Clovis and his followers enabled him to return to Tournai. His episcopate which lasted forty-five years, seems to have been chiefly passed in struggles with the pagans and heretics. The latter belonged to sects of the Arians, whose doctrines at this time influenced the greater part of Christian Gaul except the Franks. He is said to have visited Rome three times in all: first, on the occasion already mentioned, and twice when bishop during the pontificates of Symmachus and Hormisdas, the two latter visits being in connexion with his efforts against heresy. With the same object he convened a synod about the year 527, in which he expounded the true faith and confuted his opponents. These efforts entailed much persecution, and finally in A.D. 531 or 532 his enemies lay in wait for him as he quitted a church, and so maltreated him that he was left for dead. Seven weeks later he died of the injuries received on that occasion. He was buried at Blandinium, and his remains are said to have been translated twice. Among the miracles ascribed to him are the raising of a girl from the dead (see the somewhat romantic account in the first of the Lives, Boll. Acta SS. ut sup.) and the cures of a cripple, a blind man, and a leper. The following writings have been assigned to him: Sermo, seu Confessio de SS. Trinitate, said to have been presented by him to pope Symmachus in the fourteenth year of his episcopate; Transitus S. Eleutherii Episcopi; Sermo de Trinitate; Sermo de Incarnatione Domini; Sermo de Natali Domini; Sermo in Annuntiationis Festum; and Oratio Beati Eleutherii (see Migne, Patr. Lat. lxx. 83–102), but without sufficient authority. (Rivet, Hist. Lit. de la France, iii. 154; Gall. Christ. i. 863.)

ELEUTHERIUS (11), ST., was the fifteenth bishop of Auxerre, preceded by St. Droctoaldus, and followed by St. Romanus. He is said to have sat twenty-eight years, from A.D. 532 to 561, the date of his death. Nothing further is known of him than that he was present at the four councils of Orleans, held in the years 533, 538, 541, and 549. He is commemorated on Aug. 16. (Gall. Christ. xii. 246; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iii. 299; Bar. an. 536 cxxiv., and 552 xrvii.; Labbe, Sacros. Conc. v. 929, 1282, 1371, 1384.)

[S. A. B.]

ELEUTHERIUS (12), a bishop in whose diocese, on an estate named Pancellus, the deacon Maximus had erected an oratory in honour of the saint Cantiana. Eleutherius was requested by Pelagius I., bishop of Rome (555–560), to consecrate this oratory. (Pelag. Epist. fifth fragm. Patr. Lat. lxxix. 414; Ceillier, Auteurs Sac. xi. 333.)

[C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (13), bishop of Cordova, signs the acts of the third council of Toledo in 589. (Esp. Sagr. x. 227; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238; Gomez Bravo, Catálogo de los Obispos de Cordova, p. 64, ed. 1739.)

[M. A. W.]

ELEUTHERIUS (14) (LEUTERIUS in some MSS.), the first bishop of Salamanca of whom any record remains. He signs the acts of the third Council of Toledo, 589. The bishop of Salamanca was a suffragan of Merida up to the Moorish conquest, and is now under Valladolid. (Esp. Sagr. xiv. 273; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238.)

[M. A. W.]

ELEUTHERIUS (15), erroneously said by Gervase (Acta Pontif. in Twysd. 1630. 15), and after him by Dugdale (i. 81) to have been bishop of Arles, and to have consecrated Augustine archbishop of Canterbury. The bishop named by Bede (H. E. i. 27) is Aetherius, and he was bishop of Lyon, not of Arles.

[C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (16), bishop of Lucca, signed the second Epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680 after a synod in Rome to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 307; Hefele, § 314.)

[A. H. D. A.]

ELEUTHERIUS (17), martyr in Persia under Sapor II. After he had become a Christian and had been instructed by Simeon, a bishop, he began to preach amongst his countrymen; they lodged information against him, and he was brought before the king, by whose orders he was tortured and put to death. He is commemorated April 13. (Menol. Bas.; AA. SS. Ap. ii. 130.)

[T. S. B.]

ELEUTHERIUS (18), soldier and martyr at Nicomedia in the Diocletian persecution. He was amongst those whom the emperor commanded to be put to death in consequence of his palace having been burned, as he supposed, by the Christians. (Mart. Hier., Ad., Us.) He is commemorated Oct. 2.

ELEUTHERIUS (19) (LEUTERIUS), a martyr at Paris with Dionysius the bishop, and Rusticus a presbyter, circ. A.D. 272. [DIONYSIUS (2).] He is commemorated Oct. 9. (Mart. Rom. Vet. Hier., Ad., Us.; Greg. Tur. Opp. append. p. 1383, in Patr. Lat. lxxi. 1198.)

ELEUTHERIUS (20), martyr at Tarsus in Bithynia, commemorated on Aug. 4. He was a active of Byzantium, a senator, and a chamberlain in the palace of Maximian at Nicomedia. Having embraced the Christian faith, but fearing to avow it, he procured some land beyond the Sangarus, where he built a house with an underground chapel handsomely fitted up with altar and silver lamps. He also employed a priest to minister in it, and here he was secretly baptized. He returned to court, but retired as often as possible to his retreat. The emperor, becoming suspicious, visited him there, discovered the crypt, learned the whole truth, and finally caused him to be put to death. (Basil. Menol. iii. 193; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. i. 318.) Tillemont identifies this martyr with Eleutherius of Oct. 2 (No. 18), but Papebroche argues against that view (Tillem. Mem. v. 25, art. ix.; Boll. ut sup. p. 320 c). [C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (21), mentioned by Baronius among the martyrs of Byzantium, A.D. 311. (Baron. Annal. ann. 311, xix.) [C. H.]

ELEUTHERIUS (22), abbat of St. Mark, at Spoleto, 6th century.

From him, whom he styles venerable father, Gregory the Great had the story of Isaac the Syrian (Greg. Mag. Dialog. iii. 14, in Patr. Lat. lxxvii. p. 244), who settled at Spoleto. Eleutherius was his authority for various anecdotes mentioned in the Dialogues, as that of the young noblewoman of Spoleto disinherited by her father for refusing to marry (Dialog. iii. 21), that of the possessed boy at a convent (iii. 33), and that of Eleutherius's own brother John having summoned with his dying breath the monk Ursus, then in a distant monastery, to follow him (iv. 35).

He was a greatly honoured friend of Gregory, who relates (Dial. iii. 33) his having raised one from the dead, which, however, he confesses to have only heard of from some of his disciples (u. s. 33). Gregory's own recovery through the abbat's prayers is also related by Adrian I. in one of his letters to Charlemagne, which is given in full by Baronius (s. a. 604, xxiv.). Eleutherius died in the monastery of St. Andrew's at Rome, where he frequently stayed, and, it is said, he expired in the arms of Gregory, c. A.D. 585. The Bollandists have much about him. (Act. Sanct. Sept. 6, ii. 685; see also Peter de Natal. Catal. SS. viii. 45, and the Martyrologies.) His body was first buried in St. Mark at Spoleto, but was afterwards removed to the church of St. Peter in that city (Act. Sanct. u. s.). [T. W. D.]

ELEUTHERIUS (23), exarch of Ravenna, c. A.D. 616, 620. He is called "patricius et cubicularius," and never actually "exarch," in the Liber Pontificalis, the only authority for his life, but there can be no doubt that he should be ranked among the exarchs. He came to Ravenna c. A.D. 616, and executed all who had been concerned in the death of his predecessor, John Lemigius. He then went to Rome, where he was well received by the pope Deusdedit. He passed on to Naples, where he defeated and killed John Campanus, who had set himself up as a rebel against the empire. He then returned to Ravenna and ruled for a time in peace. (S. Deusdedit, in Liber Pontificalis, Migne, cxxviii. 685.) About A.D. 620 we find that he set himself up as emperor in Italy; he was, however, killed (by his own soldiers according to one reading of the Liber Pont.), and his head sent to Constantinople. He was a eunuch, like one at least of his predecessors, and like the last of his successors. (S. Bonif. V. in Liber Pontificalis, Migne, cxxviii. 693; Paulus Diaconus, iv. 34; Ersch and Gruber, Encycl. "Exarch und Exarchat," xxxix. 1, p. 318.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELEUTHERUS (1), Bishop of Rome in the reigns of Marcus Aurelius and Commodus, during 15 years, 6 months, and 5 days, according to the Liberian catalogue. Eusebius (H. E. v. proem.) places his accession in the 17th year of Antoninus Verus (i.e. Marcus Aurelius), viz. A.D. 177; which date would involve A.D. 192 as that of his death. But the consuls given in the Liberian catalogue as contemporary with his election and death (a cons. Veri et Herenianus usque Paterno et Bradua) are those of 171 and 185. For a discussion of the most probable dates see "Lipsius, Chronol. der römischen Bischöfe."

Hegesippus, quoted by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22), states that at the time of his own arrival in Rome Eleutherus was deacon of Anicetus, who was then bishop, and that he became bishop on the death of Soter, the successor of Anicetus (cf. Irenaeus adv. Haeres. iii. 3, and Jerome de Vir. illustr. c. 22).

As is the case with the generality of Roman bishops of the earlier centuries, the episcopate of this prelate is memorable rather for contemporary events and celebrities than for anything certainly known of himself or his influence on the age. He was contemporary with the Aurelian persecution. There is, however, no evidence of the Church of Rome itself having suffered under it to any great extent; and after the death of Aurelius the Christians there, as elsewhere, are known to have had peace, in consequence, it is said, of Marcia, the concubine of Commodus, being favourably disposed towards them; the only recorded exception in Rome being the martyrdom of Apollonius in the reign of Commodus (Euseb. H. E. v. 21, Jerome, Catal. c. 42). The chief sufferers under Aurelius were the churches of Asia Minor and Southern Gaul. With the persecution in the latter region, which took place A.D. 177, and of which the Christians of Lyons and Vienne were the victims, the name of Eleutherus has become connected from the following circumstance. Eusebius has not only preserved long and interesting extracts from an account of the persecution, addressed by the Christians of Lyons and Vienne to those of Asia and Phrygia (H. E. v. 1), but states further that, opinions being divided as to the claims to inspiration of Montanus and his colleagues (Montanus having asserted his pretensions about the middle of the century), these same Christians of Gaul expressed their own judgment on the question, setting forth also divers epistles which had been addressed by their martyrs, while still in prison, to the churches of Asia and Phrygia, and to Eleutherus, bishop of Rome; which letter had been sent by the hands of Irenaeus, described as still a presbyter, "for the sake of the peace of the churches" (H. E. v. iii.).

The fact of the bishop of Rome having been especially addressed on this occasion has been adduced as an instance of the acknowledgment in that early age of his supreme authority. But neither do the letters of the martyrs to Eleutherus appear, from the narrative of Eusebius, to have had a different purport or purpose from those sent also to the churches of Asia and Phrygia, nor does their object in either case seem to have been to seek a judgment on the questions at issue, but rather to express one, in virtue, we may suppose, of the weight carried in those days by the utterances of martyrs. Their having addressed Eleutherus, as well as the churches where Montanus himself was teaching, is sufficiently accounted for by the prominence of the Roman bishop's position in the West, about which there is no dispute. Of the course taken by Eleutherus with respect to Montanus nothing can be alleged with certainty. By some he is supposed to have believed in him for a time, and countenanced him, the grounds of this supposition being these. Tertullian (adv. Prax. c. i.) states that a bishop of Rome gave credence for a time to the claims of Montanus and his two prophetesses, though his predecessors had condemned them, and issued letters of peace in their favour, but afterwards, after the arrival at Rome, and at the instigation of Praxeas (the author subsequently of the Patripassian heresy) retracted his temporary approval. Some have thought this bishop of Rome, whom Tertullian does not name, was Eleutherus, the supposition being supported by the statement of Eusebius that the mission of Irenaeus by the martyrs was "for the sake of the peace of the churches," from which it is concluded that they recommended conciliatory measures. This view is taken by Pearson, Cave, Valerius, and Neander. Others, however, as Tillemont, Bower, Giesler, and Milman (though the last of these somewhat doubtfully) prefer the supposition of Victor, the successor of Eleutherus, being the bishop referred to, as agreeing better with the probable dates of the rise of Montanism and of the arrival of Praxeas in Rome. Baronius supposes Anicetus, the predecessor of Soter, to be the bishop of Rome referred to, and accounts for his temporary approval of heretics by supposing the superior sanctity of their lives, for which they were at that time principally notorious, and not their errors, to have called forth his letters in their favour.

Montanism was not the only heresy that troubled the episcopate of Eleutherus. The Alexandrian and Syrian forms of Gnosticism developed by Basilides and Valentinus, and by Cerdo and Marcion, were at their height, and gained many adherents in Rome. Valentinus and Cerdo had come thither between A.D. 138 and A.D. 142; Marcion a little later, where, having attached himself to the Syrian Gnostic Cerdo, he developed his own peculiar system. According to Tertullian (de Praescript. Haeres. c. 30), both Valentinus and Marcion were in Rome during the episcopate of Eleutherus, under whom they were twice excommunicated, two hundred sestertia which Marcion had offered to the church being restored to him on his dismissal. Tertullian adds that Marcion again sought re-admission into the church, which was accorded him on condition of his bringing back with him those whom he had seduced into heresy, a condition which he accepted, but was prevented from fulfilling by death. There is, however, some difficulty in placing the sojourn in Rome of these heresiarchs in the episcopate of Eleutherus, Valentinus certainly, according to other accounts having died previously. (See Tillemont on Eleutherus.)

Besides these noted heresiarchs, Florinus and Blastus, two degraded presbyters of Rome, broached during the episcopate of Eleutherus certain heresies of their own, of which nothing is known except what may be gathered from the titles of certain lost treatises written against them by Irenaeus, viz. De Schismate, De Oydoadē, and Of Monarchy; or, that God is not the Author of Evil (Euseb. H. E. v. 14, 15, 20, Pacian ep. i.). It may be added that an important result of the visit of Irenaeus to Eleutherus in Rome was the opportunity afforded him of becoming acquainted with the prevalent heresies, against which he became the most distinguished champion.

More interesting to English Christians than anything else told about Eleutherus is the story related by Bede, connecting him with the origin of British Christianity. Bede (H. E. c. iv.) says: "Anno ab incarnatione Domini centesimo quinquagesimo sexto Marcus Antoninus Verus, decimus quartus ab Augusto, regnum cum Aurelio Commodo fratre suscepit: quorum temporibus cum Eleutherus vir sanctus Romanae ecclesiae praeeset, misit ad eum Lucius Britanniarum rex epistolam obsecrans et per ejus mandatum Christianus efficeretur: et mox effectum piae postulationis consecutus est, susceptamque fidem Brittanni usque in tempora Diocletiani principis inviolatam integramque quietam in pace servabant." He mentions the same story in his Chronicon, giving A.D. 180 as the date of the conversion of Lucius. This account of Bede's, written some 500 years after the event referred to, is the earliest mention of it found in any historian. Gildas, from whom Bede took most of his account of the early British Church, does not allude to it, but speaks in general terms of the earlier introduction of the Gospel into Britain, before the revolt under Boadicea, in the reign of Nero. But in the early recension of the Liber Pontificalis known as Catalogus Felicianus, and attributed to the year 530, and of which the earliest known codex (existing in the Vatican) dates from the 9th century, occurs the following statement: "Hic (i.e. Eleutherus) accepit epistolam a Lucio Britanniorum rege ut Christianus efficeretur per ejus mandatum." Now Bede, in the dedication prefixed to his work, mentions the Roman archives, examined personally by his friend Nothelm, as among the authorities for the early portion of his history. It seems pretty certain, therefore, that it was from the Roman catalogue referred to that he got his information, Gildas, his usual authority, being silent on the subject. In the hands of chroniclers after Bede the story receives several and growing additions. In the work called Historia Britonum, attributed to Nennius, a monk of Bangor in the 7th century, but now believed to have been written in the 9th, we find the name of the alleged King Lucius explained, as being the Latin equivalent of the Celtic name Llewel Maur, i.e. Magni splendoris. And to Bede's story is added that all Britain received baptism with Lucius. The Welsh poems called the Triads (believed to be later than the Norman Conquest) connect the story with Llandaff, saying that there "Lleirwg made the first church, which was the first in the isle of Britain, and gave lands and privileges to those who embraced the faith of Christ." The book of Llandaff also, written in the 12th century, repeats the story. In the same century William of Malmesbury and Geoffrey of Monmouth tell the tale with many details: the former, in his Antiquities of Glastonbury, connects the mission with that place, and from both together we learn that Elvan and Medwin were the messengers sent by Lucius to the Pope, and that they were by him consecrated bishops; that Fagacius (or Fagan) and Damian were the Pope's legates sent to Britain, and that three archbishoprics and twenty-eight bishoprics were founded in the island. A further connexion of the tradition with Llandaff is found in the dedication of certain churches in the diocese to Lleirwg, Ddyfan, Ffagan, and Medwy.

Thus the history of the story as far as we can trace it is this. It is found first in its simplest form in the Pontifical annals at Rome, in the 6th century. It is introduced into Britain by Bede in the 8th: it grows into the conversion of the whole of Britain in the 9th; it appears full-fledged, enriched with details, and connected with both Llandaff and Glastonbury in the 12th. What ground is there for believing in a fact for its foundation? The accretion of details is of course untrustworthy. Two suppositions involved in the story as told by Bede, that Lucius was king of the Britons generally, and that a mission from Rome to him was the main origin of Christianity in the island, are both untenable; the first, as inconsistent with the known political condition of the country under the Roman empire; the second on the ground that the resistance to Roman claims on the part of the British bishops when Augustin came from Rome A.D. 597, and the difference at that time of their customs from those of Rome point to some source of their Christianity other than Roman. Still the question remains whether the statement in the Felician catalogue may not be true, involving as it does no more than this: that a British prince called in Latin Lucius, having gained some knowledge of Christianity from Gallic or native believers, applied to Eleutherus for instruction in the faith, and that a mission from Rome followed. Some of the arguments adduced by those who discredit the whole story are inconclusive. 1st. It is said that Bede is at fault in his dates, giving A.D. 156 instead of 161 as the date of the accession of Marcus Aurelius, and being otherwise confused or inaccurate. But, even if the error above noticed could not be so easily accounted for by the resemblance between the Roman numerals CLVI and CLXI, chronological inaccuracies in the transmitter of a tradition do not invalidate the truth of the story itself, if otherwise probable. 2ndly. The silence of all general ecclesiastical historians is alleged: to which argument it may be replied that such a transaction as this may be supposed to have been between a bishop of Rome and an obscure British prince may easily have escaped the notice of such writers, or been deemed of less importance than to claim admission in general histories of the Church. But 3rdly. The silence of Gildas, and his apparent ignorance of the whole story, is a valid argument against its truth; as is also the entire absence of any mention of the mission to Lucius in the earlier edition of the Pontifical catalogue, viz. the Liberian, A.D. 354. Such complete silence on the subject of the early British and even Roman records suggests strongly the probability that the story was first fabricated at Rome in or before the 6th century, and owed its origin to the same motive that has caused many other successive additions to the Pontifical annals: the desire to trace the origin of all western churches to some bishop of Rome. On the other hand, it may be argued that there is nothing improbable in the original story itself, that it is more likely to have had some fact than pure invention for its origin, and that the Welsh traditions about Lleirwg, though unnoticed by Gildas, may have been ancient and genuine ones, independent of Bede's account. Lingard takes this view, laying stress on the dedication of churches in the diocese of Llandaff to Lleirwg and the saints associated with him, and supposing him to have been an independent British prince outside the Roman pale.

In confirmation of the truth of the story is alleged further the fact that, shortly after the time of Eleutherus writers first begin to speak of British Christianity. For Tertullian, Origen, and Arnobius are the first to allude to the triumphs of the Gospel, though partial, in this remote island. What they say, however, is quite consistent with the earlier, and other than Roman, origin of the British church; and it may be that it was the very fact of their having borne this testimony that suggested the idea of Eleutherus, a pope shortly anterior to their date, being the one to whom the mission might be assigned. It may be remarked in conclusion that undue heat has been introduced into the controversy on the subject from advocates of one or the other view being anxious, on polemical grounds, to prove or disprove the connexion with, and subordination to, Rome of the early British church.

In the Liber Pontificalis Eleutherus is said to have ordained that all kinds of food were to be allowed to Christians; and there is a spurious decretal attributed to him, addressed to the provinces of Gaul, containing this ordinance about food, with others about the trial of clerics by provincial synods, with an appeal to Rome. In some late MSS. of the so-called laws of Edward the Confessor there is also a letter from Eleutherus to king Lucius, undoubtedly spurious.

He is commemorated in the Roman Calendar on the 26th of May as a saint and martyr, having however no claim, resting on any ancient authority, to the latter title. [J. B.—y.]

ELEUTHERUS (2), a resident in a village of Lydia, by whom Lampetius, one of Chrysostom's partisans, was hospitably received during the persecution of the Joannites. (Pallad. Dial. p. 195.) [E. V.]

ELEUTHERUS (3), a martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia. Commemorated Sept. 27. (Mart. Hier., Wand.) Ferrarius says he was put to death during the reign of Hadrian, but this seems very uncertain (AA. SS. Sept. vii. 482).

ELEVARA (Chron. Centulens. iii. 29), martyr. [ELENARA.] [C. H.]

ELFAN (ELVAN) appears in the legend of king Lucius and his application to pope Eleutherus for instruction in the Christian faith. According to Bale he was surnamed Avalonius. As the account of Lucius is confused and very uncertain, that of Elfán or Elvan must be infinitely more obscure, though in monkish legend there is no hesitation in accepting him. [LUCIUS.] According to the Welsh Triads, and the Silurian Catalogues of Saints, the application was made to Rome by Lleufer Mawr or Lleurwg ab Coel ab Cyllin, otherwise more usually known as king Lucius, and Eleutherus sent four persons, named Dyfan, Ffagan, Medwy, and Elfán, to inform him in the Catholic truth. But Elfán is more generally spoken of as messenger, along with Medwy, from Lucius to the pope, as having received baptism and the orders of a bishop from Eleutherus, and then as having been sent back with two additional companions to teach his countrymen the faith. The Welsh authorities say that Elfán presided over a body of Christians at Glastonbury, where Harpfield says he was educated; but according to Jocelyne of Furness, he succeeded Theanus, and thus became the second bishop of London. As contemporary with pope Eleutherus, Elfán must be placed in the end of the 2nd century. Pitseus, following Radulphus Niger and Bale, attributes to him a work entitled De Origine Ecclesiae Britanniae, and Dempster caps this by saying he was the first who illustrated Scotch affairs, and wrote in the ancient Scotie tongue Historia Scotiae, lib. i., Descriptio Scotiae, lib. i.; but none of these is extant or otherwise known. (Baronius, Ann. ii. A.D. 183; Radulphus Niger, Chron. A.D. 119, § 37; Bale, cent. i. c. 19; Pitseus, *de Illust. Angl. ELFEIS (AILFYW, AILVYW, ELVEIS), Welsh saint of the 6th century, and son of Dirdan by Danaldwen, daughter of Gynyr of Caergaweh. The church of St. Elvis, co. Pembroke, is dedicated to him, and his name is probably derived from St. Ailbe, who may have baptized him when living at Menevia (Rees, Welsh Saints, 162-3; Williams, Emin. Welsh. 11).

[J. G.]

ELFFIN (ELPHIN) (1) was a saint of the college of St. Illtyd in the beginning of the 6th century. He was son of Gwyddno Garanhir ab Gorfynion, descended according to the Welsh tradition from Macsen Wledig (i. e. Maximus the Roman emperor of the West). In the Myvyrian Archæology, vol. i. 17, and more fully in the Cambrian Quarterly Magazine, vol. v. 200, there is a prose tale or Mabinogi, entitled Hanes Taliessin, which gives a weird-like account of the saving of Taliessin by Elffin from death in infancy and of Taliessin's gratitude, which among other things prompted the composition of De-huddiant Elphin, or The Consolations of Elphin (Myv. Arch. i. 20). This is in reality a romance, probably belonging to the 12th or 13th century. The Hanes Taliessin is also given, with a translation and notes, in Lady Ch. Guest's Mabinogion, iii. 321 sq. As Elffin and Elphin his name often occurs in the poetry of Taliessin. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 108, 236-37; Skene's Four Anc. Books of Wales, i. cc. 2-11; Williams, Emin. Welsh. 139.)

ELFFRYTT (Brut y Tywysog., text in M. H. B. 842), king of Northumbria, son of Oswy. [ALCHFRITH (1), ALDFRITH.] [C. H.]

ELFLED (Nennius, Hist. Brit. cap. 66, in M. H. B., 74 b, marg. Eanfled), daughter of Edwin king of Northumbria, an error for Eanfled, who had a daughter Elfled. [C. H.]

ELFLEDA (1) (AELSFLED, AELFLED), abbess of Whitby, daughter of Oswy king of Northumbria, and of Eanfled daughter of king Edwin. In 655 her father vowed that if he conquered Penda king of Mercia, he would dedicate his child to God's service, and send her from him full-handed as well. The victory was achieved, and Elfleda, then scarcely a year old, was set apart for a conventual life. Her father gave her a noble fortune, and sent her to the monastery of Hereteu (Hartlepool), over which Hild was abbess. After two years Hild acquired some ground at Streanaeshalch (Whitby), where she built a monastery, which became a house of renown. Thither Elfleda went, and there, first as pupil and lastly as abbess, she spent the remainder of her life. She died at the age of fifty-nine, and was buried at Whitby, where her father and mother were interred (Bed. H. E. iii. 24). In the management of her house Elfleda had for a long time the valuable help of Trumwin, sometime bishop of the Picts, who died and was buried at Whitby. (Bed. H. E. iv. 26.)

In the latter days of Wilfrid, Elfleda took a strong part in allaying the animosity against him, and it was chiefly her recollections of the last wishes of king Aldfrid which brought about his recall at the synod on the Nidd. Eddi, full of gratitude, calls the peacemaking abbess, "semper totius provinciae consolatrix, optimaque consiliatrix" (Vita Wilfridi, capp. xliii. lix. lx.).

Elfleda was a friend and a great admirer of Cuthbert. On one occasion he is said to have cured her of an infirmity with his girdle (Bed. Vita S. Cuth. cap. 23). In A.D. 684 she and Cuthbert had an interview on Coquet island, in the course of which he revealed to her the nearly approaching end of her brother Ecgrid, and his own elevation to the episcopate (Id. cap. 24). Elfleda also gave an account to the anonymous biographer of Cuthbert of a vision in which the saint had beheld Hadwald, one of the brethren at Whitby, carried up into heaven (Vita, inter Bed. Opp. Min. 280-1, and Bed. Vita Cuth. cap. 34).

Elfleda was commemorated in the calendar on Feb. 8. Cf. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 178-186. Her death in 713 is recorded in the Annals of Laureham, which call her Alfrede. (Pertz, Scriptt. i. 24; cf. Lappenberg, Hist. Eng. introd. p. xxxvi.)

[J. R.]

ELFLEDA (2) (AELFLEDA, AETHELFLEDA, ETHELFLEDA), a daughter of Offa king of Mer-

dia, married at Catterick, Sept. 29, 792, to Ethelred king of Northumbria, who was murdered in 796. (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 667; Chr. Sax. M. H. B. 337.) She is mentioned by Offa himself in a charter granted to Chertsey (Kemble, C. D. 151) under the name of Aethelfleda. She was known to Alcuin, who, in a letter addressed to her sister the abbess Ethelburga, recommends that she should retire to a monastery. (Ep. 59, Mon. Alc. p. 293.) In another letter he recommends his messenger to Elfleda, apparently, as "dilectissima domina." (Ep. 60; ib. p. 295.)

ELFTHRITHA (1) (AELFDRYDA), a lady mentioned in the letter addressed by Waldhere, bishop of London in 705, to archbishop Brihtwald. A witenagemot under Coenred, king of the Mercians, had lately been held, in which "the reconciliation of Elfthritha" was discussed. Nothing more is known of the matter; as the dates run, she may be identified with the abbess of Repton [ELFRIDA (1).] (See Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 275; Smith's Bede, app. n. 24, pp. 783, 784.)

ELFTHRITHA (2), a daughter of Offa king of Mercia, betrothed to Ethelbert king of the East Angles. (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 638.) She is not mentioned by Offa in the Chertsey charter (Kemble, C. D. 151) in which he names his other daughters, but she is described in the legendary life of St. Ethelbert as a noble and glorious virgin. (R. Cirencester, Spec. Hist. ed. Mayor, i. 286, 287.) Brompton (Twysden, c. 752) adds that she retired as a solitary to the marshes at Crowland, and that she prophesied that her brother Egfrith would reign only three years after Ethelbert's death. The author of the lives of the two Offas calls her Aelfleda. (Vit. Dun. Offa. ed. Wats, p. 24.) See ETHELBERT (3). There appears no authority for the spelling Elfida adopted by Hume. Florence writes it AELFTHRYTH (Geneal. in M. H. B. 630), and ALFRITHA (Ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 638 c); Richard of Cirencester (Spec. Hist. i. 286, ed. Mayor) writes ALTRIDA in the heading, and ALFRIDA in the text; Brompton (Chron. in Twysden X. Scriptt. col. 750. 39), ALTHRIDA. Among later historians, Turner (Hist. Engl. i. 414, ed. 1839) writes ETHELDRITHA; Lappenberg (Hist. Engl. ed. Thorpe, 1845, i. 235, 237), AETHELTHRYTH and (ib. 291, Stemma) AELFTHRYTH; Lingard (Hist. Engl. i. 144, ed. 1849), ETHELDRIDA.

ELFWAD (Chron. de Mailros, ann. 791, ed. Stevenson), king of Northumbria, son of Oswulf. [ELFWALD (2).]

ELFWALD (1) (AELFWALD), king of East Anglia. According to the Chronicle of Melrose, he succeeded Selred in 747 and died in 749, whereupon East Anglia was divided between Hunbeam and Albert. Simeon of Durham also states, without mentioning Selred, that Elfwald died in 749, when the kingdom was divided between Hunbeanna and Albert. William of Malmesbury is silent as to Elfwald, and states that Beorna (i.e. Hunbeanna) was preceded by Aldulf and Elcwold, and these two by Ethelwald (ob. 664). This last statement suggests the inquiry whether Malmesbury's Elcwold may not be identical with the Elfwald of the Chron. Mel. If he be, then this king and his brother Aldulf between them reigned eighty-five years (664-749), which is very difficult to conceive. Lappenberg assumes the identity, but does not appear to have observed what it involves. Hickes also assumes the identity and makes Beorna succeed in 690, so reducing the united reigns of the two brothers to the reasonable period of twenty-six years, but he does not attempt to justify his chronology, and is evidently dissatisfied with it. The 690 is probably conjectural. It appears preferable then to assume the non-identity of Elcwold and Elfwald, and to attribute to Malmesbury an omission of the two kings mentioned by the Chron. Mel., Selred and Elfwald. Hardy takes this line, making the succession run thus:—Ethelwald (ob. 664), Aldulf, Elcwold, Selred (ob. 747), Elfwald (ob. 749), Hunbeanna. The objection to this scheme would be that Selred, whom the Chron. Mel. reckons a king of East Anglia, was in reality king of the East Saxons. It is met by Hardy concluding that there must have been two Selreds. It might also be met by an alternative hypothesis, that one Selred ruled both the contiguous states.

In the correspondence of Boniface of Mainz occurs a letter to him from Elfwald king of East Anglia, variously written by the editors Ebwald (Migne), Aelbwald (Jaffé and Serarius), Aebwald (Wüdtwein). It is dated by Migne A.D. 733, and by Jaffé 747-749. The king assures Boniface that his instructions as to masses and the frequency of prayers shall be followed in the monasteries of his kingdom; that Boniface's name shall be held in perpetual memory in the services of the seven hours; that the royal bounty in support of the monasteries shall be regulated in accordance with Boniface's recommendation; that Boniface shall be regarded as their patron; that the names of those who through Boniface's prayers die in the faith of the undivided Trinity shall be introduced in the public prayers.

[ELCWOLD, EAST ANGLES.] In 747-749, the see of Elmham was occupied by either Ethelfrith or Eanfrith, and the see of Dunwich by Eardred or Eardulf, one of whom, if they are different persons, attended the council of Clovesho in 747.

ELFWALD (2) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 779, 780, 781, 783, 786, 788, 791, in M. H. B. 664 c, 865 a, b, 866 c, 867 a, b, 868 a; Chron. de Mailros, ed. Stevenson, 788, 793; ibid. ann. 791, ed. Gale, Scriptt. i. 139, where Stevenson has ELFWAD), king of Northumbria, son of Oswulf [ALFWOLD]. [C. H.]

ELFWIN (AELFUINI, AELWIN, ELWIN, ALFWINE), son of Oswy, and brother of Egfrid, kings at Northumbria. He was present with his brother of the dedication of Ripon minster (Eddi Vita Wilfridi, cap. 16). When Wilfrid appealed to Rome against the decision of Egfrid the courtiers derided him, and Wilfrid said that on that day year their laughter would be turned into tears. On that very day the corpse of Elfwin was brought to York amid the lamentations of the whole kingdom (Id. cap. 19). This took place in A.D. 679. Elfwin was slain in a battle between Egfrid and his brother-in-law Ethelred king of Mercia, near the river Trent, being then only eighteen years of age. By the intervention of Archbishop Theodore Egfrid was satisfied with the payment of a blood-mulct from Ethelred, and peace was restored (Bed. H. E. iv. 21; Sax. Chron. Flor. Wigorn. i. 35). [J. R.]

ELFWOLT (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 2017, in M. H. B. 788), king of Northumbria, son of Oswulf. [ALFWOLD.] [C. H.]

ELGAR, ST., the hermit, a life of whom is printed in the Liber Landavensis, p. 1. The life says that he was born in Devonshire, and taken by pirates as a slave to Ireland. He at last escaped to Bardsey, off Carnarvonshire, called in the British tongue Ynys Enlli, or the Island of the Current, from the violence of the current, now called Bardsey Race, between it and the mainland. The only dates mentioned are that Reotri, grandson of Conchor, was ruling in Ireland, and that North Wales was desolate for seven years (? by plague). His remains were removed to Llandaff, in 1120, after which date the life must have been written (see Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 161, who point out the very doubtful character of these lives. The legends are unhistorical, but the persons for the most part really existed). [C. W. B.]

ELGISTIL. (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. 615.) [ELWYSTYL.] [J. G.]

ELGUD lived in the latter half of the 6th century, but has no festival or church dedication. He was son of Cadfarch ab Caradog Fraichfras ab Gwen. Gwen is known as St. Gwendeline of Talgarth, and was daughter or grand-daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog (Rees, Welsh Saints, 150, 202, 280). [J. G.]

ELGWORED. [ELWARD.]

ELHAEARN (AELHAIARN, AELHAYARN, ELHAERN), son of Hygarfael ab Cyndrwyn of Llystinwennan, in Caereinion, Montgomeryshire. His festival is Nov. 1, and he founded Llanael-haiarn, Carnarvonshire, and Cegidva, or Guilsfield, Montgomeryshire (Myo. Arch. ii. 24, 41; Rees, Welsh Saints, 275; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 595; Williams, Emin. Welsh. 11). [J. G.]

ELHAFED, a clerical witness to the grant of the village of Bertus by "King Ithael in the presence of Meurig (Ithael's father), before the chieftains of Glewyssig, to bishop Berthgwyn," as bishop of Llandaff, in the end of the 6th or opening of the 7th century (Lib. Land. by Rees, 440-41). [J. G.]

ELI (ILI), a clerical witness to many grants to the church of Llandaff, while Berthgwyn and Trychan were the bishops, in the end of the 6th and beginning of the 7th centuries (Lib. Land. by Rees, 434 sq.). [J. G.]

ELIAB, deacon and martyr of Ethiopia. He was one of forty martyrs, viz.: two bishops, Abdas and Ebedjesus, sixteen presbyters, nine deacons, six monks, and seven virgins, who were slain on Saturday, May 15, in the sixty-sixth year of Sapor II. king of Persia (309-381), A.D. 375. Eliab was one of the clergy of a city called Cascara, of which Abdas was bishop. Eliab is commemorated in the Ethiopian calendar on December 2 (see Assemani Acta SS. Martyrum Orientalium et Occidentalium, 1748, part 1, p. 144; Ludolf, Historia Ethiopica, appendix; Robertson, Ch. Hist. i. p. 291). [J. W. S.]

ELIAN, Geimiad (the pilgrim), a Welsh saint, whose name is confused with that of Hilary. His churches at Llanellian, Anglesey, and Llanellian, Denbighshire (near the last of which is a famous well), were renowned for the cure of diseases. His wake was held in August (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 267). [C. W. B.]

ELIANUS (AELIANUS), the proconsul of Africa, before whom Felix bishop of Aptunga, the consecrator of Caecilian of Carthage, was tried, and acquitted on the charge of having been a "traitor," A.D. 314. Optatus (Migne, Patr. Lat. xi.; De Schismate Donat. i. 25) narrates the actual words of the proconsul's decision. Aelianus also received letters from the emperor Constantine about the conveyance of the African bishops to the council of Arles. (Ibid. Hist. vii. note b; Ceillier, v. 112.) [L. D.]

ELIANUS (AELIANUS), a pagan, with whom St. Gregory Thaumaturgus disputed. Certain expressions in the exposition of the faith that Gregory composed on this occasion were wrested by the Sabellians to the support of their heretical views, but St. Basil exposes the futility of their reasoning (Basil, Ep. 210, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxii. 316; Greg. Thaum. Frag. de Trin. in Migne, Patr. Gr. x. 1103, 1143; Ceillier, ii. 442.) [L. D.]

ELIANUS (AELIANUS), one of the leaders of the rebellion of the Bagaudae in Gaul, to subdue which the Thebaean legion was brought by Maximian from the East. Aelianus was slain in the battle which decided the fate of the rebellion. (Eutrop. Hist. ix. 20; Orosc. vii. 25; Baron. A. E. ann. 297, iv.; Martin, Hist. de France, i. 281; Ceill. Aut. Eccl. ii. 473.) [R. T. S.]

ELIAS (I) L, bishop of Jerusalem, A.D. 494-513; he was an Arab by birth and received his education with his friend Martyrius, also bishop of Jerusalem, in one of the Nitrian monasteries. Being driven from Egypt by Timothy Aelurus, the two friends took refuge, A.D. 457, in the laura of St. Euthymius, who received them with great favour, admitted them to frequent converse, and predicted that they would both be bishops of Jerusalem. Euthymius took them as his companions in his periodical retreats and administered the Eucharist to them every Sunday (Cyril. Scythop. Vita S. Euthym. nos. 94, 95). After a time Elias quitted the laura with Martyrius, and constructed for himself a cell at Jericho, which in process of time, by successive enlargements, became a monastery. The two friends met at Euthymius' death-bed in A.D. 473, though not present at his actual departure (ib. nos. 109, 110). Anastasius, the bishop of Jerusalem, having come down to the laura for the translation of the body of St. Euthymius, took Elias and Martyrius back with him and ordained them presbyters, putting them on the roll of the church of the Anastasis (ib. No. 111). Five years later, A.D. 478, Martyrius succeeded Anastasius as bishop of Jerusalem, and was followed by Sallustius in A.D. 486, who dying in A.D. 494, Elias became his successor. Moschus records that having practised total abstinence from wine as a monk he observed the same rule as bishop (Prat. Spiritual. c. 25). According to the practice of the time his residence became the nucleus of a collection of cells of ascetics, which developed into a monastery adjacent to the church of the Anastasis (Cyril. Scythop. Vit. S. Sabas, c. 31). At the time of Elias' succession to the patriarchate, the Christian world exhibited a melancholy spectacle of discord. There were at least four great parties mutually anathematizing one another. The church of Rome denounced the whole of the East as heretical, with the exception of the monks of Constantinople, who thought more highly of communion with the bishop of Rome than with their own bishops, on account of their refusal to recognise the excommunication of Acacius. The Eastern church, though comprehended under the general ban, and forced into seeming unity by the Henoticon of Zeno, was split into three by intestine divisions. While Alexandria and the bishops of Egypt subscribed the Henoticon and rejected the decrees of Chalcedon, the churches of Jerusalem, Antioch, and Constantinople, though also accepting the Henoticon, maintained these decrees, although for the sake of peace, they were unwilling to enforce them. Besides this, there was the extreme section of the Eutychians or Monophysites, as they now preferred to be called, known as Acephali, who regarded the council of Chalcedon as tainted with Nestorianism, and cherished the memory of Dioscorus and Eutyches. Elias, as a leader of the party of the centre, was in communion with Euphemius of Constantinople, and on his deposition and banishment, in 496, ostensibly on the ground of treasonable practices, he maintained communion with his successor, the gentle and peaceable Macedonius, on being assured of his orthodoxy, though without expressing his approval of Euphemius' removal, much to the annoyance of the emperor Anastasius. When the Monophysite party in Syria, under the leadership of Xenaias of Hierapolis, broke out into open insurrection, treating as heretics all who acknowledged the two natures, Elias was one of the chief objects of their attack. In A.D. 509 they demanded a confession of his faith, and Anastasius required him to convene a council to repudiate the decrees of Chalcedon. He declined to summon a council, but he drew up a letter to the emperor, containing a statement of his belief, accompanied by anathemas of Nestorius, Eutyches, Diodorus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia. This letter was entrusted to members of the Acephali to convey to Constantinople. When it was opened, it was found to contain an anathema against the two natures. Elias reproached the bearers with having falsified the document and thus laid him open to the charge, which he found it very hard to refute, of having condemned the council of Chalcedon (Evagr. H. E. iii. 31; Theodor. Lect. p. 561; Theophan. Chronogr. pp. 129, 130). Macedonius having been deposed A.D. 511, and Timotheus, an unscrupulous Monophysite monk, appointed to the see of Constantinople, Elias, whose principle appears to have been to accept the inevitable, and to go the utmost possible length in obedience to the ruling powers, seized on the fact that he had abstained at first from anathematizing the council of Chalcedon, as a warrant for joining communion with him and receiving his synodical letter. However, as on the former occasion, he with Flavius declined to acknowledge the justice of Macedonius' deposition, and with the same result. Communion with Timotheus was of no avail, unless they would recognise him as the rightful bishop. On their refusal, the long-stifled wrath of Anastasius broke out vehemently against his two feeble and wavering antagonists, and he availed himself of the ready services of Soterichus, bishop of the Cappadocian Caesarea, and Xenaias, to accomplish their ruin. In obedience to the emperor's directions, a synod was convened at Side, A.D. 512, to condemn the decrees of Chalcedon and remove the two unaccommodating prelates (Theophan. p. 131; Marcellin. Chronicon; Coteler, Mon. Eccl. Gr. iii. 300; Labbe, Concil. iv. 1414). Elias, in alarm, despatched St. Sabas to Constantinople to plead his cause with the emperor (Cyril. Scyth. Vit. S. Sab. No. 50). Meanwhile, he and his companion Flavius by their diplomatic address succeeded in breaking up the council before it had pronounced any sentence on them. After its separation they addressed complimentary letters to the emperor, couched in language which dissembled their real sentiments. By this mean compliance they succeeded in keeping their sees a short time longer. Their implacable enemies, Soterichus and Xenaias, furious at having missed their aim, represented to the emperor that he had been imposed upon by these adroit masters of language, who were really at heart supporters of the impious doctrines of Nestorius. Anastasius, ready to believe the worst of those who had repeatedly opposed his wishes, gave them permission to do what they pleased with the culprits. St. Sabas, however, had not yet left Constantinople, and pleaded the cause of Elias so effectually that Anastasius revoked the order for his deposition (Coteler, u. s. pp. 300-302). But all his concessions were in vain. Flavian's sentence of deposition was carried into effect, and Severus, the leader of the Acephali, having been made patriarch of Antioch in his room in A.D. 512, Elias steadfastly refused all token of communion with him. Once and again the synodical letters of the intruder and the act of deposition of Flavian were contemptuously rejected by the patriarch, together with the clergy and laity of Jerusalem (Evagr. H. E. iii. 33). St. Sabas supported them in their resolution. Severus complained to the emperor in strong terms of this insult. Anastasius, determined to bring matters to a point, despatched Olympus, count of Palestine, to give Elias his choice between submission or deposition. To damage his cause with the orthodox, the emperor put in Olympus' hands Elias' former letter, in which to save his see he repudiated the decrees of Chalcedon. Elias was now in a great strait. He lacked the strength for prolonged resistance. But for the earnest entreaties of St. Sabas and the monks of Jerusalem he might have yielded again, but, backed by their moral support, he persisted in his refusal, and was forcibly driven from his episcopal seat by Olympus, and banished to Aila, on the shores of the Red Sea, A.D. 513. He survived his banishment five years, breathing his last A.D. 518, during a visit of St. Sabas and other abbats, having previously, it was said, seen a vision which announced the death of his old enemy, the emperor Anastasius, and bade him follow in ten days (Moschus, Prat. Spirit. c. 35; Cyrill. Scythop. Vit. S. Sab. no. 60). Before he expired he gave directions for the government of the monasteries he had founded, the oversight of which he had continued during his banishment. He was eighty-eight years old at the time of his death. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. xvi.; Cyril. Scythop. Vita S. Euthymii, Vita S. Sabas; Joannes Moschus, Prat. Spirituel.; Evagr. H. E. iii. 31, 33; Theophan. Chronogr.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (2) II., bishop of Jerusalem, c. A.D. 760–797, of whom very little is certainly known. His see was invaded by an ambitious monk named Theodorus before A.D. 763. In this year Theodorus joined in the condemnation of Cosmas, bishop of Epiphania, on the charge of Iconoclasm (Theophan. p. 290). Theodorus also sent synodical letters to Rome, concerning the worship of images, in A.D. 767 and 769. Theodorus is charged with having secured the deposition of Elias, by accusing him of crimes to the chief-counsellor (πρωτοσύμβουλον) of Arelia, by whom he was thrown into prison, loaded with fetters, and banished. The date of his restoration is uncertain. He, together with the other patriarchs of the East, was represented at the second Council of Nicaea, A.D. 787, by Joannes, a presbyter, and Thomas, the provost of the convent of St. Arsenius, near Egyptia, Babylon. (Papebroch, nos. 167, 172; Leontius, Vita S. Steph. Sabaitae, c. 5; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 300.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (3) (AELIUS, HELIAS), bishop of Lyons, next but one after St. Irenaeus. No particulars of his life are known, but Gregory of Tours (de Gloria Confess. c. 62) relates a curious legend that a robber coming to spoil the corpse of Helias was seized in its arms and held fast till bound by the authorities and condemned to death; but the corpse would not let him be taken away for execution, and retained him until he was forgiven. (Gall. Christ. iv. 13; Gams, Ser. Ep. 569.) [R. T. S.]

ELIAS (4) (HELIAS), bishop of Sedunum (Sion, Sitten). In the island of St. Julius on the lake of Orta, not far from Lago Maggiore, rest the remains of Elias, who is venerated in that place as a hermit who brought the bones of St. Audentius into Italy. An ancient inscription, however, is said to have described him as bishop of Sion in the Valais. But his age is very uncertain. If, as some say, he succeeded St. Julius, he must have lived about the beginning of the 5th century, but others assign him a later date. The Sammarthani relate that he transferred the see from Octodurum to Sion, in consequence of the prevalence of floods in the former place. (Gall. Christ. xii. 735; Acta SS. 21 Mar. iii. 360.) [R. T. S.]

ELIAS (5) (HELIAS), a Syrian bishop, who, with several others, among them Macarius bishop of Laodicea, and John patriarch of Antioch, vainly endeavoured to dissuade Nestorius from persisting in his heresy (Epist. Joan. Ep. Antioch. ad Nestorium, s. f. Act. Co. Eph. A.D. 431, pt. i. c. xiv.). [JOANNES OF ANTIOCH.] [T. W. D.]

ELIAS (6), bishop of Balandus, or Blandus, a town of unknown position in the province of Lydia, present at the oecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 890; Mansi, vi. 1089.) [L. D.]

ELIAS (7), bishop of Seleuco-belus on the Orontes, in Syria Secunda. He signed the synodical letter of the bishops of Syria Secunda, addressed to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 551; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 922.) [J. de S.]

ELIAS (8), bishop of Majorca, A.D. 484. His name appears in that year among the suffragan bishops of the Sardinian see of Cagliari, who attended the colloquy held at Carthage between the Catholic and Arian bishops under the Vandal rule, by command of Hunnerich, king of the Vandals (see Dahn, Könige der Germanen, i. 250). In the 9th century the Balearic islands are found attached to the bishopric of Gerona; in the eleventh they were transferred to Barcelona. At the present time the bishop of Palma is a suffragan of the archbishopric of Valencia. (Villanueva, Viage Literario a las Iglesias de España, xix.; Gams, Series Episc. Harduin, ii. 875.) [M. A. W.]

ELIAS (9) (EGHIA), bishop of Peznouni in the canton of Dourouperan in Great Armenia, succeeded Isaac III. as catholicos or patriarch of Armenia. According to the list of Saint-Martin he ruled from A.D. 703 to 718. The same author gives Ardjiach as his birth-place. (Saint-Mart. Hist. Armen. i. 438; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1390.) [ARMENIANS.] [C. H.]

ELIAS (10), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia. [HELIAS.]

ELIAS (11), bishop of Rachlena in Phoenicia. He took part in the synod of the Phoenician province, held at Tyre, A.D. 518, to condemn the heresy of Severus. (Mansi, viii. 920; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 831.) [J. de S.]

ELIAS (12), bishop of Joppa, who in the synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 518, signed the letter of John of Jerusalem to John of Constantinople against the errors of Severus (Labbe, v. 191), and in A.D. 536, the sentence of Peter of Jerusalem against Anthimus (Ibid. 283). (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 628.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (13), bishop of Botrys in Phoenicia. He adopted the heresy of Severus, and was ana-thematized in the synod of Tyre, A.D. 518. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 827.) [J. de S.]

ELIAS (14) (HELIAS), bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, who signed the sentence against Anthimus in the synod of Jerusalem, A.D. 536. His name stands second after Peter of Jerusalem. (Labbe, v. 283; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 572.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (15), bishop of Hadriani (Ἀδριανὸς; Lat. version, Adrianopolis) in Bithynia, of which town coins are extant. He is mentioned in the accounts of the synod of Constantinople under Mennas, which condemned Anthimus, A.D. 536, though his name is found nowhere in the subscriptions. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 625; Mansi, viii. 879, 880 A.) [L. D.]

ELIAS (16), bishop of Areopolis (Rabbath-Moab), on the left bank of the river Arnon. Mansi's Greek text names the see Ἀρεωπόλις, but the Latin has Hadrianopolis, with Areopolis in the margin. Elias was present at the synod held at Jerusalem under the patriarch Peter, A.D. 536, and signed the sentence upon Anthimus. (Mansi, viii. 1173, 1174 A; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 736.) [J. de S.]

ELIAS (17), metropolitan of Thessalonica, c. A.D. 548 to 553, subscribed the profession of certain bishops concerning the three chapters, which is included in the "constitutum" of pope Virgilius addressed to the emperor Justinian (Mansi, ix. 64). At the fifth general council, Benignus bishop of Heraclea in Macedonia, one of his suffragans, acted as his proxy. (Mansi, ix. 389; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 38; Gams, Series Episc. 429.) [L. D.]

ELIAS (18) (HELIAS), bishop of Diocletianopolis. It is doubtful whether this was the see situated in Thracia or the one in Palestine. (See Wiltch, Handbuch der kirchl. Geographie, i. 172, and note 4, 210, and note 21.) Harduin mentions a third Diocletianopolis in Phrygia, which, as well as the other, it is now impossible to trace. An Elias, bishop of one of these sees, was present at the fifth general council at Constantinople, A.D. 553. Le Quien places him under the Thracian see as well as under the Palestinian, without deciding to which he belongs. Gams assigns him to both sees, as though there were an Elias in each that year. (Mansi, ix. 176 B, 392 c; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1164, iii. 646; Gams, Series Episc. 427, 453.) [J. de S.]

ELIAS (19), archbishop (or metropolitan) of Aquileia, c. 572, successor of Probinus. (Paulus Diaconus, iii. 14.) His predecessor, Paulinus, had fled before the Lombards in 568 to the island of Grado. Elias is said to have held a synod in 579 (in hoc castro Gradensi nostram confirmare metropolim), with nineteen other bishops, to confirm the translation of the see to Grado: (Chronica Patriarcharum Gradenium in Mon. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 393). According to this, probably the earliest authority, the synod appears to have been held in 582. This synod has given rise to much discussion. It is probably apocryphal, and the letter of Pelagius II. consenting that Grado shall be the metropolis of Venetia and Istria spurious. (Hefele, § 280; Mansi, ix. 929; and Jaffé, Regest. Pont. Idem. Spuria, cccxxii.) Troya upholds it (Cod. Dipl. i. 168). A full discussion of the matter is found in De Rubeis, Monum. Eccl. Aquil. p. 227.

Elias and others had been unwilling to subscribe the condemnation of the Three Chapters passed by the council of Chalcedon, and he was at the head of those bishops of Venetia and Istria who refused to hold communion with Rome on account of her views in the matter. Gregory the Great, then a deacon, interested pope Pelagius II. against them, and it is thought that he himself wrote them the letters which bear his master's name (Pelagii Epist. 3, 4, 5; Greg. Mag. Epist. ii. numb. 36). The authority for Gregory's authorship is Paulus Winfridus, A.D. 784 (Patr. Lat. xcvi.; De Gestis Langobardorum, cap. 10, xx.). The letters were unsuccessful, and Pelagius stirred up the exarch Smaragdus against Elias and three other Istrian bishops, Joannes Parentinus, Severus, and Vin-demius. Smaragdus dragged Elias from the basilica at Grado, and carried him off with his suffragans to Ravenna, where he forced him to communicate with Joannes, metropolitan of Ravenna, who condemned the Three Chapters. At the end of a year they returned to Grado. Their people and the other local bishops refused to communicate with them. Smaragdus afterwards fell into disgrace, and returned to Constantinople. A synod of bishops subsequently accepted Severus as their patriarch, on his recantation of his weakness in submitting to communion with the Catholic patriarch of Ravenna. Elias is said to have died about the time of Gregory's mission of Augustine to England. But the account of Paulus Winfridus Diaconus is obscure, and it is not perfectly clear that Elias was really dragged to Ravenna with the other bishops by Smaragdus. Baronius also points out his mistake in describing John, patriarch of Ravenna, as not in communion with the Roman see. (Paulus Winfr. Diac. de Gestis Langobardorum, iii. 26, in Patr. Lat. xciv. 527; Baronius, A.D. 586, 26; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. c. ann. 585, letters 686-688.) He was succeeded by Severus. [A. H. D. A. & W. M. S.]

ELIAS (20), bishop of Parenzo, in Istria, c. 558, of somewhat doubtful authenticity. (Gams, 799; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 785; Ughelli, Italia Sacra, v. 396.)

[A. H. D. A.]

ELIAS (21), circ. A.D. 640, bishop of the Jacobites and writer of a letter to Leo bishop of Charrae (Haran), in which he gives apologetic reasons for having passed from the faith of Chalcedon to the sect of the Monophysites. He mentions the work of George bishop of Tagrit against Probus and Philoponus, and his letter to the monks of St. Matthew. He also mentions Constantine bishop of Haran, and three books which he had written against the Monophysites (Assemani Biblioth. Oriental. i. 465, 466; Ceillier, xii. 100).

[W. M. S.]

ELIAS (22), bishop of Coria, signs the Decretum Gundemari, 610. (See GUNTHER; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 56; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 324.) [JACINTHUS.]

[M. A. W.]

ELIAS (23), bishop of Lilybaeum, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Hefele, § 307; Mansi, x. 867.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELIAS (25), bishop of Iconium, the metropolis of Lycaonia, present at the synod held at Constantinople A.D. 692, called Quinisexta or Trullana (Mansi, xi. 992; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1071). [L. D.]

ELIAS (26), bishop of Seville in the 8th century, appears thirty-seventh in the catalogue of the bishops of Seville contained in the Codex Aemilianensis in the Escorial (A.D. 962-994; see Gonzalez, Collectio Canon. Eccl. Hisp. praeft.). He is the second bishop after the Moorish invasion, and comes next after the traitor Oppas. [MARCELLUS.] (Esp. Sagr. ix. 124, 236.)

[M. A. W.]

ELIAS (27) CRETENSIS, bishop of Gortyna and metropolitan of Crete, at the second council of Nicaea, A.D. 787 (Labbe, vii. 39, 323, 661, 704). Several works are ascribed to him, especially a commentary on these nineteen orations of St. Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 1, 3, 4, 10, 11, 19, 23, 24-30, 33-37, 51, 52). The commentary is not continuous, but takes the form of explanatory notes on various words and expressions. These commentaries were first published in Latin by Billius, at the end of his editions of Gregory Nazianzen, the first of which appeared at Paris, in 1583; and in Greek by Albert Jahn, Berne, 1858, and in the Patrologia of Migne (xxxvi. pp. 737-902). Jahn has adduced a satisfactory proof (printed also by Migne, u.s.) that the author of the commentaries was a different person from the Elias who attended the council of Nicaea, in the fact that he quotes Basilus, surnamed 'ΕΛΑΧΙΣΤΟΣ (to distinguish him from Basil the Great), who lived in the first half of the 10th century, and his contemporary Gregorius (Oudin, de Script. Eccl. i. 649; ii. 428, 443). Jahn places this Elias in the middle of the 11th century.

To Elias is also ascribed a huge commentary in three volumes, on the Scala Paradisi of Joannes Climacus, MSS. of which exist in the collection of Cardinal Bessarion at Venice, and in the Coislinian and Chigian libraries. Nic. Comnenus mentions a work of Elias, de Moribus Ethnicorum (p. 213), also several series of answers to the questions of monks in cases of conscience, the whole of which Jahn considers variant forms of the Responsa ad Monachum Dionysium, printed lib. v. Juris Graeco-Roman. (pp. 335-341); (Oudin, de Script. Eccl. ii. 1066; Ceillier, ii. 691; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 641; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. viii. 430; ix. 525; xi. 615.)

ELIAS (28), bishop of Jabruda in Phoenicia Secunda, north-east of Damascus. He is known only by the mention in a Greek Codex of Joannes Damascenus. Gams places him in the 8th century. (See Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 846; Gams, Ser. Ep. 435.)

[J. de S.]

ELIAS (29). Sent from Egypt with some companions to minister to the necessities of the confessors in Cilicia. They were all arrested in the city of Ascalon by the spies appointed to watch the gates, and like those to whom they had come to minister were mutilated in their eyes and feet. Three of them, Ares, Elias, and Promus, were martyred. Ares was burned, Elias and Promus were beheaded by orders of Firmilian, governor of Palestine (A.D. 308), during the reign of Galerius and Maximian. They are commemorated Dec. 14. (Eus. Mart. Pal. x.; Ruinart, AA. Sincera Mart. 330; Mencol. Bas.; Baron. 307, xxiv.) [T. S. B.]

ELIAS (30) had also gone to Cilicia from Egypt with four companions; they were all arrested and brought before Firmilian. After they had been tortured, they were asked their names, and (doubtless because they had been originally named after some of the idol gods) they replied that their names were Elias, Jeremias, Esaias, Samuel, and Daniel. They were then asked what country they came from; their reply was that Jerusalem was their city. The judge, not understanding their meaning, thought that the Christians must be about to establish collectively a city in opposition to the Romans, and so he put them to further torture, hoping to gain information from them. Failing in this he caused them to be put to death (A.D. 309). They are commemorated Feb. 16. (Eus. Mart. Pal. xi.; Men. Bas.; Ruinart, 330; Baron. 308, iv.)

ELIAS (31), a priest who suffered martyrdom in Palestine during the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 309. On the dispersion of the Christians who were working in the copper mines, he was sent with three companions to the military governor, and on his refusal to abjure Christianity was burnt alive. Eusebius in his Mart. Pal. does not give his name, but it is mentioned with those of his fellow-martyrs in the Menaea of Basilus, 19th Sept. (Basil. Men. i. 53; Ceillier, iii. 13.)

ELIAS (32). [SEBASTE, FORTY MARTYRS OF.]

ELIAS (33), March 27 (Symeon Metaphrast.), Dec. 24 (Assemani). Martyr in Persia under Sapor II. A.D. 327 with Brichjesus and nine others. Ruinart and Tillemont would postpone this martyrdom to the persecution which began in A.D. 343, denying that there was any persecution at the earlier date. However the exhortation against persecuting the Christians contained in the letter of Constantine to Sapor looks as if a persecution had already taken place. (Euseb. Vita Const. lib. iv. cap. xi.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 691; Assem. Mart. Or. et Occ. i. 215.)

[G. T. S.]

ELIAS (34), a martyr of the 5th century. Commemorated Jan. 14. (AA. SS. Jan. i. 953; Ruinart, AA. Sincera Mart. 334.) [T. S. B.]

ELIAS (35), governor of a monastery for women, described as of Athribis in the Delta, an excellent disciplinarian (optimus exercitator) and an especial friend of unmarried females (amantissimus virginum). Having property at Athribis, he erected there a large monastery for the reception of vagrant persons of that condition under his own management, he being between thirty and forty years of age. He supplied all the wants of his inmates, about three hundred in number, and provided gardens and implements for their occupation. But they would not live in harmony among themselves, and in the discharge of his duties as peacemaker he was brought into close and frequent intercourse with them. So great did he find the snares of such a position for himself as well as for them that he one day fled in despair from the monastery. The same night he had a vision of angels, who so strengthened his mind while he slept that he awoke a different man, and soon returned to his charge, in which he continued for forty years, without any further annoyance from his carnal nature. (Pallad. Laus. Hist. viii. 35, in Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 1135.) [C. H.]

ELIAS (36), solitary near Antinous, capital of the Thebaid, 4th century. The same account of him is attributed to Palladius (Hist. Lausiaca viii. 51, in Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 1154), and to Rufinus Aquileiensis (Historia Monachorum, 12, in Patr. Lat. xxi. 432). The writer, whoever he was, saw him with his own eyes. They said he was about 110 years old, and that he had passed seventy years in that awful solitude, the horror of which no tongue could express. It was high on the bare mountains, approached only by a narrow and rugged path, hardly to be discovered by travellers. The place where he sat was a terrible cavern; and more horrid dread seized the minds of those who dared to look in. For from his extreme age he shook visibly in every limb. He was said to effect many cures. Nobody remembered the time when he had retired to this desert. He was believed to eat three ounces of bread daily, and three olives of an evening. In his youth he had only touched food once a week. [W. M. S.]

ELIAS (37), a solitary of Palestine, near the Dead Sea. His cell being near one of the chief roads, he shewed hospitality to all wayfarers who needed it. (Pallad. Hist. Laus. c. 110–111, p. 1026.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (38), abbat of a monastery in Syria, celebrated for his personal holiness and the wisdom of his rule. Alexander Acoemetes spent four years of his early life (c. A.D. 378) under his discipline, but left him on the plea that the precepts of the Gospel were violated in his community because what was necessary to supply the daily wants of the brethren was provided beforehand, and something was left for the wants of the morrow. (Bolland. Jan. 15, p. 1021, § 4–6.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (39), abbat and presbyter of Isauria, in the diocese of Antioch, towards the close of the 6th century. He sent Epiphanius, one of his monks, to Gregory I., A.D. 595, with an apology for not coming to him in person, on the plea of illness and old age, and a request that a copy of the Gospels might be sent to him, and a sum of money for his monastery: he also prayed that his messenger might receive orders. Gregory complied with all his requests, but detained Epiphanius at Rome, refusing to allow him to return to the monastery, on the plea that no one who had received orders in "this church" was ever permitted to leave it. (Greg. Ep. V. xiii. 38; Baron. 595, xxvi. lxxx.) [T. W. D.]

ELIAS (40), circ. A.D. 621, presbyter at Jerusalem. He is said by the writer of the Acts of Anastasius the Persian to have been in charge of the church of the Holy Resurrection; his holiness is spoken of in the highest terms; and it was to him that Anastasius (at that time named Magundat) was brought for baptism by his host the silversmith. Elias consulted Modestus bishop of Jerusalem, and then gave him the rite. (Symeon Metaph. Vit. S. Anastasii Persae, § 3, in Patr. Gr. cxiv. 778 c; quoted in Surius de Prob. Hist. 22 Jan. i. 362, ed. 1617, and in Baron. A. E. an. 621, xi.) [W. M. S.]

ELIAS (41) (HELIAS), president of Cappadocia, to whom on his entrance on his government Basil wrote, A.D. 372, to defend himself from the calumnies brought against him by his enemies in connexion with the hospital he had recently established in the suburbs of Caesarea. (Basil, Epist. 94 [372].) [BASILIUS OF CAESAREIA, vol. i. p. 291, b.] In the same year Basil wrote to Elias in behalf of an aged man, whose orphan grandson, only four years old, had been placed on the senatorial roll, thus compelling his grandfather to serve again (Epist. 84 [389]). Garnier and Ceillier are probably right in identifying Elias with the governor of Cappadocia, who to the grief of the province had been removed from his office after a brief rule, through the calumnies of those whom his highminded uprightness had displeased, in whose behalf Basil wrote in A.D. 372 to his early friend and fellow townsman, Sophronius, prefect of Constantinople (Epist. 96 [332]). Basil commends this governor most highly for his incorruptible integrity, his justice, his impartiality, his accessibility, as well as for the favour he had shewn to the Christians, and begs Sophronius to plead his cause with the emperor, and dispel the calumnies of his enemies. This governor is identified by Tillemont with Theresius, but was probably mistaken. [E. V.]

ELIAS (42) SCHOLASTICUS, an advocate of Cyrrhus, to whom Theodoret transmitted the chief of a band of robbers, named Abram, together with the persons he had plundered and the evidence of the case, with the desire that Elias would compel the evildoers to restore their plunder. (Theod. Epist. x.) [E. V.]

ELIAS (43), friend and slayer of Justinian II. A.D. 711. As the tyranny and cruelty of that prince grew darker, Bardanes and Elias, an officer in high command, conspired against him. Justinian, in the violence of impotent anger, had the children of Elias slaughtered in the bosom of their mother, and gave her to his own Indian cook, a monster, according to one MS., of deformity. After the defection of his fleet and army, and the death of his heir Tiberius, Justinian was found at Sinope by Elias, who cut off his head with his own hand. (Theophanis, Chronographia, 317, 318, 319, Patr. Gr. cviii. col. 368; Baron. Annal. ad ann. 711, v. viii.) [W. M. S.]

ELIAS, APOCALYPSE OF. An apocryphal work under this title was current in the 2nd century, and was supposed by Origen (35 in Matt. 27, vol. iii. p. 916) to have been the source whence Paul took the quotation, "Eye hath not seen," &c. (1 Cor. ii. 9). This view is controverted by Jerome, who refers the quotation to Isaiah lxiv. 4 (xvii. in Isaian, iv. 761 Vallar.; Ep. ad Pammach. 54, l. 913). See HIERONYMUS. It is no doubt the same work which is rejected, Ap. Const. vi. 14, and in the Synopsis Eccl. Script. ascribed to Athanasius, li. 154.

[G. S.]

KLIDIUS (1), ST., from whom one of the Bailly laie is named. The name is now corrupted into "St. Helen's laie;" but we find in William of Worcester's extracts from the Calendar of Tarbock, "S. Kldit episcopi 8 die Augusti. Jacet in insula Syllia;" and again, "Saint Lyda filius regis;" and see Leland, Rin. 3, p. 9. Some other chapels in Cornwall seem to be dedicated to him under the name of "St. Lyda," once in conjunction with the Irish saint, St. Ida, and hence Klidius also has been supposed to have come from Ireland. His name is sometimes confounded with that of Ley or Eloy, i.e. Eligius, bishop of Noyon (see Monasticon, i. 590, 1002, and Whitaker's Cathedral of Cornwall, li. p. 211).

[C. W. B.]

KLIDIUS (2), martyr. He was an acolyte of St. Praejectus (Pria), bishop of Clermont, and was slain with him and St. Amerinus at Volvic, in the Auvergne, as they were returning from the court of Childeric II. (874). He is commemorated Jan. 25. (See the second Vita S. Praejecti, cap. iii. 18-20, in Boll. Acts SS. Jan. ii. 633.)

[B. A. B.]

KLIEZER n. HYRCANOS, also called Eliezer the Great, or simply R. Eliezer, one of the most distinguished Jewish teachers during the 1st century of the Christian era. He was brother-in-law of Gamaliel II., who succeeded to the presidency of the Sanhedrin about A.D. 90. His father, Hyrcanus, who was a wealthy farmer, intended him to cultivate his estates, but he found that a quiet rural life was uncongenial to his active mind, and having felt an uncontrollable desire for study, he betook himself, contrary to his father's wishes, to Jerusalem at the age of twenty-two. Here he placed himself at the feet of the celebrated R. Jehanan b. Saccal, and soon became one of his most distinguished disciples. When Hyrcanus, a few years afterwards, came to the metropolis to disinherit his son for having acted contrary to his wishes, he found that Eliezer had already attained the position of a prominent teacher, and that well-known disciples attended his public lectures. Instead of discarding him, Hyrcanus now offered him all his property, but this Eliezer declined, declaring that he would only accept an equal share with the other children. His prodigious memory made him a living depository of the canon and civil laws, which were developed in the course of time, and which were orally transmitted from school to school for generations. His teacher, R. Jehanan b. Saccal, therefore aptly described him when he said that "he was like a well-cemented cistern, which never loses a drop of water" (Mishna Abot, li. 5). He moreover declared that "if all the sages of Israel were put in one scale, and R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanus in the deep originality, his independence of opinion, and his determination not to be overruled by majorities in matters of conscience, soon brought him into serious collision with the president and with his colleagues. Gamaliel, who feared lest the dissolution of the Jewish state and the dispersion of the nation, should bring about the loss of some of the traditional laws, and thus produce diversity of opinion, was determined to secure once for all uniformity of faith and practice. To effect this, the distinguished doctors of the law who constituted the Sanhedrin brought forward the different canons with their different interpretations, which were handed down in the respective schools, and the president ruled that the decision of the majority was to carry every point, and that it should henceforth be unalterably binding. The canon thus carried was at once shown to be implied or expressed in some verse of the Mosaic law by the elastic rules of interpretation or application which were in vogue in the time of Christ.

For such work of co-operation and compromise, Eliezer was ill-fitted. His principles of interpretation were adverse to those of R. Joshua, R. Akiba, and others who were distinguished members of the Sanhedrin. They maintained that every particle, to the very sign of the accusative (Nitz), represented some recondite law, and sought to be explained accordingly. He advocated the literal meaning of the Bible, and declared that when a canon obtained in the course of time, having been called forth by circumstances unforeseen in the Mosaic law, it should be regarded as an independent oral law, and no attempt should be made to foist it into the Bible. He moreover could not recognise the principle that the majority is infallible, and hence on one occasion would not abide by their decision, especially when the point at issue was a question of memory, involving the accurate record of ancient tradition. The immediate cause of rupture between him and the Sanhedrin was a difference of opinion about the treatment of an oven of peculiar construction. The majority decided that it comes under the category of earthenware, and hence is capable of defilement. R. Eliezer, who remembered an ancient tradition to the contrary, would not submit to the decision, and practically acted against it. For this insubordination R. Gamaliel II., the president of the Sanhedrin, his own brother-in-law, excommunicated him (Baba Metsia, 59 b).

The manner in which this Rabbi who lived in the Apostolic age was excommunicated, and the issues involved in it, as described in the Talmud, strikingly illustrate those passages in the New Testament where this penalty is spoken of (John ix. 22, xii. 42, xvi. 2; 2 Thess. iii. 14, 15). Before the sentence of excommunication was pronounced, the offender was admonished three times on three different occasions, generally on Monday, Thursday, and Monday. It was only when he persisted in the offence after these several admonitions that the excommunication was pronounced, which was called Nidui ("712), and S-muntha (71267). If the offender was present, the judge

It was only on very exceptional occasions that the nature of the guilt was publicly proclaimed, and that a horn was blown to announce it. If the offender was absent, the judge declared, "A. has the penalty of excommunication inflicted upon him," and the sentence was then conveyed to him by an official. If the offender died during the period of his excommunication without repentance and submission, the tribunal ordered a stone to be put on his coffin "to indicate that he who is excommunicated and dies in his excommunication is stoned in his coffin" (Mishna Eduyoth, v. 6). In the case of R. Eliezer, his own favoured disciple, R. Akiba, conveyed to him the sentence of excommunication, and the mournful narrative which records the event gives a vivid picture of the religious life and practices in the time of Christ. "Everything which R. Eliezer declared clean was collected and burnt with fire, then the majority of the members of the Sanhedrin was counted against him, and he was sentenced to excommunication. Whereupon the question was asked, 'Who will go and announce it to him?' R. Akiba answered, 'I will go, lest some inferior person should go and announce it, and thereby cause irreparable damage to the world.' R. Akiba then dressed in mourning, and wrapped himself up in black, and sat down on the ground before him at a distance of four cubits. R. Eliezer exclaimed, 'Akiba, why differeth this day from all other days?' He replied, 'Rabbi, it seemeth to me that thy colleagues have separated from thee.' He too, then, tore his garments, took off his shoes, left his stool and sat down on the ground, tears rolling down from his eyes" (Baba Metzia, 59 b). Never was so bitter a message conveyed in a more tender manner.

Thus excommunicated, R. Eliezer left Yamnia, and removed to Lydda and Caesarea, where he established schools, and had numerous disciples. The sympathy which the people felt with this distinguished scholar is seen in the public apology which the president of the Sanhedrin was obliged to make for his rigorous measure. When R. Akiba conveyed the sentence of excommunication to R. Eliezer, we are told R. Gamaliel was at sea. "A fearful storm arose against him, threatening to swallow him up. He exclaimed, 'It seemeth to me that this cometh upon me because of R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanos.' He then stood up and said, 'Lord of the Universe, it is revealed and known to Thee that I have not done it to exalt myself, or to exalt my father's house, but to exalt Thee, lest schism should take place in Israel.' Whereupon the sea became calm." (Baba Metzia, 59 b.) Though the storm of public opinion against the president of the Sanhedrin was thus allayed, the kindly feelings towards the learned Rabbi, discharged from his membership of the national assembly, increased in intensity. His schools, both at Lydda and Caesarea, were much frequented, and his teachings greatly influenced and moulded Jewish doctrines and practice in Palestine during the Apostolic age. His frequent intercourse with the disciples of Christ, and with the first preachers of the Gospel, tended to preserve feelings of amity between those of his brethren who believed, and those who did not believe, that Jesus was the Christ, thus affording a peaceable platform for discussion of the claims to the Messiahship of Him who was sentenced to death by some of the same members of the Sanhedrin which afterwards excommunicated R. Eliezer. As it is of the utmost interest and importance to the student of ecclesiastical history and theology to know what doctrines were propounded by eminent expounders of the law, and what were the phases of faith which competed with the teachings of the Apostles in the infancy of Christianity on its native soil, we subjoin a brief summary of the sayings and doings of this excommunicated member of the Sanhedrin.

The cardinal doctrines which R. Eliezer urged on his disciples were absolute faith in the goodness, justice, and mercy of God as our heavenly Father, and a corresponding filial confidence in Him, which should manifest itself in loving Him above all things, in walking before Him in holiness and righteousness, in scrupulously obeying His commandments, and in living a life of union with Him from whom all our blessings flow, and from whom no evil can proceed, who punishes the evil-doer, but shews mercy to the penitent. On the passage "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy wealth" (Deut. vi. 5), he remarks, "Why this treble expression of heart, soul, and wealth?" It is to teach thee that there are some who love life more than mammon, and that there are others who love mammon more than life. Now, the love of God is to be above both life and wealth" (Pessachim, 25 a). Man should pray for his daily bread. To be anxious for the future betrays a want of confidence in the goodness of God, and is evidence of little faith. "He who hath still bread in his basket and saith what shall I eat to-morrow, belongeth to those of little faith" (Sota, 48 b). This is a striking illustration of Matt. vi. 30-34. Next to the love of God he laid the greatest stress on the reverence and obedience due to parents. He was once asked, "To what extent is the honouring of parents to go?" To which he replied, "Go and learn it from a heathen who resided at Ashkelon, and whose name was Dama b. Nethina, what he did. The sages came to him to buy precious stones for the ephod for a very large sum, but the key of the box containing them was under the pillow of his father, who was asleep. The son refused to wake his father, though he thereby lost the sale of the costly gems" (Babylon Kiddushin, 31 b, with Jerusalem Pea, i. 1). Equally exalting were the lessons which he inculcated about the sacred jealousy with which the honour of our fellow-creatures is to be guarded. "Let the honour of thy fellow-man be as precious to thee as thine own, and be not easily provoked" (Aboth, ii. 10). In opposition to the celibate practices which obtained among the Essenes, and which began to find favour among the Jews generally immediately after the destruction of Jerusalem, he laid it down that "he who abstains from marriage and propagating the race is like one who commits murder" (Yebamoth, 63 b). The exalted idea which he inculcated into the minds of his disciples about the sanctity of marriage, and his denunciation of being influenced by wealth or rank in contracting this sacred tie for their children to the disregard of the disparity of the respective ages, may be gathered from his remark on Levit. xix. 29: "Do not prostitute thy daughter, to cause her to be a whore," he declares; "this refers to one who causes his young daughter to be married to an old man."

(Seder Shema, 76 a). He moreover urged that girls should be well educated and be instructed in the divine law (Seder Shema, 30). Considering the general condition of women in the East and the opinion which some of the doctors of the law shared in common with other nations of antiquity on this subject, it will be seen how far R. Eliezer's teaching was in advance of the age, and how it harmonises with the teaching of the gospel. Again he maintained that Gen. ix. 5 denotes "Your blood I will require from your person," deducing from it that the Mosaic law forbids suicide (Seder Kema, 91 b), which contradicts the statement of Josephus, that it positively enjoins it under certain circumstances (War, III. viii. 9; Vil. viii. 7; with I. xiii. 10). He deprecated the practice of offering up fixed, formal, and lengthy prayers, declaring that "he who offers up his prayer as something fixed, his prayer is not with devotion," and he has bequeathed the model of a collect for travellers, which for terseness, earnestness, beauty, and brevity would do honour to any liturgy. "Let Thy will be done in heaven above, and grant a contented mind to those who worship Thee here below, and do Thou what is pleasing in Thine eyes. Blessed art Thou, O Lord, who hearest prayer" (Seder Shema, 98 b). To him, moreover, biblical students are partly indebted for Aquila's Greek version of the Old Testament, for we are distinctly told that "Aquila the proselyte made the translation under the auspices of R. Eliezer and R. Joshua, and they praised him for it" (Seder Shema, i. 9). Prompted probably by a discussion on Christ's conduct in acquitting the woman taken in adultery, thus apparently setting aside one of the laws of Moses on adultery, R. Eliezer wanted to know if Christ also interpreted another law on the same subject with equal leniency. He relates the story as follows. "Once upon a time I was walking in the upper street of Zipporith when I met one of the disciples of Jesus of Nazareth, whose name was James, of Kapher-Sachala. He said to me, 'It is written in your law thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore into the house of the Lord thy God' (Deut. xiii. 18). May a water-closet be made with it for the high-priest? This question I could not answer. Whereupon he said to me, 'Jesus of Nazareth taught me thus on the subject. It is written she gathered it of the hire of an harlot, and it shall return to the hire of an harlot (Micah i. 7); that is, it came from an impure source, and it may be applied to an impure use.' When I heard this explanation, I was pleased with it." (Aboda Zara, 17 a.) This James is also mentioned as having offered to cure a nephew of R. Ishmael of the bite of a serpent, but the rabbi, not being so liberal as R. Eliezer, declined his services (Aboda Zara, 27 b).

the Mishna, but has not cultivated personal intercourse with the sages and the doctors of the law, is an Am Ha-Arel = ignorant." But with all his appreciation of their unity, he almost fathomed the depth of theological error, and no modern antirist could more witheringly chastise this undivine spirit of divinity than R. Eliezer did in his earnest advice to his disciples. "Warm thyself at the fire of the sages, but beware lest thou come too near their glowing coals and burn thyself, for their life is the bite of a jackal, their sting is the sting of a scorpion, their blessing is the blessing of a venomous serpent, and all their words are like burning coals" (Abot, ii. 10). Towards God he admonished that we should cultivate a spirit of increasing devotion. The cry "repent" which was raised by John the Baptist, was urged by him with the earnestness of voice of a dying man to his dying fellow-creatures. "Repent one day before thy death" (Abot, ii. 10) was his watchword. But as it is impossible to say on which day we may die, we are to repent daily. This he not only preached, but practiced. At Caesarea, which was the last scene of his active life, he felt that he was called to his everlasting home. In the presence of his former colleagues and friend, but now his great opponent, the learned R. Joshua b. Chanina, he put the phylacteries on his arm and hand to meet his Creator. Arrayed in those symbols of prayer, which had the name of the Lord inscribed on them, and in this attitude, he gave up his spirit to the Father of all spirits about A.D. 118-120. R. Joshua embraced the lifeless body, took off the phylacteries and cried, "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel," in allusion to 2 Kings ii. 12. He annulled the sentence of excommunication, and the body was removed with great obsequies to Lydda. Here, where he first established a school, and where he delivered public lectures on a stone in an old raccourse, R. Akiba, who conveyed to him the sentence of excommunication, delivered a most solemn funeral oration. R. Joshua kissed the stone on which he used to lecture, exclaiming "This is Mount Sinai, and the man who sat on it was like the ark of the Lord," and the whole nation said, "With the death of R. Eliezer the book of wisdom is buried" (Babylonian Sanhedrin, 68; Jerusalem Shabot, ii. 7).

As he is often quoted in the Mishna and in the Talmud by the simple abbreviation ר' ע' ר' E. Elizer , and as there was a R. Elizer of a later period, who is likewise quoted by the initial ר' ע' R. Elizer , the two have often been confounded. To guard against this confusion, it is to be remarked that when the name occurs in full, that is, when R. Elizer & Hyrcanus is meant, it is spelt ר' ע' with Yod, and when R. Elizer & Shimon is meant it is spelt ר' ע' without Yod. If the abbreviation ר' ע' is used, which is the same for both, it is to be distinguished by the association of other names. When the names of R. Joshua, R. Gamaliel, and R. Akiba are associated with ר' ע' , R. Elizer is meant, and when it occurs in connexion with R. Meier or R. Jehudah, Elzer is intended (comp. ELIFANTUS (ELEFANTUS, ALEFANTUS), thirty-third archbishop of Arles, between Rattbertus, or, according to Le Cointe, Arladiis, and Johannes II., was one of the subscribers at a synod held in the church of St. Just, at Narbonne, in the year 788. At the council of Frankfort, in 794, a long standing difference between the sees of Arles and Vienne, concerning the limits of their metropolitan jurisdiction, which had broken out afresh between Elifantus and Ursio of Vienne, was settled by the eighth canon, giving to the former nine suffragan sees (Le Cointe, Ann. Ecol. Franc. tom. vi. ann. 791, n. xl.; Gall. Christ. i. 545; Labbe, Sacros. Conc. ix. 4, 103.) [S. A. B.]

ELIFIUS, martyr. [ELIPHIVS.]

ELIGIUS, bishop of Noyon (640-648), saint. The only authority is the Vita S. Eligii, Novio mensis Episcopi, auctore Dadone sive Audono, Episc. Rotom. The extant biography is really a later work, modelled perhaps upon the original of St. Ouen. It is printed in the 2nd vol. of D'Achéry's Spicilegium, and extracts from it in Bouquet, vol. iii. pp. 552-561. A French translation, with notes, etc., has been published by M. Charles Barthélemy, being the first part of his Études Historiques, etc. sur le vi^e Siècle, Paris, 1847.

Eligius was a native of Aquitaine, born near Limoges. A skilled worker in gold, he emigrated to the Northern Frankish land, where, by his construction of a chair of state, he won a place at the court of Clotaire II. He was equally in favour with Dagobert I., Clotaire's son. He continued to work at his art, but acquired at the same time great fame for piety and humility. His generosity was exhibited in the ransoming of slaves; when a band of captives arrived, "of Romans, Gauls, and Britons, nay of Moors and above all of Saxons," he would buy the freedom of them all. He is described by the biographer as tall, of high colour, bearded, with finely-shaped hands, and of graceful figure. Whilst still a layman he founded and built the monastery of Solemniac, near Limoges, besides numerous churches. In 640 he was ordained a priest and consecrated bishop of Noyon. His diocese comprised all the semi-heathen lands to the north, principally inhabited by the Frisians; to their conversion and to the permanent establishment of Christianity by the foundation of churches and monasteries he devoted himself unremittingly. In 658 Eligius died, but was not buried until a contention had arisen over his body at Noyon. Both in life and after death, according to the biographer, he was a great miracle-worker, and largely endowed with the gift of prophecy. The sermon in the Vita (ii. 15) is really taken from the works of Caesarius of Arles. The festival of Eligius is on the 1st of December. The Officium S. Eligii is given by Barthélemy, pp. 464 sqq. For much legendary matter connected with Eligius, see Annales de l'Eglise Cathédrale de Noyon, par Jacques le Vasseur, Paris, 1633. Compare also for his place in the conversion of the Frisians, Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands, ii. p. 508. [T. R. B.]

ELILEUS. Given by Epiphanius (Hæc. 26, p. 91) as the name of one of the seven ruling spirits in one of the Gnostic systems. This name does not occur in the corresponding lists (Irenæus, i. 30; Origen, adv. Cels. vi. 31), but it may be compared with the name ELELETH (Irenæus, i. 29). [G. S.]

ELIMAS, martyr. [ELYMAS.]

ELINANDUS I. (EBRELINDUS, EBRETINGUS), fourth bishop of Laon, between Gondulphus and Robertus I. (Gall. Christ. ix. 510.) [S. A. B.]

ELINED (ÆLIVEDHA, ALÉD, ALMEDHA, ELEVETHA, ELUNED, LUNED, LUNETTE) is given in the Pedigrees of Welsh Saints as "daughter of Brychan in Crug Gorawal," but she is more likely to have been a grand-daughter. Her festival is on August 1. The chief authority on her life is Giraldus Cambrensis, who (Itin. Camb. i. c. 2) mentions the site of her chapel on the top of a hill, called Penginger, near the town of Brecon or Brecknock (Aberthotheni), where, "rejecting the proposals of marriage of an earthly prince and espousing herself to the Eternal King, she triumphed in happy martyrdom." This hill is identified with Slwch, where there was a roofless chapel in the end of the 17th century, and the saint locally called Tayled (i. e. St. Ayled). The hill may have received the descriptive title of Crug Gorawal or Gorseddawl, the hill of Judicature, a name connected with Elined in the Myvyrian Archaeology. In the Arthurian legends of the 12th century this maiden has her praises celebrated, and by the Welsh bards she is called Luned, while in the French romances of the same period she is better known as Lunette. By the former name she appears as one of the leading characters in the Mabinogi, The Lady of the Fountain, given in Lady Charlotte Guest's collection, and by the latter in that of Gareth and Lynette, reproduced by Tennyson. It is most probable also that Elined is the same as the patient and faithful Enid, daughter of Earl Ynywl, whose beauty and noble bearing the Romancists seem never tired of extolling, as in the Mabinogi, Geraint ab Erbin, in the same Collection of Mabinogion. "Enid, Yniol's only daughter," is one of the sweetest characters of Tennyson's Idylls of the King. In the Mort d'Arthur (b. vii. c. 36) Lynet is sister of dame (or lady) Lyones, and King Arthur makes Sir Gaherys "to wedde the damoyssel saueage that was dame Lynet," probably named the "damoyssel saueage" from the properties and effects ascribed to her magical ring, which was one of the thirteen varieties of the royal jewels of Great Britain. (Girald. Camb. Itin. Kamb. vi. 32; Myv. Arch. ii. 41; Rees, Welsh Saints, 149-50, 318, 325; Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 600; Williams, *Emin. St. Elined is the Ælivedha of Giraldus Cambrensis (Itin. Kambriae, 1, c. 2, p. 82). St. Almedha's day is August 1 (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 149). See Acta Sanctorum, August 1, vol. i. p. 70, where she is assigned to the 6th century. Perhaps the name of Elyw, who has given name to Llanellieu, Brecknockshire, and Llanelly, in the same county, where her wake is held on the

Sunday next before August 1, O. S., only an abbreviation of Elined (Rees, 156). [C. W. B.]

ELIPANDUS, archbishop of Toledo and primus of Spain under Mahometan rule, in the later part of the 8th century, is generally regarded as the father of Adoptionism, a Nestorianizing heresy which taught a double sonship of Christ, corresponding to his two natures, one by nature and one by adoption (hence the name of this heresy). He was already eighty years old when he broached his view. For this reason, and for his inferior learning, Neander (Church History, vol. iii. p. 317, Germ. ed.) ascribes the authorship of this theory to the younger and abler Felix of Urgel. But Elipandus had previously a controversy with the Spanish bishop Megetius on the Trinity which probably contained the germ and occasion of Adoptionism (comp. Baur, History of the Doctrine of the Trinity and Incarnation, vol. ii. p. 131). Elipandus appears in his actions and few writings as a violent, ill-tempered, intolerant and overbearing prelate. He was repeatedly condemned, but remained true to his opinion, and escaped deposition, not being subject to a Christian government. On his history and doctrine, see art. ADOPTIONISTS, where also the literature is given. [P. S.]

ELIPHIUS (ELIFIUS), martyr at Toul, on the Moselle, in the West of France, is said by Cratepolius to have been the son of Fincormac, a king of Scotia (Ireland), and to have suffered martyrdom at or near Toul, along with his brother Eucharius and his sisters Libaria and Susanna, in the Christian persecution by Julian the Apostate. There is scarcely a doubt to be entertained as to his Irish paternity being an error; the other details of his life and death may be generally accepted as true, though we have no exact agreement as to his place of birth, the probability being that he was a Gaul of the neighbourhood of the Toul. Ussher places his death in the year 362, and his memory is kept on Oct. 16. Ussher also gives a catena of continental authorities on his life, and Surius (Vit. Sanctorum, vol. iv. Oct. 16) prints Abbot Rupert's Vita Eliphii (Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 16, wks. vi. 336-39; Baronius, Ann. Eccl. i. A.D. 362, § 256; Camerarius, de Scot. Forb. 199; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 6 sq.; Tanner, Bibl. 258). Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 247) of course regards him as a Scotchman, and calls him the author of Exhortatio ad Martyres, lib. i. [J. G.]

ELISAEUS (1) (ELISHA, surnamed VARTABED, i.e. Doctor, Magister, Rabbi), bishop of the Amadunians, an Armenian writer of the 5th century. Sprung from noble blood, he was early instructed by Isaac or Sahag, patriarch of Armenia, as well as by Mesrob, the author of the Armenian alphabet, cir. 406, and these eminent men, by sending their pupils, Elisaëus among them, to complete their studies at the most famous schools of Greece, became the founders of Armenian literature. Elisaëus was appointed secretary to the Armenian general Vartan, to whom he was related, and either at the same time or, as is more probable, afterwards became bishop of the canton of Arakadsoden, near mount Ararat, the people of which were named Amadunians, after the princely house that ruled the district. Elisaëus as bishop of the Amadunians was one of the eighteen fathers of the Armenian church who assembled in synod at Ardashad, the capital, in 450, and in reply to the persecuting edict of Isdegerde king of Persia (to whom Armenia was then subject), signed a truly noble manifesto of the Christian faith and their resolution of adhering to it. An insurrection, headed by Vartan, followed. Vartan perished, and Elisaëus was compelled to fly. In his exile the bishop composed the work on which his literary fame rests, The History of Vartan and the Battle of the Armenians. About A.D. 480 he was in Persia, where he had some relations with the Nestorian Barsumas, to whom he presented another work (now unknown) which he had then written, a History of the Armenians. In his old age he lived a retired life in the canton of Ershedunik (also written Erheschdouni and Reschdouni) on the southern shore of the lake Van.

The History of Vartan was first printed in 1764 at Constantinople. In 1830 an English translation by professor C. F. Neumann of Munich was brought out by the Oriental Translation Fund (Murray). In 1840 Giuseppe Cappelletti published an Italian version under the title Eliser, storico Armeno (Venice), and in 1844 a French translation by G. K. Garabed came out, entitled, Soulèvement National de l'Arménie Chrétienne (Paris). To the valuable preface of Neumann and notes of Garabed this article has been chiefly indebted. The History of Vartan is not the only work of Elisaëus in existence. There is appended to it and included in the translation a panegyric on the monastic life, containing many interesting historical notices. Professor Neumann mentions other works, unprinted according to his belief, namely, exegetical illustrations of Joshua, Judges, the fourth book of Kings, and the Lord's Prayer, besides numerous sermons. [T. W. D.]

ELISAEUS (2), bishop of Arezzo, 713. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 73; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 410.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELISAEUS (3), bishop of Bologna, c. 716. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 471; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 11.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELISAEUS (4), thirtieth bishop of Noyon, following St. Eunanus and preceding Adalfrédus, is only known as one of the recipients of a letter of pope Zacharias addressed to Boniface and various other Gallic and German bishops, which may be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 948. (Baron. an. 748. xiii., Gall. Christ. ix. 986.) Le Cointe (Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 748, n. lxix. vol. vi. p. 199) says he was made bishop of Tournai and Noyon in A.D. 747. [S. A. B.]

ELISAEUS (5), forty-third bishop of Auch, or Aux, succeeding Galinus and followed by Joannes, about the close of the 8th century. Nothing is known of him but the name, and even that is not found in the list of Gams, the place being filled by Mainfroi (Manfredus). (Gall. Christ. i. 977; Gams, Series Episc. 497.) [S. A. B.]

ELISENIUS, a Cretian, is placed by Spota-wood (Hist. Ch. Scot. p. 5, A.D. 370) among the companions of St. Regulus, but the name is probably a mistake for CRISENIUS. [J. G.]

ELISSAEUS (1), bishop of Diocletianopolis, in Palaestina Prima, one of the forty-three bishops who signed the semi-Arian formula at Seleucia, in A.D. 359. Adrian Reland has been cited without reason for an opinion that this bishop was called also Epictetus. (Epiphan. Haeres. lxxiii. No. 26, p. 874; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 645; Reland, Palest. Illustr. ii. 736.) [E. V.]

ELISSAEUS (2), a priest, who, by the eighth act of the council of Seville, A.D. 619, was condemned to slavery as a punishment for his ingratitude, because, having been made free by the kindness of his bishop, he had broken the canons and discipline of the church, and had entered into plots against his bishop. (Mansi, x. 550; Ceillier, xi. 915.) [L. D.]

ELITHIR (AILITHER, AILITIR, ALITHERIUS, ALITHERUS, ELITIR, EULITHERIUS). There are three of this name in the Irish kalendars, and though the word signifies a pilgrim, yet it seems at an early period to have become a proper name. Adamnan (Vit. S. Col. i. c. 3) and O'Donnell (Vit. S. Col. iii. c. 17) mention that when St. Columba was founding Durrow, he paid a visit to the brethren in the monastery of Clonmacnoise, where Alitherus, Alitherius, or Ealitherius was then abbat. This was the fourth abbat; he died A.D. 599 (Ann. Tig.), and belonged to Muskerry in Munster (Reeves, Adamnan, 24 n.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, Jan. 7, i. 100). Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 373 n. 28, 434 n. 16) says he is the Alitherus or Elithir of May 12, but on that day Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 125) has "Elitir, of Muic-inis, in Loch Derg-derc," and Mart. Tallaght "Ailitir Muccinsi;" Muic-inis is now Muckinish in Lough Derg, on the Shannon. Elithir of Cluaingeisi is commemorated in the kalendars on April 25, but without farther notes for identification or place in history. And at Dec. 23 there is the commemoration of the Twelve Pilgrims of Inis Uachtair ("Da Ailitir dec inise uachtair," Mart. Tallaght), now Upper Island, in Lough Sheeling. [J. G.]

ELIUD, a Welsh saint. [TEILO.]

ELIZABETH Thaumaturga, or the wonder-worker, commonly called of Constantinople. A short account of her is given in the menology of the emperor Basilius Porphyrogenitus, who lived in the 10th century. She appears to have flourished long before; no date is given and few details, except the usual general tributes to piety. The principal characteristic related of her is that during the whole course of her life she never once washed her body with water. For three whole years also she never looked at the sky, in order to fix her mind more uninterruptedly on the invisible heaven. (Basil. Menolog. iii. 70, April 24, Patrol. Graec. cxvii. 421; Molanus, ap. Usuard. Auct. Ap. 24, Patrol. Lat. cxiii. 970.) [W. M. S.]

ELKESAI, ELKESAITES (Ἠλκασαί, Hippolytus; Ἠλκασαῖοι, Epiphanius; Ἠλκασαῖοι, Origen). A book bearing the name of Elkesai, and purporting to contain angelic revelations, was, at the end of the 2nd century, in high repute among certain Ebionite sectaries, who were most numerous in the district east of the lower Jordan and of the Dead Sea. This book first became known to orthodox writers in the 3rd century, and we have accounts of it from three independent primary sources, Hippolytus, Origen, and Epiphanius. Hippolytus (Ref. ix. 12, p. 292) states that this book, several extracts from which he gives, was brought to Rome by a certain Alcibiades, a native of Apameia in Syria, and indicates that the time was either during or immediately after the episcopate of Callistus, i. e. about A.D. 222. The great controversy which was agitating the church of Rome at the time was the question whether, and with what limitations, forgiveness might be bestowed on grievous sin committed after baptism, a dispute in which Hippolytus took the side of rigour and Callistus of leniency. This book of Elkesai announced a new method of forgiveness of sin, asserted to have been revealed in the third year of Trajan, by which any person, no matter of what sins he might have been guilty (some of the very grossest are expressly mentioned), might obtain forgiveness by submitting to a new baptism with the use of a certain formula of which we shall speak presently. The use of a similar baptism was prescribed as a remedy to be used by a person bitten by a mad dog or by a serpent or otherwise afflicted with disease. Hippolytus takes credit to himself for the resistance which he made to the teaching of Alcibiades, and blames Callistus for having, by the laxity of his doctrine and practice concerning church discipline, predisposed men's minds for the easy methods of forgiveness of sins expounded in this book. Origen, in a fragment of a homily on the 82nd Psalm, preserved by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 38) and assigned by Redepenning to the year 247, speaks of the teaching of the Helcesaites, some specimens of which he gives, as having then but lately troubled the churches. Epiphanius, though a later witness, professes to speak from personal acquaintance with the book, and this is confirmed by his coincidence in a number of details with the other authorities. His notices are distributed between his accounts of the Jewish sect which he calls Ossenes (Haer. 19), of the Ebionites (Haer. 30), and of the Sampsaeans (Haer. 53). Under these names the same people seem to be described, those who honoured the book of Elkesai (whom it probably was never accurate to speak of as constituting a distinct sect of Elkesaites) being found among those Ebionites who owed their origin to the acceptance of Christianity by Jewish Essenes. But we may infer that the book had some extent of circulation in the time of Epiphanius, being held in honour among different Jewish sectaries whom he counted as distinct. We may count the Pseudo-Clementine writings as a fourth source of information concerning the book of Elkesai; for although these writings do not mention that name, and although the question of relative priority is not absolutely settled, yet we have already (see vol. i. p. 575) enumerated coincidences between these books sufficient to authorise us in looking on them as works of the same school, and in using the one to throw light on what we are told about the other.

Hippolytus states that the book of Elkesai, according to its own account, has been obtained from Sere^a, in Parthia, by a righteous man named Elkesai, who had delivered it to a person called Sobiai; that its contents had been revealed by an angel 96 miles high with other dimensions, which are exactly given, in proportion,^b who had been accompanied by a female of corresponding size; that the male was Son of God, and the female was called Holy Spirit. Epiphanius, quoting more fully, explains that these beings had been seen between two mountains by comparison with which their dimensions had been ascertained. Epiphanius also speaks of Elkesai as a false prophet, mentions his brother Iexai and two women of his family, Marthus and Marthana,^c who had survived to his own time and were treated with superstitious honour by the members of their sect. Ritschl and others have thought that Hippolytus was misled by his ignorance of Aramaic into taking Elkesai and Sobiai as the names of persons. Different explanations of the former name have been given (see Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. i. 100), but the most probable is that which we learn from Epiphanius (Haer. 19, p. 41) was current among these sectaries themselves, viz. hidden power, ܥܠܝܐ ܥܝܠܐ; and Gieseler notes the occurrence of the phrase δύναμις ἁσάρκος in the Clementine Homilies, xvii. 16. It is argued that Elkesai must be the name of the book, or of the angel, and not of a man who is not represented either as the original recipient or the writer of the revelation. The name Iexai is in like manner explained "hidden Lord," ܝܬܝܐ ܥܝܠܐ, though Hilgenfeld prefers to connect this word with ܝܥܨܝܐܝܐ (Epiph. Haer. 29. 1, 4, 5) which seems to be one of the forms of the name Essene. So again Sobiai has with much plausibility been interpreted by Ritschl as the "sworn persons," ܫܘܒܝܐܝܐ, it being one of the rules of the sect that this book should be communicated to no one except on a pledge of secrecy. But it is a formidable objection to this interpretation that the members of this sect counted swearing unlawful; for so we are told in the preface to the Clementine Homilies, a work of the same school, and the protestation of secrecy there given is expressly said not to be an oath. We conclude then that the book derives its name from a man named Elkesai whom it represented as taking the leading part in the communication of the new revelation; but we believe this to have been an imaginary personage, and reject the account of Epiphanius who assigns to him a certain part in the history of the Ebionite sects.

^a ἀπὸ Σερῶν τῆς Παρθίας. Concerning the Sere^a, compare Clem. Recog. viii. 46, ix. 19, whence it appears that the Sere^a were supposed to be a race noted for the natural practice of the virtues on which the Elkesaites laid most stress. Ptolemy always uses for the name of their chief town the singular form Sere^a.

^b In the Clementine Homilies, viii. 15, it is taught that the giants of Gen. vi., being of mixed parentage, were as much inferior in size to the angels to which they belonged on the father's side as they were superior to the human race to which they belonged on the mother's.

^c Uhlhorn conjectures that the first syllable of these names may be but the Syriac title of honour Mar, and that Epiphanius by a mistake has converted two bishops into two sisters.

In giving an account of the doctrine of the book it will be convenient, first, to state the points in which it agrees with the doctrine of the Clementine writings, and afterwards those in which it goes beyond them. The book is evidently of Jewish origin. Jerusalem is made the centre of the world's devotion, and it is prescribed that the right rule of prayer is to turn not necessarily to the East, but towards Jerusalem in whatever quarter of the world the suppliant may be. It has been already noted that the names of the book are formed from Hebrew roots, and a further mark of Aramaic origin is the representation of the Holy Spirit as a female. The influence of the use of a noun of feminine form to denote the Holy Spirit shews itself also in some of the Gnostic theories as well as in the well-known passage from the Hebrew Gospel, Ἄρτι ἔλαβέ με ἡ μήτηρ μου τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα (Origen in Joann. tom. ii. 6, Opp. iv. 63). Epiphanius also quotes from the book of Elkesai a Hebrew form which the Greek and Roman converts were instructed to use without trying to understand it. Epiphanius gives an unsatisfactory interpretation of this formula on which others have attempted to improve (see Basnage, Annal. ann. 104, pp. 12, 13); but the right key seems to have been found in a highly ingenious solution given by Stern and Levy (see Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. extra Can. Rec. iii. 165). The book ordained compliance with the other ordinances of the Jewish law, but condemned the rite of sacrifice, and this condemnation involved the rejection of certain parts of the Old Testament, and was coupled with aversion to the eating of flesh (see vol. i. p. 575). The superiority of the method of forgiveness of sins by the washing of water over that by the fire of sacrifice is based on the superiority of the element of water to fire (Hipp. ix. 14; Epiph. Haer. 19, p. 42; Clem. Rec. i. 48; Hom. xi. 26). It is taught that Christ is but a created being, and, as has been already said, He is in the introduction spoken of as an angel; but He is the greatest of creatures, being Lord over angels as well as over every other created thing. The name Great King is applied to him (Epiph. Haer. 19, p. 41; Hipp. ix. 15; Hom. viii. 21). The formula of baptism runs in the name of the Most High God and of His Son, the Great King; but this Great King is not exclusively identical with Jesus of Nazareth, for it is taught that He appeared in the world in successive incarnations, Adam being the first. The book of Elkesai agreed with the Clementines in complete rejection of the apostle Paul. It is said to have been hostile to virginity, and to have compelled men to marry (Epiph. Haer. 19), and this agrees with the inculcation of marriage upon all (Hom. iii. 68; Epistle of Clement, ch. 7). The book contained some astrological doctrine recommending the abstinence from certain works on days under the influence of evil stars (Hipp. ix. 16, p. 296). Compare Hom. xix. 22, where the origin of the diseases of the human race is ascribed to the non-observance of proper times for cohabitation. The book taught that it was lawful to deny the faith in time of persecution (Eus. vi. 38; Epiph. 19), thus annihilating at once the class of offences as to the forgiveness of which there was most controversy at the time, and so the Recognitions (i. 65) describe Gamaliel as really a Christian, but, by the apostle's advice, concealing his profession; and, similarly (x. 55), represent Christians by a like dissimulation accompanying with Simon Magus and acting as spies upon him.

Prefixed to the Homilies is a protestation of secrecy to be taken by all to whom the book should be communicated. This does not take the form of an oath to God, but of an appeal to witnesses, viz. heaven, earth, water in which all things are contained, and air which pervades all things and without which we cannot breathe. It is stated that this appeal was similar to that made at the time of their regeneration when they promised to sin no more. After making this protestation the candidate was to partake of bread and salt with him who administered it. We read constantly in the Homilies of this partaking of bread and salt^d (iv. 6, xiii. 8, xiv. 1, 8, xix. 25), and among those Ebionites who do not seem to have used wine, this rite takes the place of the Eucharist of the church. We have here marks of very close affinity with the book of Elkesai. The formula of baptism already spoken of contains a solemn promise to sin no more, made before the seven witnesses who are enumerated as heaven, earth, water, oil, salt, the holy spirits, and the angels of prayer. Epiphanius tells us that the witnesses are elsewhere in the book enumerated as salt, water, earth, bread, heaven, aether, and wind. The interchange of the aether and wind for the spirits and angels has its explanation perhaps in a theory that these regions were the abode of the spirits in question. The mention of oil among the seven witnesses is illustrated by the unction used in this sect as a necessary preliminary to baptism (Rec. iii. 67; see also the discussion on anointing Rec. i. 46-48). At all events it seems plain that the protestation in the Clementines, referring as it does to the witnesses appealed to in the baptismal formula, harmonizes completely with the account of the baptismal formula given by Hippolytus.

To speak now of the differences between the Clementines and the book of Elkesai; Hippolytus states, p. 293, that the book taught the necessity of circumcision, and if this be correct it went beyond the teaching of the Clementines. In the addresses to the heathen therein contained they are never told that they must be circumcised; yet it is to be noted that a statement of the non-necessity of circumcision found in the Recognitions (v. 34) disappears from the corresponding passage of the Homilies (xi. 16), and in the preface to the Homilies, which is more strongly marked with Elkesaite features than the work itself, it is ordered that those Homilies should be communicated only to a circumcised believer—a phrase rather suggesting the inference that the circumcised were regarded as a higher class of believers than that all were circumcised. With regard to baptism the Clementines are silent with respect to all that is most peculiar in the doctrine of Elkesai. The heathen addressed by Peter are exhorted to a single baptism in the account of which no mention is made of the appeal to the witnesses. This baptism is represented as the divinely appointed means for forgiveness of sins and new birth unto righteousness through the power of the Holy Spirit which since the creation of the world works through the water (Rec. vi. 8, 9; Hom. xi. 26). Peter is represented as practising a daily religious washing; but this is never spoken of as a special means for obtaining a new forgiveness of sins. On the other hand, it is to be owned that the Recognitions state a principle from which the repetition of baptism might logically follow. They do not, as Christian theologians have generally done, make baptism correspond to circumcision, a view from which they were probably precluded by the fact that in their community both rites were simultaneously observed: but they make baptism take the place, as a means of forgiveness of sin, which sacrifice had occupied under the old dispensation (Rec. i. 39). Hence it was possible to draw the inference that baptism should be used as frequently as sacrifices had been as an atonement for constantly recurring sin.

The differences here noted bear on the question of relative priority between the Clementines and the book of Elkesai. Ritschl had counted the latter as the later. Uhlhorn in opposition pointed out that the differences just mentioned exhibit the Jewish and heathen elements in greater and the Christian element in less prominence in the book of Elkesai than in the Clementines, and that the latter are therefore to be regarded as the product of a time when the Essene doctrine of the former had been modified by Christian influences. It may be added that the violent hostility to the rite of sacrifice which appears both in the Homilies and in Elkesai is likely to date from a time antecedent to the destruction of Jerusalem, and is hardly intelligible if supposed to originate in times when sacrifice was only a rite practised by heathen. Uhlhorn's arguments then are conclusive in proving that the doctrine of the book of Elkesai is considerably older than the time when it became known to the orthodox, but the question still remains open, what was the date of the embodiment of the doctrine in this particular book?—a point which our information is too scanty to determine. There would be no question as to the date of the book if we could accept its own account, that the revelation in which it originated was made in the 3rd year of Trajan; but though many have attributed to this statement some historic value, it deserves absolutely to go for nothing. If we refuse to believe on the author's word that the two gigantic angels ever appeared, why should we accept the date that he assigns to the occurrence? We have noted, however, already (i. 575) that the work which was the common groundwork of the Recognitions and Homilies asserts that a new Gospel was published (the Homilies add "secretly") after the destruction of the Holy Place. And it seems on other grounds probable that a number of Essenes, who had always held the Temple sacrifices in abomination, were brought to recognise Jesus as the true Prophet when the destruction of the Temple and the abolition of its sacrifices fulfilled the prediction which he was known to have made. At this time then probably had their origin those Ebionite sects which combined a certain reverence for our Lord's utterances, and an acknowledgment of ^d In the parallel places in the Recognitions salt is not mentioned; and in the Recognitions generally reserve seems to be practised about many things which are plainly spoken of in the Homilies.

Him as a divine prophet, with the retention of a host of Essene usages and doctrines; and this date would be remembered as an epoch in the history of these sects. It is likely that we are to connect with this the statement of Hegesippus (Eus. H. E. iii. 32; iv. 22), that the reign of Trajan was the time when the church, till then a pure virgin, was corrupted by the breaking out of heresies. There seems to be no foundation for the opinion that Hegesippus was himself of Ebionite tendencies, and Jewish heresies are those of which the context would suggest that he was speaking. In sum, then, though it may be the more probable opinion that the book of Elkesai had been, as it professed to be, a considerable time in secret circulation among the Ebionite sects before Alcibiades brought it to Rome, yet it is possible that it may have been then of quite recent manufacture. We have elsewhere given reasons for thinking that the Clementine Homilies are not earlier than the beginning of the 3rd century, and that the corresponding story, that this work had been in mysterious circulation, under a pledge of secrecy, since the days of Peter was only a fiction intended to explain why the book had not been heard of before.

It would seem to be long before the sect of Elkesaites disappeared. En-hedim, an Arabic author who wrote about A.D. 987; quoted by Chwolson (Die Seabier, i. 112, ii. 543), tells of a sect of Sabians of the Desert who practised frequent religious washings and who counted one El-Chasaiach as their founder.

The primary authorities with respect to Elkesai have been already mentioned. Of recent dissertations on the subject most information will be found in Ritschl, Zeitschrift für histor. Theol. 1853, p. 573 sqq., and Entstehung der althatholischen Kirche, p. 234 sqq.; Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. extra Canonem receptum, iii. 153, where all the fragments of the book are collected; Uhlhorn, Homilien und Recognitionen des Clemens Romanus, p. 392; and Lightfoot's Dissertation on the Essenes, 'Epistle to Colossians,' p. 118 sqq.

[G. S.]

ELLA (1) (AELLA, AELLI, ALLA, ELLE, ULLI), king of Deira, and, according to his recorded pedigree, a lineal descendant of Woden. (Nennius, 51; Sax. Chron. ann. 588.) The Saxon Chronicle makes him king of Northumbria, but it was only over the southern portion of it that he reigned. The same authority places his accession in A.D. 560, and says that he was king thirty winters. It also states, along with Florence, that Ella died in A.D. 588.

The only interest attaching to Ella's reign arises from the well-known story of the English youths accosted by Gregory in the slave market at Rome, and replying that they were Angles from the province of Deira, and the subjects of king Alla. (Bed. H. E. ii. 1; Malms. G. R. i. 63-4.) Bede gives the story as one of hearsay only, and in the chronicle of Ethelwerd the incidents are somewhat differently narrated. The young men are not spoken of as slaves; there is no mention of Ella or Deira, and Gregory's play on their names is omitted. Ella left two children, Edwin, who, after a long interval, succeeded him on his throne, and Acha or Acca, a daughter, who was the second wife of Æthelfrid, son of Ethelric, who intruded himself into Edwin's heritage.

[J. R.]

ELLA (2), bishop of Sigüenza (Segontia) circa A.D. 680-685. His signature appears among those of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth councils of Toledo. [PHOTOGENE.] (Exp. Sagr. viii. 126; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270, 287 304.) [M. A. W.]

ELLADIUS, presbyter of the palace. [HELLADIUS.]

ELLBRIGH, abess of Cluain-Bronaigh (Clonbroney, bar. Granard, co. Longford), died A.D. 785 (Four Mast. A.D. 780; Ann. Ulst. A.D. 784). This is said by Archdall (Mon. Hib. 346) to have been one of the earliest patrician foundations, and the earliest abess mentioned is St. Samhthann virgin, who died A.D. 734 (Four Mast.). [J. G.]

ELLDEYRN (1), according to the Acham y Saint, was son of Gwrtheyrn (Vortigern), and must have flourished towards the end of the 5th century. His name is preserved in Llanelldeyrn or Llaniltern chapel, in the parish of St. Fagan's, Glamorganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 132, 186, 338).

ELLDEYRN (2), chorepiscopus, of Caerleon prior to the time of St. Dubritius (Lib. Land. by Rees, 623 n. 2; Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. 154).

[J. G.]

ELLDYD. [ILLTYD.]

ELLE, king of Deira. [ELLA.]

ELLEBICHUS (1). Gregory Nazianzen addressed his two hundred and twenty-fifth letter to this man, wherein he regrets his inability to visit him through ill-health, and consigns to his care Mamas, a reader, the son of a soldier. Mamas had been enrolled, and Ellebichus is requested to obtain his discharge. (Greg. Naz. Ep. 225, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 369.)

ELLEBICHUS (2), a military official (στρατηγὸς ἀδρῆς) attached to the imperial court, sent with Caesarius by the emperor Theodosius II. to Antioch to seize the guilty parties connected with the throwing down of the statues. Chrysostom delivered his seventeenth homily to the Antiochenes in the presence of these officers. (Chrysost. Homil. xvii. in Migne, Patr. Gr. xlix. 171.)

ELLEL, a Jewish patriarch, who lived in the time of Constantine, and was baptized on his death-bed (Epiph. Haer. 30, p. 128). [G. S.]

ELLENIIUS succeeded St. Cadoc in the abbacy of Llancarvan [CADOC], but Ussher gives too early dates, when he says Ellenius became abbat in A.D. 514, and was succeeded by St. Brendan, of Clonfert, in the year 520. Cadoc probably died about A.D. 570, and St. Brendan about A.D. 577. [BRENDAN (2).] Ellenius is said to have been an excellent disciple of an excellent master, and to have done much in making the college at Llancarvan so famous. Of his own kindred or previous life we know only the tradition that he was "reginae cujusdam transmarinae filius," and one of the principal disciples of St. Cadoc. But the Welsh authorities (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 354, 383, 395) trace an entirely different order of succession, and make Cyngen immediately follow St. Cadoc as abbat. [ELLI.] (Usher, Ecc. Ant. cc. 13, 14, wks. v. 538, vi. 50; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 423; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. i. c. 9, § 11.) [J. G.]

ELLI, "unmarried disciple," the "very dear unmarried auditor" of St. Cadoc, is said, in the Life of St. Cadoc, to have been the child of a queen long barren, and born on the islands of Grimbul. He lived at the White Court (probably Whitton, near Llanancarvan) in the time of Meurig ab Tewdrig, king of Morganwg and Gwent, and seems also to have been connected with Crucygreif or Garnllwyd, near Llanfeithan, in the same neighbourhood. He is one of those who are said to have been the immediate successors of St. Cadoc in the abbacy of Llanancarvan [ELLENIUS], St. Cadoc having divested himself of the office in his favour, with procession of relics, &c., on a Palm Sunday. We find him as witness to several grants to St. Cadoc or his church in the 6th century (Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 332, 365-6, 379, 382, 387-9.) [J. G.]

ELLOC, of Cill-moelloc, is given by O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 3) and Colgan (Acta SS. 312, c. 5) among the sons of Bracan, or Brychan, and the brothers of St. Canoc (Feb. 11) and St. Dabneog (Jan. 1); the latter places Cill-moelloc near Loch-garman, now Wexford Haven. Elloc is unknown in the Welsh and Cornish genealogies of Brychan. Colgan (ib. 313, c. 17) puts his commemoration on July 24, where Mart. Tallaght (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. xxx.) has "Oilleoc Cluana Etchen." This is probably the same person as stands in Mart. Doneg. on July 13, "Mothiológ, of Cill-Mothiológ, in Ui Ceianscailigh, or Mothilóg, of Cluain Aithghin." Cill-moelloc and Cill-Mothiológ are now two parishes, called Killmallock and Kilmachaelogue or Gorey, in the barony of Ballaghkeen, and part of the latter in the barony of Gorey, co. Wexford. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 14; Skene, Celt. Scott. ii. 23; and on the sons of Bracan or Brychan of Brycheiniog, see BRYCHAN and DABNEOG.) [J. G.]

ELLTIN (1) Son of Maelan of Senchua, commemorated Jan. 11 in the Martyrologies of Donegal and Tallaght. His church was one which is said by Tirechan, and in Colgan's Lives of St. Patrick, to have been founded by St. Patrick. It is now Shancoe, in the barony of Tirerril, co. Sligo, on the borders of Leitrim. (Colgan, Tr. Thaurm. 89, c. 105, 134, c. 35, 271, c. 24, and notes; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 176.)

ELLTIN (2) of Kinsale, confessor, commemorated Dec. 11. He was brother of Sedna (Mar. 10), son of Eren, and native of a district in Munster, called Altraighe Cliach. He was revered at Kinsale as one of its patrons, and is known by the affectionate title Melteog, "My-little-Eltin," or "My Elltin-dear," now corrupted into St. Multosa. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, xliii. n. 4, 332 n. 1, 333; Colgan, Acta SS. 573, col. 2 and n. 4; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. 94; Caulfield, Life of St. Finbarre, 15 n. b.) [J. G.]

ELLYW (ELYW) is given by Professor Rees as a grand-daughter of Brychan of Brycheiniog, yet he does not think it unlikely that she is really identical with St. Elined, or Alivedha, on whose festival that of St. Ellyw depends, the former being on Aug. 1, O. S., and the latter on the Sunday immediately preceding. She is patron, or has probably given her name to Llanelly in Carmarthenshire, and to Llanellieu and Llanelly, both in Brecknockshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 156, referring to Hist. Breckn. ii. 473). [J. G.]

ELMERUS (ERMELIUS), patron saint of a collegiate church at Molhanium, in the diocese of Liège, near Marienburg. What is known or believed of this obscure saint, who is placed in the 7th or 8th century, and where Molhanium was, is discussed in Boll. Acta SS. Aug. 28, v. 485. [C. H.]

ELMGAUDUS, officer of Charlemagne [HELMGAUDUS.]

ELNOG. [ELENOG.]

ELOAEUS (Eloesus, Irenaeus; Ἀλωαῖος, Origen; Ἐλωαῖος, Epiphanius), one of the seven ruling spirits in the OPHITE system (Irenaeus, i. 30, p. 109; Origen, adv. Cels. vi. 31; Epiph. Haer. 26, p. 91). These authorities differ both as to some of the names and as to the order in which they are placed. On the obvious derivation of the present name from the Hebrew name of God, see Irenaeus, ii. 35, p. 170; Epiph. Haer. 40, p. 296. [G. S.]

ELOC, clerical witness to the grant of Mafurn by king Cynfyn, son of Pebiau, to Aidan, bishop of Llandaff, probably in the 6th century (Lib. Land. by Rees, 408). [J. G.]

ELODIA, a virgin martyr, put to death, together with Nunilo at Osca (Huesca). Commemorated Oct. 22 (Mart. Us.). [T. S. B.]

ELOHIM, Ἐλωεῖμ, Hippol. Ref. v. 26, pp. 150-159. [JUSTINUS.] [G. S.]

ELOI, ST., bishop of Noyon. [ELIGIUS.]

ELOPHIUS, martyr of Toul. [ELIPHIUS.]

ELOQUIUS, abbat of Lagny, commemorated Dec. 3. He was one of that illustrious stream of missionaries which flowed from Ireland and flooded the continent of Europe in the sixth and following centuries. He was an Hibernian Scot, and accompanied St. Fursey (Jan. 16) to Lagny, where he associated with such other saints as St. Fursey's two brothers, Faellan or Foillan and Ultan, with Mumbolus, Etto, Adelgisius, and Fredegand, but it seems an anachronism to make him contemporary with St. Tressan (Feb. 7), who flourished at least a century earlier. Probably setting out from Lagny, he went with twelve disciples and taught in Belgium, and on St. Fursey's death he is said to have become abbat of the monastery at Lagny, as being the special friend of the late superior, but it is probable that Emilian [EMILIANUS (10)] came between, and this succession is adopted by the Gall. Chr. (vii. 492). He flourished about the middle of the 7th century. Colgan had a Life of St. Eloquius in contemplation for Dec. 3 (Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. vii. 375) which was probably that one given by Miraeus (Belg. Fast.) and Molanus (Nut. Sanct. Belg.) on the same day. (Colgan, Acta SS. 51 n. 1, 96, c. 6, 273 n. 2, 436 n. 2; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 10; Reeves, Adamnan, 299; O'Hanlon, Irish H 2 Saints, i. 264-86, ii. 378 sq.; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 201, Dec. 4; Ware, Irish Writ. c. 3.) Dempster says he flourished A.D. 651, and wrote Ehortationes ad Gentiles, lib. i.; Homilias, lib. i. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 250; Tanner, Bibl. 260). [J. G.]

ELOTHERUS (ELEUTHERIUS), twenty-seventh bishop of Avignon, succeeding St. Saturninus and followed by Julianus. He is said to have been a priest of that church before his elevation to the see (A.D. 475), and to have been remarkable for his learning, faith, humanity and integrity. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (i. 863) conjecture him to have been the Eleutherius addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. vi. 11 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 559), who has also been assigned to Tournai. He does not appear in Gams's list of the bishops of Avignon. (Series Episc. 503.) [S. A. B.]

ELOY, ST., bishop of Noyon. [ELPIDIUS.]

ELPICIUS, a deacon in the 5th century, nephew of Elpidius reputed bishop of Atella. (Boll. Acta SS. 24 Mai. v. 282.) [ELPIDIUS (12).] [C. H.]

ELPIDEPHORUS (1), a Persian of senatorial rank, converted to Christianity by witnessing the constancy of the martyrs Acindynus, Pegasus, and Anempodistus. He was cruelly tortured by order of Sapor II., king of Persia, and afterwards beheaded, circ. A.D. 320. He is commemorated Nov. 2 (Men. Bas.; Cal. Byzant.). [T. S. B.]

ELPIDEPHORUS (2) (ELPIDOPHORUS), bishop of Cuiculis or Cuizis in the province of Numidia, was present at the council of Carthage under Gratus, A.D. 349, and was the mover of the eleventh canon against the pride of the junior clergy. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 147, ii. 253; Mansi iii. 148). [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (2), bishop and martyr, sent during the reign of Diocletian, after the death of Basil the bishop, together with Agathodorus, Capeto, and Eugenius, to Cherson, where they were all slain by the Greeks. They are commemorated March 8. (Men. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

ELPIDIUS (3), bishop of Comana in Cappadocia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 448; Mansi, ii. 694.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (4), a bishop of Palestine, who subscribed the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Athanasii Opera, i. 133, in Patr. Graec. xxv. 339 B; Mansi, iii. 69 A). He also subscribed the letter of a synod at Jerusalem (Athan. ibid. 139). [W. M. S.]

ELPIDIUS (5), bishop of Satala in Armenia, deposed by the triumphant Acacian party in the council of Constantinople, Jan. A.D. 360, together with Acacius, Cyril of Jerusalem, and others. The nominal grounds were his participation in the violent acts of Basil, his having occasioned great disorders in the church, and particularly his having violated the decrees of the council of Melitene by reinstating a presbyter named Eusebius, deposed for having appointed one Nectaria as deaconess, though excommunicated for perjury. (Socr. H. E. ii. 42; Soz. H. E. iv. 24.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (6), bishop of a maritime town in the East, A.D. 375, separated by Eustathius of Sebaste from his communion ostensibly on account of his holding communion with the intruded Arian bishop of Amasea, but more truly as a friend of Basil (Basil, Epist. 251 [72]). Basil wrote to Elpidius, A.D. 375, by a presbyter Meletius, requesting him to arrange with his brother bishops of the seaboard of Pontus a time and place for Basil's meeting them in the hope of removing mutual suspicions and confirming mutual charity (Epist. 205 [322]). Soon after this Elpidius lost a little grandson. Basil wrote to console him exhorting him to Christian fortitude, and expressing his hope that this bereavement would not prevent their meeting at Comana (Epist. 206 [348]). His see is uncertain, but Blondel is certainly wrong in placing it at Neocaesarea. (Tillemont, ix. 674.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (7), bishop of Dionysia or Dionysias in the ecclesiastical province of Bostra, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 570; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 865.) For Dionysia, see Hieroclis Synodotus in Corp. Script. Hist. Byz. pt. 5, vol. iii. p. 399, Bonn. 1840, and Wesseling's note, p. 535. [J. de S.]

ELPIDIUS (8), bishop of Laodicea in Syria at the close of the 4th century and opening of the 5th. He was originally a priest of Antioch under Meletius, whose confidence he enjoyed and with whom he resided (σύνσκηρος) as what we should now call bishop's chaplain, and of whose moderation and gentleness of disposition Theodoret tell us he afforded a more exact copy than the wax does of a seal (Theod. H. E. v. 27). He shared in his master's sufferings under Valens, and accompanied by Flavian, attended Meletius at the council of Constantinople A.D. 381 (Labbe ii. 955). We next find him bishop of the Syria Laodicea, in succession to Pelagius, in which capacity he attended a council at Constantinople A.D. 394 (Labbe, ii. 1151). We again find him at Constantinople at the close of A.D. 403, as member of the council summoned by Chrysostom's enemies, and issuing in his deposition. Elpidius had been an intimate friend of Chrysostom at Antioch, and lent the weight of his advanced years and his well-deserved reputation for learning and piety to the defence of his associate. When the validity of the canons of the council of Antioch, of suspected orthodox used by Chrysostom's enemies as an instrument to secure their object, came into question before the emperor, Elpidius adroitly turned the tables on Acacius and his party by proposing that the advocates of the canons should declare themselves of the same faith with the who had promulgated them (Pallad. Dial. c. p. 80). After Chrysostom's deposition and excommunication, Elpidius exerted himself strenuously in his behalf, despatching letters to the bishops and faithful zity, not only in his own diocese and neighbourhood, but in all parts of the world, exhorting them to remain true to their allegiance to Chrysostom, and encouraging them to bear up against the storms of persecution, however violent. Chrysostom wrote to Elpidius shortly after his arrival at Cucusus in 404, thanking him most warmly for the zeal he had manifested in his behalf in spite of his advanced years, and giving him the information he had desired to receive, concerning the place of his banishment, his companions, and his own health (Chrysost. Epist. 114). This letter was probably transmitted by Libanius, the layman of Antioch, who was returning from his visit to his former revered teacher with an epistle from Chrysostom commending him to Elpidius, for whom Libanius felt great reverence and affection, and to whom he was desirous of being introduced. Chrysostom states in this letter that "not for any gain to Elpidius, but for the interest of the church at large, he was anxious that Elpidius should enjoy the honour and respect of all the faithful" (ibid. Ep. 230). Four other letters from Chrysostom to Elpidius are extant. They all breathe the same spirit of deep respect and grateful affection. They chiefly consist of entreaties that Elpidius would write more frequently, and excuses for the infrequency of his own correspondence, caused by the badness of his own health, the want of trustworthy persons to convey his letters, the isolation of Cucusus in the winter, and the ravages of the Isaurians, together with assurances of his confidence in Elpidius's undiminished regard for him. They are all written from Cucusus in the spring of the year, as soon as the roads were open. (Epist. 25, 138, A.D. 405; Epist. 131, A.D. 406; Epist. 142, A.D. 407.)

Elpidius suffered for his fidelity to his friend in the persecution against the Joannite party under Atticus and Porphyry. In A.D. 406 he was deposed from his see, and suffered close imprisonment in his own house for three years, Pappus, a Syrian bishop, being the companion of his incarceration (Pallad. Dial. p. 195). His sufferings lasted till A.D. 414, when Alexander, on succeeding Porphyry as bishop of Antioch, restored Elpidius to his see in a manner which testified his deep reverence for his character. The intelligence of his restoration was received by pope Innocent with extreme satisfaction. (Baron. 408, §§ 35, 37; Tillemont, xi. 274.)

ELPIDIUS (9) (HELPIDIUS), bishop of Lyons, about 424. He was buried in the church of the seven Maccabæan brothers, where his predecessor St. Justus also lay, and was commemorated on Sept. 2. (Usuard. Mart.; Acta SS. Sept. i. 388; Gall. Christ. iv. 18.) [R. T. S.]

ELPIDIUS (10) I., bishop of Thermae, otherwise called Myracium, Myricium, and also Myricenum, in the province of Galatia Secunda, in the middle of the 5th century. (Le Quien, Oriens Chr. i. 334; Gams, 441.) He was at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vi. 573 a, 945 d, 981 c, 1091 d.) [T. W. D.]

ELPIDIUS (11) II., bishop of Thermae, one of the signatories at the Quinisextine council, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 1000 e; Le Quien, Oriens Chr. i. 498; Gams, Series Episc. 441.)

[T. W. D.]

ELPIDIUS (12), ST. The first of the four recorded bishops of Atella in Campania cir. A.D. 400. Great sanctity and many miracles were attributed to him and to his brother St. Cyo a presbyter and his nephew St. Elpicius a deacon, both of whom also lived at Atella. St. Elpidius was buried at Salerno, and his festival was on May 24. Some suppose that he is an African refugee in the Vandal persecution. (Ug. Ital. Sac. x. 17; Boll. Acta SS. 24 Mai. v. 282.)

[C. H.]

ELPIDIUS (13), a bishop who with eleven companions is commemorated on Sept. 1 (AA. SS. Boll. Sept. i. 210). The accounts concerning him are obscure, but he is supposed to have been one of the African bishops exiled by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484; by others he is identified with Elpidius, bishop of Atella in Campania, who might have been an African refugee (No. 12).

ELPIDIUS (14), (HELPIDIUS), bishop of Tamiathis (Damiatta), in Egypt, one of the orthodox Egyptian bishops, who, with some Alexandrian clerics, fled to Constantinople in A.D. 487, to escape from Timotheus Aelurus and the Eutychians. [NESTORIUS, bishop of Phragones.] His name does not appear in their petition to the emperor Leo, but it does appear at the head of the letter addressed to them by the pope Leo (Leo, Mag. Ep. clx. 1336). It appears also in the list of bishops subscribing the encyclical letter of the council held at Constantinople under Gennadius in A.D. 489 against simony (Harduin, ii. 783; Oriens Christianus, ii. 589).

[C. G.]

ELPIDIUS (15), bishop of Volterra, present at the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth Roman synods under pope Symmachus in Oct. 501, Nov. 502, in 503, and Oct. 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen, iii. 209), who accepts with a slight alteration the arrangement of Hefele, § 220. (Mansi, viii. 253, 269, 299, 315.)

[A. H. D. A.]

ELPIDIUS (16), bishop of Ancyra, the metropolis of Galatia Prima, in the early part of the 6th century. (Le Quien, Oriens Chr. i. 466; Gams, Series Episc. p. 441.) He sent Gaianus, a presbyter, as his legate, to the council of Constantinople, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 879 b, 938 d, 951 a.)

[T. W. D.]

ELPIDIUS (17), one of four brothers, all bishops (the others being Justus, Justinian, Nebridius), who flourished in Spain during the first half of the 6th century. Isidore, de Vir. Ill. cap. 33, has two or three lines about Elpidius, whose reported writings, he says, together with those of his brother Nebridius (bishop of Egara), had remained unknown to him. (Ximeno, Escritores del Reyno de Valencia, i. p. viii; Ceillier, Aut. Sac. xi. 265.)

[M. A. W.]

ELPIDIUS (18), bishop of Thebes Phthioticae in Thessaly, A.D. 531, mentioned in the petition of Stephen of Larissa to pope Boniface II. and the Roman synod against the conduct of Epiphanius of Constantinople, who had excommunicated Stephen, and had summoned him and his consecrators to appear at Constantinople. The Theossalians rejected the jurisdiction of the bishops of Constantinople. (Mansi, viii. 743; Le Quien, Origins Christ. ii. 121.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (19), bishop of Catania, c. 580. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xxi. 636.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELPIDIUS (20), a bishop most probably of some Eastern see, to whom, along with two other bishops, pope Gregory the Great addressed a letter (Epist. vii. 7), blaming him for crying out, "This is the day which the Lord hath made," at the ordination of Cyriacus the patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 597 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 853.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (21), bishop of Tarazona (Turiasso), signs the acts of the fourth and sixth councils of Toledo (A.D. 633, 638), being fifty-second out of sixty-nine bishops in the former, and eighteenth out of fifty-three in the latter. [LEON.] (Mansi, x. 643 A, ILPIDIUS, 671 C; Esp. Sagr. xlix. 114; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385, 413.) [M. A. W.]

ELPIDIUS (22), bishop of Astorga from about 654 onwards. Signs the tenth Council of Toledo A.D. 656. His name is variously written—Alpidius, Hilpidius, and Ilpidius. [FELIX OF ASTORGA.] (Mansi, xi. 43 e; Esp. Sagr. xvi. 114; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 158.) [M. A. W.]

ELPIDIUS (23), a Roman presbyter, who, with Philoxenus in 341, transmitted the letters of Julius I. to the Eusebian bishops in the East by whom Athanasius had been condemned at the Council of Dedication, inviting them to a council in December in that year. Elpidius and his companions were sent back in January, A.D. 342, with the reply of the bishops couched in grossly defiant terms. (Ath. Opp. I. iii. in Patr. Gr. xxv. 282; Labbe, ii. 494, 514; Baron. A. E. 340, iii.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (24), priest of the Roman church sent by pope Liberius to the bishops of Illyricum, A.D. 365, who, the provincial synod being assembled, commissioned Elpidius as their delegate to the Asian bishops. Their synodal letter containing his credentials, warning the Asiatics against the Macedonian heresy, and exhorting them to preach the Nicene faith, is preserved in Theodoret. Baronius thinks he may be the same as the legate of Julius in the preceding article. (Theodoret, H. E. iv. c. 8, in Migne, Patr. Graec. lxxxii. 960; Baron. A. E. 365, xvii.; Mansi, Concil. iii. 383-386.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (25), a deacon by whose hands Basil received a letter from Eusebius of Samosata A.D. 373 (Basil, Epist. 138 [8]); and by whom, A.D. 376, Basil sent a letter of consolation and sympathy to the Egyptian bishops Eulogius, Alexander, Harpocraton, in exile for the faith in Palestine. (Epist. 265 [293].) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (26), ST., abbat, and patron saint of the town of St. Elpidio in Picenum (the Marches of Ancona), where his relics are preserved. According to the traditions collected by the Bollandists, he was a Cappadocian by birth, who preached the Gospel in Pice-another tradition, he was an abbat in his own country, and moved into Palestine, his remains only being translated into Italy. (AA. SS. Boll. 2 Sept. i. 378.) [L. D.]

ELPIDIUS (27), Spanish presbyter, who with the Spanish bishop Hilarius appealed to pope Innocent on the prevailing dissensions in Spain, occasioning Innocent to address the bishops assembled at the first council of Toledo, A.D. 400. (Innoc. Ep. 3, cc. 1, 2; Mansi, Concil. iii. 997.) [C. H.]

ELPIDIUS (28), presbyter of Constantinople, who deposed against Chrysostom at the council of the Oak, A.D. 403 (Phot. cod. 59). One of the attempts to assassinate Chrysostom after his condemnation, A.D. 404, was made by a slave of Elpidius, who asserted that he had been bribed by his master with fifty pieces of silver. (Soz. H. E. viii. 21; Pallad. Dialog. cap. 20.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (29), presbyter, who laboured with much zeal and success as a missionary among the heathen tribes inhabiting the mountain range of Amanus between Cilicia and Syria. Many were converted by his means, and several churches and monasteries built. Chrysostom wrote from Cucusus, A.D. 404, to commend Elpidius and his work to the liberality of his ancient friend Agapetus (Chrysost. Epist. 175). [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (30) OF CAPPADOCIA, priest and abbat. Having passed his earlier years in a monastery founded in Cappadocia by Timotheus, a chorepiscopus under Basil the Great, he became the abbat or superior of an anchorite community in the mountains in the neighbourhood of Jericho, originally founded by Chariton, with whom Palladius passed some time in his twentieth year shortly after embracing the solitary life. Palladius speaks of his austerities as surpassing those of all the hermits of that district. The last twenty-five years of his life he spent in a cavern on the mountain side, only partaking of food on Saturdays and Sundays, passing the whole night in singing the praises of God, with his face constantly turned to the east, night and day, not changing his posture even when suffering intensely from the poisonous sting of scorpion. He became priest after Palladius left him, and died before A.D. 420. (Pallad. Hist. Lausiaca. cc. 106-108, pp. 1024-1026.) [E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (31) (HELPIDIUS), presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople, who subscribed the deposition of Eutyches at the council of Constantinople in 448 (Labbe, i. 232 B). He, among the other orthodox archimandrites, is addressed by Leo I. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 71, 1012, FAUSTUS). His name does not appear among the orthodox archimandrites who petitioned Marcian, the emperor, in 451 (FAUSTUS but he or one of his name does appear as subscribing the almost contemporary appeal to the emperor from the Eutychians, headed by Charisius, who were, or claimed to be, archimandrites [ἀρχιμανδρίται ἐλάχιστοι] (Labbe, iv. 524; Tillemont, xv. 638). In the 4th session of the council of Chalcedon, the orthodox archimandrites, who had been summoned to sit there before their Eutychian brethren were introduced, recognized the name of this Elpidius as that the μεμροφύλαξ τῶν Προκοπίου,^a but as it is implied in this that he could not rightly claim the title of archimandrite, we must probably distinguish him from his orthodox namesake.

[C. G.]

ELPIDIUS (32) RUSTICUS (HELPIDIUS), a deacon of Lyons, and, according to some, an ex-quaestor (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxii. 545 n.), who studied medicine, and became one of the physicians of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths (Procop. Bell. Got. lib. i. cap. 1), to whose intimate friendship he was also admitted (regia potestate ac sedulo famulatu intimus, Cyprian. Tolonens. Caesarā Arelat. Vita, lib. i. 29, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxvii. 1016). His skill in his profession is evidenced by a letter from St. Avitus bishop of Vienne, begging him to cure the son of one Celerius, and speaking of his "peritia singularis" (Avitus, Epist. 35 in Patr. Lat. lix. 251), and by another from Ennodius bishop of Ticinum, informing him that he is daily afflicted with such a complication of diseases that he despairs of his life (Ennodius, Epist. lib. ix. ep. 14; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxiii. 155; cf. too lib. viii. ep. 8, Migne, lxiii. 135). The facts of his life known to us are scanty. He was on intimate terms with Ennodius (see the letters above quoted, and a fourth, lib. vii. ep. 7; Patr. Lat. lxiii. 117). Cyprian in his life of Caesarius bishop of Arles (lib. i. n. 29, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxvii. 1016), tells a story of his having a haunted house, apparently at Arles, which the bishop, by the sprinkling of holy water, freed from the spirits. In the Epist. Var. of Cassiodorus (lib. ix. ep. 24, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxix. 612) there is preserved a letter addressed to him by his master Theodoric, towards the close of his reign, in the highest terms of respect and admiration. Elpidius had seemingly petitioned the king for a grant to enable him to restore some of the buildings of Spoleto, which had suffered from age. The letter readily concedes his request. From this it has been inferred that he was, at least temporarily, a resident at Spoleto.

Two short poems by him are extant, both on sacred subjects, and both written in the hexameter metre. The former is in twenty-four separate stanzas of three lines, each treating of a different subject from the Bible, but for the most part alternating between the Old and New Testament, a stanza on a subject from the former being followed by a corresponding one from the latter, the type by the antitype. For instance, one on the confusion of tongues at the destruction of Babel, has for its complement the miracle of tongues at Pentecost, that on the selling of Joseph by his brethren, the selling of Christ by Judas. The other poem is somewhat longer, and not distinguished by this peculiarity. It is a hymn on the blessings conferred by Christ, and the language is perhaps more spirited. Both are classical for the age. They may be seen in ^a Lat. monumentorum Procopiensium custos. The μεμροφύλαξ is interpreted by Du Fresnoie (Gloss. Infamiae Graecitatis) as a church dedicated to a saint, by others as a sacred tomb: according to the latter interpretation a μεμροφύλαξ is an anchorite inhabiting a tomb, and the μεμροφύλαξ τῶν Προκοπίου would be the monk in charge of the collection of tombs so inhabited, which were called by the name of Procopius; this would interpret his claim to the title of Archimandrite. Labbe, . 618 n.

ELPIDIUS (33), bishop and martyr—March. 8. [ELPIDIUS (2).]

ELPIDIUS (34), a martyr under Julian with Marcellus, Eustachius, and others. Special cruelty was practised towards Elpidius as he was a man of senatorial rank, and had been made "praefectus praetorii" by Constantius (Baron. Annal. 362, 15). He is commemorated Nov. 16.

ELPIDIUS (35) (HELPIDIUS), a Paphlagonian who held several important offices under Constantine and Constantius. A law of 323 was addressed to him by Constantine, when he was perhaps vicarius of Italy (Cod. Theod. xvi. 2, 5; see Gothofredus). He was a man of mean aspect and a poor speaker, but of very gentle and honest character. He succeeded Hermogenes as praetorian prefect in 361, but begged to resign his office when Constantius ordered him to torture an innocent man in his presence (Amm. xxi. 6, 9). Before he became praefect he paid a visit, with his wife Aristaeneta and his children, to St. Antony in Egypt. On his return his three sons were taken ill of fever at Gaza, and were healed by the prayers of St. Hilarion (S. Hieron. De Vit. Hil. tom. i. p. 249). Libanius addressed a complimentary letter to him, in which the wife and children are also mentioned (Lib. Ep. 1301). Baronius identifies him with the Roman senator martyred by Julian (no. 34), commemorated by the Roman church on Nov. 16; but this is improbable (see Tillemont, Emp. iv. p. 691). It is uncertain whether he is the "count of the private estate" in the next article who is said to have apostatised under Julian. (Theodoret, H. E. iii. 12, and Tillemont, l. c.) [J. W.]

ELPIDIUS (36), nicknamed "the Sacrificer" (ὁ θυρῆς, Philostorg. H. E. vii. 10), a friend of the emperor Julian, under whom he held the office of Comes Rerum Privatarum. During the reign of Constantius he had professed himself to be a Christian, but under Julian he became an earnest pagan (Philostorg. u. s.; Theodoret, H. E. iii. 12). Libanius, a great correspondent of his, describes him as, though inferior in learning to Maximus and Priscus, two other friends of Julian's, yet their equal in zeal for the gods and in affection for the emperor. (Liban. Orat. pro Aristoph. ed. Reiske, pp. 435, 436.) When Julian commanded the great church, which Constantine had erected at Antioch to be spoiled of its treasures and closed, Elpidius was one of the three officers who were sent to execute the mandate. (Theodoret, H. E. u. s.) He survived Julian, the uncle of the emperor, and Felix, his associates on that occasion, but being implicated in the treason of Procopius, A.D. 365 he was deprived of all his property and cast into prison, where he died amid universal detestation. (Philostorg. u. s.; Theodoret, u. s.; Niceph. x. 29.) Elpidius is frequently mentioned by Libanius in his letters, and always in terms of great praise. (Epp. 29, 33, 136, 208, 227, 302, 303.) [T. W. D.]

sius governor of Cappadocia. Basil's 77th letter appears to have been addressed to him. He is exhorted not to leave Therasius, but to share his cares. In his 78th letter Basil earnestly desires that the province may continue to enjoy the efficient services of Elpidius. He may be the Elpidius of Basil's 63rd and 64th letters, a man fulfilling every characteristic of friendship, in all respects excellent, and worthy of the utmost respect. (Basil. Epp. 63, 64, 77, 78, Patrol. Graec. xxxii. 419, 451, pp. 157, 172.)

[W. M. S.]

ELPIDIUS (38), A.D. 375, bearer of a letter from Basil to Amphilochius bishop of Iconium. He was servant to Amphilochius and was hastening to him to refute certain calumnies about himself (Basil. Epist. 231, Patr. Graec. xxxii. p. 861).

[W. M. S.]

ELPIDIUS (39) (HELPIDIUS), a Spanish rhetorician of the 4th century, one of the promoters of the Zoroastrian opinions in Spain which culminated in Priscillianism. He is mentioned by Jerome (Ep. cxxxiii. 4; see also Ep. lxxv. 3, and Vallarsi's note) as having been misled by Agape [AGAPE] and as having imbibed his opinions from Mark the Egyptian; and by Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 46, 47) as having been condemned together with Priscillian (both of them being laymen) by the synod of Caesar Augusta (Sargossa) A.D. 380. It is singular that in the letter of Pope Innocentius on the synod of Toledo, about A.D. 402 (Inn. Ep. 3), the name Elpidius appears as that of a presbyter who had come with others to lay before the apostolic see the state of the province of Baetica, which was distracted by Priscillianism. [ELPIDIUS (27).]

[W. H. F.]

ELPIDIUS (40), a Spanish nobleman, cousin to Theodosius I. The emperor endeavoured to obtain for him the hand of Olympias shortly after her widowhood. On her steadfast refusal of his overtures, Elpidius, imagining that she would yield to the emperor's authority, suggested the use of forcible measures. Theodosius ordered the confiscation of her property till she should be thirty years old, and forbade her to hold any intercourse with the bishops, or to go to church, but without affecting Olympias's resolution to remain a widow. (Pallad. Dial. p. 164.)

[E. V.]

ELPIDIUS (41), an Arian gentleman, who, having sent to Bonosus and Jason a work of St. Augustine's, afterwards sent to the latter a treatise by an Arian bishop, in the hope of clearing up the whole question, and reclaiming him from his supposed errors of doctrine. The reply of Augustine is directed to the object of illustrating the Catholic doctrine in this question, and is remarkable for its studious yet genuine courtesy and moderation of tone. (Aug. Ep. 242.)

[H. W. P.]

ELPIDIUS (42), one of the two imperial commissioners (Eulogius being the other) sent by Theodosius II. to represent him at the infamous "Robbers' Synod" of Ephesus, 449 A.D. Elpidius was a man of high official rank, "count of the divine assembly," a president of the council. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 105.) His whole behaviour exhibited the most unblushing partiality and a determination to intimidate the party opposed to the emperor's wishes. Stephen bishop of Ephesus having shewn hospitality to Eusebius of Dorylaeum and other members of Flavian's party, Elpidius and Eulogius paid him a domiciliary visit, with a band of 300 men, partly his own soldiers, partly disorderly monks, and threatened him with punishment for receiving the emperor's enemies (ib. 112). On the opening of the council he unblushingly took part against Flavian, delivering a long and rhetorical harangue, at the close of which he produced the emperor's letter to Dioscorus, postponing the reading of that from pope Leo (ib. 128, 145). The request of Flavian that the accuser of Eutyches, Eusebius of Dorylaeum, might be heard, was contumeliously refused by Elpidius, who rebuked the venerable prelate for daring to speak without permission of the council, and told him that the accusation was a thing of the past, and could not be entered on again (ib. 145). In the scene of excitement and disorder which followed the revocation of the condemnation of Eutyches and the sentence of deposition pronounced on Flavian and Eusebius, Elpidius and Eulogius resorted to the grossest measures of intimidation, calling in the proconsul of Asia, attended by a tumultuous body of soldiers and monks, bearing swords, clubs, and chains (ib. 112, 129). These guardians of public order, if not actual abettors of Barsumas and his brutal adherents in their assault on Flavian and the other orthodox bishops, certainly did nothing to restrain their violence. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. vol. xv. passim.)

ELPIDOFORUS, an apostate from the ranks of the Catholics during the general persecution of the orthodox in Africa by the Vandal king Hunneric, c. A.D. 484. Elpidoforus was appointed to superintend the punishments of the Catholics, and amongst those brought before him was Muritta the deacon, who had received him from the font on his baptism. Muritta before his burning produced the very towels or sheets in which he had received Elpidoforus on stepping out of the font, and reproached him with so much force that Elpidoforus was burned with fire of conscience before he entered the eternal fire, as Victor Vitensis narrates. (De Persec. Vandal. v. 9, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 246.)

ELPIDOPHORUS (1) (Mansi, Concil. iii. 148), bishop of Cuiculis. [ELPIDOPHORUS (2).]

ELPIDOPHORUS (2), bishop of Anastasiopolis, in Caria, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 913; Mansi, ix. 394.)

ELPIN, of Glais-Naidhean (Glasnevin, an ancient monastery founded by St. Berchan, who is better known as Mobhi Clairenech (Oct. 12), on the Liffey, near Dublin [BERCHAN (4)]), died A.D. 753. (Four Mast.)

[J. G.]

ELPIS (1), one of the aeons in the system of VALENTINUS (Iren. I. i. p. 7; Hippol. Ref. vi. 30, p. 187; Epiph. Haer. 31, pp. 165, 169).

[G. S.]

ELPIS (2), martyr with Pistis, Agape, and their mother Sophia. [CARITAS.]

ELPIS (3) (also written HELPIS), daughter of Festus, a Roman senator, and, according to a doubtful tradition, wife of Boethius, who at one period of his life was certainly married to Rusticana, the daughter of Symmachus [BOETHIUS]. The only evidence for the double marriage of Boethius to be found in his writings is the passage in the Consolatio Philosophiae (Lib. ii. Proa. 3), "Quis non te felicissimum . . . tanto splendore sacerorum . . . praedicavit"? which is obviously capable of a different interpretation. Elpis is the reputed authoress of two hymns in the breviary addressed to the Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, Decora his aeternitatis auream, and Beate Pastor Petre clemens accipe (Migne, Patrologia, vol. lxxiii. p. 538). An epitaph upon this lady in six elegiac couplets (ibid. p. 558) speaks of her as "Siculae regionis alumna," and records the fact that she followed her husband into banishment. It has been ascribed, but without authority, to Boethius himself (Vallini, Vit. Boeth. praefat.). [E. M. Y.]

ELPISTUS, a contemporary of Dionysius bishop of Corinth. [DIONYSIUS (3)]. Eusebius relates that Dionysius attributes his letter to the Amastriani and other churches of Pontus to the influence of Bacchylides and Elpistus (Euseb. H. E. iv. 23). [W. M. S.]

ELRIC, son of Ealdwulf (or Aldulf) king of East Anglia, according to Nennius, who is the only authority for his existence. He would thus be the brother of Eadburga abbess of Repton. (Nenn. Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 74c; Lappenberg, Hist. Eng. i. 287.) [C. H.]

ELTUTUS (Nennius, Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 74A), Welsh saint. [ILTUTUS]. [C. H.]

ELUEUS, ELUIUS, bishop of Menevia. [ELVAEUS].

ELUOC (ELNOT, ELUOT, ELWAD) was bishop at Caergyli in Anglesey, and in the Achaw Saint says Prydain is identified with ELBOD, bishop of Bangor. (Myo. Arch. ii. 42.) [J. G.]

ELURION, A.D. 347, Egyptian bishop, present at the Council of Sardica (Mansi, iii. 68 d; Athanas. i. 133). [W. M. S.]

ELUSIUS (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 199), deacon. [ELUERIUS (1)]. [C. H.]

ELVAED (ELANG, ELAVE, ELVOED, ELWAED), are all probably names of the same person who is numbered among the bishops of Menevia or St. David's, but beyond the names we know nothing; it is suggested by Professor Stubbs that he may be Elvod or Elbod, bishop of Bangor (A.D. 755-800) [ELBOD], but it is very doubtful for many reasons, though the names are similar. (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 155, 157; Girald. Camb. Itin. Camb. ii. c. i. wks. vi.; Godwin, de Praesul. Angl. 601). [J. G.]

ELVAN (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. p. 152), legendary bishop of London. [ELFAN]. [C. H.]

ELVEIS, Welsh saint. [ELFERI].

ELVETUS, bishop of Arezzo, 775. (Capelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 76; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 412.) [A. H. D. A.]

ELVIANDUS (HELVIANDUS), bishop of Treviso (Tarvisium). When Attila had sacked Aquileia, Concordia, and other neighbouring cities, and was approaching Treviso the bishop saved the town by a prompt surrender, A.D. 452. (Ughelli, Italia Sacra, v. 490; Gams, Series Episc. 803.) [L. D.]

ELVOD (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. p. 157), bishop of Bangor, archbishop of Gwynned. [ELBOD, ELVAED]. [C. H.]

ELVODUGUS, educated at Bangor in Wales, and author of Historia Britonum, lib. i., is probably the same as St. Elbod, whose contemporary he is otherwise said to have been, though his reputed date (A.D. 590) is at least two centuries before St. Elbod's time. Pitseus (de Illust. Angl. Script. 103) calls him Elvodugus Probus, and adheres to the early date; he also gives a separate account of Elbodus, and yet he appears to give an account of the same individual in both memoirs. [ELBOD]. (Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. 135; Tanner, Bibl. 262.) [J. G.]

ELVOED, bishop of Menevia (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. p. 155). [ELVAED, ELBOD]. [C. H.]

ELVOGUS (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. p. 156), bishop of Llandaff. [ELWOG]. [C. H.]

ELWAED. [ELVAED].

ELWARD (ELGWORED), a clerical witness to grants of land to Llandaff when Teilo and Arwystyl were the bishops in the 6th century (Lib. Lund. by Rees, 358-60, 412-13). When St. Oudoceus was chosen to succeed St. Teilo, Elward was one of the most prominent electors. According to the Life of St. Oudoceus, he, Merchwyn, and Cynfyn went, apparently as delegates from the clergy, to present the bishop-elect to the Archbishop of Canterbury for consecration. (ib. 372.) There can be little doubt but he is the Elgwored who attended the school of St. Dubricius at Hentland on the Wye [DUBRICIUS] (ib. 324). [J. G.]

ELWINUS (1), ST., or Alunus, one of Breaca's companions in her voyage from Ireland to Cornwall. A life of him was extant in Leland's time (Itin. iii. p. 5, 15, 16, 21). His day was Feb. 22. The parish named after him, St. Allen, is a little way north of Truro, and the parish between it and the sea is dedicated to St. Perran, also an Irish saint. [C. W. B.]

ELWINUS (2) (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 77, ed. Hardy), brother of Egfrid. [ELFWIN]. [C. H.]

ELWOED (ELWOID, ELWOD), abbat of St. Illtyd's, now Lantwit Major, and witness to several grants of land to the see of Llandaff, when Oudoceus and Berthgwyn were bishops, in the 6th century (Lib. Land. by Rees, 402 sq.). [J. G.]

ELWOG (ELVOGUS) was bishop of Llandaff in the time of Meurig, Rhys, Ffernwael, and Rhodri, sons of Ithael, king of Glewysig (Glamorgan). He is said by Usher to have been the sixteenth bishop of Llandaff, and the Liber Landavensis places him next to bishop Trychan, but the editor inserts three bishops between them and counts Elwog only the ninth prelate at Llandaff. He must have flourished in the second half of the 8th century. Professor Stubbs suggests his identity with Elbod, bishop of Bangor. (Lib. Landav. 460, 626; Ussher, Eocl. Ant. c. 5, wks. v. 110; Godwin, de Praesul. Angl. 625; Stubbs, Regist. Sacr. 156.) [J. G.]

ELWORED. [ELWARD.]

ELWYSTYL (ELGISTIL), one of the clergy under St. Dubricius, is placed among the bishops of Llandaff, but only as one of the suffragans, according to the system instituted by St. Teilo, who "raised (suitable persons) to the episcopacy, sending them through the country, and giving dioceses to them to suit the convenience of the clergy and the people." Elwystyl appears to have been stationed in Ergyng, and flourished in the first half of the 6th century, in the times of Cynfyn and Gwyddai, sons of Pebiau, kings of Ergyng. (Lib. Landav. by Rees, 352, 409, 624; Godwin, de Praesul. Angl. 622; Stubbs, Reg. Sacr. Angl. 156.) [J. G.]

ELXAI (Epiphan. Haeres. xix.), founder of Elkesaites. [ELKESAI.] [C. H.]

ELYMAS, a presbyter, martyred in Persia, together with Polychronius bishop of Babylon, and several other presbyters and deacons during the Decian persecution. Commemorated April 22. (Boll. Acta SS. Apr. iii. 11; Tillem. Hist. Eccles. v. 561; Baron. Annal. 254, 27.) [T. S. B.]

ELYW. [ELLYW.]

EMA or AMA—May 22. Martyr with six other nuns, captives with Eliabus. [ELIABUS.] They were offered freedom on condition of marriage and offering sacrifice. They refused, and were at once beheaded. (Assem. Mart. Orient. i. 144.) [G. T. S.]

EMAGOLA. [MOLOCUS.]

EMAN, a clerical witness to a grant made to Grecielis, bishop of Llandaff, late in the 7th or early in the 8th century (Lib. Land. by Rees, 417-18). [J. G.]

EMANT, of Cluain, commemorated July 1. He is called a bishop by Mar. O'Gorman, and his name is inserted by the second hand in the Martyrology of Donegal (by Todd and Reeves, 185 and n. 2). It appears in the Kalendar of the Arbuthnott Missal (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 102), in the phonetic form of St. Evan, bishop. [J. G.]

EMANUEL, archimandrite. [EMMANUEL.]

EMANUS, martyred at Chartres in the 6th century with St. Maurilius and St. Almerus. According to the legend he was a Cappadocian, who in early youth made a pilgrimage to Rome, where pope Leo befriended him and furthered his education. After a stay of seven years, he conceived the desire of visiting the shrine of St. Nazarius at Milan. Here he stayed two years, and then proceeded to that of St. Symphorian at Autun, but a little later, warned by a vision, quitted that city to preach the Gospel at Chartres. In a remote part of that district he was set upon by thieves, who received with contempt his exhortations to them to lead a better life, and slew him on the 16th of May, the day on which he is honoured at Chartres. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 595.) [S. A. B.]

EMCHAT (EMCHATH), an old man in Glen Urquhart, on the side of Loch Ness, Inverness-shire, who was converted and baptized by St. Columba, and then passed to the Lord. His son Virolec also believed, and was baptized with all his house (Adamnan, Vit. S. Col. iii. c. 14). [J. G.]

EMEBERTUS, bishop of Cambray. [HILDEBERTUS.]

EMERENTIANA, a virgin, martyr at Rome, A.D. 304. She was the foster-sister of Agnes [AGNES]; as she mourned for her at her tomb, she was stoned by a crowd of people. She was at the time a catechumen. She is commemorated Jan. 23. (Mon. Bas.; Mart. Ad. Us.; Baron. Annal. 304, 31.) [T. S. B.]

EMERIA (1) is the name given by Joceline and Evinus in their Lives of St. Patrick to the two daughters of St. Patrick's master Milcho, and sisters of bishop Guasacht (Jan. 24) of Granard. While Joceline (c. 36) gives few particulars regarding them except their place of burial, Evinus (Trip. Vit. i. c. 20, ii. cc. 30, 137) gives first an account of a wonderful dream by Milcho, and then tells how St. Patrick placed bishop Guasacht over the church of Granard, co. Longford, and the two sisters were put in charge of the neighbouring nunnery of Cluain-bronach, now Clonbroney, where at death they were interred, and are now venerated on July 11 (Colgan, Acta SS. 741, col. 2, and Tr. Thawn. 73, c. 36, 100 n. 36, 120, c. 20, 133, c. 30, 148, c. 137, 170, n. 2). Lanigan (Eocl. Hist. Ir. i. 146, 219, 405) allows that there may have been such persons in Ireland, and even at Clonbroney, but sees many difficulties in the way of his receiving them and Guasacht as children of the unfortunate Milcho or Maelchu.

EMERIA (2), one of St. Triduana's two companions at Rescob, Forfarshire [TRIDUANA] (Brev. Aberd. Prop. SS. p. aestiv. f. 122). [J. G.]

EMERINUS (EAMENUS), a bishop of Limoges, whose name is found in the catalogues between Atticus and Hermogenian, who flourished in the 3rd century. He is not mentioned in the letter written by Jordanus bishop of Limoges to pope Benedict VIII., in which he gives a list of the early bishops of the see in their chronological order. (Gallia Christ. ii. 501, Instrumenta, 163; Gams, Series Episc. 564.) [L. D.]

EMERITA (1), supposed sister of the British king Lucius. Her death by martyrdom, after she had followed her brother in his missionary journeys, is placed at Trimas or Trimontium, near Curia, now Coire, or Chur, the capital town of the Swiss canton Grisons, A.D. 193. Her feast is Dec. 4. Dempster has her commemoration at May 26 and Dec. 3, and with other Scotch authorities gives her nativity to Scotia (Ussher, Eocl. Ant. cc. 3, 6, wks. v. 53 sq. 166; Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. iv. 16; Dempster, Hist. Eocl. Gent. Scot. i. 261; Rees, Welsh Saints, 83, 316). [J. G.]

EMERITA (3), virgin martyr at Rome, together with Digna. They were put to death during the Valerian persecution, circ. A.D. 257. Commemorated Sept. 22. (A.A. SS. Sept. vi. 302.) [T. S. B.]

EMERITA (3), sister of Cornelia, confessor. (Cyp. Epp. 21, 22.) [MACARIUS.] [E. W. B.]

EMERITUS (1), Donatist bishop of Julia Caesarea, or Jol, once an important town on the coast of Morocco, now called Scherschell (Shaw, Trav. p. 18).

A conference between the Catholics and Donatists was held at Carthage in June, A.D. 411, by command of Honorius, at which Marcellinus the proconsul presided. For the general character of the discussion, and the part taken in it by Emeritus, see above, vol. i. pp. 893, 894, but some remarks may here be added to illustrate his own character. He may be described as shewing himself a pertinacious and adroit, and to this extent able, partisan and special pleader, exhibiting much profession of fairness and anxiety that the case should be decided on its real merits, but meanwhile making it his business to divert attention from them, affecting a mock modesty as to his own slowness of comprehension, and on this ground repeatedly asking for more time to consider the whole matter, declaring his inability to understand the grounds taken by his opponents, and complaining of their alleged attempt to regard the Donatists and not themselves as the challenging party. He attempted also to shew that the ground taken by them in their invitation to discuss the disputed questions was different from that laid down by the imperial commission, that the genuineness of the invitation itself was doubtful, and that there was on the part of the Catholics a wish to conceal the truth in this matter. At the same time he disclaimed any obligation of being bound by the result of the discussion, insisted on regarding the question as merely an African one, and protested against its being extended beyond the limits of Africa alone.

When Augustine replied that it affected not the African church only, but the universal church of Christ, Emeritus accused him of shifting his ground, and of taxing him with a fault of which he himself was guilty. When the president recalled the attention of the Donatists to the real question, viz. whether the case was to be argued on the ground of fact or on that of doctrine, Emeritus replied, that if there were two grounds there ought to have been two commissions, and to the remark of Augustine, that if facts were to be judged, they must be attested by evidence, if doctrine, arguments taken from Scripture must be used, Emeritus repeated his former protest against treating the Donatists as challengers of the discussion. When Augustine asked whether they abandoned their objection to the consecration of Caecilianus, Emeritus complained that if they did so they were treated as challengers; if not, the Catholics claimed the right of replying to them as objectors. He protested against the importation into the controversy of the name of Caecilianus. Had the proceedings concerning him made him a righteous man or not? The church ought to be pure, and is vitiated by the presence of impure persons.

The world is not the church, nor does God in any way regard the two as identical. The above account is taken from the Monumenta Vetera de Don. Hist. in Oberthür's edition of Optatus, No. 53, pp. 286-482; see also Ribbek, Don. und Aug. pp. 515-608.

On Sept. 20, 418, a meeting of Catholic bishops was held at Caesarea by desire of Zosimus, bishop of Rome, at which Deuterius, the metropolitan, presided. Emeritus, who happened to be in the place at this time, was invited to attend. Having mentioned the insinuations which were current as to the unfairness of the inquiry, whose decision it was said had been purchased by the Catholics, Augustine called on him to give a reason why, after the decisions against him and his party, he still refused to rejoin the church. Having recited the declaration of the Catholic bishops previous to the inquiry, in order to shew their candour and spirit of fairness, Augustine gave a summary of the Maximianist proceedings, in which Emeritus had taken a prominent part as a member of the council of Bazaia, and by assisting in drawing up its decision, if not, as Augustine appears to say, actually dictating it. He shewed that these had been pressed without effect upon the Donatists at the inquiry, and pointed out their inconsistency therein. But he failed in drawing from his opponent any satisfactory reply. (Aug. de Gestis cum Emer. vol. ix. p. 698; Tillemont, lxxvii., lxxvii.; DONATISM, sup. 887.)

Two days after this Emeritus was present at a discourse delivered by Augustine in the principal church of Caesarea, in which, while he justified the imperial proceedings against the Donatists, proceedings which they chose to call persecution, he entreated his former opponent to return to the communion of the church. Augustine mentions in his Retractations that shortly after this he addressed a letter to Emeritus, containing an account of the points in which he thought the Donatists had been vanquished in argument, but this letter is not extant. From this time we hear no more of Emeritus. (Aug. Serm. ad Pop. Caes. vol. ix. p. 690; Retract. ii. 46, 51; Epp. 190, 193, c. Gaud. i. 14; Possidius, Vit. Aug. c. 14; Ribbek, u. s. pp. 645, 649.) [H. W. P.]

EMERITUS (2), bishop of Macri in the African province of Mauritania Sitifensis, summoned to Carthage to confer with the Arians by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484; at the conclusion of the conference he was sent into banishment, where he died. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 207; Gams, Series Episc. 466.) [L. D.]

EMERITUS (3), eleventh archbishop of Embrun, succeeding Salonius, who was deposed for treason and followed by St. Alfonsus, is said to have held the see from A.D. 585 to 610. He was present at the second council of Mâcon in 585, and himself convened a provincial synod in A.D. 588. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Frana. lib. v. cap. 28; Labbe, Conc. vi. 681, 692; Ceillier, Hist. des Autours Sacrés, xi. 896; Gall. Christ. iii. 1063.) [S. A. B.]

EMERITUS (4), a reader, who suffered martyrdom along with Saturninus and many others at Abitina in Africa during the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 303. He openly avowed that as assembly had been held in his house on a Sunday, and refused to surrender the sacred books, for, said he, "they are written on my heart." He was commemorated on Feb. 11 or, according to some, on Feb. 12. (Boll. AA. SS. Feb. ii. 513-519; Baluze, Miscell. Hist. i. 14; Ceillier, iii. 20; Vict. Vit. de Pers. Vand. lib. iii.; Ruinart, AA. Sinc. Mart. 382; Baron. Annal. 303, 36, 49.)

EMERIUS (1), bishop of Treves. [EVEMERUS.]

EMERIUS (2), the eighth bishop of Saintes, succeeding Eusebius, flourished in A.D. 562 or 563. His election was irregular, for he had usurped the see on the sole authority of a mandate of king Clotaire, without the consent of his metropolitan, who was absent, and apparently without having obtained the suffrages of the people and clergy. Accordingly, Leontius the archbishop of Bourges convened a council of the bishops of his province at Saintes, and having deprived Emerius, put Heraclius a priest of Bourges in his place (Labbe, Conc. vi. 527; Gall. Ch. ii. 1057). The document attesting the fresh election, subscribed by the archbishop and bishops, was forwarded to king Charibert, who had succeeded his father Clotaire. Charibert at once ordered Emerius to be reinstated, and sent his officers to exact a thousand gold pieces from Leontius, and from the rest according to their ability, and so avenged the insult. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 26; Ceill. Hist. des Autours Sacrés, xi. 886-7.) This was one of the high-handed impieties to which Baronius (ann. 566, n. xviii.) ascribes Charibert's death. But he infers from some verses of Venantius Fortunatus, lib. i. (given in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 74), that Emerius continued to hold the see, and was reconciled to Leontius.

EMERIUS (3), ST., son of St. Candida, founder and first abbat of the monastery of Banyoles (Balneolum) in Catalonia. He lived during the time when the Gothic inhabitants of Spain were hard pressed by the Mahometans, during the life of Charles Martel, A.D. 739; other traditions assign him to the time of Charlemagne. (AA. SS. Boll. 27 Jan. ii. 781.)

EMERUS, bishop of Treves. [EVEMERUS.]

EMETERICUS, bishop of Tarentaise. [EMETERIUS.]

EMETERIUS (1) AGRICOLA (MATINUS, ST. MADIR), said to have suffered martyrdom near Barcelona about A.D. 680. He was commemorated on March 3. (Boll. AA. SS. Mart. i. 244.)

EMETERIUS (2) only known as a subscriber of the fifth council of Arles, A.D. 554. He was not present, but was represented by Claudianus, a deacon. The name of his see was not added, and he has been claimed conjecturally as the sixth bishop of Riez, and the eighth of Marseilles. The latter is Le Cointe's conjecture, and is the more probable. (Le Cointe, an. 554, n. xvii. vol. i. p. 799; Gall. Christ. i. 394, 637; Labbe, Conc. vi. 462.)

EMETHERIUS (HAEMATERIUS, HEMETERIUS, HEMITHERIUS), martyr, who is said to have suffered along with Celedonius, at Calaguria, the modern Calahorra, on the river Ebro. He must have lived before Prudentius, but at what period is quite uncertain (Gregor. Turon. de Glor. Mart. i. 93, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 825). He was commemorated on March 3. Prudentius composed a poem (Peristeph. Hymn i.) in honour of the two martyrs (ibid. lx. 275; AA. SS. Boll. Mart. i. 228). The Bollandists distinguish between this martyr and Emeterius. (Vet. Rom. Mart., Usuard., Adon., Notker., Wandalb. In Mart. Hieron. he occurs as Eremitas.)

EMIGDIUS (EMYGDIUS), first bishop and tutelary saint of Asculum or Ascoli in Picenum. In the reign of Diocletian he came out of Germany, with twelve brothers, to visit the tombs of the martyrs at Rome, where by his zealous preaching, overthrowing a statue of Aesculapius and casting it into the Tiber, he so exasperated the praefect that Marcellus bishop of Rome ordained him bishop and sent him for safety to Asculum. Here he eventually suffered martyrdom under the praefect Polimnius, A.D. 303 or 304. The Roman Martyrology commemorates him on Aug. 5. His Life has been written by Appiani, the Jesuit historian of Ascoli, but the authorities for his highly legendary Acta are allowed by Boschius to be conflicting and suspicious. (Ughel. Ital. Sac. i. 439; Baron. Annal. 309, iv.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. ii. 25; Paolo Antonio Appiani, Vita di San Emidio, Rom. 1702.)

[C. H.]

EMILA (1), bishop of Barcelona (?) from about A.D. 600 to about 615. His name appears among the signatures to the disputed decretum Gundemari [GUNTIMAR], which professes to date from 610. An Emila is also found among the subscriptions to the synod of the province of Tarracensis, held at Egara in 615. No see is mentioned, but as Barcelona is one of the suffragan bishoprics of Tarragona, it seems justifiable to identify this Emila with the Emila ecclesiae Barcinonensis episcopus in Gunthimar's decree, which, even if not of the date it pretends to be, was probably put together with the help of documents now inaccessible to us. It is not pretended in any case that the decretum is later than 681 (Esp. Sigr. xxix. 128; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 342 and 324.)

[SEVERUS, ST.]

EMILA (2), bishop of Mentesa. After the (disputed) synod of Carthaginensian bishops at Toledo, in 610, and the decree of Gunthimar in the same year [GUNTIMAR] (which documents are appended to the Acts of C. Tol. xii.), there appear in the most ancient MSS. three letters, or Suggestiones, from the clergy and people of Mentesa, the first from Sesuld in the name of the clergy, the second from Sunila, whom Florez takes to have been the chief civil authority, and the third from John, Ermengild, and Vivendus, in the name of the people of Mentesa, asking that one Emila of noble birth and character, should be consecrated "per Dei et vestram ordinationem." There is no name given of the church to which the letters were addressed, and we have no farther mention of Emila; but if the letters, together with the synod and decree, are genuine and not a forgery of the time of Julian, it is probable, as Gams has suggested, that the letters were tacked on to the Acts of the synod and to Gunthimar's decree, as documentary evidence in support of the claim to supremacy then brought forward by, and formally conceded to, Toledo, and that Emila must be dated, not after 610, but before 589, between which years the names of the bishops of Mentesa are known (Esp. Sagr. vii. 255, Aguirre-Catalani; Gams, Kirchengesch. vol. ii. pt. 2, 77). [M. A. W.]

EMILA (3), bishop of Ilici (Elche), subscribes the acts of the fifteenth council of Toledo under Egica, A.D. 688, as "Elicitanae, qui et Elotanae sedis Episcopus." For the connexion of the see of Ilici with the older bishopric of Elotana vid. SERPENTINUS. (Esp. Sagr. vii. 241; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 313.) [M. A. W.]

EMILA (4), the last bishop of Coimbra under the Gothic rule whose name remains to us. He signs the acts of the sixteenth Council of Toledo, under Egica, A.D. 693. (Esp. Sagr. xiii. 76; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333.) [LUCENCIUS.] [M. A. W.]

EMILA (5), deacon of Cordova, martyr with Hieremias, a layman, under the Saracens. They were proficient in the Arabian tongue, in which they so eloquently denounced the false prophet beyond all previous example that the Saracens meditated the extirpation of the whole Christian church at Cordova. Eulogius of Toledo gives Sept. 15 as their day (Eulog. Tolet. Memor. SS. ii. 12, in Patr. Lat. cxv. 793). Emila is named also Emilianus. [EMILIANUS (15).] [C. H.]

EMILIANUS (1) (AEMILIANUS), reckoned by the Sammarthani, according to their authorities, the first bishop of Valence in Gaul. He is mentioned, without any see, among the bishops who attended the council of Valence in the year 374. (Bruna, Canon. Apost. ii. 111; Gall. Christ. xvi. 291; Ceillier, iv. 600.) [C. H.]

EMILIANUS (2) I., eleventh bishop of Vercelli, cir. A.D. 500, present at the third and fourth councils of Rome under Symmachus (Mansi, viii. 252 a, 268 c), buried in the church of St. Eusebius, where his remains were discovered in 1081; commemorated Sept. 11. It is stated that he was born in Spain in the town of Libyum, that he was a disciple of bishop Felix, and a hermit for forty years, and that his great fame caused him to be unanimously elected bishop by the clergy and people of Vercelli (Boll. Acta SS. 11 Sept. iii. 797; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 762). The story of his life thus crosses that of the famous Spanish San Millan. [EMILIANUS (8).] [C. H.]

EMILIANUS (3) II., twenty-second bishop of Vercelli according to Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. iv. 763), who is followed by Gams. The period assigned to him is the year A.D. 653, and he is stated to have received many privileges from the Lombard king, Aripert I. Some confusion with Emilianus III. may be suspected. [C. H.]

EMILIANUS (4) III., bishop of Vercelli. In a deed of Aripert II., king of the Lombards, dated Oct. 9, 706 (Troya, Cod. Diplom. 3, p. 80), Emilianus receives a confirmation of the lands which Gauderius ("olim noster miles nunc autem . . . abbas") had given to the monastery known afterwards as that of St. Michele di Lucedio near Vercelli. Aripert also decrees that the monastery which Emilianus had consecrated should be under the control of himself and his successors. (See also Historiae Patriae Monumenta Chartarum, vol. i. 13-15. The charter belongs to A.D. 706 or 707, according as the "fifth indiction" is reckoned. Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. iv. 763) has no Emilianus III., and calls this bishop, of whom he relates the same facts, Magnetius, the twenty-fifth in his list. See the preceding article.) [A. H. D. A.]

EMILIANUS (5) patriarch of Grado, 749 to 757. See Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ix. 749. For the relations of Grado and Aquileia, see ELIAS and EPIPHANIUS. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 1090.) [A. H. D. A.]

EMILIANUS (6) (AEMILIANUS), an Irish bishop, patron of Faventia, now Faenza, in the north of Italy (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 10; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. Nov. 12, p. 198; Mon. Hist. Brit. i. 193 n. b). [J. G.]

EMILIANUS (7) (AEMILIANUS), a hermit who retired into the forest of Ponticiacum in Auvergne. This locality has been thought to be either Pontgibaud at the sources of the Sioule, west of Clermont beyond the Puy de Dôme mountain, or Pionsat at the north-west angle of the dep. Puy de Dôme. Here he passed his life in prayer and manual labour, with the birds and wild beasts for his familiar companions. He died at the age of ninety, A.D. 538, leaving what possessions he had to his disciple Brachio. (Greg. Tur. Vit. Patr. c. 12, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 1210; Ceillier, xi. 381.) [L. D.]

EMILIANUS (8) (AEMILIANUS, SAN MILLAN), solitary; one of the most famous and ancient of Spanish saints, claimed by the Spanish Benedictines as joint patron of Spain with St. James (Sandoval, Fundaciones de San Benito en España, Madrid, 1601). The only original source of information about him is the life of him by St. Braulio bishop of Saragossa, written about fifty years after his death, on the testimony of four of his disciples—Citonatus, Sophronius, Gerontius, and a holy woman Potamia. St. Braulio died about 657, and we have a mention of his life of Emilianus by St. Ildefonso (de Script. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. 12), which must have been written before 667. The life was written for the express purpose of being read on the saint's feast-day, November 12, and was sent to the bishop's brother Fronimianus, accompanied by an Iambic hymn, which appears at length in the Mozarabic Breviary. It was first published by Sandoval in 1601.

St. Braulio gives no dates and no names of parents, but the common tradition is that St. Emilianus was born about 473, and died about 572, not long before the destruction of the town of Amaya in Cantabria (Dahn, v. 150), by Leovigild in 573, a fact mentioned in the Acta as having been prophesied by the saint "ante annum fere migrationis suae centesimum vero vitae." His birth-place and the site of his oratory have given rise to endless controversy, Castile claiming him as a native of the Rioja, a district of Old Castile, born at Berceo, close to the existing monastery of San Millan, while Aragon puts forward Verdeyo, near Calatayud. The name of his native place is given by St. Braulio as Vergegium. The question then is, is Vergegium represented by Berceo in Castile or Verdejo in Aragon? and which relics are genuine—those at Torrelapaja near Verdejo, or those at San Millan near Berceo? In the fiftieth volume of the España Sagrada, Señor Lafuente devotes a good deal of space to these difficulties, and comes to the following conclusions: (1) that Vergegium is Verdejo, and that San Millan was therefore a native of the Arragonese diocese of Tarrazona; (2) that the cult of the saint at or near the present San Millan is extremely ancient, and springs from the fact that the saint passed the first forty years of his anchorite life on the mountain of La Cogolla, which overhangs the monastery, being recalled thence by command of the bishop of Tarrazona; (3) that his oratory, of which St. Braulio speaks as the scene of his last years (“ubi nunc ejus habetur corpusculum gloriosum”), is rather to be identified with Torrelapaja, near Verdejo, than with the site of the upper and elder monastery of San Millan de Suso, near Berceo. The archives of the monastery, however, from the 12th to the 16th century have been so hopelessly tampered with and falsified that it is almost impossible to arrive at the facts of the original cult or of the early history of the community. The present Benedictine house was probably founded in the 11th century in the time of the Clunian reform, though there may have been an older community there, and the cult of the saint on the Cogolla mountain is certainly very much older. (Esp. Sagrada, vol. i. p. 2.)

Emilianus began life as a shepherd, and it was while following his flock over the mountains that the dream overtook him which was the cause of his conversion. Moved by what seemed the direct call of God to a holy life, he betook himself to St. Felix, a neighbouring hermit, living at Bilibium (absorbed in the 12th century into the modern town of Haro), and was by him instructed in Catholic belief and practice. Thence he returned to Vergegium (Verdejo), but finding his life there too public on account of the strangers who flocked to see him, he soon left it for the mountains, wandering north-west into the remotest parts of the mountainous district between Burgos and Logrono (“ad remotiora Distertii montis secreta”). For 40 years he lived a hermit's life there, for the most part on or near the peak of La Cogolla (according to the tradition of the monastery; there is no mention of the Cogolla of St. Braulio's life), whence the after name of the monastery which commemorated him—San Millan de la Cogolla. At last, attracted by the fame of his extraordinary sanctity, Didymus, bishop of Tarrazona (Turiasso), sent for him, and much against the saint's will ordained him presbyter, imposing upon him at the same time the cure of Vergegium, his birthplace. In this office his entire unworldliness (locupletem reddens ecclesiam Christi virtutibus non opibus; religione non redditibus; Christianis non rebus) drew upon him the hatred of his brother clergy. He was accused before Didymus of wasting the goods of the church, and deprived of his cure. Thus released from an unwelcome office, Emilianus retired to an oratory near Vergegium, and there passed the rest of his life. During this second period of retirement, although the severity of his personal asceticism increased rather than diminished with time, he allowed himself to be surrounded by a small circle of disciples and became widely famed for his charity and tenderness towards the poor. In extreme old age he even allowed himself to be nursed by certain holy women (habitabat cum sacris virginibus), a fact which, taken together with the mention of his possessing a horse at one time upon which he rode to church, seems to dispose of the absurd assertions of later times that St. Emilianus was the founder of a Benedictine monastery and himself a Benedictine abbat. St. Braulio nowhere speaks of him as monachus, but only as presbyter; there is of course no mention of any monastery, though we hear of friends and disciples, and we are told that he died in the arms of a certain “Arellum presbyterum, cum quo habebat collegium.” Ildefonsus indeed speaks of St. Braulio's life as “vitam cujusdam monachi,” and Braulio himself applies the title of abbat to Citonatus, one of the four disciples and eye-witnesses, a fact however which proves nothing for the Benedictines, as monachism in Spain is at least as old as the mention of it at the Council of Saragossa in 380. On the whole it seems most likely that the Benedictine rule was unknown in Spain during the whole Visigoth period. (Mem. de la Real Acad. de Hist. de España, vol. vii. p. 469. See arts. FROMISTAN and ST. MARTIN of Braga.) About the beginning of the 13th century there was a curious upgrowth of legend, of miraculous appearances, forged privileges, and so forth, round San Millan and his monastery. Of this the Latin and Castilian versions of the famous Privilegio de los Votos (Sandoval, Fundaciones, &c. i. fol. 46), and the Vida de San Millan of Gonzalez Berceo, written about 1240, and one of the earliest monuments of Spanish vernacular poetry are well known instances. (Tamayo de Salazar, Martyr. Hisp. vi. 109; Esp. Sagrada, l. 2; Mabillon, saec. i.; Yepes, Chron. Benedictin. i. ann. 572; Sanchez, Poesias Cast. ant. al Siglo XV. vol. ii.) [M. A. W.]

EMILIANUS (9) (AEMILIANUS), a notary who was retained by Gregory the Great amongst his clerics, and with his company wrote down from the pope's delivery (excepit) the forty homilies on the Gospels, as we learn from the life of Gregory by John the Deacon (lib. ii. 11, in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxiii. 48; Ceillier, r. 550). [L. D.]

EMILIANUS (10) (AEMILIAN, EMINIAN, EMMIAN), abbat of Lagny. At March 10, Colgan (Acta SS. 573–574) gives a memoir, “De S. Aemiliano Abbate Latiniacensi ex Jacobo Desmayo et aliis.” This was a disciple of St. Fursey (Jan. 16), and a follower in his footsteps, first in study and discipline, and then across the sea. He left Ireland and joined St. Fursey at Lagny, in France. When St. Fursey set out for England, shortly before his death by the way, he gave his monastery at Lagny (Latiniacense), in charge to Emilian, who unless, as some say, St. Eloi was chosen by the brethren successor of St. Fursey at Lagny, continued to rule it until his own death. The date of this is unknown, but he must have flourished about A.D. 648, and his festival at Lagny was on Mar. 10, as we gather from Menardus in the Benedictine, and from Saussayus in the Gallican Martyrologies. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 278-79; Gall. Christ. vii. 491; Mabill. Acta SS. O.S.B. saec. ii. 624, ed. 1733.) [J. G.]

EMILIANUS (11), martyr in Lesser Armenia, with Dionysius and Sebastian; commemorated Feb. 8. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hier., Ad., Us., Wand.) [T. S. B.]

EMILIANUS (12), martyr in Numidia with bishops Agapius and Secundinus, during the persecution of Valerian, A.D. 259. He is commemorated April 29. (Mart. Ad., Us.) [T. S. B.]

EMILIANUS (13) (AEMILIANUS), the Spanish governor who condemned St. Fructuosus and his companions to death at Tarragona, A.D. 259. [FRUCTUOSUS.] (A.A. SS. 21 Jan. ii. 340; Ceillier, ii. 387.) [L. D.]

EMILIANUS (14), martyr at Dorostorum, in Moesia, during the reign of Julian. He entered an idol temple, broke the statues of the gods, and scattered the victims. He then went and informed upon himself to the governor of the province, by whom he was condemned to be burned alive. (Men. Bas.; Mart. Us.) Commemorated July 18. [T. S. B.]

EMILIANUS (15), a deacon, martyred at Cordova with Hieremias. Commemorated Sept. 17, according to Usuard, but Eulogius assigns him (under the name of Emila) a different day. (Mart. Us.) [EMILA (5).] [T. S. B.]

EMILIANUS (16) (AEMILIANUS), physician and martyr in Africa during the persecution under Hunneric king of the Vandals; commemorated Dec. 6. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Ad., Us.) [T. S. B.]

EMILIUS (1), an African martyr, commemorated May 22. [CASTUS (2).] (Mart. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Ad., Us.; Cal. Carth.) [T. S. B.]

EMILIUS (2), a martyr in Sardinia along with Felix and two others. Commemorated May 28. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Ad., Us.) [T. S. B.]

EMILIUS (3), martyr at Capua during the Diocletian persecution. Commemorated Oct. 6. (Mart. Hier., Ad., Us.) [T. S. B.]

EMILIUS (4) (AEMILIUS), a bishop, the father of Ia, whose epithalamium on her marriage with Julian of Elana was written by St. Paulinus of Nola, who speaks in flattering terms of her father. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxi. 607; Ceillier, viii. 86.) [L. D.]

EMILIUS (5) (AEMILIUS), ST., bishop of Beneventum, was sent to the emperor Arcadius by pope Innocent and the Roman council concerning the affairs of St. John Chrysostom, A.D. 405. He is identified by some with the bishop Aemilius mentioned by St. Paulinus of Nola in the epithalamium on the marriage of Julian and Ia (Paulin. Nolan., Poem. xxvi., in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxi. 638, 922 note 292; Sarnelli, De' Vescovi Benev. 23; Mansi, iii. 1162.) [L. D.]

EMILIUS (6) (AEMILIUS), father of Remigius (St. Remi) bishop of Rheims. According to the traditions embodied in the lives of St. Remi, Emilius was an illustrious man, and he is said by some to have been a count. (A.A. SS. Boll., Oct. i. 65, 135.) [L. D.]

EMILIUS (7) (Gall. Chr. ii. 500), bishop of Limoges. [EBBO.] [C. H.]

EMIN, EMINUS. [EIMHIN.]

EMINENTIUS, a Donatist bishop, who, instead of appearing personally at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411, sent his signature by Felix bishop of Novasinnus (Mon. Vet. Don. ed. Oberthür, p. 460.) [H. W. P.]

EMINIANUS, abbat of Lagny. [EMILIANUS (10.)]

EMINO, bishop of Tarentaise. [EMMO.]

EMITERIOUS, EMITERIUS, twelfth bishop of Tarentaise, succeeding Budemar and followed by Widenardus, about the middle of the 7th century. The name alone survives. (Gall. Christ. xii. 702; Gams, Series Episc. 829.) [S. A. B.]

EMITERIUS (Adon. Mart. Mar. 3).

EMITHERIUS, (Wand. Mar. 3), martyr. [EMETHERIUS.]

EMMA, the wife of Eadbald king of Kent, 616-640; daughter (according to Florence of Worcester, who probably followed the Kentish hagiographers) of a king of the Franks, who is identified by Pagi with Theodebert king of Austrasia. (M. H. B. 635.) Thorn, the Canterbury historian, says that she died two years after her husband, and was buried beside him. (Thorn, ap. Twysden, col. 1769.) She is said to have been the mother of all his children. (Elmham, pp. 175, 176.) Her name appears in a spurious charter of Eadbald. (Kemble, C. D. No. 6; Elmham, p. 144; see Will. Malmesb. G. R. lib. 1, § 11.) [S.]

EMMANUEL (MANUEL), presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople. In A.D. 448 he appears as informing the archbishop Flavian, through the presbyter Asterius, that Eutyches, the heretic, had sent to him a "tome" which he had drawn up and had endeavoured to secure his signature to it. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 197.) It appears however that when Flavian sent messengers to the archimandrites to ascertain the truth in this matter, Emmanuel was one of those who said the tome had not been sent to him. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 211.) This contradiction has not been explained. Tillemont suggests the possibility of there having been two Emmanuels, contemporary archimandrites (as there were two Eusebiuses), but of this there are no traces. Nor, again, is it possible to suppose two archimandrites, one Manuel and one Emmanuel, for wherever Manuel occurs, he stands in the place which Emmanuel occupies in other lists.

Emmanuel is addressed by pope Leo, Oct. 15, A.D. 449, together with Faustus, Martinus, and Petrus, other archimandrites of Constantinople, in a letter exhorting them to constancy, faith, and charity, and denouncing the acts of the second council at Ephesus (Epp. 51, 71, 937, 1012, Migne). In 451 he signs the address of the orthodox archimandrites to the emperor

Marcian, and he appears in the Act of the Council of Chalcedon as subscribing the deposition of Eutyches. [C. G.]

EMMANUEL, bishop of Adrianople, present at the seventh general (second Nicene) council, A.D. 787, where in the acts he is called Manuel (Mansi, xii. 994). He is identified by Le Quien (Oriens Christ. i. 1173) with the Manuel bishop of Adrianople who was carried away and cruelly murdered by Crumus the Bulgarian chief. Another account says that he was carried off by Crumus along with the parents of Basil the Macedonian, who afterwards became emperor; that he converted many of the Bulgarians, and was murdered with others by Cutrago or Mutrago, the successor of Crumus, who was enraged at his missionary success, but that Basil, being a mere lad, was allowed to escape. This latter version is that adopted by Constantine Porphyrogenitus in his life of his grandfather Basil (c. 4). (Migne, Patrol. Graec. cix. 216.) [L. D.]

EMME (Bed. H. E. iv. 1, in M. H. B. 210), bishop of Sens. [EMMO.] [C. H.]

EMMELIA (EMMELIUM), the mother of St. Basil, who supplied her son and Gregory Nazianzen with food whilst they were living as anchorites in Pontus, as we learn from Gregory's fifth letter (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xxxvii. 5). On her death, Gregory wrote an epitaph for her, in which he extols her on account of her children, three of whom were priests (ibid. xxxviii. 1128, 1129; Baron. A. E. 363, lxxxviii.). [L. D.]

EMMERAMMUS, EMMERAMNUS, ST., martyr and missionary bishop. There is no distinct authority for his see, but it has been inferred, with great probability, that it was Poitiers, and in the list of the Gallia Christiana (ii. 1151) he appears as 25th bishop of that diocese, succeeding Johannes I. and followed by Dido. We know, however, that about A.D. 649, he resigned his see, whichever it was, and, after providing a successor, left country, family, and large possessions to seek the wilds of Pannonia, where he had heard the people were still idolaters. He was accompanied only by a priest named Vitalis to act as interpreter. On his way he arrived at Ratisbon, the residence of Theodon, who governed Bavaria for king Sigebert III. Here he learnt that the country before him was so hostile as to be impassable, and reluctantly yielded to the entreaties of his host that he would stay, and, as bishop, or if his humility declined that office, as abbat, charge himself with the spiritual jurisdiction of the district. He allowed himself to be persuaded with the less regret, as he saw that the recently converted people of that part mingled the worship of their old gods with their new-found Christianity. For three years he preached and worked in all parts of the country round, and his labours were crowned with success. At the end of that period, A.D. 652, he obtained permission to make a pilgrimage to Rome. Accompanied by a few priests he set out on his way amid the lamentations of his flock, but when he had been three days only on the journey, and was resting at a place called Helfendorf, where there was a pleasant spring of clear water, he was overtaken and slain by Lambert, Theodon's son, and a band of armed followers. An almost incredible story is given as the reason of his murder. He was buried at Aschaim, but his remains were later on translated to Ratisbon. Two churches were built, one on the spot where he was struck down, the other at the cross-roads where he breathed his last. Both were reputed to be the scene of numerous miracles. Before the close of the century, the well-known monastery called after him was erected at Ratisbon. He is commemorated Sept. 22. The authority for this account is the life by Aribo, who calls himself Cyrinus, bishop of Freising, who lived about a century later, in Surius de Prob. Sanct. Sept. 22, v. 367, and Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vi. 474. There are also extant a treatise, De Passione B. Emmeramni, by a priest called Constans, written at the end of the 7th or beginning of the 8th century (Patr. Lat. xcvi. 1367), a Vita B. Emmeramni, by Meginfredus provost of Magdeburg, and two books of Miracula S. Emmeramni by Arnold, a monk of the monastery, both in the 11th century (Canisius, Lectt. iii. pt. i. p. 105; Pertz, Scr. iv. 543; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxli. 973, 995), but they add nothing to the account of Aribo. (Cf. Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, xiii. 94, 95; Usuard. Mart. Sept. 22.) [S. A. B.]

EMMETIUS, bishop of Nantes. [EUMELIUS.]

EMMIANUS (Gall. Christ. vii. 491), abbat of Lagny. [EMILIANUS (10).] [C. H.]

EMMIA, abbess. [ENIMIA.]

EMMO, ST., twenty-fifth bishop of Sens, succeeded Arnulphus. In 659 he subscribed a praeceptum or privilegium for the abbat and monks of the monastery of St. Columba, and another for the monastery of St. Peter of Sens (both given by Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1168, 1171). In 662 he was one of the subscribers of a charta of Berthefredus, bishop of Amiens, in favour of the monastery of Corbie (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1178). He entertained Adrian, the companion of Theodore archbishop of Canterbury, during part of the winter of A.D. 668, which they spent in France, on the way to their new country (Bede, Hist. Eccl. iv. 1). He is said to have died in A.D. 675, and to have been buried in the monastery of St. Peter Vivus. His successor in the see was Landeberchtus, or according to the Bollandists, St. Amatus. (Gall. Christ. xii. 9; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iv. 124-5.) [S. A. B.]

EMMO (EMINO), eighteenth bishop of Tarantaise, succeeding Benimondus and followed by Possessor, towards the close of the 8th century. Nothing but the name survives. (Gall. Christ. xii. 702; Gams, Series Episc. 829.) [S. A. B.]

EMNERIUS, deacon of Nantes, whose servant Ludardus was cured of blindness. (Græg. Tur. de Mirac. SS. Mart. iv. 20.) [C. H.]

EMNERUS, bishop of Nantes. [EUMERICUS.]

EMPIRE, ROMAN. The religion of the empire at the time when it came in contact with the church of Christ may be best described as one of confluent polytheism. Following in the line of the great Macedonian conqueror it had recognised the religions of the nations it had conquered, and had, with some natural exceptions, tolerated their introduction even at Rome itself. In the gods of Greece, and even in those of many barbarian nations, it recognised under different names those which from time immemorial had been the objects of worship in Italy, and even the deities of Egypt and of Syria were allowed to have the honour of a cultus in the imperial city. The worship of Mithras was naturalised at Ostia. Serapis and Isis were not without their votaries at Rome (comp. Apuleius, Metam. bk. xii.; Juvenal, vi. 526-541, ix. 22, xiii. 93).

The exceptions, which proved the rule, were significant in their character. Rome had been startled, even in the days of the Republic, by the introduction of the new rites of the Bacchanalia. A secret society with mysterious orgies, which drew within its influence men and women of the higher classes, and in which licence of the worst character was practised, or reported to be practised, alarmed the senate. Edicts were issued for their suppression, and those who were suspected of joining in them were watched with a jealous eye (Livy, xxxix. 13, 14).

When the course of conquest brought the Roman government into contact with the Jews a new phenomenon presented itself. Here was a people unlike the rest of the nations, professing a religion which stood out in marked contrast with theirs, which worshipped one God and not many, and thought of that God not as the others did, as anthropomorphic or theriomorphic, but as invisible and apart, not capable of being represented by any human art. Political considerations made it expedient to court the support of the Jews in the conflict of Rome with the kings of Syria, and the Jews, on their side, welcomed the protection of the great republic. When the conquest of Judaea by Pompeius brought large numbers of Jews to Rome, they were allowed to settle in the Transtiberine quarters of the city by themselves, and, although belonging mostly to the slave or freedman class, they gained, partly by their higher culture, partly by the mysteriousness of their faith, a considerable influence over both men and women of the higher classes. Horace alludes sportively to his reluctance to offend them (Sat. 1, 9, 69). Juvenal notes it as a sign of the degeneracy of the times that the groves of Egeria had been let to them, either as a quarter where they might take up their abode, or for purposes of worship (Sat. iii. 12-15), and speaks of their oratories (proseuchae) as more or less frequented by converts (Sat. iii. 296), of their women as beguiling the minds of others of their sex by whispering the secrets of the future, or unfolding the to them mysterious lore of the books of Moses (Sat. xiv. 102). Judaism also took its place as a religio licita, though it was regarded with a feeling of uneasy suspicion, as presenting affinities with the magic arts practised by the Chaldaei and mathematici, who cast horoscopes, and whose predictions were at times a disturbing element in the state. Traces of this feeling are found in the edicts of expulsion which either deluded Jews, as under TIBERIUS, or were specially directed against them, as under CLAUDIUS.*

In the edict of the latter we may probably find the first trace of the followers of the new faith. The Jewish quarter had been for some weeks or months in a state of tumult, and that tumult was connected with the name of Chrestus. We can scarcely fail to recognise in that name the fact that the question whether the name of the Christ of right belonged to Jesus of Nazareth had become, as in other cities of the empire, a bone of contention between hostile parties, and that the Romans, looking at the matter as one of "words and names," and taking Christus or as they afterwards, and, probably, then also, pronounced it (Tertull. Apol. c. 3) Chrestus, for the leader of one of the parties, thought it necessary, as a measure of police, to eject the whole body of the Jewish population. This was, however, only a transitory measure of precaution. The salutations in Rom. xvi. shew that the Jews soon returned, and with them a considerable number of those who were now known as Christians. They, too, we must believe, so far as they distinctly recognised at all, were regarded at first as professing a religio licita.

Soon, however, a more hostile feeling began to shew itself. When St. Paul arrived at Rome the sect was "everywhere spoken against" (Acts xxviii. 22). It was probably the adoption of that faith by Pomponia Graecina, the wife of Plautius the conqueror of Britain, A.D. 47, that led to her trial as professing a new and gloomy superstition (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 32), and although the church gained its converts among the slaves and freedmen of the imperial household (Phil. iv. 22), and possibly also among the soldiers and centurions of the Praetorian camp (Phil. i. 13), there was a counter-current of feeling which led men to look on the Christians as with the hatred which grows out of fear, and when NERO, in what is reckoned as the first general persecution, exposed their men to the cruelest tortures and their women to outrages yet worse than torture, he fell in with, rather than shocked, the current of popular feeling. It was easy to turn the tide of suspicion after the fire of Rome, against those who spoke of the vengeance revealed in fire that should destroy their enemies. Disciples might honour the remains of St. Peter and St. Paul, and other martyrs, but statesmen, men of letters, and the crowd of sightseers looked on with indifference.

The death of Nero, however, brought with it a temporary relief. There was no law or edict of the senate forbidding the practice of the new religion, and as it had its meetings for worship, and its organised government by a bishop and elders, it must either have continued to profit by its identification, for legal purposes, with Judaism, or have been recognised as having a distinct existence as a religio licita. Under DOMITIAN, however, they were again in danger, not from any systematic persecution, but from the jealous suspicion which marked the policy of that emperor, and which turned the bureaucracy of the empire into a vast army of delatores. His victims were not many, but they were illustrious. The emperor's cousin, FLAVIUS CLEMENS, was put to death, and his wife and daughter, each bearing the name of FLAVIA DOMITILLA, banished, on a charge of atheism, in which the testimony of Christian writers enables us to recognise the profession of the new religion. The traditions that the grandsons of Judas the brother of the Lord were brought to Rome as possibly dangerous rivals, that with this there was a local persecution in Judaea, and that St. John was only delivered by a miracle from the caldron of boiling oil, are probably all connected as parts of the results of the same policy [DOMITIANUS]. The conversion of these members of the imperial family may at any rate be taken as shewing the extent to which the church was gaining followers among the upper classes, and it is a noticeable fact that from this time to the conversion of Constantine no name appears so frequently among the Christian inscriptions as that of the Flavian gens.

* It has been maintained, and, I think, fairly proved, in Hindekofer's Judaism at Rome (1877), that the senatorial patrician party, who looked back with regret to the days of the republic, were all along the advocates of a rigorous and repressive policy against both Jews and Christians, while the popular party, represented commonly by the emperors, were in favour of a wider tolerance, or were secretly inclined to a monotheistic faith.

The reign of TRAJAN (A.D. 98-117) presents the first instance of a persecution set on foot, not by a brutal or cruel emperor, but by one whose general policy was one of vigorous equity. The letters, however, that passed between him and Pliny, the proconsul of Bithynia, shew that it was forced on him against his will, and that his own nature was inclined to tolerance. He was told that the temples were deserted, that sacrifices were no longer offered. The vested interests that were connected with the established worship were threatened by the growth of the new society. Vague rumours were current that its members met together for Thyesteian banquets and orgies of frightful licence. The truthful report of the proconsul shewed that there were no grounds for these charges, but the tranquillity of the province had to be maintained, and the aggressive movement of the new sect to be checked, and the directions given by the emperor issued in the rule against which Tertullian protests as a "sententiam necessitate confusam" (Apol. c. 2), flagrantly at variance with the first principles of justice. Christians were to be punished if they confessed that they bore that name, to be set free if they disclaimed it. The very plea of not guilty, which in other cases was but the prelude of a trial, was in this to be tantamount to a sentence of acquittal (Pliny, Epp. x. 96, 97). In the report of the trial of IGNATIUS of Antioch before the emperor, we trace, with all allowance for the exaggeration of the martyrologist, the half-conscious feeling that the empire was coming into contact with a new force, acting upon society as well as upon speculative thought, which would in the long run prove incompatible with its religion, and therefore, as it seemed, with the authority with which that religion was identified. The members of the Christian church acknowledged "another king, one Jesus," and his law, and not that of Caesar was their ultimate standard of right and wrong. The reigns of the two Antonines (ANTONINUS PIVS, A.D. 138-161, MARCUS AURELIUS (A.D. 161-180) presented nearly the same features as those of Trajan. They too were wise, liberal equitable in their general administration. They were content to treat Christianity as a religio licita, so long as it did not thrust itself forward in real or apparent antagonism to the supreme authority of the state. They had their places of meeting and of burial. They had, as Tertullian (Apol. 37) boasted, with perhaps some pardonable exaggeration, filled the courts and the camps, and were not without representatives even in the senate and the forum. They claimed the protection of the laws so long as they were not guilty of crimes against social order. They numbered among them men of education and culture who were not ashamed of their religion, and were prepared to undertake its defence. The 2nd century, especially in its second half, was emphatically the age of the Apologists, of QUADRATUS (temp. Hadrian), of JUSTIN (d. 167), of TERTULLIAN (d. 240), of MINUCIUS FELIX (fl. 270). Their tone is for the most part that of those who are contending against vague calumnies and a widespread suspicion, threatening a future persecution, rather than of men who are themselves at the time suffering from it. JUSTIN, it is true, earned the name of martyr, and POLYCARP (A.D. 169) fell a victim to the passions of the populace at Smyrna, backed by the vindictive hatred of the Jews, but there are no traces of any active persecution at Rome itself, or throughout the empire generally, and the very stress which Justin lays in his second Apology on one or two individual cases in which Urbicus the praefect of the city had punished Christian propagandism with death shews that they were exceptions to the general tolerance (Apol. II. c. 2). Apart from propagandism, there was nothing to prevent the Christians of Rome from meeting for worship and burying their dead in peace, and holding undisturbed possession of their catacombs. The reigns of SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS and his sons (A.D. 193-217) were marked by no fresh legislative or executive activity directed against the Christians, and the influence which ORIGEN had exercised over the mind of JULIUS MAMMAEA when he visited her at Antioch, were seen in their treatment by her son ALEXANDER SEVERUS (A.D. 222-235). In the eclectic worship of that emperor busts of Christ and of Moses were seen, even in his private oratory, side by side with those of Orpheus and Lyncurgus, and when a question arose as to the contending claims of the church at Rome as a corporation (the very dispute shews that it was recognised as having a right to hold property), and that of a guild of butchers, the emperor gave judgment, on ethical grounds apart from the legal merits of the case, in favour of the former, as likely to make a better use of the property for which the two parties were contending. Under these conditions it was natural that the inherent vitality of the Christian church should assert itself, and that men and women should turn to it as affording a refuge alike from the foulness of heathen life and the scepticism which had been the outcome of the decay of the old faiths of Greece and Rome and the conflict of rival schemes of philosophy. The boastful language of Tertullian, "We have filled your senate, your camps, your courts," may perhaps, as has been said above, be exaggerated, but it bears testimony, after all due discount has been allowed for its high-flown rhetoric, to the spread of the new faith among the upper ranks of Roman society. The foreign origin of PHILIP THE ARABIAN, even if we set aside the doubtful tradition that he was himself a Christian, naturally made him indifferent to the maintenance of the national cultus, and was so far favourable to the church's peace. It was not till the accession of DECIUS (A.D. 249-252) that the officials of the empire, under an emperor bent upon restoring the old vigour of Roman policy and checking all innovations on its religion, awoke to a sense of the seriousness of the situation, and began to take active measures for the suppression, or at least the repression of the Christian faith. There was accordingly a violent though brief persecution in well-nigh all the provinces of the empire. Some sought safety by flight, some retired to the hermit life of the wilderness, some languished in prison, many died under cruel and varied tortures. Not a few, the thyriscanti, the lapsi, of ecclesiastical history, purchased their lives by apostasy. Others, technically known as the libellatici, without participating actually in the idolatrous act which was made the test of conformity to the religion of the state, purchased a certificate (libellum) that they had complied with the emperor's edict and so escaped.

The immediate effect of the Decian persecution was, as has been said [DECIUS] to thin the numbers of those who were known as the followers of Christ, and to strengthen the energy of those who continued faithful. The martyrs gained new honours, the confessors greater influence, and the very controversies which arose as to the treatment of the lapsi and the libellatici bear testimony to the church's freedom of action. The first eight years of VALERIAN (A.D. 253-261) were a time of rapid increase in numbers and growing consciousness of strength. In A.D. 259, XYSTUS, bishop of Rome, had had the courage [CYPRIAN] to transfer the supposed remains of St. Peter to the catacombs, afterwards known as those of St. Callistus, on the Appian Way, those of St. Paul to a burial-place on the Ostian Way. Those who had been active supporters of the policy of Decius felt that there was a fresh necessity for supporting it, and at the instigation of Macrianus, the emperor issued an edict which was the signal for a fresh persecution. Xystus and four of his deacons were apprehended as he sat teaching in his episcopal chair in the cemetery of Praetextatus [CYPRIAN]. Cyprian was seized and condemned to death by GALERIUS at Utica, and the last three years of the emperor's reign witnessed sufferings in all parts of the empire, like those under Decius. When GALLIENUS came to the throne (A.D. 261-268), as if shrinking from the possible issue of a prolonged struggle, he adopted a more temporizing and tolerant policy, restored to the Christians the places of assembly of which his father had deprived them, and for the first time formally recognised their faith by name as a religio licita (Euseb. H. E. vii. 13). The taunting speech of AURELIAN to the Roman senate, when he reproached them for not consulting the Sibylline books in a time of national danger, that "it would seem as if they were sitting in a church of the Christians, and not in the temple of the gods," implied at once that he recognised the effect of Gallienus's edict, and was more or less alarmed by it, and it is probable that had his life been prolonged he would have followed in his footsteps, and rescinded the edict of toleration. As it was, however, he so far acted on that edict as to recognise the authority of the church of Rome in determining a question affecting property in the church of Palmyra.

The edict of Gallienus remained in operation, however, till A.D. 303, when DIOCLETIAN (A.D. 284-305), who had begun his reign with the policy of toleration, who had Christians, recognised as such, among the officers of his household, and whose wife and daughter were more than suspected of being proselytes to the rival faith, issued the decree which made his reign memorable as the æra of martyrs, and gave the signal for the last great struggle. Churches were burnt or desecrated. The sacred books of the Christians were destroyed. Christians were to be deprived of all official dignities and civil rights, and reduced to the level of slaves. The test of sacrificing or burning incense was applied with a ruthless severity. Even CONSTANTIUS was compelled to content himself, in spite of all the leanings to a more tolerant policy, which were due probably to the influence of his wife, Helena, with endeavouring to save the lives of Christians while he acquiesced in the destruction of their buildings and their books. The eight years that followed were the worst that the church had as yet encountered. The first signal of a return to the older policy was given in A.D. 311, in the decree issued by CONSTANTINE, LICINIUS, and GALERIUS, which gave Christians permission to rebuild their churches, and restored their faith to the position of a religio licita, but by another edict in A.D. 312, propagandism was still treated as penal, and while the organised Catholic church was recognised as a corporation that might be dealt with as having a legal existence, all sects outside the church were excluded from the benefit of the decree. The edict of Milan, A.D. 313, gave an ample measure of freedom in allowing conversions to the church, as well as protecting those who were already in it, and in ordering the restoration of all property that had been taken from them in the time of persecution. The battle of the Milvian bridge, in which Constantine, after the memorable vision of the In hoc signo vinces, adopted the monogram of Christ, so familiar in the Christian inscriptions of the catacombs, and ordered it to appear on the shields of his soldiers as they marched against Licinius, closed the long struggle, and the decrees which followed in A.D. 319, giving to the ministers of Christian churches immunities from public burdens, in A.D. 321, allowing the enfranchisement of slaves in churches as well as temples, and ordering the observance of the Dies Solis, by the suspension of public works and judicial business, placed it on the footing of the most favoured faith. The religion of the emperor was avowed, and it tended naturally, even without actually repressive measures against the religion of his fathers, to become the religion of the empire.

It is difficult to form any accurate estimate of the actual amount of suffering caused by the intermittent persecutions of the fluctuating policy which we have traced for nearly 300 years. Probably not more than fifteen or twenty years out of that period were marked by any very rigorous measures of repression. The tendency of Gibbon's mind may have been to underrate the severity of the sufferings of the early Christians as that of the martyrologists was to indulge in enormous exaggerations, but some weight must be given to the language of Origen that those who had died for their religion were "few and very easy to be counted" (Cont. Celsum, iii.), and to the fact that Dionysius of Alexandria, giving an account of the sufferings of the church there, names only ten men and seven women as having suffered martyrdom (Euseb. Hist. vi. 41). The calculation which, starting from the fact that Eusebius names only ninety-two Christians in Palestine as put to death in the persecution of Diocletian, in which for the first time the cruelty of panic was added to the policy of repression, and which was therefore at once more violent and more protracted than any that had preceded it, and that as Palestine was about the sixteenth part of the Eastern empire, the total number of sufferers may be reckoned at 1500, or throwing in Italy, Africa, and Spain, at about 2000, is open to the charge of being a somewhat precarious method of statistical inquiry (Gibbon, c. xvi.), but it must be admitted that no persecutions endured by the Christian church at the hands of Roman emperors ever approximated to those which Christians afterwards inflicted on each other; and the aera of Diocletian falls into insignificance as compared with the crusade against the Albigenses under Innocent III., or that against the Protestants of the Netherlands under Charles V. and Philip II., or the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, or the Dragonnades that followed on the Revocation of the edict of Nantes by Louis XIV.

The difference was indeed natural, looking to the motives that prompted the persecution in either case. There was no odium theologicum in the policy of the Roman emperors, no intense conviction that those whom they persecuted were enemies of God, and bringing others into peril of a condemnation, compared with which the stake and the sword, and the torments of the Inquisition, were light and temporary evils. With them persecution was but a measure of police, necessary to uphold the religion of the state when its existence was threatened by the active propagandism of men who were not content with exercising the rights of conscience for themselves. Among those who occupied a lower position than that of emperors and statesmen there were doubtless other motives. There were the vested interests, which, like those of Demetrius and his craftsmen, gathered round the established worship, and which made every great temple, with an organisation like that of a cathedral or mediæval abbey (Wood's Ephesus, pp. 4-45) the centre of a resolute resistance to a new faith. There was the feeling prevalent at first among the lower classes, but finding its way afterwards to the more educated, for whose instruction Augustine wrote his De Civitate Dei, that the gods were offended at the spread of those who said that they were demons and not gods, and which led the people, when they suffered from inundations or earthquakes, famines or pestilences, to cry, "Christianos ad leones!" There was the irritation caused in the minds of the vile by the presence of a purity and holiness that reproved their vileness, presenting features such as have been seen in later times in the outrages endured at the hands of mobs by Puritans and Methodists. There were the calumnies insidiously propagated, and telling, probably, on the more decent and respectable classes, which represented the eucharistic feast of Christians as a Thyesteian banquet upon flesh and blood, and their feasts of love as polluted by incestuous and unnatural licence. There was the dread, telling upon men of the official order, and reproduced in the feeling of English politicians towards the Jesuits of the court of Rome, and of the despotic monarchies of Europe towards freemasons and other secret societies, caused by finding themselves face to face with a vast organised community spreading throughout the empire, and owning other laws of duty as superior in authority to theirs. At one period there seemed, indeed, something like the fanaticism of a rival worship. The cultus of Mithras, the Sun-god, introduced at Ostia in the time of Pompeius, had gradually spread throughout the empire. Mithraic groups have been found in well-nigh every province from Cyprus to Pannonia. The basilica of St. Clement at Rome stands over what was once a sanctuary of Mithras. With this worship the main actors in the last struggle of paganism were more or less closely identified, and Constantine's edict for the observance of the Dies Solis was probably intended as a concession to the worshippers of Mithras as well as to those of Christ. These influences, varying from time to time in their effects, led doubtless in many cases, to great brutality and cruelty, like that of the reign of terror in the French Revolution; but putting aside legends like those of the 10,000 martyrs slaughtered in a single day on Ararat, and the 6000 soldiers of the Theban legion in the valley of the Rhone, commemorated by the abbey of St. Maurice, the history of the church and the empire presents nothing like a massacre. It was the aim of statesman-like emperors, and they for the most part were the only persecutors, to repress rather than to exterminate. To plead "not guilty" to the charge of being a Christian was to ensure acquittal. The forms of law were carefully observed. The accused was allowed time for his defence; and opportunities for flight so frequently given and used that Tertullian thought it necessary to write a treatise (De Fuga in Persecutione) against it. Compromises like that of the libellatici in the Decian persecution were readily connived at; and the question which arose within the church as to the treatment of those who had accepted it, or had actually burnt incense, and so placed themselves among the lapsi, shews how widely the door of escape had been thrown open.

What was it, we ask in conclusion, which sustained the Christians of the first three centuries in their conflict with the empire? What was the secret of their final victory? The answer, looking for the present to human causes only, is found first, and chiefly, in the fact that they had faith, and that the statesmen and emperors had none. They did verily believe that they were worshippers of the Son of God, through whom they found access to the Father; that heaven and hell, their future destiny through long, it might be, endless, ages, depended on their steadfastness in that faith. Few philosophers were willing to suffer or die for a theory about the Supreme Good. The disciples of Christ were ready to suffer and die for their belief in the Supreme

God. For them the religion of the empire was not a form of Aryan thought, presenting a lower stage of culture or education, but a system identified with the power of Satan, the gods of which were individually demons who owned him as their master. As the superstructure on this foundation there was the strength of a wide organisation and of a unity, which as yet heresies and schisms might have impaired, but had not destroyed, and the attractive power,—attractive to all in whom there was any yearning after a higher life than the infinite debasement of the cities of the empire,—of a new purity, a new reverence for womanhood and childhood, a new sympathy with the sick and with the slave, a new sense of the heroism of living for the truth. How far a more systematic and continuous persecution might have succeeded in realising the boast of the Pseudo-Neronian inscription [NERO], and destroying the name of Christian from the face of the earth, we can, of course, only conjecture; but intermittent persecution was obviously calculated only to further its progress. It acted like a test, and purified the Christian society from the feeble and faint-hearted, the sensuous and the worldly, who flocked into it in the time of its prosperity [DECIVS]. It strengthened the esprit de corps in those who remained faithful. The blood of martyrs became the seed of the church. Slowly the new faith worked its way from towns to villages, from slaves and freedmen to men of culture and wealth. The aristocracy of the senatorial party, at first foremost in the work of persecution, and protecting itself against innovations by requiring every senator to burn incense as he entered the halls of meeting, found itself invaded. When the parties were evenly balanced, there was, as in the time of Diocletian, a sharp and fierce struggle; but the eye of the statesman who looked into the future could no longer fail to recognise that all the elements of strength and success were with the Christians and not with their opponents. To endeavour to put back the shadow on the dial of history, as Julian did, was a fruitless and hopeless task. It was impossible to galvanise the corpse of the dead cultus into a new vitality, and the traditional confession of the apostate, "Vicisti, O Galilae!" was the natural consequence of the traditional assurance given to Constantine, "In hoc signo vinces!"

EMPODIUS, bishop of Volterra. [ELPIDIVS (15).]

EMPTACIVS, bishop of Siceſsa, a town in all probability to be identified with Siga, in the African province of Mauretania Caesariensis, at one time the royal residence of Syphax. He was one of the catholic bishops summoned to Carthage and subsequently banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 278; Gams, Series Episc. 468.)

EMUNDUS is said to have been the fifteenth bishop of Avignon, following St. Maximus, and succeeded by St. Magnus, about A.D. 630 to 644. The evidence on which this assertion rests is an old manuscript list of the abbats of the monastery of Mons-Major near Arles, to which he belonged before he was made bishop. This list is said by Le Cointe to have been published by

Francis Nouquier, a priest of Avignon, in 1659. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 641, n. vi. tom. iii. p. 132; Gall. Christ. i. 800.) [S. A. B.]

EMYGDIUS, bishop of Asculum. [EMIGDIUS.]

EMYR LLYDAW, though not the ancestor of any of the "three stocks of saints of the island of Britain," like Brychan, Cunedda Wledig and Caw, yet had many descendants among the saints, a list of twenty-two being given by Rees. He was an Armorican prince, nephew of St. Germanus, and flourished in the 5th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 165; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 144). [J. G.]

ENAN (HENAN). (1) Son of Gemman, commemorated Jan. 30. Mart. Doneg. places him at Ros-Mor in Ui-Deagha, in Ui-Ceinnsealaigh, in the south of Leinster, but this Ross or Rosmore is unidentified. It is also conjectured, but against probability, that he may be the person who wrote the lives of the saints. In this, Enan is evidently regarded as the same person with St. Evin, to whom is attributed the writing of the so-called Book of Kilkenny and the Life of St. Patrick. [EIMHIN.] (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 31 407; Reeves, Adamnan, 137; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 361 n. 64, 511-12.) In the Kal. Drummond, Jan. 30 (Bp. Forbes Kal. Scott. Saints, 4), it is said "apud Hiberniam S. Enan confessor migravit ad Christum." [J. G.]

ENAN (2), son of Muadan, commem. Mar. 25. When St. Patrick came into Dalriada and adjacent districts, and was building churches there, Evinus (Vit. S. Patr. ii. c. 130) mentions his erection of the church of Druim-Indich, in the region of Cathrigia, and his placing over it St. Enan, whom in his note Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 146 col. 2, 182 n. 203) identifies with the son of Muadan, though in another place (Acta SS. 747) he had doubted as to assigning the dedication of Mar. 25 to this saint, and not rather to a disciple of St. Comgall (May 10), of Bangor, whom St. Comgall brought back to life: Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 268) accepts the validity of this doubt, and says Enan must have lived late in the sixth century; but Lanigan's great aim seems to be to controvert the statements of Archdall in his Monasticon Hibernicum, where an abbey is raised on St. Patrick's foundation. There is little doubt, however, but that this is the saint who is called in the Kalendar of Marian O'Gorman, "Enanus egregius, diuturnae quietis, et Muadani filius," and who had his church in the townland Drumeeny in Glenshesk, in the parish of Ramoan and barony of Cary, co. Antrim, where there is also an old burying-ground, now under cultivation, called Killeena: in the same neighbourhood there was a church given to St. Erclach, called Rath-mudain, "Arx Muadani," from Muadan, the father of Enan, and this, being contracted, has given its name to the parish, Ramoan (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 79, 284-5, 323). Colgan thinks he flourished about A.D. 460. [J. G.]

ENAN (3) of Drumrath, commem. Aug. 19. He was son of Ernineus, of the race of Eochaidh Finnfuathairt, and thus cited by Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 613, col. 2), among the saints belonging to the family of St. Brigida (Feb. 1). His church, which some call an abbey, was at Drumrath, a parish in the barony of Kilkenny West, and county of West Meath, and this, which was built about A.D. 588, is said to have been destroyed A.D. 946, by the foreigners, and again by Brian M'Cinneide fifty years later (Nat. Gazet. "Drumraney"; Mart. Doneg. Todd and Reeves, 225). In the Life of St. Aedh (Nov. 10), this bishop is said to have paid a visit to St. Enan, the hermit, who lived in the place where the famous monastery of Drumrath now stands in his honour, but nothing is really known of St. Enan's history. According to Tigernach (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. ii. 192) he died A.D. 633. [J. G.]

ENAN (4) of Glenn-Faidle. Commemorated on Dec. 29. [MENOC.]

ENAN (5) of Inis-Aego, commem. April 29. He was one of the successors of St. Donnan (Apr. 17), after the island of Egg again became a religious abode, but his date and history are unknown, unless he be the person mentioned in the Annals of Ulster, "A.D. 724, Oan princeps [superior ecclesiastically] Ego mortuus est." (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scriptor. iv. 79; Reeves, Adamnan, 296.) [J. G.]

ENBALD I. (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 731 A, 732, B, C), archbishop of York. [ENBALD I.] [C. H.]

ENBALD II. (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in Mon. Hist. Brit. 732 C), archbishop of York. [ENBALD II.] [C. H.]

ENCHONIUS (Baron. A. E. ann. 608, xi.), bishop of Maurienne. [ICONIUS.] [C. H.]

ENCHORACH UA DODAIN, abbat of Glendaloch, bar. North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, died A.D. 769 (Four Mast. A.D. 764; Ann. Ult. A.D. 768). [J. G.]

ENCOLPIUS, Donatist bishop of Vallis or Balita, in proconsular Africa (Opt. ii. 4; Baron. A. E. ann. 321, iv.; Gams, Ser. Episc. p. 469). [H. W. P.]

ENCRATIS, ST., or ENGRATIA, "Santa Engracia" in Spanish parlance, one of the Saragossa martyrs in the persecution under Diocletian, who suffered at the hands of the well-known Dacian. She is not one of the famous eighteen martyrs of Saragossa, but her name and sufferings, together with those of St. Vincent, are celebrated in the hymn devoted to them by Prudentius (Peristeph. Hymn iv. vv. 109 sq.). The peculiarity of her passion is that she did not die under the hands of her persecutors, but survived for some time in an incredibly torn and mutilated state, until at length the release of death came. In certain epigrammata attributed to St. Eugenius II. (III.) of Toledo (Esp. Sagr. v. 273), who is known, from his life by St. Ildefonsus, to have had a special devotion to the Saragossa martyrs, she is mentioned as buried in the same church, but not in the same tomb, as the eighteen.

Hic etiam compar meritis Engratia Martyr
Sorte sepulchrali dissociata jacet.

For an account of the discovery of the relics of Engracia and Lupercius at Saragossa in 1389 in the foundations of the cathedral and of the present cult of the saint, see Esp. Sagr. xxx. 289. The late Acta, together with Prudentius's

Hymn, are given in Tamayo de Salazar, Martyr Hisp. ii. 645. Engratia is also mentioned in the well-known Passio SS. innumerabilium Caesar-Augustanorum Martyrum, attributed to Braulio of Saragossa. (Esp. Sagr. xxx. 260, 307; Gams, Kirchengesch. von Spanien, i. 320; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 410-412.) [M. A. W.]

ENCRATISTAE (Cod. Just. l. v. 5), heretical. [ENCRATITES.] [T. W. D.]

ENCRATITES (Ἐγκρατεῖς, Irenæus; Ἐγκρατῆραι, Clem. Alex.; Ἐγκρατῖται, Hippol.), heretics who abstained from flesh, from wine, and from the marriage bed, not temporarily, as in the earliest ages of the church, with a view to more intense devotion, but permanently, and from a belief in the essential impurity of the things renounced. Persons who so abstained called themselves continent (ἐγκρατεῖς, Iren. i. 28, p. 107); and the slightly modified form, Encratites, soon became a technical name to denote those whose asceticism was regarded as of a heretical character (Clem. Alex. Paed. ii. 2, p. 183; Strom. i. 15, p. 359; vii. 17, p. 900; Hippol. Ref. viii. 20, p. 276). We are not bound to suppose that all who were known by the name formed a single united sect. Irenæus, for instance (l. c.), says that some of the earliest of them were followers of Saturninus and Marcion; and it is reasonable to understand by this, not that followers of Marcion coalesced with followers of Saturninus to form a single new heretical body, but rather that followers of these two heresiarchs, independently using the same mode of life, and making the same boast of continence, were known by the orthodox under the same name. The practice of abstinence of the kind in question was anterior to Christianity. Not to speak of the Indian ascetics (to whom Clement of Alexandria refers as predecessors of the Encratites), the abstinence of the Essenes both in respect of food and of marriage, is matter of notoriety. Josephus's account of the Essene is referred to by Porphyry, who, like them, objected both to the use of animal food and to animal sacrifices. An interesting specimen of the Pythagorean doctrine on this subject is his work περὶ ἀποχῆς τῶν ἐμψύχων, addressed to a friend who after trial of abstinence had wickedly relapsed into the use of flesh diet. He insists on the importance of keeping the soul, as far as possible, free from the bonds of matter, and which the use of animal food tends to enslave it on the wisdom of avoiding everything on which evil demons have power, viz. all material things, and especially the use of animal food, and on the injustice of depriving of life for pleasure animals who are akin to ourselves, as in everything like ourselves, having reason, emotions, sentiments completely like ours.

The account given by Hegesippus of James the Just (Eus. H. E. ii. 23) shews that righteousness of the Essene type was early held in admiration in the Christian church; and we learn from 1 Tim. iv. 3-6 that at the date of that epistle teachers had arisen who inculcated such abstinence as duty. But it does not appear that they held the Gnostic doctrine, that matter is essentially evil and its creation the work of a being inferior and hostile to the Supreme; for the apostle's argument with them assumes it as a point still uncontroverted that the things they rejected were creatures of the good God. We find from the Clementines that the Ebionite sects which arose out of Essenism, though they permitted marriage, disallowed the use of flesh meat and wine; and that their doctrine respecting God's work of creation was quite orthodox. Hippolytus, too, who takes his account of the Encratites, not, as in several other cases, from Irenaeus, but from his own acquaintance with them as a then existing sect, describes them as orthodox in their doctrine concerning God and Christ, and as only differing from the church in their manner of life. But the Gnostic teachers named in the passage cited from Irenaeus undoubtedly based their asceticism on the doctrine of the evil of matter which they denied to be the work of God; and in consequence they deemed it wrong, by generation, to bring new souls under the dominion of death, and expose them to the miseries of this life. A full discussion of the arguments which they used will be found in the third book of Clement's Stromatis (though in this book the name Encratites does not occur), the principal writers whom he combats being MARCION, TATIAN, already mentioned by Irenaeus as a leader of that sect, and JULIUS CASSIANUS. It appears that the Gospel according to the EGYPTIANS contained alleged sayings of our Lord, which they used in support of their doctrines. Epiphanius mentions that they used other apocryphal writings, such as the Acts of Andrew, John, and Thomas. This controversy seems to have been actively carried on in the last quarter of the 2nd century. Eusebius (H. E. iv. 28) relates that MURBANUS, a writer of the beginning of that period, addressed a very effective dissuasive argument to certain brethren who had turned aside to that sect, then newly come into existence; and Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 21) mentions that another writer of the same date, APOLLINARIUS, wrote against the Severian Encratites.

Eusebius (iv. 29) derives this name Severians from a certain SEVERUS, who became an Encratite leader shortly after Tatian. He adds that these Severians received the Old Testament and the Gospels, only putting their peculiar interpretations on them, but that they reviled Paul, rejecting his Epistles, and not even receiving the Acts of the Apostles. There are Ebionite features in this description, and it is quite possible these Severians may have been of Ebionite origin, for we have already said that great diversity may have existed between the teaching of persons known by the common name of Encratite. The Severians are described by Epiphanius (Haer. 45) with all the features of an Ophite sect; but he seems to have had only a hearsay knowledge of them, for he speaks of the sect as having almost died out in his time; and Lipsius (Q.-K. des Epiph. 215) gives good reason for thinking that he did not find any article on them in previous heretical treatises. In his chapter on the Encratites (Haer. 48) Epiphanius describes them as widely spread, enumerating seven different countries where they were then to be found; and we may at least conclude that he had reason to know that there were in these countries heretics leading an ascetic life, though, as has been already remarked, it would be unsafe to assert an absolute identity in their teaching. We may set it down as a mistake of Epiphanius that he places the Encratites after the Tatianites, as if they were a branch of the latter sect, the true relation between the two names being just the opposite. Some additional information about the Encratites is contained in the lately recovered work of Macarius Magnes, published in Paris, 1876. In this work (iii. 43, p. 151), written about the year 400, he gives an enumeration of some of the countries where the Encratites (whom he also calls Apotactites and Eremites) were to be found, which so far agrees with that of Epiphanius as to suggest that Macarius was acquainted with the work of Epiphanius. But he adds that a defence of their doctrines in eight books had been published by a leader of theirs, Dositheus, a Cilician, in which he inveighed against marriage, saying that "by sexual intercourse the world had had its beginning, but by continence would receive its end," and equally condemning as abominable the tasting of wine or the partaking of flesh meat. In his account of the Samaritan Dositheus, Epiphanius introduces some Encratite features not attested by other authorities; and perhaps it is not incredible that Epiphanius may have allowed his knowledge of the doctrine of the one Dositheus to affect his account of the other. We cannot give much weight to the account of Philaster, who (72) assigns the name and doctrine of the Encratites to the followers of AERIUS [see also ABSTINENTES]; and we may wholly disregard the inventive "Praedestinatus," who represents the Encratites as refuted by an Epiphanius, bishop of Ancyra. It is worth while, however, to repeat the last writer's distinction between Encratite and Catholic abstainers; viz. the former asserted the food which they rejected to be evil; the latter owned it to be good, too good for them.

With the advance of asceticism in the church care was always taken to distinguish in some such way between orthodox and heretical abstinence. At first the distinction seems to have been between occasional and permanent abstinence, the latter being regarded with suspicion in the church. We learn from the letter of the churches of Vienne and Lyons (Eus. H. E. v. 3) that Alciabiades, one of the confessors who had been in the habit of living on bread and water, reformed his practice on the exhortation of his fellow prisoners, who represented to him that he did not well in refusing to use God's creatures, and in causing a stumbling-block to others. In like manner the 53rd (45th) of the apostolic canons deprives any clergyman who refuses to partake of flesh and wine on festival days. Perhaps this willingness to partake of flesh and wine on festival days may have been intended as a test of the distinction made in the 51st (43rd) canon between those who abstained from self-denial (δι' ἀσκησιν) and those who abstained διὰ βδελυρίαν, as abominating God's creatures. The 14th canon of the council of Ancyra permits clergy to abstain from flesh, on condition of their first tasting it. This would shew that they had no heretical horror of the food itself. (See ASCETICISM, Dict. Christ. Ant.) For the controversy raised on the subject of asceticism by EUSTATHIUS of SEBASTEIA, see that article and GANGRA, Dict. Christ. Ant. Canons of St. Basil on the subject of Encratite baptism (clxxxviii. can. 1; cxix. can. 47) have given rise to some dispute, but it seems to us clear that St. Basil wished to reject the baptism of the Encratites in question, not because they did not use the orthodox formula of baptism, but because, regarding them as tainted with Marcionite error, he could not accept the verbal acknowledgment of the Father in the baptismal formula as atonement for the insult offered to the Creator, whose work they looked on as evil. Reference has been already made to these canons in the article APOSTOLICI, as well as to the law of the Theodosian code (A.D. 381) against the Manicheans, who sheltered themselves under the name of Encratites. Not many years earlier we have mention of the Encratites as a then existing sect in Galatia; for Sozomen (v. 11) records the sufferings of Busiris, who was at that time one of them, in the persecution under Julian. [HYDROPARASTATAE.] [G. S.]

ENCTHONIN, a crocodile-shaped archon presiding over the first division of the place of punishment (Pistis Sophia, p. 320). [G. S.]

ENDA, ENDE. [ENNA (1).]

ENDDWYN is a Welsh saint of uncertain date, whose name remains in Llanenddwyn, Merionethshire. (Myv. Arch. ii. 42; Rees, Welsh Saints, 307, 341.) [J. G.]

ENDELECHIUS, a rhetorician, who is said to have held the chair of rhetoric at Rome, mentioned by St. Paulinus of Nola in his twenty-eighth letter as a Christian man, and the inspirer of his panegyric on Theodosius. He is identified by some, but without any sufficient reason, with "Sanctus" to whom Paulinus wrote his fortieth and forty-first letters. (Vit. Paulin. cap. 25, Paulin. Ep. 28, § 6 and note, Epp. 40, 41, in Patr. Lat. lxi. pp. 66, 312 b, 367, 377, 870 c; Ceillier, viii. 70.) [L. D.]

ENDELIENTA, ST., daughter of Brychan, king of Brecknock, one of the numerous Welsh devotees who settled on the Cornish coast opposite to Wales. The parish of St. Endellion is on the Bristol Channel, west of St. Tethe (also named from a daughter of Brychan). In it exists a very early sepulchral pillar, with the inscription, "BROEAGAN HIC IACIT," which some connect with the name of the Welsh king (see Whitaker's Cathedral of Cornwall, li. p. 95; Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 160; Sir J. Maclean's Trigg Minor, i. p. 485). [C. W. B.]

ENDEUS, (Hardy, Descr. Cat. Mat. i. 86), Irish abbat. [ENNA.] [C. H.]

ENDBIGHETTUS, bishop of Feltre, received a grant of certain privileges from Charles the Great between 769 and 781. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 134.) [A. H. D. A.]

ENDULUS (ENDULANUS, ENTULANUS, EUTULANUS), fourteenth bishop of Toul, following Autmundus and succeeded by Theodefridus, was born at Toul, and was beloved of the kings of Austrasia. He obtained for his church several fresh possessions, which are said to have been confirmed by a charter of Theodebert II., king of Austrasia, in the eighth year of his reign (A.D. 602 or 603), but it does not appear to be extant. (Gail. Christ. xiii. 962.) [S. A. B.]

ENEAS of Gaza. [AENEAS.]

ENEDOR. ST. (Cressy, Ch. Hist. of Brit. lib. iv. 19, § 1), saint. [ENODORUS.] [C. H.]

ENFAIL (ENVAEL, ENVAIL) is in the list of Brychan, or Brycheiniog's children (or grandchildren) in the Bonedd y Saint, and had the church of Merthyr Enfail, now probably Merthyr in Carmarthen. The name would suggest her martyrdom. She lived in the middle of the 5th century. (Myv. Arch. ii. 42; Rees, Welsh Saints, 152, 331.) [J. G.]

ENGELBERTUS (ANGILBERTUS, ANGHILBERTUS), a Frank of good birth ("haud ignotae familiae" Nithard, iv. 5), brought up from his earliest years in the palace of Charlemagne (Epist. Hadrian; ap. Jaffé's Mon. Alcuin, 246, and Ep. 112, p. 458), and employed by him on political missions of importance. He was appointed abbat of St. Riquier about the year 790. He had previously (circa 783) been attached to the court of Pippin, king of Italy, Charles's son, as "primicerius" and chief counsellor (Mon. Alc. 149), and in 794 he was entrusted by Charles to carry the capitularies of the synod of Frankfort relating to the worship of images to pope Hadrian (Mon. Alc. 245, and V. CAROLINI LIBRI). In 796 he was again sent to Rome on the accession of Leo III. nominally to congratulate him, in reality to secure his fidelity to the Frankish king. The instructions given to him by Charles shew the confidence reposed in him. (Ep. Carol. 9, ap. Jaffé's Mon. Carol. 353.) Originally a pupil he always remained a close friend of Alcuin, by whom he was specially recommended to pope Hadrian. (Mon. Alc. 244. Compare also Epp. Alc. 51 and 54, in Mon. Alc. 279 and 281, the latter of which, addressed to Engelbert himself, shews the very intimate character of the friendship; cf. also Ep. 163, Mon. Alc. 603-4.) It was a friendship not only of affection and religion, but of books and of literature. Engelbert is said to have collected a library of 200 MSS. for his monastery. Alcuin continually entreats Engelbert, when at Rome or elsewhere, to bring him relics, also books (e.g., a copy of Jordanes, de Getarum Origine, Ep. 164, Mon. Alc. 603-4), and the latest letter in Jaffé's collection is one in which Alcuin elaborately discusses certain grammatical points with Engelbert. (Ep. 252, Mon. Alc. 802 sq.) Engelbert in the literary round table of the court of Charlemagne, bore the name of Homer, and even in the letter of instructions above referred to (Mon. Car. 353) he is addressed by the king as Homer and "Homeriane puer." So, often by Alcuin, see especially Ep. 54, Mon. Alc. 281-3. Charles and Alcuin both spent Easter of 800 at Engelbert's abbey of St. Riquier, and Alcuin was requested by the abbat to write a life etc. of the patron saint, which he subsequently sent to the emperor. (Ep. 238, Mon. Alc. 755.) Engelbert apparently accompanied Charles to Rome, and was present at his coronation there. In 811 he witnessed the will of Charlemagne. (Einhard, Vita Karoli, 33.) He died a few days after the emperor, on Feb. 18, 814, and was buried at St. Riquier. (Nithard, iv. 5.) His remains were translated from the porch to the choir of St. Riquier with great solemnity, twenty-nine years later. (Nith. l. c.) His epitaph is to be found in Bouquet, (vol. v. p. 408 note). His extant writings are a fragment of his Carmen de Karolo Magno (ap. Canisius, Duchesne, vol. ii., Bouquet, vol. v., and best ap. Pertz, Scrip. vol. ii.), three letters addressed to Arno bishop of Salzburg (ap. Mon. Car. pp. 365 sqq.), and some verses on Pippin king of Italy are ascribed to him (ap. Duchesne, vol. ii. 646; Bouquet, vol. v. pp. 408-9).

There are two lives of Engelbert as a saint: tant, both of the 12th century, one by Anscherus abbat of St. Riquier, the other by Hariulfus, author of the Chron. Centulensis Abbatiae; both are to be found in the Acta Sanctorum.

Engelbert was the father of Nithard the historian, by Bertha daughter of Charlemagne (Nith. iv. 5). The Chron. Centul. and the life of Anscher, without attempting to disguise the fact, endeavour to make the marriage take place early in the reign of Charles, before Engelbert had entered the clergy. According to these authorities the "Ducatus maritimae terrae" was committed to him, and he fought several battles against the Danes; afterwards he became a monk, whilst Bertha took the veil. Probably the plain fact as related by Nithard himself is the truth, and we have Einhard's testimony that Charles's prohibition of the marriage of his daughters gave rise to many grave scandals. This question, together with others relating to Engelbert as abbat of St. Riquier, has been elaborately discussed by MM. Dufour and Hénocque in the Bulletin de la Société des Antiquaires de la Picardie, vol. ix. (1865-67), pp. 98-113, 146-82, 250-269. Cf. generally Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, vol. i. pp. 131-7, 3rd ed.

ENGELMUND, presbyter, abbat, and patron saint of Velsena, a fortified spot four miles from Haarlem. He was an Englishman of Frisian descent, born of Christian parents, and in the time of Willibrord, the apostle of the Frisians, came among this people, and preached in Kennemaria, the district about Haarlem. He died in the pagus Velsenus, where was formerly one of the five mother churches raised by Willibrord between the Meuse and the insula Texalia. He was commemorated on June 21. (Boll. Acta SS. June iv. 115.)

ENGHENEL was son of Cynan Garwyn ab Brochwel Ysgythrog, descended from Cadell Deyrnllug. Rees (Welsh Saints, 161, 297) says he is the saint to whom Llanenghenel, under Llanfachraith in Anglesey, is dedicated, and places him in the beginning of the 7th century. (Myr. Arch. ii. 41.)

[J. G.]

ENGLATIUS, ENGLACIUS, abbat, commemorated Nov. 3. This saint appears in most of the Scottish Kalendars, but is not in the Litany of Dunkeld. Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 248) says he wrote Lecturae sacrae, lib. i., Scriptura ad scrutinium, lib. i., Epistolae ad Varios, lib. i.; but Dempster's literary ascriptions are usually extremely doubtful. Englatius's dedication is Nov. 3, but Camerarius places him on Nov. 5, and Dempster gives him a double dedication, pointing to a two-fold history. "Sept. 26. In Scotia Englatii episcopi, qui crebris predicationibus Scotiam cum maximo fructu lustravit. Bæth., Brev. Aberd." "Nov. 3. In Scotia Englatii episcopi, qui Picticam halosin vidit et ante bellum deflevit. Kal. A. King." Adam King calls him bishop and confessor in Scotland under Kenneth III. A.D. 966, and Dempster says he flourished in the year 1010; but Kenneth III. was not King in that year: Spotswood (Ch. Hist. Scot. 27) classes him with Blaanus Colmocus, and Moveanus in the 10th century. But there is evidently much confusion, and of the time, place, and circumstance of the saint's death we are altogether uncertain. No details of his life are known. The collect in the Aberd. Breviary (Prop. SS. p. est. f. 146a), prays that by his intercession we may be saved from the concupiscence of the world, and neither be corrupted by its blandishments nor crushed by its frowns. His only known dedication is at Tarves, Aberdeenshire, where he is locally called St. Tanglan. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 122, 136, 166, 212, 217, 332; View Dioc. Aberd. 329; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 185, Nov. 5; Tanner, Bibl. 262.) [J. G.]

ENGRATIA, Spanish Martyr. [ENCRATIS.]

ENI, brother of Redwald and father of Anna, kings of East Anglia (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 97, ed. Hardy; Wend. F. H. ann. 652, ed. Coxe).

[C. H.]

ENIMIA (ENYMIA, EMMIA), abbess; said to have been the sister of Dagobert king of the Franks and daughter of Clotaire II., though some traditions make her the daughter of Clovis II. and even of Clovis I. She founded a double monastery, one for monks and another for nuns, in the mountains overlooking the river Tarn (dep. Tarn), and was consecrated the first abbess by Iserus bishop of Meude, her diocesan. She was commemorated on Oct. 6. (Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 406; Gall. Chr. i. 111; Le Cointe, Annales, ii. 794.)

[C. H.]

ENNA (ENDA, ENDE, EINNE, latinised ENDEUS) (1) Son of Conall Derg, and abbat of Aran, commemorated March 21. The primary authority on the life and acts of St. Enna is Magradin's Memoir, which both Colgan (Acta SS. 704-10) and the Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. 21, tom. iii. 267-72) have printed, as taken from MS. of the Island of All Saints; Loch Ree (Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. 86, 779). With probably much that is fact, there is also mixed up much that must be purely fabulous, and drawn from the customs and notions of the writer's own age, the fourteenth century. St. Enna belonged to the noble house of the princes of Oriel, in Ulster, and was born in Louth, where his father was a ruler. His father was Conall Derg, son of Daimhin, son of Coirpre Domhairgid, of the race of Coia-da-Crioch, and his mother was Briga, or Aebhfhinn, daughter of Ainmire, son of Ronan, king of the Ards, in the county of Down. He had a brother, probably uterine, called Libeus, or Molibba, and four sisters, Fanchea, Lochinia, Carecha, and Darenia, the first three having been dedicated to the Lord in virginity, and the last espoused to Aengus, king of Cashel, becoming thereby the mother of a royal and holy race; she must have been his first wife, as his second, the infamous Eithne Vathach of the Deisi, was slain with king Aengus in battle. On the death of his father St. Enna was unanimously chosen chief of the Oriels, but the future celebrated soldier of Christ did not long retain an earthly magistracy, and the acephalous life in Colgan begins by relating how, as a rude warrior, triumphing over his enemies, he came with his soldiers to the nunnery of his sister Fanchea, and was converted by the sudden and voluntary death of one of Fanchea's virgins, whom he demanded for his wife. [FAINCHE.] After resigning his position among the Oriels, he was under the tutelage of his sister for some time, and under her direction engaged in heavy manual labour, a very common employment for one in his condition in those days, and then was sent to Rosnat, in Britain, to be a pupil in the monastery of Mansenus, that is, in all probability to the great monastery at Candida Casa, to be under St. Ninian, or rather one of his successors (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 437; Bp. Forbes, SS. Nin. and Kent. xlii.-iii.; Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 103-8). From Rosnat he is said to have proceeded to Rome, where, after building a monastery called Latinum, or, as Colgan suggests, Laetinum, expressive of his spiritual joy, he was joined by his sister St. Fanchea, who came to induce him to return. In the course of a year he followed her to Ireland, and after landing at Colptha, in Meath, where St. Patrick also had landed, and after founding many churches on the banks of the Boyne, he applied to Aengus, son of Nadfraech, the first Christian king of Cashel, for a grant of the Island of Aran. After some delay on account of Aengus's desire to have St. Enna's monastery in the neighbourhood of Cashel, this request was granted, and most of the remaining part of the life is taken up with the account of St. Enna's voyage to Aran, his taking possession of it, and his subsequent division of it into ten portions, with ten monasteries under as many abbats, his own monastery being built on the east side of the island, at a place called to this day Killeany, on Killeany Bay. This was on Inishmore, the most westerly of the Aran group,* and his monastery soon became the resort of the saints of God. His monks are said to have been one hundred and fifty, and the training he had received at the Magnum Monasterium of Whithern, he imparted to the younger race of founders of monasteries, whose fame remains to this day. Among his disciples are enumerated St. Kieran (Sept. 9) of Clonmacnoise, St. Brendan (May 16), St. Finnian (Sept. 10) of Moville, St. Columba (June 10), and other well-known abbats and bishops. The celebrity of Aran as an ecclesiastical seat is still attested by the ruins of churches and monasteries which cover the area of Inishmore, and which to this day are visited as objects of special veneration. Mingled with the cyclopean architecture of a former military era are the stone-roofed oratories, and little bee-hive stone cells of the sixth and seventh centuries, pointing to a period and place of religious activity and earnestness. From the numbers who flocked to it, the island received the name of Ara-na-naomh, or Aran of the saints, and the occupants, living and dead, were said to be innumerable.

Enna is said by Ware to have his name in the register of bishops at Clogher, in the end of the sixth or beginning of the seventh century, but this can hardly be, as he must have lived earlier, and his name is not elsewhere connected with Clogher. St. Enna himself belongs to the second order of Irish saints, but his dates are for the most part conjectural. If Inishmore was given him by the king of Cashel, it must have been before A.D. 489, as in that year Aengus fell at the battle of Cell-Osnadha, now Kelliston, in the barony of Forth, co. Carlow. The time of his death is uncertain, but he probably died in Aran about the year 542, the date usually accepted; he was buried in or near the sandy mound on which the little church of Teaglach-Einne now stands, and his memory is held in great veneration throughout the west of Ireland. His feast has always been attached to March 21. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. cc. 8-10; O'Flaherty, Iar-Connaught, 42, 74 seq., 462-63, and Ogygia, vol. ii. pt. iii. c. 76; Ware, Ir. Ant. cc. 26, 28; Geneal. Hy-Fiach, by O'Donovan, 462-63; Journ. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 3 ser. i. 79-80; Journ. Kilh. Arch. Soc. iv. 263-4, new ser.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, March 21; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, iii. 376-87; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 1 seq.; Archdall, Mon. Hib. 76-8; Nicolson, Irish Hist. Lib. 45, London, 1736; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 83; Skene, Celt. Scot. 47, 60, 62. seq. 245.) The only Scotch Kalendar in which St. Enna appears is that of the Drummond Missal (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 8), which is closely affiliated to the Irish Martyrologies and Kalendars, and he is always called abbat or confessor, but, strange to say, there is none of his acts recorded in any of the Irish Annals, so that these give us no direct clue to the time when he lived. [J. G.]

* Colgan (Acta SS. 714-5) entirely inverts the position of the Aran Isles, bringing Ardoillen also into the group, and has led Archdall, the Bollandists, and Lanigan into the same geographical mistake.

ENNA (2), son of Nuadhan, and abbat of Imleachfoda, commem. Sept. 18. O'Donnell (Vit. S. Columb. i. c. 104) relates how St. Columba founded a church on the west side of a hill called Tulach-Segra, in the district of Corann (now Tully, in Toomour), and gave it to his pupil Enna, son of Nuadhan. The place was called Imleach-foda, now Emlaghfad, or Emlyfad, a parish in the barony of Corran and co. Sligo; Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 8, § 7; ii. c. 12, § 10) believes that this Enna, rather than the saint of Aran, is the Endeus who is named among the Irish saints of the second class. But there is no Enna, son of Nuadhan in the Irish Kalendars, and Colgan may have connected this Enna with Sept. 18, because Enan of Drumrath is so placed in the Martyrology of Tallaght. It is also questionable whether Enan, son of Muadan [ENAN (2)], and Enna, son of Nuadhan, be not the same person, though usually referred to the different eras of St. Patrick and St. Columba (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 406, c. 104, 451 n. 20, 490, n. 10; Reeves, Adamnan, 282). [J. G.]

ENNA (3) of Cill-na-manach, commem. Dec. 31. Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 351) has the dedication at Dec. 31, of Enda and Lochan, of Cill-na-managh in Ui-Dunchada (probably in the county of Dublin), or of Cill-mac-Cathail, in Ui-Bairche (in Queen's County); and of Bealach Gabhrain (now Gowran Pass, in the county of Kilkenny). But in tracing out the topography of Kilkenny, Mr. John Hogan says St. Enna is one of the patron saints of Kilmanagh, co. Kilkenny, where his holy well is still recognamed as "Tober Edaun," and Ciil-mac-Cathail is now anglicised Kilmacahil in Gowran Pass. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 359; Mart. Donaj. by Todd and Reeves, 351; Journ. Kilken. Arch. Soc. v. 200 n. 1.) [J. G.]

ENNA (4) (ENDA CROM), son of Amhalghaidh, of Tirawley, co. Mayo. Having, with his son Conall, been favoured by St. Patrick at Tara before king Laeghaire, he was the means of saving the apostle of Ireland from the plots of the Magi (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 140-41, cc. 76-84; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 253). [J. G.]

ENNA (5). In the Lives of St. Patrick attributed to Joceline (c. 100), and Evinus (ii. cc. 17-19), Enda and Fiacc, brothers of king Laeghaire, are represented as resisting and then embracing the Christian faith as proclaimed by St. Patrick. On his conversion Enda gave to the church and St. Patrick, not only the holocaust of a devout mind, but his first-born son Corbmac, and the ninth part of all the fields and property he had in Ireland (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 88, 131). This Corbmac is by some identified, but most improbably, with St. Corbmac of Armagh. [CORBMAC (2)]. King Laeghaire seems never to have had brothers so named (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 238, 253).

ENNA (6) (ENDEUS), son of Cathbhath, has his death entered in the Irish Annals about A.D. 457 (Ann. Inisf. A.D. 459; Ann. Ult. A.D. 456; Four Mast. A.D. 456), and is supposed by O'Connor (Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 109 n. 34) to be the same as St. Enna of Aran; but it is most unlikely. [J. G.]

ENNA (7). [MOENNA.]

ENNATHAS, a virgin, martyred in Palestine during the Diocletian persecution. She was brought before Maxys the tribune, who caused her to be led through the city of Caesarea by men who kept scourging her with thongs all the time; after this she was condemned to be burned. (Eus. Mart. Pal. ix.). In Bas. Men. i. 186, she is named Manetho, and is commemorated Nov. 13. [T. S. B.]

ENNEIM, one of five virgins martyred in Persia under Sapor II. (A.D. 326). Commemorated June 9. (AA. SS. Jun. ii. 172.) [T. S. B.]

ENNEPIUS, bishop of Maximianopolis (formerly Impara) in Thracia, near Rhodope. He was present at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi. iv. 1365; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1199.) [J. de S.]

ENNIUS (1) (EUNIUS), appears in the ancient lists of bishops of Nantes as second among them, and is said to have built the first church in that place, but everything concerning him is uncertain. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 795; Gams, Ser. Ep. 581.) [R. T. S.]

ENNIUS (2) (EONIUS, EUNIUS), sixth bishop of Vannes, succeeding Macliavus and followed by Regalis. In the third year of Childebert or the 17th of Chilperic (A.D. 578) he was sent to the latter king with an unwelcome message by Warochus a Breton leader, whose offence he expiated by sending him into exile with reproaches. The sentence, however, was relaxed in the following year so far that he was permitted to dwell at Angers, though not to return to Vannes. Subsequently he visited Paris, and while celebrating mass fell down in a fit. He was carried out and recovered, for, as Gregory explains, "nimium vino deditus erat, et plerumque ita deformiter inebriabatur ut gressum facere non valeret." (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 27, 30, 41; Aimoin, Hist. Franc. lib. iii. 25 in Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 703.)

ENNOALDUS (CHAIMOALDUS), twenty-third bishop of Poitiers, the successor of Caregisilus and predecessor of Johannes I. We know nothing of him unless he may be the bishop Cabimoaldus or Chaimaldus (both forms are used) whom St. Bertram, bishop of Le Mans, in his will speaks of as a relation, and begs to bury him. The date of St. Bertram's will was A.D. 616, and as Ennoaldus was alive in A.D. 615, the theory is not improbable. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 405, Gall. Christ. ii. 1151.) [S. A. B.]

ENNODIUS (1) MAGNUS FELIX, bishop of Pavia, was born at Arles (Ennod. Epist. lib. vii. 8) about 473. Through his father, Camillus (Ibid. iv. 25), he was connected with Faustus, Boethius, Avienus, and other Romans of distinction, though he constantly speaks in humble terms of his own family. The invasion of the Visigoths, and the consequent loss of his patrimony, caused him to migrate at an early age to Milan, where he was educated in the house of an aunt. At this time study had no attraction for him, as we learn from one of his letters addressed to Arator (Epist. ix. 1). In 489, the year in which Theodoric invaded Italy, his aunt died, and he was again reduced to destitution, but having rendered himself acceptable to a young lady of family and fortune he was happily saved from beggary by marriage (Eucharist. de Vit.). A dangerous sickness, from which he recovered by the aid of St. Victor, martyr, who administered extreme unction to him (Epist. viii. 24), first led him to serious thought, and suggested the composition of his Eucharisticon, in which he reviews his past life with many expressions of penitence. He was subsequently ordained deacon by Epiphanius bishop of Pavia, whose exhortations determined him to renounce his marriage. This he did with the consent of his young wife, who retired into a convent. In 494 he accompanied Epiphanius (Ennod. Vit. Epiphan. 234 A) on a mission to Gundebaud, king of the Burgundians, to procure the ransom of certain Ligurian prisoners. Upon the death of Epiphanius two years later he visited Rome, and gained reputation by composing an apology for pope Symmachus and the synod which acquitted him, as well as by a panegyric which he pronounced publicly in honour of Theodoric. The former of these discourses was inserted in the Acta Conciliorum; the latter is generally included in collections of the Panegyrici Veteres. Under pope Hormisdas, who succeeded Symmachus, he was advanced to the see of Pavia in the room of Maximus II., and on the strength of this dignity was sent in 515, and again in 517, on an embassy to the Emperor Anastasius, in order to oppose the spread of the Eutychian heresy. In the first instance he was accompanied by Fortunatus, bishop of Catana, in the second by Peregrinus, bishop of Misenum. Both embassies were unsuccessful. Anastasius continued to favour the heretics, and failing to corrupt or bend the bishop, he had him placed at his second departure from Constantinople, on board an unseaworthy vessel, with orders not to put into any Greek port. Ennodius, however, arrived safely in his diocese, which he continued to administer for the space of four years. He died at the early age of forty-eight, and was buried in the church of St. Michael at Pavin, July 17, A.D. 521, which day is observed as his festival by the Roman church.

The following is a list of his works:—

- (1) Epistolarum Libri ix., consisting of 297 letters addressed to various correspondents.
- (2) Dictiones xxviii., comprising six sacred, seven scholastic, eight controversial, and five ethical discourses.
- (3) Panegyricus Theoderico regi dictus.
- (4) Apologeticus pro Synodo.

To these works a supplement was added by Martene and Durand (Nov. Thesaur. Anecdotor.), from a MS. of St. Remy, of Rheims, comprising a discourse, "In natali Laurentii Mediolanensis episcopi," and a short letter addressed to one Venatius.

The writings of Ennodius exemplify throughout that profane tendency of thought and expression which the Christian writers of Gaul were so slow to abandon. Many of his letters would seem to have proceeded from the pen of a heathen rhetorician, rather than of a Christian bishop. His illustrations are commonly drawn from Greek mythology. He speaks of divine grace as descending "de Superis," and sets the Fates side by side with Jesus Christ. His letters addressed to the other sex breathe a spirit of gallantry, little in keeping with his sacred office. Most of his poems were written before his conversion, but even in those which were composed subsequently the old Adam occasionally reappears. His style is turgid, involved, and affected. He seems to shrink from making himself intelligible lest he should be thought commonplace, and the result is anything but attractive to the reader.

The works of Ennodius were first collected and printed among the Auctores Orthodoxographici, Bale, 1569, fol. Two editions were published in 1611, that of Andrew Schott at Tournai, 8vo., and a more complete edition by Sirmond at Paris, 8vo., with notes, which is reprinted in Migne's Patrologia, vol. lxiii., together with the supplement above mentioned.

ENNODIUS (8), addressed by Sidonius [EVODIUS (6).]

ENNOEA (Ἐννοία). In the attempts made by the framers of different Gnostic systems to explain the origin of the existing world, the first stage in the process was usually made by personifying the conception in the divine mind of that which was to emanate from Him. We learn from Justin Martyr (Ap. I. 26), and from Irenæus (I. 23, p. 99), that the word Ennoea was used in a technical sense in the system of SIMON. The Latin translation of Irenæus either retains the word, or renders "mentis conceptio." Tertullian has "injectio" (De Anima, 34). In the Ἀπόφασις Μεγάλη cited by Hippolytus (Ref. vi. 18, 19, p. 174), the word used is not Ἐννοία but ἑνωσία [HELENA, SIMON]. Irenæus states (I. 23, p. 100) that the word Ennoea passed from the system of Simon into that of MENANDER. In the Barbeliot system, which Irenæus also counts as derived from that of Simon (I. 29, p. 107), Ennoea appears as one of the first in the series of emanations from the unnameable Father.

In the system of VALENTINUS (Iren. I. i. p. 5) Ennoea is one of several alternative names for the consort of the primary Aeon Bythos [CHARIS, SIGE]. For the somewhat different form in which PTOLEMAEUS presented this part of the system see Irenæus (I. xii. 1, p. 56). Irenæus criticises this part of the system (II. xiii. p. 129). The name Ennoea is similarly used in the OPHITE system described by Irenæus (I. xxx. p. 108).

ENOCH, APOCRYPHAL BOOK OF. In Gen. v. 24 it is said of Enoch that he walked with God. This expression was interpreted to mean not only that he led a godly life, but also that he had been vouchsafed the privilege of Divine intercourse, and of receiving Divine revelations. Jewish antiquity regarded him therefore as a prophet, equally familiar with heavenly things and the future fortunes of the human race. These views of his character gave occasion for attributing to Enoch the apocryphal writing which constitutes one of the principal monuments of the apocalyptic literature of later Judaism. This Book of Enoch, which was already cited in the Epistle of St. Jude (v. 14), and much used by Jewish and Christian writers in the following centuries, was subsequently almost entirely lost—a few fragments only having been preserved in the chronography of Georgios Synkellos—till rediscovered in the last century in an Ethiopic translation. James Bruce, in 1773, brought back two MSS. into Europe, to which some others have been subsequently added. Silvestre de Sacy was the first to publish, in 1800, some particulars concerning the contents of this writing (Magasin Encyclop. vi. i. 382 sqq.). Archbishop Laurence was the first to edit an English translation (The Book of Enoch, an Apocryphal Production, &c. Oxford, 1821, 2nd ed. 1833, 3rd ed. 1838), followed by the original Ethiopic text from Bruce's manuscripts (Libri Enoch Versio Aethiopica, Oxford, 1838). A German translation, with learned introduction and continuous commentary, was published by Prof. A. G. Hoffmann in Jena (Das Buch Henoch in vollständiger deutscher Uebersetzung, &c. 2 Theile, Leipzig, 1833-1838). The first part is translated from the English, but the second is based likewise on the Frankfort manuscript of the Ethiopic text. The Latin version of Gfrörer, made from the English and German translations, is of no value (Prophetæ veteres pseudepigraphi, Stuttgart, 1840). The best edition of the Ethiopic text is that of Prof. Dillmann, who made use of five manuscripts (Liber Henoch Aethiopice, Leipzig, 1851). Of the improved text thus obtained, Dillmann published another German translation with critical introduction and copious commentary (Das Buch Henoch übersetzt und erklärt, Leipzig, 1853). The Ethiopic version was not made immediately from the Hebrew original, but from the Greek. There is no reason to doubt its substantial fidelity, though it not unfrequently differs from the Greek text of fragments preserved elsewhere, one at least of which is not to be found in the Ethiopic text. The whole work as it now lies before us is divided into five books, but closer investigation makes it evident that this text has passed through various hands, and is a composite work. It has been assumed by various critics that we have before us a collection of several books of Enoch independent one of another. This hypothesis, however, is untenable; we must, on the contrary, assume the existence of an original document, which at different times was enriched with additions from various sources. The critical treatment of the book has occupied, besides de Sacy, Lawrence, and Hoffmann, the following scholars, whose labours deserve a special mention here:—Ernst Krieger [Lützelberger] (in the Beiträge zur Kritik und Exegese, Nürnberg, 1845), Lücke (Einleitung in die Offenbarung Johannis, 2nd edit. Bonn, 1852), Dillmann (as above), Ewald (Ueber des Aethiopischen Buches Henoch Entstehung und Zusammensetzung), K. R. Köstlin (Ueber die Entstehung des Buches Henoch, Theologische Jahrbücher von Baur und Zeller, Jahrgang 1856), and Hilgenfeld (Jüdische Apokalyptik, Jena, 1857; Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, 1860, p. 319 sqq., 1861, p. 212 sqq., 1862, p. 216 sqq.).

Excluding first the so-called Parables (cc. 37-71), the following chapters—1-19, 21-36, 72-105—form a well-connected whole, which professes to be a variety of revelations committed to writing which had been vouchsafed to the prophet Enoch, partly in ecstatic visions in the heavenly world, partly in prophetic dreams. The introduction (cc. 1-5) announces first a benediction of the prophet on the righteous, and then a prophecy of the great day of judgment, on which the impious will receive well-merited punishment for their disobedience to the ordinances of God. Whereupon follows (cc. 6-16) an account of the origin of the universal corruption of the human race, induced by the fall of the angels and their carnal intercourse with the daughters of men. In consequence of the abominations resulting from this fall God is about to impose a heavy judgment, which Enoch has to announce to the fallen "Watchers." These are to be in future bound in subterranean prisons for the whole period of earth's history, the duration of which is fixed at seventy generations, until the day of final judgment, whereon they will be cast for ever into the lake of fire. In what follows, the original text appears in a somewhat fragmentary form in the Ethiopic version. As in the introduction, a reference to the fixed Divine laws which heaven itself and the whole physical universe have to obey served to exhibit in the strongest light the guilt of sinners in transgressing the will of God, so now is made to follow (cc. 17-19, 21-36) an account of the mysteries of heaven and earth which have been exhibited to Enoch by angels during an ecstatic rapture from earth to heaven. In this miraculous journey round the universe Enoch sees first the place of the winds and the regions whence lightning and thunder come. After that the water of life, and the sea of fire which is destined to receive the setting sun, the streams of Hades, the dwelling-place of the dead, the mountains of black winter clouds, the waters of Oceanus, the winds which support the universe, seven fiery mountains of precious stones, the mid-one of which, being the throne of God, reaches to heaven, the hell of fire, and in the vacant spaces of the universe the prison-houses of fallen star-spirits, and the future place of punishment for the angels who had held sinful intercourse with the daughters of men. In a subsequent journey Enoch is taken a second time to the same places. First to the place of punishment for the fallen angels; then into Hades and its different compartments; to the fire at which the stars are kindled; to the place of future judgment; to the seven mountains, the middle one of which rises in the form of a throne; and then into the Holy Land and the vale of Hinnom, the future place of punishment for impious men; and then further eastward to the legendary home-lands of noble spices, and on as far as Paradise. In a third journey Enoch arrives at the gates of heaven, and the places whence issue stars and winds. Thereupon follows (cc. 72-82) the book concerning the courses of the heavenly lights, which describes once more in the form of a journey the movements and orders of stars and constellations, the courses of sun and moon, and the relation of the solar to the lunar year, to which are attached a series of further communications regarding the various winds, their origin and operations, concerning the seven mountains, seven streams, and seven islands. The laws of the lights and powers of heaven are announced to Enoch on his journeys by the instrumentality of angels. All this he imparts to his son Methuselah, who is to commit it in his turn to following generations. In some parts of this section the original order seems to have been disturbed. Chapter 82 ought properly to stand before chapter 79, while chapter 81 forms the conclusion of this section. Enoch in this chapter contemplates the writing on the heavenly tables, wherein are recorded the actions of men to the latest generations, and then returns from his journeys to earth, in order to spend one last year in the circle of his family.

The revelations which follow concerning the future fortunes of mankind (cc. 83-91, 11; 93-91, 12-19) are presented in the form of visions which Enoch has been vouchsafed at different times of his life, but now for the first time, on the conclusion of his wondrous journey, relates to his son Methuselah.

The first vision, seen by him while still a boy, in the house of his grandfather Mahalaleel describes the flood (c. 83); the second, which had been imparted to him before his marriage gives in apocalyptic figures a general survey of the history of the chosen people, from the first human pair to the struggles of the Israelites against the Syrians, in the time of John Hyrcanus. The account of these struggles is immediately followed by that of the approaching universal judgment (cc. 84-90). A third description of the future, introduced by exhortations to his children, gives once more a rapid survey of the world's history divided into ten great weeks. At the end of the seventh week, which is the actual writer's own time, the righteous receive a sevenfold instruction concerning the whole creation; in the eighth week the righteous celebrate their triumph and enter on their kingdom; in the ninth, judgment is passed on the ungodly; to the tenth is assigned the judgment of the fallen angels and the renewal of heaven and earth. The last section (cc. 92; 94-105) contains the Doctrines of Wisdom which Enoch the writer imparts to his children and all future generations, warnings against sin in its various forms, admonitions to righteousness, fidelity, and perseverance, comminations against the ungodly, and promises for the righteous.

The text of this comprehensive work appears in some parts not to belong to the original form. Apart from the lacuna between chapters 16 and 17, and some smaller interpolations of which we shall have to speak farther on, it strikes one with surprise to find several things seen by Enoch in his journeys repeatedly told again in the same words. The revelations, moreover, vouchsafed to Enoch on his first journey (cc. 17-19) are for the most part repeated, chapters 21-36. The section about the Winds, on the other hand, chapters 76 and 77, together with the addition about the Seven Mountains, &c. disturbs too much the connexion of the book about the Lights of Heaven. It repeats also, in more detail, what has already been treated of (chapters 33-36), only much more briefly.

As there is little probability that these repetitions were intentional, we are warranted in supposing that there may have been different recensions of the text which held their ground side by side, and were put together by some simple-minded collector.

There is also much probability in Ewald's supposition that the author of our Book of Enoch had another and older book before him, perhaps in different editions, a "book of celestial physics," which in its first part contained a description of the mysterious regions above the earth, under the earth, and at the world's ends; and in its second part comprised the laws of the motions of sun, moon, and stars. This original work, more or less revised, seems to have been comprised in chapters 17-19, 21-36, 72-79, and 82. As a "scribe of heaven" to whom all the mysteries of creation and the courses of the stars were known, Enoch appeared to be the most suitable person to be represented as teacher of the higher wisdom. The second author, who regarded Enoch chiefly as a preacher of repentance and foreteller of judgment to come, adopted this other view of his character the more readily as the description of the place of torment prepared for the ungodly, in the lower world, fitted in well with his special purpose. At the same time he worked out the thought that the whole universe is governed by fixed laws and ordinances, and that every disorder or disturbance is simply a consequence of the sin of the fallen angels and of the impious among mankind. To him belongs the form of representation, somewhat late and abruptly introduced, according to which Enoch is imparting to his son, Methuselah, the mysteries which have been revealed to himself. The apocalyptic pictures drawn of the future (a main object with the second writer) are somewhat awkwardly presented in the form of dream-visions, related by Enoch, long after he had seen them, to his son. This second Book of Enoch seems never to have existed as an independent work, but only as an expansion and completion of the former. The pieces peculiar to the second author are chapters 1-16, 80 and 81, 83-105.

The date of the original work cannot be determinately fixed, while that of its revision is clearly indicated in the Vision, chapters 85-90. The seventy shepherd-times which begin after the destruction of the first Temple are the times of heathen dominion over Israel, till the rise of the Hasmonean monarchy. The seventy shepherds, each of whom obtains dominion for a definite period over the sheep, can indeed hardly be regarded as so many heathen princes, but rather as punitive angels who destroy more sheep than were included in their commission. At the same time the longer divisions into which these shepherd-times are distributed, though in detail the reckoning may be somewhat uncertain, correspond on the whole with the ruling periods of Babylon, Persia, Macedonia, and Syria; the last twelve appearing to answer exactly to the reigns of twelve kings of Syria, from Antiochus Epiphanes to Antiochus Cyzicenus. In any case the lambs, born in the last twelve shepherd-times, whose horns grow, and which call the sheep together to fight with the ravens, are the pious zealots of the Hasmonean period, and the great horn which the ravens, along with other birds of prey, vainly endeavour to cast down, is John Hyrcanus, the victorious Hasmonean (B.C. 135-106). The author looks forward to the close of Gentile dominion and the day of final judgment as soon about to follow these days of victory. The date of composition might be still more definitely made out could we but fix more exactly the dates of the seventy shepherd-times. They do indeed evidently correspond, as Hilgenfeld was the first to observe, to the 70 weeks of Daniel or 490 years. This, reckoning exactly, would give us the period from 588 B.C. to 98 B.C., and so bring us down to the early years of Jannaeus Alexander (105-79 B.C.). On the other hand, we do not certainly know that the date fixed in the author's own mind for the destruction of the first Temple was exactly B.C. 588. Putting this in round numbers at 600 B.C. we are brought by the 70 weeks down to 110 B.C., which Dillmann fixes as the approximate date of composition. In any case, the young whelp (chap. 90, 13, 14) is not distinguished from the great horn, and cannot therefore refer to Jannaeus Alexander but to John Hyrcanus himself.

The reckoning according to 70 generations chap. 10, 12) or 10 weeks (chap. 93) leads to no sure result.

The book, in any case, remains a remarkable monument of Jewish theological opinion at the close of the second and beginning of the first century before Christ. It is without sufficient foundation that the assertion has been made of its having proceeded from Essenic circles. It neither advocates Essenic asceticism nor rejects the Temple worship; the angelological speculations are still very undeveloped, while the writer's imagination is so much the more occupied with final judgment and consummation, the future blessedness of the righteous, and the torments of the ungodly. It is further noteworthy that the Messiah plays a quite subordinate part in its Eschatology. The specimens given of Jewish natural science are of special value.

What must be regarded as a third Book of Enoch is formed by the three Parables. These contain a description of the time in which the elect one, that is the Messiah, and the company of the elect will be manifested.

After an Introduction (chap. 37) the first Parable describes the dwellings of the righteous and of the holy angels in heaven (chaps. 38-44); the second, the final judgment to be administered by Messiah and the punishment of the ungodly (chaps. 45-57); the third describes, on the one hand, the blessedness of the righteous and elect in the Messianic time, and, on the other hand, more copiously than before, the judgment inflicted on kings and potentates of the earth, as well as on evil spirits, seducers of men and angels (chaps. 58; 60, 1-6; 61-64; 68, 2-5; 69).

The conclusion of the whole is formed by another description of the glories of heaven, and a promise of eternal peace which Enoch and other righteous shall enjoy under the dominion of Messiah (chaps. 70, 71). The introduction of these Parables, under the title of "The Second Vision of Wisdom which Enoch saw," proves that they do not constitute a distinct work but were added as a complement to the older collection.

That they proceed from a different author was early recognised, and is now, Dillmann only excepted, universally acknowledged. They not only disturb the connexion of parts in the older work, but by a new introduction, and the genealogy of Enoch inserted here for the first time, betray the existence of a different author. It is still more important to observe that their circle of ideas is in some essential points a different one to that of the older work; in that Messiah is only mentioned as it were in passing (chap. 90, 37, the white bull born at the end of time being probably the Messiah), while in the Eschatological Drama of the Parables, the "Elect One," or "Son of Man," is the chief person. He it is who conducts the final judgment which in the older work was regarded as resting in the hands of God only. He again has been from all eternity the destined ruler of the company of the elect, who, immediately after the final judgment, begins his everlasting reign. (The passage, 105, 2, where the Lord and His Son are manifested, is probably an interpolation.) Whereas, moreover, in the older writing, the Messiah is evidently regarded as a human descendant of Abraham. He now appears as one, who from all eternity has pre-existed with God. Many other differences may also be noticed between this and the older writing. Here only do we find as Divine names or titles, "Lord of Spirits," and "Head of Days," and while, moreover, in the older work the name "Watchers" (ἐγρηγόροι) is a general term to designate the angels, we now find the designation, "spirits who slumber not" applied to none but angels of the highest order. Other angelic names are also different in the two works respectively. Foremost in the latter stand the arch-angels, Michael, Raphael, Gabriel, Phanuel; beneath them the Cherubim, Seraphim, and Ophanim, followed by the thousand thousands and ten thousand times ten thousand. In the older writing, on the other hand, Uriel occupies throughout the place of Phanuel (the name Suriel for Raphael, 9, 1, is not confirmed by the parallel passage in the Greek text, nor is it met with elsewhere). The Seraphim and Ophanim are not mentioned at all. While, further, the older writing represents Enoch as under the guidance of Uriel, Raguel (Gabriel?), Raphael and Michael, he now appears under the guidance of the angel of peace, and sees the archangels in their lofty station round the throne of God. Azazel, moreover, is here placed at the head of the fallen angels (54, 5; 55, 4), whereas in chapters 6, 3-7, and 9, 7 (compare 10, 11) Semjaza is the first, Azazel the tenth in the list of those unhappy beings. In the passage 69, 2, the catalogue of fallen angels is an interpolation disturbing the context which treats only of originally evil spirits. Azazel is indeed in the older work also represented as the author of all kinds of iniquity, who teaches men the use of murderous weapons, luxurious living, and covetousness (8, 1; compare 9, 6; 10, 4; 13, 1), whereas in the second, these functions are ascribed to the evil spirit Gadreel, who (69, 9) teaches mankind the construction and use of instruments of slaughter. It is yet more significant that the Parables of the second work presuppose a Satan and Satans, that is, originally evil spirits by whom the angels have been seduced (69, 4, sqq.; compare 40, 7; 53, 4; 54, 6), and in accordance with this, they appear also to teach the existence of two races of mankind. As God originally divided light from darkness, so has He also divided the spirits of men, confirming in goodness those of the righteous (41, 8). This dualism is not, however, carried out to its legitimate consequences. We may further reckon among the peculiarities of these Parables the development of the teaching concerning the heavenly wisdom (chap. 43; compare 37, 2 sqq.; 48, 1, 7; 49, 1-3; 51, 3); the doctrine of the general resurrection of the dead (chap. 51); and the doctrine of an endless blessed life of the righteous in Heaven (37, 4; 58; 71, 16 sq.). The designation of the Messiah as "Son of Man," which, as is well known, is elsewhere applied to our Lord, only by Himself, is borrowed from Daniel, and this alone accounts for the representation of Heaven as the native home of the Messiah. The name, "Son of Woman" (62, 5), occurs once in a passage in which the text appears to have been corrupted, while "Filius Viri" in another passage (69, 29), instead of "Filius Hominis," may simply result from a mistranslation. The name Son of Man (Filius Hominis) is, in fact, the regular predicate of Messias, and this, combined with other somewhat developed Christological ideas in the Parables, has led to the supposition of a Christian authorship, in favour of which may also be alleged the expression "church of the elect," and the sharp antithesis between elect and reprobate, which is by no means identical with that between Israelites and Gentiles. Neither of these notes can, however, be regarded as decisive. The work is in the main directed against the kings who deny the name of the Lord of Spirits (38, 5; 41, 2; 46, 4, sq.; 48, 10; 53, 5; 54, 2; 55, 3, 63), and oppress the theocracy. This indicates a time not earlier than that of the later Hasmonians and the Herods. That we cannot go farther back than such a time is determined amongst other circumstances by the mention of the Parthians (56, 5) who then first began to be formidable neighbours to the Jews. Hilgenfeld contends that by "the kings," Gentile or heathen sovereigns are designated, and that because they are spoken of (chap. 46, 7) as those "whose trust is placed in gods which their own hands have made." This view is contradicted, however, by other passages, while the Gentile proclivities of the later rulers of Palestine, and specially of Herod and his sons, may be held to justify the expression on which his theory is founded.

These Parables, moreover, are not on their side free from interpolations. Such beyond doubt are the so-called Noachian sections, which not only disturb the context in which they stand, but also introduce Noah as the speaker instead of Enoch. They all refer to the first divine judgment, that of the Deluge. The limits of these Noachian sections are variously determined; Dillmann and Köstlin make them include chapters 54, 7, to 55, 2; 60; 65 to 69, 25, the former adding also chapter 70. Ewald, on the other hand, would assign only a few verses of chapters 60 and 69 to the interpolator. But the section chapter 68, 2-5, which is immediately connected with chapter 64, and the whole chapter 69 (with the single exception of the Catalogue of Angels, vv. 2 and 3, and perhaps the note of Time, v. 1), together with chapter 70, must have already belonged to the Parables, but of chapter 60, on the other hand, only vv. 1-6. As certainly Noachian sections then can be regarded only chapters 54, 7, to 55, 2; 60, 7-25, and 65 to 68, 1. Another passage which seems to have proceeded from the same interpolator as Ewald already has perceived, is the passage interpolated in the older writing, chapter 10, 1-3, 22^b, containing the announcement of the Deluge to Noah by an angel, not elsewhere mentioned as Arsajaljur. Whether he also inserted the Catalogue of Angels, chapter 20, and the list of fallen angels (chap. 69, 2, 3), repeated from 6, 7, cannot be definitely ascertained. It is however highly improbable that these additions are fragments of an independent Book of Enoch. On the other hand we must regard as mere interpolations in part the close relation in which Noah is placed here and afterwards to Enoch, and in part the circumstance that the Noachian additions borrow various expressions from the Parables (Lord of Spirits, Angel of Peace, &c.).

It is more difficult to determine the origin of some other sections. To these belong among the Parables some pieces which break the connexion of thought, and remind us of The Book of Celestial Physics (41, 2-9; 43; 44; 59; 69, 23). A comparison of these with the section 60, 11-23, which belongs to the Noachian additions, makes it probable that they also proceed from the same interpolator. To the same source may likewise be referred cc. 106 and 107, which treat of the birth of Noah and the Deluge which is to follow in his time, but here Enoch is the speaker and not Noah. Chapter 108, on the other hand, is certainly the work of another author, as is clear from the title, "Another Treatise which Enoch wrote for his son Methuselah, and for those who come after him." It was evidently after the insertion of the Parables with which it has several points of resemblance, as, for instance, in the antithesis of light and darkness. For the date of composition of the Noachian additions, we have no certain indications. One passage, 67, 5 sq., is important, which speaks of the custom of kings to seek for healing by bathing in warm springs; the allusion seems to be to Herod the Great and the hot baths of the Dead Sea (Joseph. Antt. xvii. 6, 5); that these baths are placed in "the west" appears to have arisen from a thoughtless reproduction of what had been said about localities in chapter 52, 1. Hilgenfeld prefers to think the allusion to be to the warm baths of Campania, so much frequented in the imperial times as really situated in "the west" of Palestine. This assumption, presupposing the Christian origin of the Parables, would indeed be necessary. Chapter 108 is, at any rate, the latest piece of the whole collection.

The result of these observations seems to be that the Book of Enoch must be regarded as a collective work, consisting of various parts, about the composition of which it will be difficult to form a certain judgment until the Hebrew original, or at any rate the Greek version from which the Ethiopic is derived, shall have been recovered. Apart from the question of the interpolations and especially the Noachian fragments, the chief point of interest for us at the present time is whether we are to regard the Parables as a Jewish or Christian work; could it be proved that they were made use of in the Book of Jubilees, the question would be decided in favour of a Jewish origin. The Christian authorship of the whole book is maintained by Lücke (in the first but not the second edition of his Einleitung in die Offenbarung Johannis), Weiss (Evangeliensfrage, Leipzig, 185 p. 214 sq.), J. Chr. K. Hofmann (Zeitschrift deutschen Morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1852, p. 87 sq.) and Philippi (Das Buch Henoch, Stuttgart, 186 is quite inadmissible. Volkmar's theory on the other hand is still more fanciful (Zeitschr. deutschen Morgenl. Gesellsch. 1860, p. 87 sq. and Eine Neutestamentliche Entdeckung u. deren Bestreitung, Zürich, 1862), namely, that the book proceeded from the school of R. Akiba, A.D. 132, and was written to invite followers to attach themselves to the false Messias, Bar-kochba, and join the Jewish revolt against Hadrian.

ENODOCUS (GUINEDOCUS), ST., to whom a chapel in the Cornish parish of St. Min (Menefrida), on the Bristol Channel, is dedicated, was probably a Welsh saint. William of W calendar gives March 7 as the day of St. Wenedocus. Bishop Lacy, of Exeter, in 1434, allowed the parishioners to celebrate their dedication day, to all future time, on the 13th of July, instead of on the 24th, which was the feast-day of St. Christina (Oliver's Monasticon Dioec. Exon. p. 441). In the parish of St. Cubert, also on the northern sea, is a sepulchral stone with the inscription, "CONETOCI FILI TEGERNOMALI," which some connect with this saint. The inscription is very like those on the sepulchral stones of Brecknockshire (compare those given in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. pp. 169, 625), which seems to have been a central point for missionary enterprise. [C. W. B.]

ENODORUS, ST., an Irish saint, who gave the name to St. Enoder, or Enedor, in Cornwall. His feast is the Sunday nearest the last Thursday in April. The name is Celtic, and not the same as Athenodorus. He is said to have died in Cornwall late in the 5th century. The church dedicated to him, just south of St. Columb Major, is called Eglosenuder in Domesday. The prefix Eglos is comparatively rare and early in Cornish names. The old fair-day of the parish was Sept. 25. (See Cressy's Church History of Brittany, i. 19, 1.) [C. W. B.]

ENOGATUS, said to have been bishop of Maclonium (St. Malo) in Brittany, and to have died A.D. 631 (Migne, Hagiog.). But the Samaritani do not feel certain enough about him to include him among the occupants of this see (Gall. Christ. xiv. 995). [C. H.]

ENON, martyred together with Quirio and forty others under Gallienus, A.D. 263. He is commemorated Jan. 13. (Mart. Hier.; AA. SS. Jan. i. 767.) [T. S. B.]

ENTHEUS, a monk, commemorated by the Ethiopian church on the 17th of the month Nahasse (August 10). Ludolphus adds no note to his name (Ludolphi ad Siam Historiam Aethiopicam Commentarius; Francofurti, 1691, p. 425). In the Ethiopian MS. of the Senkessar in the Bodleian Library, the 17th of Nahasse is marked thus: Martyrium Entei, Amoraei; and the martyrdom of his brother, Acrates, is commemorated on the same day (cf. Dillmann, in Catalogus Codd. MSS. Bibl. Bodleianae, pt. vii. p. 67). [F. P.]

ENTHUSIASTAE (ENTHOUSIASTAE, Cod. Just. I. v. 5; ENTHYSIATAE, Cod. Theod.), a name by which the EUCHITES were known (xvi. Cod. Theod. Tit. v. 65, vol. vi. p. 187; Concil. Epist. iv. 1477, Mansi; Theod. H. E. iv. 11; Tim. Presb. ap. Cotelier, Mon. Ecc. Gr. iii. 400). [G. S.]

ENTHYMESIS, one of the six "roots" in the system of SIMON (Hippol. Ref. vi. 20, p. 177). (OPHITES (Iren. I. xxx. 6, 7, p. 110) and VALENTINUS.) [G. S.]

ENTICIUS (EUTICIUS), of Caesarea in Maeritania (Scherschell), one of the numerous Christians who were required to surrender their sacred books during the period of the persecution of Diocletian, A.D. 303-4. (Monum. Vet. de Don. Hist. Oberthür, p. 171; ed. Migne, Patr. Lat. viii. 733 a.) [H. W. P.]

ENTULANUS, bishop of Toul. [ENDJLUA.]

ENTYCHITAE, a sect of the followers of SIMON, who, according to Clem. Alex. (Strom. vii. 17, p. 900), derived this name from the unlawful things which they had the audacity to practise (ἀφ' ὧν παρανόμως ἐπετήδευσαν τε καὶ ἐτόλμησαν). We know that Christians believed the charge to be true of certain of the Gnostic sects which had been brought by heathen against the Christians, viz. that haphazard sexual intercourse took place at their nightly meetings; and this would seem to be what was referred to in this nickname. Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 1) copies the name in the form Eutychetæ. Cotelier notes (Mon. Ecc. Gr. iii. 640) the occurrence of Eutychitæ as a transcriber's error for Euchitæ, and conversely Euchitæ in a passage where Sophronius intended the name Eutychitæ, derived from Theodoret. [G. S.]

ENUTIUS, bishop of Noyon. [EUNUTIUS.]

ENVAEL, Welsh saint. [ENVAIL, ENFAIL.]

ENYMLA, abbess. [ENIMIA.]

EOAIN, Irish saint. [IOAIN.]

EOALDUS (EOLDUS, GOALDUS, EDALDUS, CAEOLDUS), ST., was an archbishop of Vienne. In the Gallia Christiana (xvi. 35) he is placed forty-first in the list, succeeding St. Agratus, and followed by St. Barolinus II. He flourished about the year 710. He has sometimes been confused with Cadeoldus, who preceded him by about forty years in the same see. Almost the whole of his authentic history is summed up in a sentence from the Chronicon of Ado, archbishop of Vienne, for the year 718 (see Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 120), to the effect that at that time Eoldus enriched the church of Vienne, for he was related to the kings of the Franks, and built within the city a chapel cryptwise, in honour of the Thebaean martyrs, St. Maurice and his companions, and there placed a considerable number of relics, both of these and other martyrs, and the church was thenceforth called St. Maurice's. Eoaldus is commemorated on the 7th day of July. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 35.) [S. A. B.]

EOALDUS, bishop of Lyons. [FULCOALDUS.]

EOBANACH (EOBANUS), martyr, commemorated June 5. His name occurs in the list of martyrs in the Dunkeld Litany, and Camerarius, calling him St. Eobanus, martyr, places him on this day. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, lvii. 238, 332; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 153.) [J. G.]

EOBANUS presbyter of Boniface, of Mentz, in whose correspondence his name is also written EABA and EOBO. The archbishop calls him his son and a bearer of his letters. In the latter capacity Eaba visits the abbat Duddo, Eadburga abbess of Thanet, and Sigebald, apparently abbat of Chertsey. Boniface once addresses him from Italy among the friends he had left behind in Germany, viz. Gezpan, Tatwinus, and Wyigbertus. (Mon. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, pp. 98, 99, 100, 166.) He is mentioned as amanuensis of Boniface in a letter from the latter to the abbess Eadburga. He was sent by Pippin on an embassy to pope Zacharias to consult in the name of the princes of Christendom on questions of church discipline (Baron. A. E. 744, 3). He assisted Boniface as a chorepiscopus in his preaching and baptizing among the Frisians, and was afterwards appointed by him bishop of Trajectum (Maestricht). (Vit. Willibald. in Monum. Mog. ed. Jaffé, 463; Baron. Annales Eccles. A.D. 724, 8; 755, 38.)

[I. G. S.]

EOBE, an abbat who attests a charter of Ethelbald, king of Mercia, between 723 and 737. (Kemble, C. D. 83.) He is probably identical with Ibe, who attests a Worcester charter of the same king in 736 (ib. 80; Mon. Angl. i. 585) and Iebe, whose name is appended to a similar undated charter. (K. C. D. 89.) All the three charters are of respectable authority, and coincide in other points besides the attestation of this otherwise unknown person. As he was distinctly a Mercian abbat it would be hazardous to identify him further with Eaba of Malmesbury, who flourished at the same time. [EABA.] [S.]

EOBO (Monum. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, pp. 99, 100, 166), presbyter of Boniface. [EOBANUS.]

EOCAPUS, a martyr. Commemorated April 12. (Mart. Hier.; AA. SS. Ap. ii. 81.)

EOCHUA TUATHAIL, anchorer, bishop and abbat of Lughmhadh (Louth), died A.D. 820 (Four Mast.). [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH, pronounced Ohy, and derived from the Irish each, a horse, is literally a horse-man (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. 155). It is latinised ECHODIUS and ECHUDIUS, and retains also the Irish forms ECHAD and ECUID. (1) Abbat of Lismore, commemorated Apr. 17. The Irish annals mention the death of this saint in the year 634, and seem to make him abbat of a monastery at Lismore before St. Carthach Mochuda (May 14) was driven from Rahen. But however we may get over the special difficulty involved in the chronology, the truth seems to be that while Carthach was bishop, Eochaidh was the second abbat of Lismore in Waterford. [CARTHACH (2).] (Reeve, Culdees, 49; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 335.) Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 356) is urgent for his being either an abbat of Lismore, in Scotland, or else the same as Eoglodius (Jan. 25), of Iona. [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (2), bishop of Tamlacht, Jan. 28. He is commemorated on this day in the Irish Martyrologies, and, dying A.D. 812, is called in the Annals bishop, anchorer, and coarb of Maelruain, at Tallaght, co. Dublin. He was abbat and bishop in one. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 468.) [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (3), son of Cearnach, steward of Armagh, died A.D. 796 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 399). Ann. Ult. (A.D. 795) call him Echumac Cernaig, and say he died "immatura morte."

[J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (4), son of Colgan, anchorer of Armagh, and called in Ann. Ult. (A.D. 730) Echdach, died A.D. 731 (Four Mast. A.D. 725).

[J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (5), son of Colla, Jan. 29, Joyce (Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. c. 9, p. 156 seq.) has a very curious and interesting chapter on the Irish love for attaching nicknames to persons, either as descriptive of some personal or hereditary peculiarity or as based on similarities or contradictions. It is from this custom we have the name of Eochaidh, son of Colla, entirely supplanted by the nickname Dallan Forgaill, "the blind son of Forchella." [DALLAN FORGAILL.] [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (6), son of Conall Meann, abbat of Faebhran (Foyran, in the barony of Fore, co. Westmeath) (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, vii. 58, but cf. i. 357 n. 4), died A.D. 759 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 754.) [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (7), son of Diarmaid, bishop and abbat of Armagh. He succeeded St. Caerlan (Mar. 24) at Armagh in 588, and was there for ten years, dying A.D. 598 (Stuart, Armagh, 92; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 2). Ware says Eochaid, son of Dermot, called abbat of Armagh, died in January 598, but his reference to January is probably taken from Colgan's vague suggestion that if this Eochaidh is to be numbered among the saints, he is likely to be the one who is venerated on Jan. 1, though the person there is said in the Kalendars to be Eochaidh of Uisneach. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 293, col. 2; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 5; Ware, Bishops, by Harris, 39.) [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (8), son of Fiachra, a wise man, died A.D. 759 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 754.) [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (9), son of Fogarta, abbat of Fochladh and Inisclothrann (the former place a woody district near Killala, barony of Tirawley, co. Mayo, and the latter an island in Lough Ree, in the Shannon), died A.D. 785 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 386-7.) [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (10), son of Nathi or Dathi, was converted by St. Patrick on the restoration of his wife Echtra to life before the church door of Kilmore, as related by Jocelin and Evinus. Dathy, son of Fiachrach, was the last pagan king of Ireland, and killed by a thunderbolt at the foot of the Alps, A.D. 428 (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 96, c. 145, 141, c. 91, 180 n. 146). [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (11), of Uisnech — Jan. 1. There is an account given by Evinus (Trip. Vit. St. Patr. ii. c. 123) of St. Patrick's arrival in the country of Enna, who was brother of king Laeghaire, and of his request for ground to build a church. Without apparently giving his full consent at the time, Enna next day brought his son Eochaidh or Eochan Luscus to St. Patrick to be made a bishop, and, failing to meet with St. Patrick at Aileach-Airteach, prevailed upon two of St. Patrick's disciples, who were bishops, to consecrate Eochaidh. But when St. Patrick heard of this transaction he was highly incensed, and pronounced a doom upon both the young bishop and his consecrators. Colgan thinks this Eochaidh must have been the Eochaidh of Uisnech, who is commemorated in the kalendars on Jan. 1, chiefly because Uisnech or Usnagh-hill is in Westmeath, which belonged to the sons of Laeghaire, and Aileach-Airteach was probably on the other side of the Shannon, in Roscommon. (Colgan, Acta SS. 737, c. 4, and Tr. Thaum. 131, c. 17, 145, c. 123, 181 n. ¹⁸⁰; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 19.) [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (12) of Cill-Toma. In the Irish annals is the death of Eochaidh (Echdach, Ann. Ul.) of Cill-Toma, now Kiltcom, a hamlet in the barony of Fore, near Castlepollard, co. Westmeath. He died in the year 751 (Ann. Tig.), and was succeeded by Coibhdeanach. [J. G.]

EOCHAIDH (13) of Cluain-ratha, brother of St. Magister of Killmagister, descended from the Ui Bairrche who occupied Slievemargy, Queen's County, and some adjoining districts. He was thus related to and nearly contemporary with St. Fiacc, of Sletty, who, by his mother, was a step farther removed from the common ancestor Dairre Barrach (Book of Rights, 212; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Archaeol. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. ii. 547). [J. G.]

EOCHOD, apostle of the Picts. [EUCHADIUS.] [J. G.]

EODBALD (Annal. Inuvians. Maj. in Pertz, Mon. Germ. Hist. Scriptt. i. 87, ann. 640), filius Edilberti, depositus 13 kal. Februar. feria 6. [EADBALD (1).] [C. H.]

EODEBERTUS, by a deed dated the 16th of May, in the tenth year of king Childebert (704), sold all his possessions at Ruriliacum, in the district of Therouanne, to Rigobert abbat of the monastery of St. Bertin at Sithium. This document is by some mistake given twice over in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1248 and cxxxvi. 1198, the author of the Index biographicus evidently supposing there were two distinct deeds of different purport. [S. A. B.]

EODWALD (EADWALD), the son of a poor woman whom Wilfrid is said to have restored to life at a place called Ontiddanufri (? Tixover). Wilfrid desired that the child should be brought to him when seven years old, to enter into his service. When the time came, the mother, at the instigation of her husband, fled from home with her child, and was concealed among the Britons. They were discovered by Hocca, one of Wilfrid's officers, and the boy was brought to him. He was generally called "bishop's son" (filius episcopi), and died at Ripon in the great mortality. He was in some religious service there. (Eddi, Vita Wlfr. n. e. cap. 18.) [J. R.]

EOGHAN (EUGENIUS, "well-born," Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. 150). (1) Son of Cainnech, and bishop of Ardsrath and Rathsinh, commemorated Aug. 23. He was of the royal blood of Leinster, his father being Cainnech, of the race of Laeghaire Lore, son of Ugaine Mór, and his mother Muindecha, of the race of the Magdorni, probably in the county of Monaghan. He is said by Colgan and others to have been a disciple of St. Patrick, but he does not appear to have really been such, unless we are to suppose that his age was prolonged to an unusual extent. It is more likely that he was under St. Finnian (Dec. 12), of Clonard; and on his liberation from the captivity in which he was held when the pirates carried him off in his early youth, along with Tighernach (Apr. 4) of Clones, and Cairpre (Nov. 11) of Coleraine, and others, to Britain, he studied for some years at the great monastery of Rosnat or Whithern, founded by St. Ninian. He founded a monastery at a place called Kilnamanagh, in the county of Wicklow, where, according to Ussher, he flourished in the year 570, and had under him St. Kevin (June 3) of Glendalough, his kinsman. St. Etchen (Feb. 11) of Clonfad is said to have been related to him as belonging to the same sept in the Dal Messincorb. St. Eoghan afterwards was bishop at Ardsratha, now Ardstraw, in the barony of Strabane and county of Tyrone, where the bishop's seat was fixed before it was transferred to Maghera and thence to Derry; he was also bishop at Rathsinh, now Rathshee or Rashee, in the barony and county of Antrim, and as such is usually entered in the Annals. At Ardstraw he had also a monastery. To Ulster he probably came from Wicklow, on account of its being the province of his maternal relationship. He was a great and industrious preacher, and after a life of zealous labour in declaring the gospel, he fell asleep in the Lord in the beginning of the seventh century. In all the Irish annals his death is associated with that of St. Coemgen, or Kevin, of Glendalough, and took place in the year of grace 618 (Ann. Tig.). The Bollandists (Acta SS. Aug. 23, tom. iv. 624) have a memoir, "De S. Eugenio vel Eogaino, Episcopo Ardstrathensi in Hibernia. Vita auctore anonymo ex MS. Salmanticensi;" and Baring-Gould (Lives of the Saints, Aug. 23, p. 251) compiles a short notice, but gives too early a date. In Ann. Clonmacn. he is called "Owen, bishop of Ardsrathy," and Calder or Cawdor, a parish in the counties of Nairn and Inverness, was dedicated to St. Ewan and anciently called Borivon, properly Bar Ewan or Ewan's Height. He was patron also of Collace, Perthshire. O'Donell (Vit. S. Columb. i. c. 13) gives an account of St. Eugenius of Ardstraw, foretelling the birth of St. Columba, and O'Clery refers to it as a fact, but as St. Columba was born about A.D. 521 and bishop Eoghan died about A.D. 618, we must doubt the genuineness of the prophecy. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 159, 227; Colgan, Acta SS. 406, 438, and Tr. Thaum. 391, 460, c. 31; Lanigan, Eocl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 12, § 3; Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 103-6; Reeves, Eocl. Ant. 68, 250; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 184, iv. 40; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 335; Survey Prov. Moray, 202; Ware, Bishops, 48, and Ir. Ant. 131; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Aug. 23, viii. 397; Ulster Journ. Archaeol. i. 187 n.; Book of Obits, C. C. Dublin, lxx. lxx.; Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. ii. 782.) [J. G.]

EOGHAN (2), son of Laisre. "Eogenius mac Laisreus" is given in Ussher's Irish saints of the second class, who were few bishops and many priests, to the number of three hundred, and extended for a period of about sixty years up to the close of the sixth century. But nothing satisfactory is known of him: he could not have been bishop of Ardstraw, as Cainnech was that bishop's father's name, nor could he well have been master of St. Kevin (Ussher, Eocl. Ant. c. 17, works, vi. 478, 528; Lanigan, Eocl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 4, c. 12, § 7). [J. G.]

EOGHAN (3), son of Saran, of Cluain-Caolain. Commem. Mar. 15. Of this saint there is no special mention in the Kalendar and Martyrologies, but O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. 77) adds to the name on this day his own comment, "I think this is Eoghan, son of Saran, of Cluain-Caolain, for whom Ailbhé (Sept. 12), of Imleach Iobhair, composed the very hard rule which begins 'Say for me to the son of Saran,' etc., for every other person of the same name that is in the martyrology has some title or church which he possessed, except the Eoghan who comes at this day." Dr. Todd (ib. 247 n. 3) adds that the poetical rule here alluded to is addressed to Eoghan, son of Saran, of Cluain-Coelain, co. Tipperary, and a good copy of it is in Mr. Curry's copy of the Brussels MS., containing the Felire of Aengus, &c. [J. G.]

EOGHAN (4) son of Nemhain or Nemhnall. The brothers Eoghan, Conall and Cairpre, are commemorated at Feb. 19 as "The Sons of Nemhnall" (Mart. Doneg.). They had their residence at Teach-mac-Neamhain, which is said in Macgraidin's Vita S. Fechini to have been in the province of Leinster and district of Hy Faolain, i.e. co. Kildare (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 138, c. 83, 142 n. 23; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 639). [J. G.]

EOGHAN (5) of Lismore, Oct. 16. The Four Masters give the date of the death after a three years' rule of Eoghan, son of Roinchenn, abbat of Lismore, in 771, but the true year is 776. St. Adamnan (Vit. S. Columbae, ii. c. 9) relates the finding of a satchel in the river of Leinster, after the satchel itself was not only soaked but rotten, and yet the book inside it, which had been written by St. Columba and belonged to a priest named Iogenan, a Pict by race, was dry and uninjured. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 352, c. 9, 490 n. 23) identifies this Iogenan, whom he calls "B. Eugananus, seu Eoganus, presbyter, gente Pictus, Monachus Hiensis," with Eoghan, bp. of Lismore, of Oct. 16, and includes him among the disciples of St. Columba, placing him at the same time at Lismore in the Hebrides. But everything is opposed to Colgan's attempt at identification. [J. G.]

EOGHAN (6) of Cillecleithi, now Kilclief, in the barony of Lecale, co. Down; this was one of the seven sons of Trichem, a chief of Uladh, who was of the race of Fiach Finn, the ancestor of the Dal Fiatach, in Ulster. He thus was brother of St. Dichu (Apr. 29) of Saul, but of his history little is known beyond his having his church or monastery at Kilclief (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 114 n. 1; Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 38; Colgan, Acta SS. 61-2, and Tr. Thaum. 110, n. 23, 265, col. 2). When St. Patrick left Inishowen, and had placed a bishop called Beatus over the church he had built at Duncruthen (now Duncrun, in the county of Londonderry), he united him and another saint, named Eugenius, in a bond of spiritual friendship; but this is all the information Evinus (Vit. S. Patr. ii. c. 125) gives regarding Eugenius, and Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 146, c. 125, 182, n. 189) will not decide as to whether it is Eugenius of Cillecleithi, or some other of the many bearing the same name (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 183-5). [J. G.]

EOGHAN (7), abbat of Maghbile (now Moville, co. Down). Commem. May 31 in Mart. Doneg. and Mart. Tallaght, but in the latter is called bishop and sage of "Magh Cremhcaille"; yet this seems to be only by a confusion between Eoghan the abbat of Moville, and Ernin of Cremchoill (Mart. Doneg.), the term "sapiens" being taken from "Eoghan sapiens," of May 28, who is so called in both the Martyrologies [ERNIN (2)]. There is no other reference to his episcopate (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 141; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xxv.). [J. G.]

EOGHAN (8) (EUGANAN), son of Totalain, died A.D. 660 (Ann. Tig.; Ann. Ult. A.D. 659). [J. G.]

EOGHANAN, commemorated Dec. 20 (Mart. Doneg., but 19, Mart. Tall.). He was son of Aenghus, and had his residence or dedication at Ardlecach, in Magh-Ene, near unto Eas-Ruaidh, that is, in the plain of Moy, co. Donegal, and near the cataract of Assaroe or Kasaroe, on the river Erne (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 343; Mart. Tallaght in Kelly's Cal. Ir. SS. xxxix. 13). Eoghanan is the diminutive of Eoghan, and probably the double diminutive of Eogh or Eocha. [J. G.]

EOGLODIUS, Irish saint. [EUCHADIUS.]

EOGON, son of Tripot, an abbat, died A.D. 745, but the entry in the Stowe copy of the Four Mast. is modern (O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. iii. 270). [J. G.]

EOGUIN (Nennius, Hist. Angl. in M. H. B. 76 A), king of Northumbria. [EDWIN.] [C. H.]

EOIL, Irish saint. [EUHEL.]

EOIN, son of Carlan, of Tech-eoin in Uladh, commemorated Aug. 17. Eoin is the Irish form of the name John, and this saint is commemorated in Mart. Doneg. and Mart. Tallaght. His church Tigh-Eoin, "John's House," has given its name by contraction to Styoun, now St. John's Point, a detached townland of Rathmullan parish, co. Down. (Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 32, 33.) [J. G.]

EOLANG (EULAIG, EULOGIUS), of Achadbo, commemorated Sept. 5. O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 237) has on this day "Eolang of Achadh-bo-Cainnigh in Osraighe [now Aghaboe, founded by St. Cainnech (Oct. 11) in the baronies of Clandonagh and Clarmallagh, Queen's County,] and he is of the race of Conaire, son of Mogh-lamha, Monarch of Erin." In the kalendar of the Drummond Missal (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 23) he is Eulaig Confessor. A saint called Eulangius or Eulogius is mentioned among the twelve disciples or companions of St. Barry or Finbar (Sept. 25) in his journey to Britain, and at his monastery of Loch Irce or Erce; but this was really St. Ollan or Olan, of Aghabulloge, in the barony of East Muskerry, in the county of Cork. [OLLAN.] (Caulfield, Life of S. Fin Barre, 19 n.; Colgan, Acta SS. 221, c. 2, 607, col. 1.) Another homonymous saint, Eolang of Lecan, had his feast on Dec. 29. [J. G.]

EOLDUS (Adon. Chron. ann. 718 in Patr. Lat. cxiii. 120 b), bishop of Vienne. [EOALDUS.]

BOLLA, the second bishop of Selsey (M. H. B. 118). He is mentioned by Bede as the successor of Eadbert, and as dead some time before the Ecclesiastical History was completed (H. E. v. 18). His name is inserted in a spurious or interpolated charter of 714 issued at a South Saxon witenagemot (Kemble, C. D. 999), and in another charter he appears as confirming a grant of king Nunna (ib. 1001). Unfortunately the text of the Selsey charters is in such a state that nothing can be argued from these facts.

EONAN (AEONA), a singer, who with Eddi accompanied Wilfrid during his sojourn in Mercia and Kent in A.D. 664, teaching the people, no doubt, church music and the Gregorian tones. (Eddi Vita S. Wulf. cap. xiv.)

[J. R.]

EONIUS (1), bishop of Vannes. [ENNIUS (2).]

EONIUS (3), twenty-second bishop of Auch, succeeding Alecius and followed by Paulinus, towards the close of the 6th century. The name in the ancient catalogue has also been read as Comus, Conius, and Genius. (Gall. Christ. i. 975; Gams, Series Episc. 497.)

EONUS (AEONIUS), of noble birth in the territory of Chalon-sur-Saône, succeeded Leonitus as bishop of Arles. The Sammarthani date his accession in 492. The Bollandists suppose it possibly earlier. Pope Gelasius writes to notify to him, and through him to the other bishops of Gaul, his accession to the pontificate. He was present at the discussion held at Lyons between Catholics and Arians, which inspired king Gundobald with a certain leaning towards Catholicism [AVITUS] (see Hefele, Conc. Gesch. h. xii., sec. 219). In a long-standing dispute between the churches of Arles and Vienne, regarding primatial rights, pope Anastasius II. had made certain arrangements favourable to Vienne, by which more ancient regulations of St. Leo were infringed. Appeal having been made to pope Symmachus, he wrote a letter to Eonus (Patr. Lat. lxii. p. 49), in which he directs both churches to send delegates for his information. Crescentius was sent on the part of Arles, but it does not appear that Vienne sent any one. Upon hearing his statement, Symmachus again wrote to Eonus in the year 500. After perusal of the great accumulation of documents relating to the case (quibus ecclesiasticum gravatur scrinium) he rescinds the innovations of Anastasius and maintains the ordinances of St. Leo, on the ground of the reverence due to antiquity, and the need of maintaining the consistency of the apostolic see. The letter bears the appearance of a final decision on the question; but Avitus of Vienne having remonstrated, the pope replies to him that the case is still open, and in fact it was only in 513 that it was finally decided in favour of Arles. [CAESARIUS.] Eonus was the relative and fellow countryman of St. Caesarius, whom he placed over a monastery on an island near Arles, and recommended to the people as his successor. His death occurred Aug. 16, A.D. 502; but the feast of St. Roche being in possession of that day, Eonus is commemorated on Aug. 30. (Acta SS. Aug. 30; Gall. Christ. i. 534; Ceill. x. 504 and 523; Tillemont, Mém. xv. 96.)

EOPA (Wend. Flor. Hist. ann. 661, ed. Coxe); EOPPA (A. S. C. ann. 657, 661, in M. H. B. 316, 317), presbyter. [EAPPA.]

EOPPA, son of Ingeld, who was brother of Ine king of Wessex. Eoppa was great-grandfather of Egbert. (Chr. S. M. H. B. 348.)

[S.]

EORCOMBERT (ancient Cotton MSS. fragments described in Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 259), king of Kent. [EARCOMBERT.]

[C. H.]

EORCONGOTHA (Flor. Wig. Geneal. Reg. Cantw. in M. H. B. 627), daughter of Earcombert. [EARCONGOTA.]

[C. H.]

EORICHUS (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 20), king of the Goths. [EURIC.]

[C. H.]

EORMENBEORGE, or -GA (Flor. Wig. Geneal. Reg. Merc. in M. H. B. 630; id. Geneal. Reg. Cantw. in M. H. B. 627), daughter of Eormenred of Kent, wife of Merewald king of Mercia. [EORMENBURGA (1).]

[C. H.]

EORMENBURGA (1), (EORMENBURH, ERMENBURGA), otherwise called Dompneva or Domneva, a name probably derived from "Domina Eaba," the latter being the name given to her in Kentish charters, supposing the two to be identical. She was a daughter of Eormenred, son of Eadbald king of Kent. She was married to Merewald, son of Penda, who is called king of the West Mercians or West Hecani of Herefordshire, to whom she bore three daughters, Milburga, Mildritha, and Mildgitha, and a son Merefin. According to the Canterbury hagiographers she received from her cousin, king Egbert of Kent, an estate in the Isle of Thanet, in composition for the death of her brothers Ethelred and Ethelbert. Upon this she built a monastery, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, at the place now called Minster, in Thanet, where she herself became the first abbess, and was blessed by archbishop Theodore. In this dignity she was succeeded by her daughter Mildritha or Mildred, who gave her own name to the monastery. (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 534, 635, 638, 648; Will. Malmesb. G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 319; Elmham, pp. 207, 215.) In Thorn's Chronicle of St. Augustine's the name of St. Mildred's predecessor at Minster is given as Aebba, and to Aebba the forged grants of Wihtried and Swebheard are given. (Kemble, C. D. 15, 87; Elmham, pp. 234, 288.)

It is extremely difficult to unravel the Kentish hagiography, and it would not be safe to say that the three names Eormenburh, Dompneva, and Aebba represent the same person. Florence of Worcester is probably the best authority, and the identification of Dompneva with Eormenburga is not improbable. But the whole story is more or less legendary. The story of Eormenburga founding a monastery at Eastry (Mon. Angl. vi. 1620) seems to be simply a confused account of the foundation of Minster. Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 635 c) calls the wife of Merewald Ermenberga, and makes another sister Ermenburga, of whom nothing more is said but that she was "sancta virgo" (ib. p. 627).

and sister-in-law of Centwine king of Wessex. (Eddi, cap. 40.) She is charged with stirring up the wrath of her husband against bishop Wilfrid, reflecting upon his wealth and influence, in consequence of which the diocese of York was subdivided by Theodore and Egfrid, and Wilfrid appealed to Rome. This was in A.D. 678. (Id. cap. 24; Symeon, de Arch. Ebor.) On his return from Italy, Wilfrid was imprisoned, and Ermenburga got possession of his reliquary, and used it as a personal decoration. (Id. cap. 34.) Eddi tells us how for this conduct she became deranged, or possessed, at Coldingham, and how her ailment went away when Wilfrid was released and restitution made. (Id. cap. 39.) When her husband fell, in A.D. 685, Ermenburga was in her sister's monastery at Carlisle, awaiting the news of the expedition, and there she had an interview with Cuthbert. (Bede, Vita Cuth. cap. 27.) After this Ermenburga seems to have taken the veil, as her name appears in the Book of Life of Durham among the queens and abbesses (p. 3). See also Malm. G. P. p. 232. ed. Hamilton; Hist. Eliens. lib. i. ed. Stewart, p. 39. [J. R.]

EORMENGILDA, EORMENHILD, a daughter of Earcombert, king of Kent, by his wife Sexburga; married to Wulfhere king of Mercia. (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 534, 635, 637; Elmham, p. 188.) She became a nun in her mother's monastery at Sheppey, and when Sexburga went to Ely she succeeded her as abbess. On Sexburga's death Eormenhild became abbess of Ely, and gave Sheppey to her daughter Werburga. Eormenhild died and was buried at Ely. Her memory was observed on Feb. 13. (Hist. Eliens. ed. Stewart, i. 76, 77; Elmham, p. 191, W. Malmesb. G. P. ed. Hamilton, pp. 308, 323.) The history of Eormenhild as the wife of Wulfhere is crossed by that of Eadburga abbess of Gloucester. [EADBURGA (4).] A life of St. Eormenhild, which exists in several MSS., appears abridged by Capgrave in the Nova Legenda Angliae. (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 368, 369; AA. SS. Boll. Feb. 13, ii. 686-691.) Her name, "Hirmynhilda," as abbess, is attached to the spurious form of the privilege of Wihtried. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 246.) [S.]

EORMENGITHA (ERMENGITHA), daughter of Eormenred, son of Eadbald king of Kent. (Flor. Wig. Geneal. Reg. Cant. in M. H. B. 627.) [C. H.]

EORMENRED, son of Eadbald king of Kent. According to the Canterbury tradition, as delivered by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 646), he was the elder son of Eadbald, but set aside by his father in favour of Earcombert. Elmham (p. 175) makes him die before his father, whilst Thorn (c. 1906) seems to favour the notion that he survived his father and left his children to the care of his brother Earcombert. The fact that his wife Oslawa is called "regina" by Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 635) is in favour of the latter supposition. On the other hand Eormenred is never mentioned by Bede. By Oslawa he was father of Ermenburga, otherwise called Dompneva, Ermengitha, Etheldrytha, Ethelred and Ethelbert, to whom the "Genealogia" of Florence (M. H. B. 627) adds Eormenbeorga. His name is known chiefly as that of the father of a family of saints, of whom the two sons were, in legend at least, reputed as martyrs. (See Will. Malmesb. G. R. i. § 11, 13; iii. 209, &c.; Elmham, pp. 175, 176, 184; Chr. S. M. H. B. 310.) [S.]

EORPENWALD (Wend. F. H. ann. 624, 632, 636); EORPUALD (Bed. H. E. ii. 15, in M. H. B. 167 B); EORPWALD (A. S. C. ann. 632, in M. H. B. 309; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 632, 636, in M. H. B. 528 C, 529 A; id. Geneal. Reg. Or. Angl. in M. H. B. 628; id. ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 636 A; Malm. G. R. A. ed. Hardy, i. § 97), king of East Anglia. [EORPWALD.] [C. H.]

EORPWIN, abbat of the northern monastery described by the monk Ethelwulf (AA. SS. O. S. B. saec. vi. part 2; pp. 323, 327). See ETHELWULF (2). His name appears among the priests, abbats, in the Liber Vitae Dunelmensis, p. 6. [S.]

EORTASIUS of Sardis. [HEORTASIUS.]

EOSTERWINUS (MSS. described in Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 413; Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 651 C), abbat. [EASTERWINE.] [C. H.]

EOVALDUS (Hou), saint and martyr who, along with Sixtus, suffered under Dacian the governor of Spain, during the Diocletian persecution, at Gerunda in Catalonia. The Bollandists give an account of the discovery of the bodies of these saints taken from an original Spanish authority. They were commemorated on May 7. (AA. SS. Boll. Maii ii. 134.) [L. D.]

EPACHIUS, presbyter of Ricomagus (Riom) in Auvergne, spoken of by Gregory of Tours in the 6th century. Being of senatorial rank and of better birth than anybody else at Ricomagus, he was asked to celebrate mass on the feast of the Nativity. Having accordingly to keep the vigil in the church, he was observed to go out during the night to his house from hour to hour, and drink "wanton cups from foaming tankards." He was even seen drinking after cock-crow, and was therefore not in a state of fasting on the day of communion. While administering the elements to the congregation he had an epileptic fit, and was carried out of church. The fit returned monthly. Gregory relates this story, to which he adds another from his personal history, to enforce the special sanctity of the vigil of the Nativity. (Greg. Tur. lib. i. De Glor. Mart. cap. 87.) [W. M. S.]

EPAENETUS, bishop of Carthage, according to Baronius (Annal. s. a. 58, iv.), who, however, gives no authority for his statement but that of Dorotheus (De lxx. Discip., Patr. Graec. xcii. 1061). He is the person mentioned in Rom. xvi. 5. In the Greek Menaes he is said to have preached in Carthage, as well as in Italy and elsewhere, but there is no mention of his episcopate (Menaes, Jul. 30, ed. Constantinople, 1843; Calmet in Rom. xvi. 5). The anonymous Comment. de SS. Pet. et Paul. (cap. 3, § 11) printed by the Bollandists represents Epænetus to have been placed by St. Peter as bishop at Sirmium in Spain. No Spanish Sirmium is known. Flavius Dexter makes it Sexitirmus, identified by his editor with Piedrahita. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. v. 416 a; Dext. Chron. ann. 50 and Bivar's Comment. in Patr. Lat. xxxi. 103.) [T. W. D.]

EPAGATHUS (1) VETTIUS, one of the martyrs at Lyons under Marcus Aurelius (A.D. 177); commemorated June 2. (Euseb. H. E. v. 1; Mart. Hier., Ad., Us.) [T. S. B.]

EPAGATHUS (2), bishop of Marcianopolis in Moesia Inferior, south of the Danube, present at the synod held at Constantinople under Nectarius, when the dispute between Agapius and Bagadius for the bishopric of Bostra, the metropolis of the province of Arabia, was settled in favour of Bagadius, A.D. 394. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1218; Mansi, iii. 852.) [L. D.]

EPAPHRAS (Col. i. 7, iv. 12; Philem. 23), legendary bishop of Colossae. Jerome in his Commentary on the Ep. to Philemon, vv. 23, 24 (Patr. Lat. xvi. 617), mentions a tradition relating to the connexion of Epaphras with St. Paul, but nothing of his episcopate. Epaphras is first called bishop of Colossae by Ado archbishop of Vienne (Adon. de Festiv. SS. Apost. in Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 128), who records the tradition that he was ordained a bishop at Colossae by St. Paul, and that he was martyred and buried in the same city, his natale being July 19. Usuard under this day repeats the statement. The anonymous Life of St. Auxibius (said to have been bishop of Soli in Cyprus, A.D. 102) gives a different tradition; that St. Paul, in consequence of the death of Barnabas and there being no longer an apostle in Cyprus, sent Epaphras, Tychicus, and others to Heraclides archbishop of Cyprus, directing the latter to ordain Epaphras to be bishop of Paphos, and the rest for other towns. (Vit. S. Auxibii, cap. 2, § 8, in Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 126 c; Le Quien, Oriens Chr. i. 815, ii. 1059.) [C. H.]

EPAPHRODITUS (1), reputed bishop of Philippi, and imagined to have been the ἐπισκοπὸς of Phil. ii. 25. Theodoret (Comment. in loc.) interprets the word as implying that Epaphroditus was the ecclesiastical superior of the ἐπισκοπὸς (i. q. πρεσβύτερος) of Phil. i. 1; and this father, although writing as a commentator rather than as a historian, was afterwards adduced as the authority for making Epaphroditus first bishop of Philippi. (Baron. A. E. ann. 60, iii.; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 67.) [T. W. D.]

EPAPHRODITUS (2), reputed bishop of Andriaca and one of the seventy disciples (Dorotheus, de Septuag. Dom. Discip. in Migne, Patr. Graec. xcii. 1065; Basil. Menol. ii. 17, Dec. 19, Patr. Graec. cxvii.). Andriaca was the port town of Myra in Lycia; Baronius erroneously writes it Hadria or Hadriana, and places it in Syria. (A. E. ann. 60, iii.) [T. W. D.]

EPAPHRODITUS (3), reputed bishop of Terracina in Italy or Tarragona in Spain, and supposed to have been either one of the seventy or the companion of St. Paul. The authority is an anonymous Commentarius de SS. Pet. et Paul. printed by Surius and the Bollandists, Surius attributing it to Symeon Metaphrastes. Terracina is the reading in Surius (cap. x.) and the Bollandists (cap. 3, § 11); but Salazar and other

Spanish writers read Tarracona, so transferring Epaphroditus to their own country. (Surius, de Prob. Hist. tom. ii. p. 353, ed. 1618; Boll. Acta SS. 22 Mart. iii. 369, 370, § 6, 29 Jun. v. 411; Salazar, Mart. Hisp. tom. ii. p. 356; Ugh. Ital. Sacr. i. 1283; Contatore, Hist. Terracin. p. 460; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vi. 517; Baron. A. E. ann. 60, iii.) [T. W. D.]

EPAPHRODITUS (4), A.D. 431, reader and notary to Hellanicus bishop of Rhodes. He was deputed with three bishops to give a second summons to Nestorius to attend the Council of Ephesus on the first day of its session. A deputation the previous evening had been unsuccessful. (Concil. iii. 453; Caillier, viii. 577; Pope Paul V.'s Concilia Gener. i. p. 325, Rome, 1628.) [W. M. S.]

EPAPHRODITUS (5), bishop of Tamassus in Cyprus, present at the oecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where he acted also as proxy for Didymus of Lapithus in the island; at the sixth session he signed for Olympius the metropolitan of Constantia (Salamis) and the absent suffragans of Cyprus. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1060.) [L. D.]

EPARCHIUS (1), bishop of Sicca, in the proconsular province of Africa. His name is found in the preface of the acts of the council held at Carthage, under Gratus, A.D. 348 or 349 (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 277; Mansi, iii. 144, margin, the text reads PATRICIUS; ib. 153 a). [L. D.]

EPARCHIUS (2), tenth bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, between St. Namatius and Apollinaris Sidonius, held the see from about A.D. 462 to 472. Gregory of Tours calls him vir sanctissimus atque religiosus. It is said that he built a monastery on the summit of the Mons Cantobennicus, where now is a chapel, and used to shut himself up there during Lent, but on the day of the Coena Domini would return to his church with singing of psalms, accompanied by the clergy and people. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 21; Gall. Christ. ii. 231.) [S. A. B.]

EPARCHIUS (3), ST., a recluse of Angoulême (Egolisma), was born at Périgueux in the early part of the 6th century of parents named Auricolus and Principia. At the close of his school days he became the cancellarius of his grandfather, Felicissimus, a count; but his heart was not in his duties, and after fifteen years of unwilling servitude, he escaped secretly to the monastery of Sedacium, and throwing himself at the feet of Martin, the abbat, besought to be made a monk. His prayer was granted, and he underwent the usual drudgery of a novice in the field and vineyard. Feeling drawn towards the solitary life, he selected a desert spot, and built for himself a hut. According, however, to the account of Gregory of Tours, he was not altogether solitary, but was accompanied by a few monks. He passed his time in constant prayer, and devoted the offerings made him to the relief of the poor and the redemption of captives. He provided no food, but was supported by those he had befriended. After forty-four, or, according to another account, thirty-nine years of this existence, he was seized with a fever, and died in A.D. 581, or, according to Baronius, 584. He is commemorated on the 1st of July. The popular corruption of his name is St. Cybar, and there is a monastery of that name near the city of Angoulême. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 8 [see the note in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 380]; De Glor. Confess. ci.; Boll. Acta SS. July, i. 109; Aimoin, Hist. Franc. lib. iii. c. 45.) [S. A. B.]

EPARCHIUS (4) [EBARCHIUS], said to have been a bishop of Poitiers, the Gallia Christiana (ii. 1154) placing him twenty-eighth on the list. His existence, however, seems to rest for proof on a passage occurring in a charter of Louis the Pious, as king of the Aquitanians, in favour of Noailles (Nobiliacum). The king confirms to Noailles amongst other provisions, "illas conjunctiones quas anteriori pontifici Pictaviensis, quem nos recognovimus, Ansaldus, Ebasius et Grosbertus ad ipsam cellam detulerunt" (Gall. Christ. ii. Instrumenta, p. 346), but making the fullest allowance for the barbarisms of the king, this passage, as the later compilers of the Gall. Chr. have pointed out (xiv. 30), can scarcely be made to imply the existence of a bishop Eparchius at Poitiers. [S. A. B.]

EPARCHIUS (APARCHIUS, HUPARCHIUS), bishop of Italica [EULALIUS], from about 630 to 653. He signs the acts of the fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 633) in the fifty-seventh place, preceding five only. In 636 Eparcius was present at the death of St. Isidore, who had sent for him and for Joannes bishop of Elepla, to receive from them the penitential habit and the last sacraments. The signature of Eparcius is also found to the acts of the sixth, seventh, and eighth Councils of Toledo. In the seventh he signs fifth after the Metropolitans, in the eighth second. (Esp. Sagr. ix. app. 7, xii. p. 266; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 385, 413, 423, 428.) [M. A. W.]

EPATHIMITUS (Ugh. Ital. Sacr. vi. 26), bishop of Naples. [EPITIMITUS.] [C. H.]

EPHEBUS (1), CLAUDIUS, one of the bearers of Clement's epistle to the Corinthians (ch. 45). He must have been at the time (about A.D. 95) in advanced years; for he is described as having "walked among us from youth to old age unblameably." Lightfoot conjectures that he and his companion, Valerius Bito, may have been freedmen of the imperial household, and that they may have received their names at the time (A.D. 41-48) when a Claudius was emperor and a Valeria his consort. [G. S.]

EPHEBUS (2) (EPHYBUS), a martyr at Terni. He was arrested by order of Leontius the consul, and was beheaded A.D. 268. He is commemorated Feb. 14. (Mart. Adon., Rab., Notker.) [T. S. B.]

EPHEBUS (3) (Gama, Ser. Episc. 904), bishop of Naples. [EUPHEBIUS.] [C. H.]

EPHESIUS (Faustin et Marcellin. Libell. Prec. in Migne, Patr. Lat. xiii. 99), Luciferian bishop at Rome. [EURESIUS; LUCIFERIANUS.] [T. W. D.]

EPHESUS, THE SEVEN SLEEPERS OF. The first person in the West to relate the legend thus entitled appears to have been Gregory of Tours (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart.

cap. 95, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 787 n. Ruinart). According to him the names of the seven were Maximianus, Malchus, Martinianus, Constantinus, Dionysius, Joannes, Serapion. They were Christians, and all related to one another. When the emperor Decius visited Ephesus they were brought before him, and on refusing to abjure were allowed time for consideration. They concealed themselves in a cave, where they abode many days, their food being fetched from the city by one of them who is described as a lad. Decius heard of their proceedings, and commanded the cave to be closed upon them. While they were thus being entombed a certain Christian caused their story to be engraved on leaden tablets, which he hid at the entrance of the cave. After many years Theodosius, a Christian, succeeded to the empire, and there arose the "foul heresy" of the Sadducees, "who deny a future resurrection." At that time it chanced that a citizen of Ephesus in constructing a sheepfold made use of the stones that blocked up the cave, and so reopened it. "The Lord then sent the spirit of life upon the seven," who rose up, and thinking they had slept but a single night, sent out "the lad" to buy food. On coming into the city he was astonished to see everywhere the symbol of the cross and to hear the name of Christ. When he offered the money for his purchases he was seized and taken before the bishop and the magistrate as one who had discovered hidden treasure. The cave was visited, the leaden tablets read, and the entire story revealed. Theodosius came in person, and the seven said to him: "A heresy has arisen, glorious Augustus; the Lord has therefore bidden us arise, that we should say to you, according to the apostle Paul, we must all appear at the bar of Christ; see that you are not deceived and shut out from the kingdom of Christ." On this they again lay down and fell asleep as before. Gregory states that he had their passio from a certain Syrian who translated it for him into Latin. It is quite possible that the original from which the story was related to Gregory was the source from whence the Syrian bishop Jacobus (ob. A.D. 521) derived his version, which is commented on by Asseman (Biblioth. Or. i. 335, n. 221), and given at length by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 27 Jul. vi. 375). Jacobus gives eight as the number of sleepers, and varies as to their names. Photius (Bibl. cod. 253) varies from both Gregory and Jacobus. In Basil's Menology (Oct. 23) the legend is very briefly related, and again differently. Symeon Metaphrastes (Patr. Graec. cxv. 427) gives the fullest and most graphic version of all. Similar legends are met with both in the East and West. One of another "seven" is attributed to Gregory of Tours (Opp. ed. Migne, p. 1106); another occurs in Paulus Diaconus (De Gest. Lang. i. 4, in Patr. Lat. xcv. 441); another in the Koran (Sale, transl. cap. 18, p. 238, ed. 1834), while others are referred to by Baronius (Mart. Rom. Jul. 27), Hospinian (De Fest. Christ. p. 114, ed. 1612), Gibbon (D. and F. c. 33, vol. iv. p. 188, ed. Smith), Hampson, Med. Aev. Kal. 355. July 27 was the day of their commemoration. [T. W. D.] EPHRAIM (1), bishop of Alexandria. Le Quien (Or. Chr. ii. 389) says that the fourth bishop, called Primus by Eusebius (Chron. ann.

107; H. E. iv. 1), is given as Obrimius and Ephraem by the Coptic and Arabian writers. [C. H.]

EPHRAIM (2), (EPHREM, EPHRAEM; Eusebius, Ἐφραίμ; Epiphanius, Ὀδδραίμ), the thirteenth of the fifteen bishops of Jerusalem of the circumcision. He succeeded Levi, and was succeeded by Joses, or Joseph. (Euseb. Chron. A.D. 124, H. E. iv. 5; Epiphanius, Haer. lxvi. no. 20.) The 4th of April is assigned as the day of his commemoration by the continuators of the Bollandists (Le Quien, Or. Christian. iii. 146.) [E. V.]

EPHRAIM (3), bishop, sent by Hermon bishop of Jerusalem into Turcia, in the reign of Diocletian; commemorated March 8. (Basil. Menol.) [C. H.]

EPHRAIM (4) THE SYRIAN, usually called Ephrem Syrus, from the Syriac form of his name Aphrem, was certainly born in Mesopotamia, as he describes his home as lying between the Tigris and the Euphrates (Opp. Syr. i. 23), and probably at Nisibis. As Edessa became the chief scene of his labours he is generally styled the Edessene. It certainly, however, was not his birthplace, as some have supposed; for Gregory of Nyssa, in his Encomium upon him, written soon after his death, says, "Like another Abraham, Ephrem left his country, and came to Edessa, that so splendid a sun might not be hidden in a chamber underground." The exact date of his birth is unknown, but as Constantine was emperor at the time, it must have been subsequent to A.C. 306; as, further, it is comparatively certain that he died, as stated by St. Jerome, "in extreme old age," about A.C. 373,* we cannot be far wrong in considering him as having been born early in that emperor's reign, about A.C. 308.

In the Acta prefixed to the sixth volume of the great Roman edition of his works, his father is said to have been priest to a heathen idol called Abnail, subsequently broken in pieces by the emperor Jovian. But the child obstinately refused to accompany his parents to the idol-temple, and when after repeated blows he was still found holding converse with Christians, they drove him from their house and disowned him. Whereupon Ephrem betook himself to St. James, bishop of Nisibis, who admitted him into the college of catechumens, and had him carefully educated in the principles of the Christian faith. But the story is at variance with his own statements. Thus in his Confession (Opp. Gr. i. 129) he says, "When I sinned, I was already a partaker of grace: I had been early taught about Christ by my parents: they who had begotten me after the flesh, had trained me in the fear of the Lord. I had seen my neighbours living piously: I had heard of many suffering for Christ. My own parents were confessors before the Judge: yea, I am the kindred of martyrs." Equally plain is a statement in his Syriac works (Opp. Syr. ii. 499): "I was born in the way of truth: and though my boyhood understood not the greatness of the benefit, I knew it when trial came."

In his Testament (Opp. Gr. ii. 408) he tells us that his childhood was one of early promise. "When I was a child, and lay in my mother's bosom, I saw as in a dream that which has become a reality. From my tongue there sprang a vine twig, which grew and reached to heaven: it brought forth fruit without end, and leaves without number. It spread, it grew, it lengthened, it expanded itself, it went round about, it stretched abroad till it reached the whole creation. All beings gathered of it, and there was no lack: yea, the more they plucked, so much the more its clusters multiplied. Those clusters were sermons, those leaves were hymns, and God was the giver. To Him be glory for His grace, whereby He has made me receive according as He willed from the storehouse of His treasures."

This also seems to suggest that Ephrem from the first was educated as a Christian, and the statement that he accompanied St. James to the council of Nicaea is probable enough. Of course it would be in an inferior capacity: but as Ephrem was from the first a diligent student of Holy Scripture, and a keen disputant, the bishop might not unwillingly have taken with him a youth of so much promise. Of the council itself, he speaks with great reverence, describing it as "the illustrious synod, gathered by the memorable king, at which the Creed was committed to writing," and condemns heretics for not submitting to it (Opp. Syr. ii. 488 D).

In the year 337 Constantine the Great died, and Sapor, king of Persia, at once seized the opportunity of invading Mesopotamia. After ravaging the open country, he commenced the siege of Nisibis in A.C. 338, and at the end of seventy days had brought it to the verge of surrender. For having dammed up the waters of the Mygdonius, he suddenly set them free, and they rushed with so great violence against the walls of the city as partially to overthrow them. In vain the citizens raised inner walls of defence; but when all seemed hopeless, Ephrem prevailed upon the aged bishop, James, to mount the walls, and in the presence of the besiegers, to pray for the divine succour. Shortly afterwards so great a multitude of mosquitoes and horse-flies, bred probably in the swamps lately covered by the waters of the river, assailed the Persian camp, that the horses and elephants, being rendered unmanageable, threw the whole army into confusion; and Sapor, recognising that the scourge was divine, withdrew his forces, lest he should bring upon himself heavier chastisement.

Before the end of the year St. James died, but according to the Acta Ephrem remained at Nisibis till its surrender by Jovian to Sapor, when he withdrew into Roman territory, having previously been baptized at the age of twenty-eight years. But the surrender of Nisibis took place in A.C. 363, when Ephrem was about fifty-five years of age; and besides, the same Acta describe him as living at Edessa, in the reign of Julian, Jovian's predecessor. More probably he left Nisibis upon the death of James, and after a short stay at Amid, to which city his mother is said to have belonged, travelled towards Edessa, the chief seat both of Christianity and of learning in Mesopotamia. As he entered the city a number of women were engaged in washing linen on the banks of the river Daisan, and as one of them looked at him more intently than seemed becoming, he rebuked her, saying, "Be modest, O woman, and fix thy look upon the ground." "It is quite right, she answered, for men to look upon the ground; for out of it they were taken: but for the same reason I may surely look at thee, for woman was taken out of man." "If the women here," he said, as he passed on, "are so wise, what must the men be!" With some slight modification, this story is also told by Gregory of Nyssa, in his Encomium referred to above.

* Bickell, Carm. Nis. p. 9, note, shews that this was the date of his death, and not 378, as Rödiger thought probable in his article on Ephrem in Herzog's Encycl. Theol. St. Jerome's expression must not be forced too much.

Not having been taught any handicraft, and having no means of living, Ephrem entered at Edessa the service of a bath-keeper, but devoted his spare time to teaching and reasoning with the natives. While so engaged one day his words were overheard by an aged monk who had descended from his hermitage into the city, and being rebuked by him for still mingling with the world, Ephrem withdrew into a cavern among the mountains, adopted the monastic dress, and commenced a life of extreme austerity and asceticism, while at the same time he also gave himself up to study, and began to exercise that wonderful facility for writing which has made him the most prolific of authors.

Of course many portents foretold his future greatness. In one, which is vouched for by Gregory of Nyssa, an angel was seen descending from heaven with a roll inscribed within and without. He asks the aged hermit for whom he supposes it to be intended, and the answer is remarkable, as shewing who were regarded as the most famous writers of the time, "Origen or the monk Julius in the land of the north." The marvellous roll was really Ephrem's commission to declare heavenly mysteries. And quickly his reputation grew, his works were diffused far and wide, and disciples gathered round him, of whom many rose to eminence as teachers, and several of whom he commemorates in his Testament.

Many years were probably spent in this way, but the growing fame of Basil, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, inspired Ephrem with a strong desire to visit one who had been shewn him in a dream as a column of fire reaching from earth to heaven. The Acta, however, represent him as travelling first into Egypt, and though there is no corroborative evidence, still it is not in itself improbable, as Egypt was the favourite home of multitudes of ascetics such as Ephrem himself was. But the narrative exceeds the bounds of probability when it represents him as having spent eight years there, as having been divinely gifted with the power of speaking the Egyptian language, and as having not only reasoned against Arianism in the vernacular tongue, but as having even composed in it expositions and discourses.

His journey to Caesarea rests upon surer evidence, as it is vouched for by Basil's brother, Gregory, and by Ephrem himself in his Encomium on Basil.* Accompanied by an interpreter, he arrived there on the eve of the Feast of the Epiphany, and so deficient were the people in hospitality that they allowed Ephrem and his companion to spend the night in the streets. The next morning they took their place in an obscure corner of the church, and Ephrem groaned in spirit as he saw Basil seated in a magnificent pulpit, arrayed in bright and shining garments, with a mitre sparkling with jewels on his head, and surrounded by a multitude of clergy adorned with almost equal splendour. "Alas!" he said to his interpreter, "I fear our labour is in vain. For if we, who have given up the world, have advanced so little in holiness, what spiritual gifts can we expect to find in one surrounded by so great pomp and glory?" But when Basil began to preach, it seemed to Ephrem as though the Holy Ghost, in shape like a dove, sat upon his shoulder, and suggested to him the words. From time to time the people murmured their applause, and Ephrem twice repeated sentences which had fallen from the preacher's lips. Upon this Basil sent his archdeacon to invite him into his presence, which, offended at the saint's ragged attire, he did reluctantly, and only after he had been twice bidden to summon him. After embracing one another with many florid compliments Basil asked him how it was that knowing no Greek he had twice cheered the sermon, and repeated sentences of it to the multitude? And Ephrem answered, "It was not I who praised and repeated, but the Holy Ghost by my mouth."

Shortly afterwards the same miracle was repeated which has already been told of him in Egypt. Under pressure from St. Basil he had consented to be ordained deacon, while his disciple, the interpreter, was admitted to the priesthood. When Basil had laid his hands upon him, being suddenly endowed with the knowledge of Syriac he said to Ephrem in that tongue, "O Lord, bid him arise," upon which Ephrem answered in Greek, "Save me, and raise me up O God, by thy grace."

But in an age when Greek was the current language of the learned we cannot imagine an able man like Ephrem travelling about with an educated companion, and not picking up some slight acquaintance with it. He had grown also to eminence as a teacher at Edessa, a place famous for its schools: and as a commentator also he must have felt the need of some knowledge of the New Testament, and of the Septuagint, though the loss of his exposition of the former deprives us of the means of testing the extent of his learning, which seems to have been real, though perhaps not very great. We may add that Ephrem also speaks of himself as a priest,^c though all external authorities conspire in calling him only a deacon. The value of the story lies in the general testimony it bears to Ephrem being an uneducated man. Even upon this we must not lay too much stress. We shall endeavour, however, in due time to gather from his own writings evidence as to the extent of his knowledge both of Greek and Hebrew.

Two instances are given in the Acta of the

* On the authenticity of this piece, which exists only in Greek, see the Prolegomena to Ephr. Opp. Gr. II. II.

^c In Opp. Syr. III. 467 D, Ephrem says, "Christ gave me the talent of the priesthood, and I in my remembrance hid it in the ground." Vossius always speaks of him as a presbyter, but in opposition to his own ecclesiastical authorities.

influence of Ephrem's teaching on the mind of St. Basil. It had been usual at Caesarea in the Doxology to say Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, to the Holy Ghost; but after Ephrem's visit Basil inserted the conjunction and before the third clause. Whereat the people in church murmured, and Basil sheltered himself from their displeasure at his interference with so familiar a formula by saying that his Syrian visitor had taught him that the insertion of the conjunction was necessary for the more clear manifestation of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. The other instance is as follows: In Gen. i. 2, the Septuagint renders "The Spirit of God was borne upon the surface of the water." In this sense St. Basil had understood it, but the Peshito-Syriac version renders it, "The Spirit of God brooded upon the face of the waters," which Ephrem explained of the Spirit resting upon them with a warm and fostering influence as of a hen sitting upon her nest, and so endowing them with the power of bringing forth the moving creature that hath life. In the loose periphrase of Benedict St. Basil is made to talk of the affinity between Syriac and Hebrew, and so on. Really he gives two reasons for trusting his Syrian friend. The first, that Ephrem led a very ascetic life; "for in proportion as a man abandons the love of the world, so does he excel in that perfection which rises above the world." The second reason is more in accordance with modern notions. "Ephrem," says St. Basil, "is an acute thinker, and has a thorough knowledge of the divine philosophy," i.e. of the general sense of Holy Scripture. There is nothing to suggest that any appeal was made to the Hebrew, though as a matter of fact the Syriac and Hebrew words are the same; and curiously enough in his own exposition (Opp. Syr. i. 8) Ephrem says that the words simply mean that a wind was in motion; for the waters were instinct, he argues, with no creative energy till the fourth day.⁴

From Caesarea Ephrem was recalled to Edessa by the news that the city was assailed by numerous heresies. On his journey he rescued the people of Samosata from the influence of false teaching by a miracle, and on reaching home took the step which has made his muse so famous, of encountering heresy by teaching orthodoxy in hymns. The fatalistic tenets of Bardesan, a Gnostic who flourished at the end of the 2nd century, had been embodied in a hundred and fifty psalms, a number fixed upon in irreverent imitation of the Psalter of David. His son Honorius had set these hymns to music, and so sweet were both the words and tunes that they were known by heart to the very girls and children, and sung by them to the sound of the guitar. To combat their influence Ephrem both composed numerous hymns himself, and trained young women, who were aspirants after the conventual life, to sing them in chorus. These hymns have no rhyme, nor do they scan, but are simply arranged in parallel lines, containing each, as a rule, seven syllables.* Their poetry consists in their elevated sentiments, and richness of metaphor, but their regular form was an aid to the memory, and rendered them capable of being set to music. The chosen subjects of these hymns were the Life of our Lord, including His Nativity, Baptism, Fasting, the chief incidents of his ministry, His Passion, Resurrection and Ascension. He wrote also on Repentance, on the Dead, and on Martyrs. Upon the Festivals of our Lord, we read, on the first days of the week, and on the days kept in honour of martyrs, Ephrem gathered round him his choirs, and so well had he instructed these maidens in the various keys and modulations of music, that the whole city flocked together to hear them, and the poems of Bardesan lost their influence.

While thus occupied Basil endeavoured to prevail upon him again to visit Caesarea, intending on his arrival to make him a bishop, but the saint even feigned madness rather than consent. Meanwhile his muse took a wider flight, choosing for its subjects the devastation committed by the Persians,[†] the Maccabæan martyrs, the Life of Constantine, and so on, until the accession of Julian to the throne rudely disturbed his studies. On his expedition against the Persians Julian had advanced as far as Haran, a town so famous for its obstinate adherence to heathenism, that Haranite in Syriac is equivalent to pagan, and there he determined to hold a great sacrifice, to which he commanded the Edessenes to send chosen citizens to do him homage, and grace by their presence his restoration of the old cult. But the emperor's messengers were met with such fierce opposition on the part of the people, and such an eager desire for martyrdom, that the embassy withdrew in haste, and Julian threatened Edessa with bitter vengeance upon his return. And now Ephrem, who had exerted himself to the utmost in this crisis, resumed his hermit life, quitting the mountains only for controversy with heretics or for services of a more charitable nature.

As a controversialist, Gregory of Nyssa relates of him with the utmost approbation an act entirely contrary to modern views of morality. The "insane and irrational Apollinaris" had written a treatise in two volumes containing much that was contrary to Scripture. These volumes he had entrusted to the charge of a lady at Edessa, from whom Ephrem obtained a loan of them by pretending that he was a disciple of Apollinaris, and was preparing to defend his views. But before returning them he glued the leaves together, and then challenged the heretic to a public disputation. Apollinaris accepted the challenge only so far as to consent to read from these books what he had written, declining more on account of his great age. They met, but when he endeavoured to open the books he found the leaves so firmly fastened together that the attempt was in vain, and he withdrew mortified almost to death by his opponent's unworthy victory.

Far more creditable is the last act recorded

⁴ This, which is the Jewish interpretation, is the only one ascribed to Ephrem by Bar-Hebraeus in his Garner of Mysteries: and in Basil's own treatise on the Hexæmeron, Hom. 2, all that is said is that Ephrem told him that the word meant "fostered," and not "was borne."

* Ephrem also uses metres of four syllables, of five, and of lines of varying length. For discussions upon Ephrem's versification, see the works of Hahn, of Zingerle, and of Burgess.

of Ephrem's earthly labours. While withdrawn in his rocky cavern he heard that Edessa had been visited by a severe famine. Leaving his seclusion he came down to the city, and so wrought upon the minds of the richer citizens that they brought out their secret stores of food, on condition, however, that Ephrem should himself take charge of them. He did so, and managed what was given him with such skill and prudence, as well as honesty, that it sufficed not merely for the Edessenes, but for numerous strangers also. The next year was one of great plenty, and Ephrem resumed his solitary life amidst the prayers and gratitude of all classes.

His death followed shortly afterwards, fully foreseen by himself, as his Testament proves. In this hymn written in heptasyllabic metre, after playing upon his own name and professing his faith, he commands his disciples not to bury him beneath the altar, nor in a church, nor amongst the martyrs, but in the common burying-ground of strangers. They were to wrap him in no mantle of silk, but bury him in his gown and cowl, with no spices nor waxlights, but with their prayers. The rest is too long for quotation, but ends in an interesting manner, with an account of Lamprotata, daughter of the prefect of Edessa, who earnestly sought permission to be buried in due time at Ephrem's feet. In consenting to some extent to her request, the saint commanded her and her friends never again to permit themselves to be carried in litters on men's shoulders, because such a thing was degrading to those of whom the apostle had said that the head of every man is Christ.

The works of Ephrem were most voluminous. Sozomen (Ecdl. Hist. iii. 16) says of him that he wrote three million lines (three hundred times ten thousand), but a large proportion of them has perished. For at the time when so great activity prevailed in gathering manuscripts for the Vatican, an Egyptian vessel laden with books for pope Clement XI. unfortunately sank in the Nile, and many of Ephrem's writings were lost, and others rendered illegible. The general character of what remains is briefly but aptly said by Bellarmine to be "pious rather than learned." The great edition of his works is that in six volumes folio, published at Rome in 1732-43, under the editorship of the Maronite Peter Mobarek, better known by the Latin translation of his surname Benedict, and completed after his death by J. S. E. Asseman, titular bishop of Apamea, who is answerable however for the translation of only vol. vi. pp. 425-687. The first three volumes consist of sermons and discourses in Greek with a Latin translation. Many of these are probably genuine, for Sozomen says that already in his lifetime works of Ephrem were translated into Greek, and as both Chrysostom and Jerome were acquainted with them, and Gregory of Nyssa quotes his Testament, it is certain that several of his writings were very soon thus made available for general use. But among them are pieces which must be received with caution, and one, for instance (Opp. Gr. ii. 356 sq.), arranged after the order of the Greek alphabet, can scarcely be genuine. The idea that Ephrem himself wrote discourses in Greek is to be altogether rejected. As there is generally a slavish adherence to the Septuagint version in these Greek works, we must suppose that the translation was as loose as that of Benedict himself. Certainly, the translation of his Testament into Greek (vol. ii. 230-247) is inaccurate and periphrastic in the extreme, and as the object of Ephrem's writings is edification, the translators may have thought that it was best to use the version that was generally received. These three volumes are however but a sample of the numerous works ascribed to Ephrem existing in translations into Latin, Greek, Arabic, and Armenian, some published and some unpublished, and which are to be found in most of the great libraries of Europe.^s In due time many of these may be useful in giving us a critical edition of his writings.

The three other volumes of the Roman edition contain Syriac works of Ephrem, the most important of which is his Exposition of the Old Testament. Though affirmed in the Acta to be the earliest of his writings, it is really one of the latest, for he says in the preface that when asked to write a commentary on Genesis he declined, because it would only be to repeat what he had said before in his homilies and hymns. Finally he consented, and his Exposition occupies 115 pages, but is followed by a second taken from another manuscript, arranged as a catena by a monk of Edessa named Severus. In this form a large portion of it consists of passages taken from the writings of James, bishop of Edessa, and the rest is full of interpolations, of notes, and of additions intended to correct Ephrem's views, probably by Severus himself. Besides this double commentary on Genesis, vol. i. contains expositions upon the other books of the Pentateuch, on Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings; in vol. ii. we have Job, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Zechariah, and Malachi, occupying pp. 1-315. The exposition of Lamentations consists of only two or three notes extracted from a catena of Severus.^h From the Bibliotheca Orientalis of J. S. Asseman (i. 70, 71) we learn that commentaries in Syriac by Ephrem upon the other prophets are to be found among the manuscripts of the Vatican, and Ebed Jesu, bishop of Soba, ascribes to him a commentary on the Psalms (ib. iii. i. 62), of which some remains in Greek exist in Cod. Vat. DOCLII. (ib. i. 157). Of the commentary upon the Gospels few traces remain, but Dionysius Barsalibi, bishop of Amid, says that Ephrem had followed in it the order of the Diatessaron of Tatian. As copies of Dionysius's own commentary exist in the British Museum, the Bodleian Library, and elsewhere, some portions of Ephrem's work, as well as some idea of Tatian's arrangement, might be obtained from it. An Armenian translation of the commentary on St. Paul's epistles may be found in the third volume of a collection of Armenian translations of Ephrem's works, published in four vols. octavo by the Mechitarists at Venice in 1836.

^s The first important publication of works of Ephrem extant in Greek was that of Gerhard Voss in three folio volumes at Rome in 1689, and often republished afterwards. It contains, however, only a Latin translation of them. The first publication of a Greek text was that of Thwaites at Oxford, in folio, 1709. It contains 156 discourses collected out of eighteen MSS. in the Bodleian Library.

^h Cardinal Wiseman, Hor. Syr. 137 sq. has affirmed, not without probability, that all we have really consists only of extracts from catenae. This criticism is strengthened by the remark of Lengerke, De Ep̄r. Syr. Arts Herm. p. 93, note, that whole chapters are often passed by without a single observation, though full of interesting matter.

Following upon the commentary are twelve metrical expositions of portions of Scripture, such as the creation of man in God's image, the temptation of Eve, the translation of Enoch, &c., occupying pp. 316-319. Some of these, especially that upon the mission of Jonah and the repentance of the Ninevites, have been translated into English by the Rev. H. Burgess, London, 1856, the author also of Select Metrical Hymns and Homilies of Ephrem Syrus; two vols. London, 1853.

These expositions are followed by thirteen metrical homilies upon the Nativity, pp. 396-436. Asseman says, however (B. O. i. 80), that in Cod. Nūr. viii. fifteen (or really twenty-seven) such hymns exist, and as they possess much poetical merit, though inferior to the funeral hymns, it is to be hoped that the rest may soon be published.

Next come fifty-six homilies against false doctrines (pp. 437-560), levelled chiefly against Bardesan, Marcion, and Manes. Some use has been made of these by Hahn, and also by Gesenius (com. on Isaiah, ii. 339 sqq.) and others.

In vol. iii. after the Acta S. Ephraemi (i.-lxiii.) the first place is held by eighty-seven homilies on the Faith, in answer to freethinkers. The last seven are called sermons upon the Pearl, which Ephrem takes as an emblem of the Christian faith, and works out the idea with great beauty, though with that diffuseness which is the common fault of his writings. Three very long controversial homilies (pp. 164-208) follow, repeating many of the thoughts urged in the previous eighty-seven.

A sermon against the Jews, preached on Palm-Sunday (pp. 209-224), has been translated by the Rev. J. B. Morris into English.¹

Eighty-five funeral hymns succeed (pp. 225-359) to be used at the burial of bishops, presbyters, deacons, monks, princes, rich men, strangers, matrons, women, youths, children, in time of plague, and some for general use. Translations of these will be found, into English in Burgess's Select Metrical Hymns, into German by Zingerle, in the fourth volume of his Translation of Select Works of Ephrem, six vols., Innsbruck, 1831-45; and into Italian by Paggi and Lasinio, Florence, 1851. These are some of the most striking of Ephrem's poems, containing passages upon the horror of death, the ravages of pestilence, the punishment of the lost, the pains of hell, the blessedness of faith, the love of the Redeemer, of great power and eloquence, as these are the subjects which most strongly influenced his imagination. Some, however, of these hymns are mere compilations for liturgical use, notably the first six, (see Bickell, Carmin. Nis. p. 6).

Next come four short homilies on Free-will

(pp. 359-366), partly following the order of the Syriac alphabet; then seventy-six homilies on Repentance (pp. 367-561), being chiefly earnest exhortations to this duty. Next, twelve sermons on the Paradise of Eden (pp. 562-598); and finally eighteen sermons on miscellaneous subjects (pp. 599-687).

Considerable activity has been displayed in recent years in editing other Syriac works of Ephrem, as, for instance, by Dr. J. J. Overbeck, in S. Ephraemi Syri, Rabulae, Balaei, aliorumque Opera Selecta, Oxonii, Clarendon Press, 1865. This selection contains a Discourse against Julian, Hymns, Select Homilies against False Doctrines, against Hypatius, Manes, Marcion, and Bardesan; Expositions on Adam's Fall, on his being created mortal, on Satan's Fall, on the Coming of the Holy Ghost and the Gift of Tongues, on the Love of Supremacy, a Letter to the Tyrians, Selections from a Discourse against Bardesan, and finally Ephrem's Testament, extant also in the Roman edition of his works, Opp. Gr. ii. 395-410, and in the loose Greek translation referred to above.

Almost more important is "S. Ephraemi Syri Carmina Nisibena," edited by Dr. G. Bickell, Lipsiae, 1866."

Of these hymns, the first twenty-one treat of the long struggle between Sapor and the Romans for the possession of the city of Nisibis, beginning with its siege in A.C. 350, and carrying down its fortunes to the year 363, but stopping short of its miserable surrender by Jovian at a later period of that same year. The next five hymns have perished; in the next five, 26-30, the scene is changed to Edessa, and the subject is the schism which existed there in the bishopric of Barsees, A.C. 361-370. Bickell considers that these were written about A.C. 370, and therefore towards the close of Ephrem's life. Hymns 31-34 treat of Haran and the many troubles which its bishop Vitus had to endure from the pagans there. The other hymns (35-77) treat of the Overthrow of Death and Satan by our Lord, of the Resurrection of the Body in refutation of the views of Bardesan and Manes, of Dialogues between Death Satan and Man, and of hymns upon the Resurrection, not of a controversial but of a consolatory character. It is evident from this enumeration that the title Carmina Nisibena is taken from the twenty-one hymns placed at the head of the collection. From the directions for singing them given at the beginning of each hymn, and the existence in most of them of a response or refrain noted in the manuscript by its being written in red, it is plain that the collection was made for liturgical use.

Bertheau edited a Syriac homily of St. Ephrem from a manuscript at Rome (Göttingen, 1837), and another from the Museum Borghianum was published by Zingerle and Mösiniger in Monumenta Syriaca, Innsbruck, 1869, vol. i. pp. 4-12; in vol. ii. published at the same place in 1878 numerous fragments collected from manuscripts at Rome may be found in pp. 33-51. In most Chrestomathies specimens of Ephrem's writings are given, and that by Hahn and Sieffert consists entirely of them.

As a commentator Ephrem holds a middle place between Theodore of Mopsuestia, who contended for the literal interpretation alone, and Origen, who cared only for the allegorical.

As Basil and Gregory were both strongly influenced by Origen, Ephrem's independence is the more remarkable. In commenting on Isai. xx. 7, vol. ii. 61, he gives a statement of his method as follows: "Though the prophet is speaking of Sennacherib he has a covert reference to Satan. For the spiritual sense is usually the same as the ecclesiastical. The words therefore of the prophets concerning those things which have happened or were about to happen to the Jews are mystically to be referred to the future propagation of the church, and the providence of God and His judgments upon the just and upon evil-doers." Benedict, followed by Lengerke, instead of ecclesiastical, translates historical; what Ephrem really says is that there is first the literal interpretation, and secondly a spiritual one, which generally refers to the church. But not always. When a text is explained of God's Providence, &c., or used for homiletic purposes, and for personal edification, such an interpretation is spiritual without being ecclesiastical. Ephrem's habit accordingly is to give first the literal and then the mystical exposition. Some of these are sufficiently far-fetched, as where in ii. 316 he explains Paradise of the human body, the four rivers being the four operations of the mind; or where on Judg. vi. 37 he says that Gideon's fleece signifies the conception of Christ by a virgin; while the bowl into which the water is wrung out is the baptismal font, and the floor which remained dry is the world. So also his use of types is constantly overstrained, as where the stone, set up between Mizpeh and Shen (1 Sam. vii. 12), is explained as a type of Christ, the corner-stone placed between the Old and the New Testaments. But we must remember in his excuse that ancient commentators too generally delighted in ingenious and fanciful interpretations. But as a rule he also carefully expounds the literal meaning, explains hard words, and gives geographical and other notes, generally valuable, though one or two are erroneous enough, as where he says (ii. 171) that Diblath was Daphne near Antioch, and the river Pison the Danube (i. 23). Throughout, however, his object is rather edification than knowledge.

As to his scholarship the question has often been asked whether he really possessed any competent acquaintance with Hebrew and Greek. Now Ephrem confessedly was not a man who had had a learned education, but he nevertheless displays considerable knowledge. Many of his interpretations of Scripture are drawn, as Lengerke has shewn, from Jewish sources; but this is not surprising, for the Jews were very active in Mesopotamia in the 3rd and 4th centuries, and Nisibis abounded with those whom Ephrem calls "circumcised vagabonds" (Opp. Syr. ii. 469), but who must have made people acquainted with the current views of their nation. Subsequently his home was at Edessa, a place crowded with schools and educated people, and Ephrem was himself a teacher, and not a man to cast such opportunities away. For in Opp. Syr. ii. 316-318 in his expository homily on Gen. i. 27 he says that wisdom is not to be acquired without labour and study, and therefore he exhorts his hearers to read Greek writers, especially Porphyry, Plato, Aristotle, and authors acquainted with physics like Galen and Hippocrates. He shews himself in this homily some knowledge of physical science, as also elsewhere; and generally in his discourses on fate, freewill, and so on, he manifests, without parading it, a sufficient mastery of Greek philosophy to be able by its help to refute the Gnostic errors so prevalent in the East. We need not be surprised, therefore, at what Sozomen says (Hist. Eccl. iii. 16) that Basil wondered at his learning. The wonder was that one who had spent his life as a monk "in practising ascetic philosophy" (ibid.), should know so much; but he seems to have acquired it chiefly by hearsay. And this is, I think, the key wherewith to unlock the difficulties which beset the question as to his knowledge of Greek and Hebrew.

The chief places which suggest that Ephrem knew something of Hebrew are as follow. Commenting on the creation of whales in Gen. i. 21 (Opp. Syr. i. 18), he says that while they and leviathan inhabit the waters, behemoth inhabits the land, quoting not only Job xl. 15, but Ps. l. 10, which he translates, "And behemoth upon a thousand hills." Now both the Peshito and the LXX translate "cattle upon the hills and bulls." But Ephrem's rendering, though not correct, is perfectly possible, and must have been obtained by him from some Jewish source.

On 1 Sam. iii. 11, he explains the verb to tingle of the effect produced upon the ears by the beating of cymbals, and rightly says that both the Syriac and Hebrew names for cymbal resemble the verb so translated.

In 1 Sam. xxi. 7 he correctly explains the word "detained" by noting that the Hebrew word Neasar signifies pressed or hidden away.

In 1 Kings xviii. 44 the note that the Hebrew word yam rendered sea also means the south is probably an addition by James of Edessa; as also is that on 2 Kings viii. 10, noticing that the Hebrew has, "Thou shalt not recover."

In 2 Kings iii. 4 he rightly says that the Syriac Nokdo is really a Hebrew word, and means "head shepherd." Other instances might be quoted from his commentary on Job xli. 13 (in our version 21), and on Isa. xvii. 9, where, however, though he knows that Horeah, in our version bough, means in Hebrew a wood, he does not know that Azubah does not signify a pit, and Amir he leaves altogether without explanation.

In his Sermon against the Jews (Opp. Syr. iii. 218) he quotes Gen. xlix. 11 thus: "and his ass, my son, unto the choice vine." But in his Commentary on the passage (i. 108, 190) he twice reads "his ass's son," i.e. the foal of his ass, and so even in this sermon (iii. 224). Now "my son" is the apparent, though not the real meaning of the Hebrew, and the quotation is curious. Probably, however, it is only a false reading, the difference between my son and son of being in Syriac very slight, and Ephrem makes no use of nor any allusion to so strange a rendering.

These are the main passages in which Ephrem makes any use of Hebrew, and all might have been picked up from conversation with others. On the other hand there is a marked absence of acquaintance with the language in his commentary as a whole. Thus, in Gen. i. 1, he explains the Syriac particle yoth as signifying the person or substance of the heavens, and the person of the earth (vol. i. p. 6). In the Catena (p. 116) this is quoted, but only to be condemned, and the true explanation is given, probably by James of Edessa, that the Hebrew word is merely a sign of the accusative case.

Throughout Genesis, in places where a knowledge of the Hebrew language would have greatly aided him, he makes no appeal to it. The firmament, for instance, is something compact, and the cause of darkness: "For darkness does not exist," he says, "of itself, but is caused by the clouds and the firmament, which lies between the upper and lower waters like a child in its mother's womb, or, as others say, it is itself the womb of the universe."

So again on Gen. ii. 6. The word mist is rendered there in the Syriac version fountain, and Ephrem speculates upon its being the outflow from a subterranean reservoir into which the lower waters were gathered at the division on the second day, and which, by its bursting forth, caused the flood. No man acquainted with Hebrew could have so written.

On Gen. xi. 29, he says that Sarah was called Isch, because of her beauty, i. e. he derives the name from the Aramaic root seca, "to look at;" in Syriac, "to expect." And generally he explains names from their meaning in Aramaic. But as it would be impossible to go through even a tenth part of the places in which Ephrem shews a more or less complete ignorance of Hebrew, where one would have expected the contrary, I shall content myself with an examination of those places where explanations are given of Hebrew or other rare words retained in the Syriac version.

In Gen. i. 1 the Peshito keeps the original words, rendering "the earth was tohu and bohu," i. e., says Ephrem, "desert or empty, shewing that nothing existed but the bare earth." In p. 116, Severus tells us that in another copy Ephrem explained the words as meaning invisible, because the waters covered the earth on all six sides, and unarranged, because it was not as yet set in order for man's use. These expositions were probably got from Jewish sources, but shew no knowledge of the language.

The names of Job's three daughters (ch. xlii. 14) he explains thus:—The first, Jemima, signifies daylight, its Syriac meaning. Kezia, though the word is more than once rightly translated cassia, the spice, in the Septuagint, he renders a leg of wood, i. e. the Syriac kaisa; while Keren-happuch, the antimony-horn, or, as we should say, the rouge-box, is again explained from the Syriac as the twisted-horn, the last two interpretations being painfully far-fetched. In 1 Sam. vii. 3, where the Hebrew has Ashtaroth, in complete ignorance of this, he explains the Syriac word as meaning shady gardens. In 1 Sam. ix. 4, the land of Shalisha, triangle-land, is in the Syriac the hill of Gamore, which he renders cat-land, absurdly translated by Benedict cucumber-field. Bozez, in ch. xiv. 4, is explained as meaning slim, its Syriac signification; while Shen, a common Hebrew word meaning thorn-hill, becomes Sia, a Syriac word signifying a wall or fence of loose stones. We might go on indefinitely with this examination, and always with the same result, that Hebrew names and words are explained from the Aramaic with no reference to the Hebrew, except where, as in Bethel, the Hebrew and Syriac words are the same, but with nothing to show that Ephrem was aware of their identity.

Once or twice he does appeal to the Hebrew, but only to go wrong. Thus he says that for I prayed, in Deut. ix. 18, 25, the Hebrew has I fasted. Really it has I fell down, I threw myself down. I fasted is a false reading of the Syriac text. So, in Josh. xiii. 6, he says that Hamath is called Misrephoth-Maim, and that this means a gathering of waters, i. e. a lake. Benedict inserts hot before waters to connect the name with the Hebrew root saraph, "to burn." The Aramaic root from which the Syriac name is derived has the meaning of running together, though probably derived from the fusion of metals. Ephrem knew its Aramaic meaning, but Benedict has to supply him with its meaning in Hebrew.

From his errors, therefore, and still more from his general neglect of the original language in places where an appeal to it would have shewn the true meaning of the word or passage on which he was commenting, we conclude that Ephrem had no independent knowledge of the language, though he had picked up some useful information concerning it, probably by verbal communications with Jews; from which source also he had derived considerable acquaintance with Jewish expositions of Scripture.

One more passage must be quoted. Upon Ezek. vii. 17, he says, "The Hebrew has, 'All thighs shall be polluted with water.'" The Hebrew here is really the Syriac version of the Hexapla of Origen, made at a date subsequent to Ephrem's death. So manifest an interpolation confirms the suspicion that many similar notes have crept from the margin into the text. Such interpolations are usually found appended at the end to Ephrem's own exposition.

Of Greek he also shews but a very moderate knowledge, though his acquaintance with it was more real than with Hebrew. His own words in Opp. Syr. ii. 317 are to the point, as follow: "Not from the rivulet of my own thought have I opened these things for thy drinking, for I am poor and destitute alike of meat and drink; but, like a bottle from the sea or drops from a caldron, I have begged these things from just men, who were lords of the fountain." After mentioning Moses, whose words he was expounding, he explains these just men of the philosophers and medical writers of Greece. Without much knowledge of the language, he had apparently been able at a learned place like Edessa, which shortly afterwards became even famous for the numerous translations made there of Greek authors into Syriac, to acquire considerable acquaintance with their views. It is noteworthy also that in his controversies with Gnostics he gives Syriac equivalents for all their philosophic terms, and never uses the original Greek words. Possibly some Syriac compendia of their writings and of those of the chief Greek philosophers were in use in the schools of Edessa.

But an example will best shew how much more at home he is in Greek than in Hebrew. In 1 Kings xiv. 3 (Opp. Syr. i. 480) the Syriac version has, instead of cracknels, a rare word signifying sweetmeats. Ephrem notices that the Greek has grapes, and gives this as an explanation of the Syriac. But he makes no reference whatsoever to the Hebrew word, which certainly signifies some kind of cakes, such as might rightly be called sweetmeats, but certainly is no kind of fruit.

As a poet, we have seen that he possesses merits of no common order, marred only by too great diffuseness. From his intense devotion and piety, his hymns were largely adopted into the services of the church, and prayers also composed by him are found in most Oriental liturgies. His personal character deserves high praise. He was an extreme ascetic, passing his whole life in poverty, in raggedness, in humility, and also in gentleness. The latter has been denied on account of the fierce language he sometimes uses in his controversial writings. Certainly the trick he played upon Apollinaris was disgraceful, though too much in accordance with the temper of the times. But as regards those whom he chiefly assailed, the Gnostics, he had no personal feelings of antipathy against them; most of them had been long dead; but living in seclusion, with his natural feelings curbed back, like all ascetics he bursts forth into turbulent declamations, entirely devoid of malice and ill-feeling, but giving the necessary relief to a strong but repressed temperament. We may take his words in his Testament as literally true where he says, Opp. Gr. ii. 396: "Throughout my whole life, neither by night nor day, have I reviled anyone, nor striven with anyone; but in their assemblies I have disputed with those who deny the faith. For if a wolf is entering the fold, and the dog goes not out and barks, the master beats the dog. But a wise man hates no one, or if he hates at all, he hates only a fool."

Of his other virtues, and especially of the reality and depth of his humility, there can be no doubt; as also that the Syrian church has not without reason extolled him as its greatest orator and poet, and styled him its teacher, its prophet, its pillar, and even, as its hymn writer, "the harp of the Holy Spirit." Roediger concludes his account of him in Herzog's Encyclopædia with the following eloquent words: "His doctrines were those prevalent in the church in his days, but he sets them forth not didactically in dogmatic form, but hortatively with pathos. He urges their acceptance without refining upon them. It is moral earnestness and self-denial, even to asceticism, for which he strives, while he blames and despises all seeking after worldly good. The holy Scripture in its general sense and verbal expression forms the groundwork of his intellectual activity, but he allows himself largely to amplify it in a poetical and even rhetorical manner, for which purpose he calls in the aid not merely of the Apocrypha, but of legends. He states his subject in a picturesque and lively manner, and even dramatically (not always in this respect keeping to the rules of good taste, as where, in Opp. Syr. ii. 415, he introduces the Virgin making an address to the infant Saviour); he loves exclamations, apostrophes, antitheses, and plays upon words; he piles up metaphors and images, and knows how to employ them to bring out the manifold meaning of a passage, but is occasionally guilty of exaggeration, and of using far-fetched allusions. As a rule, however, his manner is tasteful and that of a master in the art of description, and where he fails, it is from diffuseness and from overloading his ideas with eloquent words. But his words reach the heart; for they treat powerfully of human joys and cares; they depict the struggles and storms of life, and sometimes its calm rest. He knows how to awaken terror and alarm, as he sets forth before the sinner his punishment, God's righteous judgment, his destined condemnation; he knows, too, how to build up and comfort, where he proclaims the hopes of the faithful and the bliss of eternal happiness. His words ring in mild, soft tones when he paints the happy rest of the pious, the peace of soul enjoyed by those who cleave to the Christian faith; they thunder and rage like a storm wind when he scourges heretics, or chastises pride and folly. Ephrem was an orator possessed of spirit and taste, and his poetical gifts were exactly those calculated to give weight and influence to his authority as a teacher among his countrymen." As such they venerated him, giving him especially the title of Malphono, the teacher, but one of his greatest services to the church as a whole was the marvellous variety and richness which he gave to its public worship. EPHRAIM (5), ST., bishop of Mylasa in Caria, mentioned in the life of St. Eusebia, a Roman virgin of the 5th century. It is there stated (cap. iii. § 12, Boll. Acta SS. 24 Jan. ii. 600) that she died at Mylasa on the feast day of St. Ephraim, a former bishop of Mylasa, whose body lay in the neighbouring village of Leuce. Leo Allatius mentions Ephraim of Caria among the hymn writers of the ancient Greek church. (Allatius, de Libr. Eccles. Græc. Dissert. i. 82, Paris, 1646; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 921.)

EPHRAIM (6) (EPHREM, EPHRAEMIUS, or, as Theophanes gives the name, EUPHRAIMIUS), bishop of Antioch and patriarch, 527-545 A.D. The title, ὁ Ἀμιδῖος, given him by Theophanes, indicates that he was a native of Amida in Armenia. He devoted the early part of his life to civil and political employments, and rose to high distinction in the service of the emperor, and became count of the east in the reign of Justin I. The city of Antioch having been nearly destroyed in the years 525 and 526 A.D. by successive shocks of earthquake, and by the conflagration which broke out among the ruined buildings, Ephraim was sent by Justin as commissioner to take measures for the relief of the sufferers and the restoration of the city. The high qualities manifested by him in the fulfilment of these duties gained the affection and respect of the people of Antioch, who unanimously chose him as the bishop in room of Euphrasius, who had been crushed by the falling buildings. (Evagr. H. E. iv. 5, 6.) His consecration is placed in 357 A.D. Moschus records (Prot. Spirit. c. 37) that his elevation to the episcopate had been shortly before predicted to him by a deposed bishop whom he had found working for his livelihood. As bishop he continued to manifest the same benevolence, and care of the poor and exhibited an unwavering firmness and zeal against the heretical tendencies of his day. Theophanes says that he shewed "a divine zeal against schismatics" (Chronogr. p. 118). Moschus tells a story of an encounter he had with one of the pillar ascetics, a follower of Severas and the Acephali, in the neighbourhood of Hierapolis. This Stylite having proposed as a test of orthodoxy that they should each walk through a fire, drew back when he found that Ephraim was ready to accept the ordeal, and was eventually brought back to the orthodox faith on the bishop's casting his "omophorium" or stole into the flames, and its remaining uninjured. (Prat. Spiritual. c. 36.) He examined synodically the tenets of Synceticus, metropolitan of Tarsus, who was suspected of Eutychian leanings, but who was acquitted. (Phot. Cod. 228.) In 537 A.D., at the bidding of Justinian, acting under the influence of Pelagius (the archdeacon of Vigilius, afterwards pope himself) he repaired with Hypatius of Ephesus, and Peter of Jerusalem to Gaza to hold a council in the matter of Paul, the patriarch of Alexandria, who had been banished to that city on account of supposed complicity in the death of Psolus, a deacon and treasurer of the Caesaria, and as well as of Nestorian leanings, and who was there deposed from his primatial see. Pelagius having been urged by the turbulent monks of Palestine to secure the anathematization of their Origenistic brethren, obtained a rescript from Justinian, addressed to the patriarchs of the East, requiring them to convene synods for this purpose. In obedience to the emperor's command, Ephraim held a synod at Antioch, which repudiated the doctrines of Origen as heretical. (Liberat. c. 23, apud Labbe, Concil. v. 777 sq.; Baronius, Annal. 537, 538.) He was a very copious writer, being the author of a large number of theological treatises directed against the errors of Nestorius, Eutyches, Severus, and the Acephali, and in defence of the decrees of the council of Chalcedon. In 546 A.D. he yielded to the severe pressure put upon all the bishops by Justinian, and to escape deposition reluctantly subscribed the edict the emperor had put forth condemning "the three chapters," sed petius honoris quam virtutis dilector inventus. (Facundus, Pro Defens. Trium Capit. iv. 4.) He did not survive the disgrace of this cowardly concession, and died 347 A.D.

Ephraim's copious theological works have almost entirely perished, and we have little knowledge of them save through the prolix account given by Photius (Biblioth. Cod. 228, 229). He speaks of having read three of the volumes, but gives particulars of two only. The first of these volumes contained (1) a letter to Zenobius, a layman of Emesa, of the sect of the Acephali, defending the orthodoxy of the Oriental addition to the Trisagion, ὁ ὁμοῦθεός ἐστις ὁ πατήρ; (2) three letters to the emperor Justinian; (3) two letters to Anthimus, bishop of Trapezus, others to Domitius, to Synceticus, bishop of Tarsus; a letter to a Persian named Braces, containing scriptural proofs of the doctrine of the Trinity, the Incarnation, &c., to certain monks of Nestorian proclivities, and others; (4) synodical acts respecting certain Eutychian books; (5) eight panegyric discourses delivered on Christmas Day, Maundy Thursday, in Lent, &c. The second volume contained four books, the first and two last of which were devoted to a defence of Cyril of Alexandria and the Synod of Chalcedon against their heretical opponents, and the last comprised his replies to five inquiries, more curious than edifying, proposed to him by his correspondent, the advocate Anatolius; e. g., whether Adam was of compound substance; in what Adam's immortality consisted; the prolonged existence of St. John, &c. Some few fragments of his defence of the council of Chalcedon, and of the third book against Severus, and other works, are given by Mai (Bibl. Nov. iv. 63, vii. 204) and are printed by Migne (Patrolog. lxxxvi. pars 2, pp. 2099 sq.). A sermon of Ephraim of Antioch on the Transfiguration has been erroneously included in the works of Ephrem Syrus (Tillemont, viii. p. 757). (Photius, Biblioth. 228, 229; Theophanes, Chronograph. ad ann. 519, p. 118 D; Moschus, Prat. Spiritual. c. 36, 37; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 507; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. lib. v. c. 38; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 733.) [E. V.]

EPHRES, bishop of Jerusalem. [EPHRAIM (2).]

EPHYSIUS was born at Jerusalem in the 3rd century. His parents were pagans, and when Ephysius came to reside in Rome he still adhered to their religion. He was appointed governor of Sardinia by Diocletian, and a short time after this he was converted to Christianity. This fact soon became known to the emperor, who at once appointed a new governor, Julius, to supersede him. Julius on arriving there at once instituted proceedings against Ephysius, and finding that he was determined to stand to his Christian profession, he ordered him to be put to death about A.D. 303. He is commemorated Jan. 15. (Mart. Rom.; AA. SS. Jan. i. 997.) [T. S. B.]

EPICARPIUS, presbyter of Beneventum, the subject of a letter of pope Leo I. to Dorus, bishop of Beneventum, March 8, A.D. 448. Paulus, another presbyter of Beneventum, had complained of the uncanonical promotion of Episcarpus above his seniors, many of whom of the first and second rank had yielded precedence. Pope Leo strongly blames Dorus for the favouritism, praises Paulus for not going away, and is indignant with the other presbyters for their subservience. (Leo. Mag. Epist. 18, al. 19 in Patrol. Lat. liv. 709.)

[W. M. S.]

EPICHARIS, a martyr at Rome under Diocletian. She was arrested by Caesarius the prefect, tortured, and put to death. She is commemorated Sept. 27. (Men. Bas.; Baron. Annal. 303, 15; AA. SS. Sept. vii. 478.) [T. S. B.]

EPIOTETUS (1). This philosopher was born at Hierapolis in Phrygia. Afterwards we find him a slave at Rome; his master was Epaphroditus, one of the courtiers of Nero. He obtained his liberty, but when or how is uncertain. In the reign of Domitian, all the philosophers were banished from Rome; and Epictetus retired to Nicopolis, a city of Epirus. There he discoursed on morals; and one among his hearers, Arrian, preserved notes of his lectures, which have come down to our own time. He is reported to have returned to Rome in the reign of Adrian, and to have enjoyed the friendship of that emperor. Some even say that he lived into the reign of M. Antoninus, but this seems very unlikely. That emperor was however a great admirer of his works. The stories told about him evince at once his excessive poverty (at any rate as far as the early part of his life is concerned) and the resignation and sweetness of his character. In his old age he saved the child of one of his friends, that would otherwise have been exposed to perish; the nurse whom he procured for this child was, it appears, the first servant he had ever had.

Epictetus lived strictly according to his philosophy; and hence his writings have that vital power which can be attained by no other means. They have indeed the characteristic marks of Stoicism; and among those marks there may perhaps be found in them the defect, that they treat the desires which men commonly experience in the course of their life too much as aberrations to be subjugated and put down. This character does of course belong to some desires, but not to all, nor to the greater part. Again, Epictetus is perhaps liable to the charge that as he depreciates too much the desires, so he exalts too much the power of the will; he thinks it far more capable of governing the desires than, by itself, it can be.

But when these defects are admitted (and they belong to all Stoical writers, though we, following Horace, are generally disposed to exaggerate them and to forget the merits of the philosophers thus criticised) it must also be said that they do but slightly mar the excellence which appears on almost every page of the writings of Epictetus. His spirit was, indeed, of a higher order than the system which he nominally followed. "A poor man, a slave, a cripple, but beloved by the gods;" such was the account which he, not untruly, gave of himself. A few extracts will, probably, give a better idea of his teaching than any description. The following are from the Discourses :—

"When you have shut your doors, and darkened your room, remember, never to say that you are alone, for you are not; but God is within, and your Genius is within; and what need have they of light to see what you are doing? To this God you ought likewise to swear such an oath as the soldiers do to Caesar. For do they, in order to receive their pay, swear to prefer before all things the safety of Caesar: and will not you swear, who have received so many and so great favours; or, if you have sworn, will you not stand to it? And what must you swear? Never to disobey, nor accuse, nor murmur at any of the things appointed by him: nor unwillingly to do or suffer anything necessary." (i. 14.)

"When one consulted him, how he might persuade his brother to forbear treating him ill: Philosophy, answered Epictetus, does not promise to procure anything external to man: otherwise it would admit something beyond its proper subject matter. For the subject matter of a carpenter is wood; of a statuary, brass; and so, of the art of living, the subject matter is each person's own life. 'What, then, is my brother's?' That, again, belongs to his own art of living; but to yours is external, like an estate, like health, like reputation. Now, philosophy promises none of these. . . . 'But how, then, is my brother to lay aside his anger against me?' Bring him to me, and I will tell him; but I have nothing to say to you about his anger." (i. 15.)

The following are from the Enchiridion; "Require not things to happen as you wish; but wish them to happen as they do happen, and you will go on well." (viii.)

"When you do anything from a clear judgment that it ought to be done, never shun the being seen to do it, even though the world should make a wrong supposition about it; for, if you do not act right, shun the action itself; but, if you do, why are you afraid of those who censure you wrongly?" (xxv.)

"Never call yourself a philosopher, nor talk a great deal among the unlearned about theorems; but act conformably to them." (xlv.)

"Never say of anything, I have lost it; but, I have restored it. Is your child dead? it is restored. Is your wife dead? she is restored. Is your estate taken away? Well, and is not that likewise restored? 'But he who took it away is a bad man.' What is it to you, by whose hands he who gave it, hath demanded it back again? While he gives you to possess it, take care of it; but as of something not your own, as passengers do at an inn." (xi.)

The following are from the Fragments. "If you would be good, first believe that you are bad." (ii.) "Instead of herds of oxen, endeavour to assemble flocks of friends about your house." (xlii.)

It is a natural question, whether Epictetus was indebted to the gospels, or to Christian writers, for any part of his morality. The answer cannot quite certainly be given; but on the whole it seems probable that there was no direct connexion between him and any Christian writer or teacher. He never alludes to Christianity. Yet some of his phrases are startlingly like Biblical expressions; and it is not impossible that the new thoughts and feelings which were spreading through society had touched him, though he was unconscious of their origin. If we compare Epictetus with those who most truly deserve the name of religious teachers, we are sensible that he lacks something of that fire which is so vital an element in all spiritual influence. But all must be struck with the eminently practical character of his teaching; and for his personal character it is impossible not to feel admiration.

Epictetus accepted the more material and quasi-scientific parts of the Stoic philosophy; but they were not the parts that had a chief attraction for him, and his allusions to them are rare.

There is a good translation of the extant works of Epictetus written in the last century (1758) by Mrs. Carter. From this translation the above extracts are taken. (See also Zeller, Philosophie der Griechen, 1865, Theil iii. Abth. 1. pp. 660 sq., and the art. EPICTETUS in the Dict. G. and R. Biog.) [J. R. M.]

EPICTETUS (2) (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. v. 248), bishop of Side and Ambrasia. [EPICTACUS.] [C. H.]

EPICTETUS (3), successor of Fortunatianus in the see of Assuræ (Zanfour, Playfair, Travels in Footsteps of Bruce, p. 207), Cyp. Ep. 65; succeeded, before A.D. 255, by VICTOR, who speaks sixty-eighth in Scntt. Epp. A.D. 256, [E. W. B.]

EPICTETUS (4), martyred with several companions at Portus Romanus (Ua., Hier., Ad.) on the Via Ostiensis (Vet. Rom. Mart.); commemorated Aug. 22. (Mart. Hier., Ad., Ua.) [T. S. B.]

EPICTETUS (5) I., bishop of Centumcellae (Civita Vecchia) in Etruria, on the sea coast, a see which was afterwards incorporated in that of Viterbo. This bishop is found amongst those who attended the council of Arles, A.D. 314, which was assembled at the order of Constantine to inquire into the question of the Donatists. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. x. 56; Mansi, ii. 477, where, together with the bishop of Portus, he subscribed the canons after the African bishops.) [L. D.]

EPICTETUS (6) II., bishop of Centumcellae, a violent Arian, a persecutor of the Catholics, and a friend of the emperor Constantius. Athanasius describes him (H. Arian. 307, Migne, Patr. Gr. xlv.) as a neophyte, audacious, and prepared for every evil; he narrates how Epictetus with two others consecrated Felix as pope in the place of the exiled Liberius, when three eunuchs from the imperial household represented the people in the election, as the palace did the church. (Baron. 355, li. lix.; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. x. 56.) [L. D.]

EPICTETUS (7), circ. A.D. 369, bishop of Corinth. He received a celebrated letter from Athanasius in reply to his request for arguments against certain errors then in controversy at Corinth. Some had maintained that the human body of our Lord was consubstantial with His deity; others that He was a man adopted only to be the Son of God. Athanasius blames Epictetus for having even allowed these opinions to be set forth. The letter has been quoted by Epiphanius (Haer. lxxvii. p. 997), by Theodoret, Cyril, Leo, by the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, and by Justinian in his letter to Menas. It was early corrupted for party purposes, as Paul of Emesa found to his cost in his controversy with Cyril. He imprudently quoted a false edition, and was corrected by Cyril. (Patrol. Graec. xxvi. p. 1049, § 720; Athanas. Epist. ad Epictetum; Ceillier, iv. 142; Gams, Series Episcop. 430.) [W. M. S.]

EPICTETUS (8), deacon of Rome, A.D. 432, bearer of the condemnation of Nestorius to pope Celestine I. The pope in his congratulatory letter to the synod of Ephesus calls him and his companion the presbyter John, "my devout sons, beloved of God." (Coeles. Pap. Epist. xx.; Patr. Lat. i. 538.) [W. M. S.]

EPICTETUS (9), bishop of Diocletianopolis, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Concil. Gener. ii. 326 b, ed. Rome, 1628). His see town was probably the Diocletianopolis of Thrace. He has been confused with Elissaeus, bishop of Diocletianopolis in Palestine. (Reland, Palaeat. Illust. ii. 736; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 645; Gams, Series Episcop. 427.) [ELISSAEUS (1).] [C. H.]

EPICTETUS (10), bishop of Claudiopolis (Bithynium) in the province of Honorias, present at the council held at Constantinople, A.D. 536, under Menas. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 569; Mansi, viii. 878.) [L. D.]

EPIDAURUS, bishop of Side, the metropolis of the first Pamphylia, subscribed the canons of the council of Ancyra, A.D. 314; Pisdensis in the subscription should be altered to Sidensis. Some MSS. have Pergamenus, whence it has been supposed that a second Epidaurus, bishop of Perga, the metropolis of the second Pamphylia, was also present. (Mansi, ii. 534; Gams, Series Episcop. 450; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 997, 1013.) [L. D.]

EPIGONIUS, an African bishop, one of two legates sent by the first African council, A.D. 399 or 401, under Anastasius (Mansi, iii. 979), to the emperor Honorius, praying him to issue an edict for the protection of the privilege of sanctuary, which had long been enjoyed by the churches (Cod. Th. IX. xlv. 1, 2, 3), but which had been seriously invaded by Masceus, during the recent rebellion of Gildo. Epigonius also took an active part in the third council of Carthage, A.D. 397 or 398. (Mansi, iii. 887, cc. 42, 44; Bruns, Canon. i. 130, 131.)

EPIGONUS, a disciple of NOETUS of Smyrna, who came to Rome about the year A.D. 200, and there promulgated his master's opinions (Hippol. Ref. ix. 7). He seems to have passed from the scene before Hippolytus wrote, having been succeeded as leader of the monarchian party at Rome by his pupil Cleomenes. But it does not appear that either of them was in formal separation from the church, for we are not told of the excommunication of any of this school prior to that of Sabellius by Callistus (Hippol. ix. 12). [CLEOMENES.] On De Rossi's proposed identification of Epigonus with Praxeas (Bulletin. di Arch. Christ. 1866, p. 69), see PRAXEAS.

EPIMACHUS (1), a martyr at Alexandria with Alexander during the Decian persecution; commemorated Dec. 12. They were kept for a long time in prison, and finally burned. (Eus. vi. 41.; Mart. Us.; Baron. Annal. 253, 105.)

EPIMACHUS (2), a martyr at Rome with Gordianus during the reign of Julian. They were scourged and tortured, and then cast into prison: upon refusing to renounce their faith they were beheaded. They were commemorated May 10. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hier., Bedae, Ad., Us.)

EPINOEA. [ENNOEA, SIMON.]

EPIPHANES, a Gnostic writer, who taught about the middle of the 2nd century, or earlier. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. p. 511) gives the following account of him. He was the son of CARPOCRATES, by a mother named Alexandria, a native of Cephallenia. He died at the age of seventeen, and was honoured as a god at Same, a city of Cephallenia, a handsome temple and other buildings having been raised in his memory; and at the new moon the Cephallenians being wont to come together to celebrate his apotheosis by sacrifices, libations, banquets, and the singing of hymns. He had been instructed by his father in the ordinary circle of arts and sciences, and in the Platonic philosophy. He was the founder of the "Monadic Gnosis," and from him flowed the heresy of those afterwards known as Carpocratians. He was the author of a work on Justice, which he made to consist in equality. He taught that God having given his benefits to all alike and in common, human laws are censurable which instituted the distinction of meum.

and twins, and which secure to one as his peculiar possession that to which all have an equal share. This communistic doctrine he extended to the sexual relations. It was injustice in a man by marrying a woman, in whom he had no more rights than any one else, to claim that she should be considered as peculiarly belonging to himself. The commandment, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife," he condemned as absurd. It was ridiculous to imagine that the same Being could make concupiscence a part of man's nature and then issue to him the command Thou shalt not covet. Whatever may have been the origin of the phrase "Monadic Gnosis," the doctrine here described seems the direct opposite of Dualism. Instead of accounting for the existence of evil as the work of a hostile principle, this theory would represent moral evil as having no existence, but as being a mere fiction of human laws, perversely instituted in opposition to the will of the Creator.

We may well believe on Clement's authority, the existence of the work on Justice bearing the name of Epiphane; nor is Clement likely to have been misinformed as to his relation to Carpocrates. But it has seemed to some improbable that if he had died so young he could have held the place ascribed to him as head of the sect of Carpocratians. This perhaps may be explained by the fact that we are not told of any book written by Carpocrates, so that it may have been through the writings of the son that the sect really extended itself. Though we never find the name Epiphanius, the sect is described by Epiphanius (Haer. xv. p. 77) as of τοῦ Ἐπιφανοῦς. But the honours said to have been paid to Epiphane at Same have appeared to many quite incredible. Dodwell (Diss. 4 in Irenaeum, §§ 29) suggests that he might have held his school at his mother's native place, and there have enrolled a multitude of disciples. But Mosheim (De Rebus Christ. ante Const. p. 370) conjectured that Clement made the same mistake that Justin Martyr is supposed to have committed in the case of Simon Magus, and imagined a heathen festival that he witnessed at Same, and which was there known as τὰ Ἐπιφάνια, to have been instituted in honour of the Epiphane with whom he was familiar. Volkmar has worked out this hypothesis with much detail (Monatsschrift des wissenschaftlichen Vereins, Zurich, 1856). The God worshipped was the Moon God, not, however, the ordinary lunar deity worshipped at the full moon, but ὁ Ἐπιφανής, the new appearing moon. The story that Epiphane died in his 17th year mythically represents the fact that the new moon no longer exists when 17 days (or more than the half of the month) are over. And licentious community of women accompanied all moon worship. However little confidence the details of this theory inspire, we must admit the possibility that Clement may have been mistaken in supposing the Cephallenian rites to have been in honour of the Gnostic Epiphane.

There is a passage in Irenaeus (I. xi. 3, p. 54) which, it has been contended, gives us another specimen of the teaching of Epiphane. In giving an account of the doctrines of some followers of Valentinus, after stating the theory of Secundus, he goes on to mention the description which another "illustrious teacher of theirs" (clarus magister) gives of the origin of the primary Tetrad. In this the first principle is stated to be one existing before all things, surpassing all thought and speech, which the author calls Oneliness (μονότης). With this Monotes co-existed a power which he calls Unity (ἐνότης). This Monotes and Henotes constituting absolute unity (τὸ ἐν οὐδαί) emitted (though not in any proper sense of that word) a principle the object of thought only, which reason calls Monad. And with this Monad co-existed a power consubstantial with it, which the author calls Unit (τὸ ἓν). From this Tetrad came all the rest of the Aeons. Pearson conjectured (see Dodwell, Dissert. in Iren. iv. §§ 25) that the "clarus magister" of the old Latin translation represented ἐπιφανής διδάσκαλος, and that this Epiphane was a proper name, or at least that there was a play upon words referring to that name. The doctrine of the extract then, which seems an attempt to reconcile the theory of a Tetrad with strong belief in the unity of the First Principle, might well be a part of the Monadic Gnosis, of which Epiphane was said to be the author. Pearson's restoration of the Greek has since been pretty nearly verified by the recovery of the passage as reproduced by Hippolytus (Ref. vi. 38), where it runs ἄλλος δὲ τις ἐπιφανής διδάσκαλος αὐτῶν. Here the word in question is plainly an adjective, and Tertullian so understood it, who translates (Adv. Valent. 37) "insignioris apud eos magistri." On the other hand, Epiphanius understood the passage of Epiphane. On examining what he tells of this heretic (Haer. 32) it is plain that Epiphanius has been following Irenaeus until, on coming to the words ἐπιφανής διδάσκαλος he goes off to Clement of Alexandria, and puts in what he there found about Epiphane. But Neander has made almost certain that the person to whom Irenaeus really refers is MARCUS. He points out that these four names for the members of the primary Tetrad, Monotes, Henotes, Monas, and Hen, which the "illustrious teacher" (ch. 1) speaks of as names of his own giving, occur again with a καθ' ἑκαστοῦ in a passage cited from Marcus by name (Iren. i. 15, p. 74).

The assertion of Epiphanius that Epiphane comes chronologically after Secundus has been treated with more respect by Dodwell and others than the statements of so careless a writer deserve. He does not seem to have had a ground for his assertion except that he found Irenaeus, after the mention of Secundus, with he supposed to be a mention of Epiphane.

EPIPHANIA (1), wife of the general Helicinus, and mother of the Eastern emperor of the name. (Theoph. Chron. A.C. 602.) [EUDOCIA (5).] [C. H.]

EPIPHANIA (2), also called EUDOCIA, daughter of the emperor Heraclius by his wife Eudocia. She was born July 7, 611; baptized August 15 by the patriarch Sergius in the church of the Deipara in the district of Blachernae at Constantinople, and on October 4 crowned in the palatine oratory of St. Stephen. In 625 she was betrothed to Zebelia, prince of the Chazari, from whom her father had received considerable reinforcements in his wars; but her way to be married she heard of the prince's death, and returned to Constantinople. The Chazari were also called Gazari, and were Turks. (Theoph. Chronogr. 250 in Patr. Graec. cviii. 627; Du Cange, Hist. Byzant. p. 101, ed. Venice, 1729; Baron. A. E. ad ann. 625, iii.)

EPIPHANIUM (Ἐπιφάνιος), a niece of Chrysostom's friend Constantius, the presbyter of Antioch. To her godly education Constantius entreats her mother to devote especial care. (Chrys. Ep. 238.)

EPIPHANIUS (1), bishop of Salamis, in the island of Cyprus, and one of the most zealous champions of orthodox faith and monastic piety, was born at Besanduke, a village near Eleutheropolis in Palestine. The year of his birth is unknown, but seeing that in A.D. 392, twelve years before his death, he was already an aged man, we may conjecturally set the date of his nativity in some year of the decade between A.D. 310 and A.D. 320. Much of his early life-time was spent among the monks of Egypt, among whom he not only acquired a burning zeal for ecclesiastical orthodoxy and the new forms of ascetic life then coming into favour, but also came for the first time into contact with various kinds of heretics. It is probably a reminiscence of his life in Egypt, when he tells us that in his early youth, Gnostic ladies of seductive beauty had endeavoured to obtain his adhesion to their sect and given him some of their books to read. But the youthful anchorite, successfully resisting all temptations, revealed the matter to the bishops of the neighbourhood, and caused an investigation to be set on foot, which resulted in the banishment of eighty persons (Haer. xvi. 17). At twenty years of age he returned home and built a monastery near Besanduke, of which he himself undertook the direction. It appears that he was ordained presbyter by Eutychius, then bishop of Eleutheropolis. With St. Hilarion, the founder of Palestinian monasticism, Epiphanius early stood in intimate relation, and at a time when the great majority of Oriental bishops favoured Arian or semi-Arian views, adhered with unshaken fidelity to the Nicene faith, and its persecuted champions, Eusebius of Vercelli and Paulinus of Antioch, whom Constantius had banished from their sees. In A.D. 367 he was elected bishop of Constantia in Cyprus, the ancient Salamis, where, for six and thirty years, he discharged the episcopal office with the like zeal to that with which he had presided over his monastery in Palestine. Under his influence the whole island was soon covered with monastic institutions. With the monks of Palestine, and especially those of his own monastery at Eleutheropolis, he continued as bishop to hold uninterrupted communication; and these last were unwearied in their efforts to extend his renown for piety, orthodoxy, and learning. It soon came to pass that people consulted him on all important questions of doctrine and discipline, and Epiphanius found no difficulty in convincing himself that a watchman of the church must reckon it among his chief duties to let his voice be heard in all the ecclesiastical controversies of the time. Some years after his elevation to the episcopate, he addressed a letter to the faithful in Arabia, in defence of the perpetual virginity of Mary, which was afterwards incorporated, almost without alteration in his great work, Against all Heresies. (Haer. lxxviii.)

Soon after this several presbyters of Suedra, in Pamphylia, invoked his assistance in their controversy with Arians and Macedonians, by drawing up for them a detailed exposition of the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity.

Similar applications were at the same time made to him from various other quarters; by an Egyptian Christian, for instance, named Hypatius, who himself undertook a journey to Salamis for that purpose, and by a presbyter, Conops, apparently a Pisidian, who, in his own name, and that of his co-presbyters, sought instruction from Epiphanius in reference to a long series of disputed doctrines. This was the origin of his Ἀγκυρῆς (Anchoratus) published in the year 374 A.D., being an exposition of the true faith, as it had from the beginning been taught in the church, which, anchor-like, might fix the minds of its readers, and save them from being tossed about by the malice of Satan amid the stormy waves of heresy.

A similar occasion gave the impulse to his great heresiological work, written in the years 374 to 376 or 377 A.D., the so-called Πανάριον, on which his fame as a combater of heresy chiefly rests. He wrote this work at the request of Acacius and Paulus, two presbyters and heads of monasteries in Coele-Syria, and in it attacks with like zeal the numerous Gnostic sects of the second and third centuries, and the ecclesiastical opposition of his own time, Arians, semi-Arians, Macedonians, Apollinarians, Origenists, whose various opinions he regards as so many corruptions of the true faith, as it had been handed down from the apostles themselves. But a merely literary activity could not satisfy his pious zeal; we find him also embracing every opportunity of personally opposing what appeared to him soul-destroying error. So, about the year 376 A.D., we find him taking an active part in the Apollinarian controversies. Vitalis, a presbyter of Antioch, had been consecrated bishop by Apollinaris himself; whereupon Epiphanius undertook a journey to Antioch for the purpose of recalling Vitalis from his error, and reconciling him to the orthodox bishop Paulinus. His utmost efforts, however, proved unsuccessful. Though not himself present at the oecumenical council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, which ensured the triumph of the Nicene doctrine in the Oriental churches, his shorter confession of faith, which is found at the end of his Anchoratus (c. 120), and seems to have been the baptismal creed of the church of Salamis, agrees almost word for word with the Constantinopolitan formula. He took no part in the synod held at Constantinople in the following year, A.D. 382; but towards the end of that year we find him associated with St. Jerome, Paulinus of Antioch, and the three legates of that synod, at a council held under bishop Damasus at Rome, which appears to have dealt with the Meletianic and Apollinarian controversies. During his residence in the Eternal City he was domiciled at the house of the elder Paula, who, under the spiritual guidance of St. Jerome, had dedicated her ample fortune to the support of the poor and sick, and he seems to have strengthened her in her resolution to forsake home and children in order to lead an ascetic life at a great distance from Rome. At the beginning of the following spring, when the bishops were returning to their sees, Paula also went on pilgrimage to the Holy Land. On her voyage to Syria she stayed with Epiphanius in Salamis, remaining there about ten days. Somewhat later St. Jerome also came to visit Epiphanius, on his return from Rome and way to Bethlehem, bringing with him a train of monks to Cyprus, to salute "the father of almost the whole episcopate, the last relic of ancient piety." From this time onward we find Epiphanius in almost unbroken intercourse with St. Jerome. In alliance with this father he began in the last years of his life those miserable Origenistic controversies, in which monkish fanaticism combined with personal hatreds and jealousies, to brand with heresy the greatest theologian of the primitive church. Epiphanius had indeed already, in his Ancoratus (c. 54), and still more copiously in his Panarion, attacked Origen as the ancestor of the Arian heresy, in a most violent manner. It has been conjectured that Epiphanius in his early years, when among the Egyptian monks, had been already filled with horror at the erroneous doctrines of Origen himself. In confirmation of this view appeal has been made to what is related in the Vita Pachomii (Boll. Acta Sanctorum, Maii, tom. iii. Appendix, p. 25 sqq.), that St. Pachomius had not only forbidden his monks to read the writings of Origen, but even to have any intercourse with those who did so. But this was probably a mere invention for the sake of ascribing to the founder of Egyptian monasticism the glowing hatred with which St. Jerome and his circle were afterwards inspired towards the great theologian. It is contradicted by the fact of the extreme reverence in which Origen was held by these very monks of Egypt in the times of Epiphanius and St. Jerome. It is far more probable that the zealous confidence with which the Arians were wont to appeal to Origen in support of their doctrine directed the attention of Epiphanius to the writings of the great Alexandrine father, and in them, though held in the highest esteem by Athanasius himself, to detect the hidden sources of Arian pravity. Incapable as he was of impartially estimating the various sides of Origen's speculative theology, Epiphanius seems to have fixed his whole attention on those passages which appear to teach the creaturely nature of the Son, and which in reality did emphasize His filial subordination to the Father in a stronger way than later orthodoxy found admissible.

Origen's predilection for Hellenic philosophy he regarded as the source of all kinds of error, as well as his audacious undertaking to explain the mysterious doctrines of Holy Scripture. He had also a particular aversion from Origen's allegorical interpretations and the whole idealizing tendency of his speculation, which seemed to Epiphanius to destroy the reality of the objective facts of Christian faith. The resurrection of the flesh, for instance, that is of our mundane corporeity, was zealously maintained by Epiphanius against the spiritualistic conception of Origen.

St. Jerome himself had originally belonged, like the friend of his youth Rufinus, and John bishop of Jerusalem, to the warmest admirers of the great Alexandrine father. But, attacked as he now was, with remonstrances from different sides, he began out of anxiety for his own reputation for orthodoxy to separate himself with the utmost care from the heresies with which he was charged on this account.

Epiphanius, moreover, on hearing that Origenism had made its appearance in Palestine himself hastened thither, in advanced old age (A.D. 394), to crush at once and on the spot the odious heresy. His appearance sufficed to drive the ci-devant Origenist, St. Jerome, into the camp of the opposition, and into the bitterest enmity with his old friends, who with greater independence of character refused even now to repudiate their old attachment. Epiphanius, received with all honours by the bishop of Jerusalem, proceeded at once to abuse the rights of hospitality by preaching in the most violent manner in the Church of the Resurrection. Bishop John, after listening for a time in silence, and expressing by gestures only his disapproval, sent at last his archdeacon to the preacher to beg him to abstain from speaking further on these topics. The sermon being over, Epiphanius, as he walked by the side of John to the Church of the Holy Cross, was thronged by the people, as St. Jerome tells us, who pressed upon him from all sides with tokens of veneration; those thought themselves happy who were able to touch the hem of his garment or to kiss his feet. Mothers held up their little ones before him to receive his blessing. The throng at last became so great that Epiphanius stood still. This homage was possibly spontaneous or possibly artificial; however that might be, bishop John, irritated as he was by the sermon, evidently preached against himself, reproached Epiphanius for the vanity and self-conceit which he shewed in not leaving the spot where these honours were pressed upon him, and afterwards availed himself of the next opportunity to preach for his part against certain simple and uneducated persons who represented God to themselves in human form and corporeity. Whereupon Epiphanius rose, and expressing his full concurrence with what John had said, went on to declare that it was quite as necessary to repudiate the heresies of Origen as that of the Anthropomorphists. He then hastened to join his friend Jerome at Bethlehem, and required the monks of that community to renounce at once all church-fellowship with the bishop of Jerusalem: they, on the other hand, entreated him unanimously to return to John. Epiphanius yielded, and went back to Jerusalem the same evening, but immediately regretting the step he had taken, and without so much as speaking to the bishop, he left Jerusalem again at midnight, and betook himself to his old monastery of Eleutheropolis. From these quarters he continued to press the monks of Bethlehem, with demands to renounce church fellowship with the Origenist bishop John, and finally availed himself of the occasion provided by a deputation, sent to him from Bethlehem, to ordain as presbyter, in a somewhat violent manner, St. Jerome's brother Paulinianus, and impose him on the community, as one who should in future administer the sacraments among them. This intrusion into the rights of another bishop Epiphanius endeavoured subse-greatly to excuse in a letter to bishop John, as an act of Christian charity supplying a spiritual want long felt by the community at Bethlehem, and even on the ground that the ordination had taken place in a monastery, exempt from his episcopal jurisdiction. He also alleged that he had himself empowered his neighbour bishops in the isle of Cyprus to give priests' orders in his absence, in the remoter portions of his diocese. As might be expected, these and the like excuses were far from satisfying the bishop of Jerusalem, who reported to other bishops this violation of the ecclesiastical canons, and, at the same time threatened the monks of Bethlehem with severe ecclesiastical penalties so long as they should recognise Paulinianus as their presbyter, or persist in their present separation. While Epiphanius and Jerome continued to insist on bishop John publicly purging himself of Origenistic heresy, the latter proceeded to invoke the mediation of Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria. Theophilus' legate, a presbyter, named Isidore, openly sided with bishop John, and Theophilus himself, who at that time was reckoned among the friends of Origen, designated Epiphanius, in a letter to the bishop of Rome, as a heretic and schismatic.

According to another account, he accused him, as well as bishop John, of Anthropomorphism. Certain is it, that Epiphanius received in this controversy little or no support from other bishops. He returned to his Cyprian diocese, and was followed thither by his newly ordained presbyter Paulinianus. In this way, the main point in dispute between bishop John and the monks of Jerusalem was set at rest, and St. Jerome himself found it prudent to renew provisionally church communion with the bishop of Jerusalem, and with his old friend Rufinus. In the subsequent renewal of personal strife between St. Jerome and Rufinus Epiphanius took no part. On the other hand, a few years after the close of the first Origenist controversy he found himself involved in much more unpleasant transactions. Among the monks of Egypt, the controversy between Anthropomorphists and Origenists continued to rage, and found no end. Theophilus of Alexandria having, in the year A.D. 398, directed a Paschal epistle against the Anthropomorphists, a wild army of monks from the wilderness of Scete rushed into Alexandria, and so frightened the bishop that he thought his life depended on immediate concession. From that time and onwards Theophilus suddenly appeared as a violent opponent of Origen. In the paschal epistle of the following year, A.D. 399, he hastened to controvert the heresies of Origen in the most violent manner. Personal quarrels with his old friend Isidore, and with the so-called "Long Brothers," Dioscurus, Ammonius, Eusebius and Euthymius, who all enjoyed, on account of their piety and learning, the highest esteem amongst monks of Origenist proclivities, were added to the causes of strife, and inflamed the wrath of the passionate and violent bishop. Isidore and two of the "Long Brothers" had found a refuge among the monks of the Nitrian mountains. Theophilus followed them into the wilderness, assembled there a number of bishops, who under his influence condemned them as erroneous teachers, and persuaded the secular authorities to issue a decree for the banishment of Origenists.

About three hundred monks are said, at that time, in order to escape the violence of Theophilus, to have fled from Egypt. An Alexandrian synod, at which Theophilus presided, confirmed this condemnation of Origenist heresies. But the zeal of the patriarch was not even herewith satisfied. He not only continued to abuse Origen in his Paschal letters, but reporting at once to foreign bishops what had been done in Alexandria, he required them to condemn the heresies of Origen in similar terms. A synodical letter addressed to the bishops of Palestine and Cyprus (first published by Vallarsi in his edition of St. Jerome—Hieronym. Opp. tom. i. Ep. 92, p. 557) contains a long list of errors in doctrine said to have been discovered in the works of Origen. Similar writings were also sent to the bishop of Rome and other heads of the church. Theophilus wrote to Jerome that, mindful of the apostle's exhortation, "rebuke them sharply," he had with prophetic sickle cut down the adherents of the Origenist heresy, and Jerome answered in triumphant strain—"The old serpent hisses no longer, crushed and disembowelled (deviscerata); she has crept away into caves of darkness." Still greater joy was expressed by Epiphanius that in his extreme old age such happiness had befallen him, and to see what he had always himself maintained now confirmed and established by the witness of so just a bishop. "Know, my beloved son," he writes to Jerome, "that Amalek is destroyed to the very root; on the hill of Rephidim has been erected the banner of the cross. God has strengthened the hands of His servant Theophilus as once He did those of Moses." The aged bishop was soon to be drawn yet more deeply into these transactions. The bishops now began from all sides to lift up their voice against the heresies of Origen. A synod assembled at Jerusalem promised Theophilus to receive none of those whom he had condemned as Origenists into communion till he himself had removed the anathemas (cf. the synodal letter printed also for the first time by Vallarsi in Hieronym. Opp. tom. i. p. 549). Dionysius, bishop of Lydda, wrote to congratulate him on the accomplished work (loc. cit. p. 561). Anastasius also, bishop of Rome, and several other bishops of the West, expressed their readiness to put Origenism under the ban.

The persecuted Origenists had in the first instance hoped to find a place of refuge in Palestine, but even John of Jerusalem was now afraid to receive them, whereupon some of them, Isidore, for example, and the "Long Brothers," fled to Constantinople, where they presented to the patriarch, St. John Chrysostom, a formal complaint in writing against Theophilus. Chrysostom endeavoured to persuade them to withdraw their complaint, and meanwhile refused to admit them to the Mysteries till the matter had been decided by a synod, according to them, at the same time, a friendly reception, and intervening on their behalf with Theophilus A.D. 401. But Theophilus, irritated by false reports, replied with an anathema against Dioscurus, and accused his colleague in Constantinople of acting against the canons, in setting himself up as judge in the affairs of another province, whereupon the "Long Brothers" presented their complaint to the empress Eudoxia, who called upon the bishop of Alexandria to answer in person for himself at Constantinople. Theophilus made the most strenuous efforts to gain the assistance of the aged Epiphanius. He had already, on hearing of the arrival of the monks in Constantinople, called upon Epiphanius to pass judgment upon Origen and his worthless heresy, by means of a Cypriot synod, to inform the bishops of the neighbouring provinces of what had taken place in Egypt, and, above all, to forward the Alexandrine synodal decree to Constantinople by the hands of a trustworthy messenger. Epiphanius complied with his usual zeal, assembled a synod, at which he prohibited the works of Origen, and called on Chrysostom to do the same. He was then moved by Theophilus, as an ancient combatant of heresy, to appear personally at Constantinople, while Theophilus intentionally delayed his own departure. The astute plan succeeded. In the winter of the year 402 A.D. Epiphanius set sail for the imperial city, convinced that only his appearance was required to destroy the last remains of the Origenistic poison. Meanwhile a party at court which had long been displeased with Chrysostom's administration, were earnestly endeavouring to make use of the opportunity for deposing the stern detector of moral evils. This opportunity appeared to be given by the arrival of a bishop with such a name for piety as Epiphanius. The object was to make use of the approaching council in order to pass judgment less upon Theophilus than upon Chrysostom himself. Full of suspicion against the protector of the Origenistic heretics, Epiphanius, accompanied by several of his clergy, landed in the neighbourhood of Constantinople. His first step was, at the request of some fanatical monks of the party of Theophilus, to ordain a deacon in a monastic church. Notwithstanding this breach of the canons Chrysostom sent the whole of his clergy to give him the most honourable reception possible at the gates of the city, with a friendly invitation to take up his abode in the episcopal residence. This was rudely refused by the passionate old man, who declared himself unable to hold church communion with Chrysostom until he had expelled the "Long Brothers" from the metropolis, and had subscribed a condemnation of the writings of Origen. This Chrysostom gently declined with reference to the synod about to be holden, whereupon Epiphanius at once assembled the bishops, who had already gathered in considerable numbers at Constantinople, laid before them the decrees of his own provincial council against the writings of Origen, and required them all to subscribe them. Some of the bishops present consented willingly to do this, others, on the other hand, like the Scythian bishop, Theotimus, steadfastly refused. Whereupon the opponents of Chrysostom urged Epiphanius to come forward at the service in the Church of the Apostles, and openly before all the people to preach against Origen, the Origenists, and Chrysostom, as their protector. The latter, however, received timely notice of these intentions, and warned Epiphanius to abstain before it was too late from his passionate undertaking. The honest zealot may by this time have begun to suspect that he was but a tool in the hands of others. On his very way to the church he turned back, and soon after, at a meeting with the "Long Brothers," was obliged to confess that he had passed judgment upon them on hearsay evidence only, and, growing weary of the miserable business, determined to return home as soon as possible. A legend says that he bade farewell to the bishops who accompanied him to the ship with the words, "I leave you the city, the imperial palace, and their hypocrisies." According to another narrative, he sent a message to Chrysostom before his departure, "I hope thou wilt not die a bishop," to which the other replied, "I hope thou wilt not return home." Unhistorical as this narrative may be, it clothes in the form of two prophecies the fates which befell them both. Chrysostom soon after this, at the instance of the empress, was deposed from his see of Constantinople by a synod composed of his personal enemies, and presided over by Theophilus. Epiphanius died on board ship before he reached home in the spring of A.D. 403.

The end of the controversy proved how little it had to do with any real interests of faith. Theophilus, having once gratified his thirst for revenge, made up his quarrel with the banished monks.

The character of Epiphanius is well illustrated by these last transactions. An honest, but credulous and narrow-minded zealot for church orthodoxy, and notwithstanding the veneration in which he was held by episcopal colleagues, and still more in monastic circles, he was often found promoting divisions, where a more moderate course would have enabled him to maintain the peace of the churches. His violence of temper too often led him, especially in the Origenistic controversies, into an ill-considered and uncanonical line of conduct; and the narrow-minded spirit with which he was wont to deal with controverted questions contributed in no small degree to impose more and more oppressive fetters on the scientific theology of his time. His contemporaries, nevertheless, regarded him as an ideal of ecclesiastical piety. His charity to the poor was loudly praised, it went so far that when his own means failed he distributed without hesitation the rich possessions of his church among them. It is related that once when all had been given away, and his steward was complaining of such prodigality, an unknown benefactor suddenly appeared with a sack full of gold pieces. In practical life he often manifested that sound common sense which in theological conflicts too frequently failed him. It is related for instance how, on one occasion, he rebuked the ascetic zeal of St. Hilarion by a word of genuine evangelical spirit. Hilarion, at a common meal, had refused to partake of some fish which was offered him, alleging that he never partook of anything that had life. "Am I," said Epiphanius, "since I commenced monastic life have never suffered any one to go to rest with any ground of offence on his mind against me." "Thy rule, my father," replied Hilarion, "is better than mine."

Less success had he with the elder Paul, whom, at St. Jerome's instance, he vainly endeavoured to persuade to relieve her physical infirmities by the use of a little wine. On Jerome asking him what he had accomplished, his reply was, "Only this, that she nearly persuaded an aged man to abstain likewise from the use of wine." In opposition to the attempts that were then being made to enlist pictorial art in the service of the church, Epiphanius maintained the full puritanical rigour of primitive times. Having entered on one occasion a village church in Palestine he found a curtain adorned with a picture of Christ or some saint; in sudden anger he tore it in pieces, and then promised the local presbyter to send him another curtain in its place. It was natural, therefore, that in the iconoclastic controversies of a later time the image breakers appealed to the example of St. Epiphanius.

His learning was much celebrated, he was said to have spoken five languages, Hebrew, Syriac, Egyptian, Greek, and also a little Latin, for which Rufinus satirised him with the remark that he thought it his duty as an evangelist to speak evil of Origen, among all nations and in all tongues.

His frequent journeys and extensive reading enabled him to collect a large but ill-arranged store of historical information, and this he used with much ingenuity in defending the church orthodoxy of his time, and opposing every kind of heresy. But as a man attached to dry literal formulas he exercised really very small influence on dogmatic theology, and his theological polemics were more distinguished by pious zeal than by impartial judgment and penetrating intelligence. He is fond of selecting single particulars, in which to exhibit the abominable nature of the errors he is combating. When one bears in mind that his whole life was occupied in the Origenistic controversy, his refutation of the doctrine of the Alexandrine theologian is quite astoundingly superficial, a few meagre utterances detached from their context, and in part thoroughly misunderstood, is all that he has to give us by way of characterising the object of his detestation, and yet at the same time he boasted of having read no less than 6000 of Origen's works, a much larger number, as Rufinus remarks, than the man had written. His credulity allows the most absurd relations to be imposed upon it; a heretic was capable of any abomination, nor did he think it at all necessary quietly to examine the charges made. He nevertheless enjoys the fame of having been, if not the most powerful champion of orthodoxy, yet certainly the most learned opponent of heretical pravitities in his time, and one who, however deficient in critical acumen and orderly arrangement, had collected an enormous material for his purpose. In the eyes of contemporaries, his credulity and want of criticism detracted as little from his credit as the passionate violence of his mode of action.

The whole age regarded him as a saint; wherever he appeared, he found himself surrounded by troops of admiring disciples, and crowds waited for hours to hear him preach. Already in his lifetime all kinds of miracles were said to have been worked by him, and immediately after his death rumour said that demons had been exorcised and sick persons healed beside his grave.

His biography, written in the name of Polybius, an alleged companion of the saint (printed in the editions of Epiphanius by Petavius and Dindorf), is little more than a collection of such legends. His day in the calendar is the 12th of May.

Among the writings of Epiphanius the two most important are the Anchoratus and Panarion already mentioned. The Anchoratus comprises in 121 sections a prolix exposition, full of repetitions, of the doctrine of the Trinity, as well as of those of the true humanity of Christ and of the resurrection of the body, with a constant polemic against Origen and the heresiarchs of his own time, especially Arians, Sabellians, Pneumatomachi, and Dimoirites (Apollinarians). The whole is concluded with the Nicene creed in a twofold form with various additions. Epiphanius having had no theology peculiar to himself, this work has no other interest for us than as a witness to the orthodoxy of its time. The Panarion is of much greater importance. It is so called as being a kind of medicine chest, in which he had collected means of healing against the poisonous bite of the heretical serpent. It embraces in three books, which again are divided into seven sections, not less than 80 heresies. The catalogue of heresies is essentially the same as that which he had already given in his Anchoratus (chap. 11 and 12). He begins with not less than 20 heresies existing at the time of our Lord's birth; Barbarism, Scythianism, Hellenism, Judaism, Samaritanism. The last three divide again, each into several heresies; Hellenism and Samaritanism into four each, Judaism into seven, making 20 in all. Then follow 60 heresies after the birth of Christ, from the Simonians to the Massalians, and among them some which, according to the acknowledgment of Epiphanius himself, are not to be reckoned so much as heresies as acts of schism. Otherwise, every variation from the orthodoxy of the time is in his view a heresy. The extraordinary division of pre-Christian heresies is founded on a passage he often quotes (Col. iii. 11). Barbarism lasted from Adam to Noah, Scythianism from the time of Noah to the migration of Peleg and Reu to Scythia. Hellenism, he thinks, sprang up under Serug, understanding thereby idolatry proper. With regard to the various Greek schools of philosophy, which he regards as particular heresies belonging to Hellenism, and offers a complete list of them in the conclusion of his work, he shews himself but poorly informed. His communications, likewise, concerning the various Jewish sects are for the most part worthless; and what he says of the Nasarenes and Ossenes (Haer. xviii. and xix.) is derived purely from respectable but misunderstood narratives concerning the Ebionites and Elkesaites. The accounts he gives of the Jewish-Christian, and Gnostic sects of the 2nd and 3rd centuries exhibit a marvellous mixture of valuable traditions with misunderstandings and fancies of his own. His pious zeal to excel all heresiologues who had gone before him, by completing the list of heretics, led him into the strangest misunderstandings, the most adventurous combinations, and arbitrary assertions. He often frames out of very meagre hints long and special narratives. The strangest phenomena are combined with total absence of criticism, and things which evidently belonged together are arbitrarily separated. On the other hand he often copies his authorities, with slavish dependence on them, and so puts it in the power of critical commentators to collect a rich abundance of genuine traditions from what seemed a worthless mass. For the section extending from Heresies xiii. to lvii. from Docetism to Noetus, he used as clue a writing now lost, but of very great importance, which is also made use of by a contemporary writer, Philastrius of Brixia, the work namely of Hippolytus, Against all Heresies. Besides this he made use of the well-known book against heresies by Irenaeus of Lyons, as a welcome mine of information. The narratives derived from both sources are often pieced together in very mechanical fashion, and hence frequent repetitions and contradictory statements are found perpetually.

In addition to these two main authorities, he had at his command many original works of heretics themselves and numerous oral traditions derived from trustworthy witnesses. Very valuable are the extracts given from an old Valentinian work (Haer. xxxi.); the Epistle of Ptolemaeus to Flora, which is quoted entire (Haer. xxxiii.), and the copious extracts from Marcion's gospel (Haer. xlii.). For his section against the Montanists (Haer. xlvi.) he makes use of an anonymous controversial work of great antiquity, from which Eusebius also (H. E. v. 17) gives large extracts; in his article on the Alogi (Haer. li.) he probably makes use of the work of Porphyry against the Christians. In the section against Origen (Haer. xlv.) copious extracts are introduced from the work of Methodius περὶ ἀναρρίσεων.

Several notices of heretical parties existing in Epiphanius's own time are derived from his own observation. The last main division of the Panarion (Haer. lxxv. to lxxx.), which takes special care to note the different opinions of Arians, semi-Arians, Photinians, Marcellians, Pneumatomachi, Aërians, Aëtians, Apollinarists, or Dimoirites, is one of the most important contemporary authorities for the history of the Trinitarian and Christological controversies since the beginning of the 4th century. Although a fanatical partisan, and therefore not always to be relied on in his statements, Epiphanius speaks almost everywhere from his own knowledge, and moreover enhances the value of his representations by the literal communication of important documents. Of far inferior value to these historical sections are the refutations of various heresies attempted by Epiphanius. Apart from his strange fancy for calling his adversaries by the names of various animals, he has acquitted himself in a marvellous fashion in all kinds of fanatical terms of abuse, misrepresentation of opinions, and attacks on character. He takes particular pleasure in describing real or alleged licentious excesses on the part of heretics; his refutations proper contain sometimes really successful strokes of argument, but are for the most part weak and unhappy. The conclusion of the whole work is formed by the section περὶ πλῆθους, a glorifying description of the Holy Catholic Church, its faith, its manners, and its ordinances. This description is of great and manifold significance for the history of the church of that time. Each section is preceded by a short summary. An Ἀνακεφαλalaίωσις, probably the work of Epiphanius himself (preceded by a short extract from an epistle of Epiphanius to Acacius and Paulus, and followed by an extract from the section setting forth the Catholic faith), is itself an almost literal repetition of the contents of these summaries. This Ἀνακεφαλalaίωσις, a work made use of by St. Augustine and St. John Damascene, seems to have circulated as an independent writing in a similar way to the x. book of the Philosophumena and the summary added to Hippolytus's σύγγραμμα against all heresies, preserved in a Latin translation in the Proscriptions of Tertullian. Of another somewhat more copious epitome, occupying in some measure a mid-position between the brevity of the Ἀνακεφαλalaίωσις and the details of the Πανάριον, a large fragment has been recently published by Dindorf from a Paris MS., No. 854, in his edition of Epiphanius, vol. i. pp. 339-369, from a transcript made by Fr. Duebners (cf. also the various readings given by Dindorf from a Cod. Cryptoferrariensis vol. iii. p. 2, praef. pp. iv. to xii.).

Among the other writings of Epiphanius should first be mentioned his book, "De mensuris, et ponderibus" (περὶ μέτρων καὶ σταθμῶν), written in the consulate of Arcadius and Rufinus, A.D. 392. The title is unsuitable, inasmuch as only the smallest part of the work gives any account of biblical weights and measures. This work is a somewhat irregular collection of different notices, serving to introduce the reader to the Greek Bible of the Old Testament, with remarks on the accents and critical and grammatical signs concerning the origin of the Septuagint, the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, the Hexapla of Origen, etc. The section on the Greek version of the Old Testament was published by Montfaucon as a work by itself, with the help of two manuscripts (Prolegg. ad Orig. Hexapla, p. 77 sqq.), and also by Dindorf (vol. iv. part i. praef. p. viii. sqq.). The treatise De Gemmis, that is, concerning the 12 jewels in the breastplate of the Jewish high priest, is preserved in only two Greek extracts, the one first published by Conrad Gessner (Zurich, 1565), the other in the Quaestiones of Anastasius Sinaita (chap. xl.), and in an old Latin version, incomplete towards the end, first published by Foggini at Rome (A.D. 1743). This treatise, which is preceded by an epistle of Epiphanius to bishop Diodorus of Tyre, contains bits of information concerning names, origin, nature, and uses of the different precious stones, together with all manner of spiritualisations.

Further, there are two letters of Epiphanius in reference to the Origenist controversy, one, longer, addressed to John of Jerusalem; the other, shorter, to Jerome, preserved in a Latin version made by that father (found in the best form in Vallarsi's edition of St. Jerome). Among his lost writings must be reckoned an Enlogium on St. Hilarion, of which Jerome makes mention. Of doubtful origin is the so-called Physiologus, a short treatise on the nature of beasts, and with somewhat tasteless pious meditations (Pitra, Spicilegium Solimense, vol. iii. Paris, 1855).

Cassiodorus (de Inst. div. Literar. Opp. ed. Venet. tom. ii. p. 513) mentions a commentary by Epiphanius on the Song of Songs, of which he had caused a Latin translation to be made. This work is supposed to be identical with the mystical interpretation of the Song first published by Foggini, from a Vatican Codex, Rome, 1750. But of this work there also exists another somewhat amplified redaction, bearing the name of Philo of Carpathus, one of Epiphanius's suffragan bishops, first published with the Latin translation of Stephanus Salutus, Paris, 1537, and afterwards by Giacomelli, Rome, 1772. Further are ascribed to Epiphanius the following works: A fragment of An Exposition of the Gospel of St. John (in Combefis Auctar. Noviss. Bibl. Patr. tom. i. p. 300). Seventeen Apophthegmata (in Cotelierii Monumenta Eccl. Graec. t. i. p. 426) and a lately discovered tractate, containing under 102 heads a collection of passages from the Old Testament, in which the author found the history of our Lord, announced beforehand (Opusculum S. Epiphani de Divina Incarnatione, ed. Steph. Ant. Morcellus, Mutinae, 1828). Unquestionably spurious is the work De Vitis Prophetarum, which is full of fables, and nearly related to that of Pseudo-Dorotheus, concerning the prophets and disciples of the Lord (recently published by H. A. Hamaker, Amsterdam, 1833). And so are likewise eight homilies attributed to Epiphanius.

The Editio Princeps is that of Basle, edited for the printer, Joh. Hervagius, by Joh. Oporinus, 1544. This edition contains the Panarion with Anacephalaeosis, the Ancoratus, and De Mensuris et Ponderibus. The first part of the MS. used by Oporinus, sent him from Erfurt by Joh. Lange, is now lost. It contained the Panarion up to p. 604, of Petavius's edition. The second part of the MS. remains in the university library at Jena. It was written in the year 1304. The same MS. had before Oporinus been already made use of by Janus Cornarius for his Latin translation of Epiphanius, Basle, 1543. The second edition of Epiphanius is that prepared by the learned Jesuit, Dionysius Petavius, Paris, 1622, in two volumes. It contains the Greek text with a new Latin translation, and numerous and still valuable Latin notes. To the writings contained in the editio princeps, a few smaller ones are added, most of them doubtful or spurious. A reprint of this is the Cologne or rather Leipzig edition of 1682, which is marred by numerous misprints. The Paris MS. used by Petavius (Bibl. Nat. 833, 835) is derived from the same source as that of Jena, but was more recently written, 16th century. To the same class of MSS. belong another Codex Membr. saec. xv. in the Bibl. Rhedigerana, at Breslau, and a Codex chart. Vindobonensis, saec. xiv. (127, in suppl. Kollarii, p. 738), which contains only fragments of the Panarion and of the Anacephalaeosis. To another and better family belong a MS. now no longer heard of, in the Vatican (Codex Vatican.), and another in St. Mark's library at Venice (Cod. Marcian. 125). Of the former Petavius used a collation made by Andreas Schott for the second and third tomos of the 1st Book of the Panarion (pp. 55–395, ed. Petav.). This collation appears attached to the margin of a still existing copy of the Basle edition, which fell accidentally into Oehler's hands.

The Codex Marcianus, 125, in the year 1057, is reliance on which the brothers Coleti began to prepare a new edition, contains, alas, only the first part of the Panarion, to p. 604 (ed. Petav.). This manuscript contains a much more original text than those of the first-named family. With its help not only are we enabled to correct innumerable corruptions and arbitrary alterations of text made by later writers, but also to fill up numerous and some very considerable lacunae. A complete collation of this MS. was first made by W. Dindorf as ground-work of his edition of Epiphanius (Leipzig, 1853–1862, 5 vols. sm. 8vo.). This, now the best edition, contains all the genuine writings of Epiphanius (the Ancoratus, the Anacephalaeosis, the Panarion, and the De Mensuris et Ponderibus in the Greek text, De Gemmis, in all three text forms, and the two Epistles, in Jerome's translation), and beside these the spurious homilies, the above-mentioned epitome, and the Vita Epiphani of Polybius. Vol. iii. pt. 2, contains the critical apparatus to the Panarion, vol. v. the Annotations of Petavius. An appendix, which has not yet appeared, besides several supplements, not further described, is announced to contain various readings of two MSS. of the first part of the Panarion, rivalling in value the Venetian Codex, as well as the remaining doubtful or spurious writings of Epiphanius.

The Greek and Latin edition of the Panarion by Franz Oehler, in the Corpus Haeresiologicum, vols. ii.–iii. (Berlin, 1859–1861), has only made use of a few specimens of the text of the Codex Marcianus, and that for its two first sections containing the first and second books of the Panarion. The third division of the second volume, containing the third book of the Panarion and the Anacephalaeosis adds, pp. 592–676, addenda et corrigenda, by way of making up for neglected revision of the text. The third volume contains, besides the Annotations of Petavius, valuable contributions by Albert Jahn, to the criticism and exegesis of the Panarion. Compare reviews of both editions by Lipsius, in Literarisches Centralblatt für Deutschland, 1859, N. 15, 1860, N. 42, 1864, N. 23. A worthless edition is that of Migne, in the Patrologia (Series Graeco-latina, tom. xli.–xliii. Paris, 1863–64). This edition contains the Panarion, the Anacephalaeosis, the Ancoratus, the book De Mensuris et Ponderibus, the treatise De Gemmis, the two letters addressed to John and to Jerome, and the doubtful or spurious works De Vitis Prophetarum, De Numerorum Mysteriis, Seven Homilies, and the Physiologus. A Syriac translation (so-called) of the Panarion, which has found its way from the Nitrian monastery of St. Maria Deipara into the British Museum, appears to contain nothing but the Anacephalaeosis. This last is found not only in MSS. of the Panarion, but in several other Greek Codices. A Syriac translation of De Mensuris et Ponderibus is found in two Syriac MSS. of the British Museum, Cod. add. 17148 and 4620. A number of various readings of this treatise have been published by P. de Lagarde (Philologus, xviii. p. 352 sq.). The sources of the Biography of Epiphanius are pretty numerous and scattered; beside the notices found here and there in his own writings, the reader may compare especially Socrates, Hist. Eccl. vi. 10, 12–14; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. vi. 32, vii. 27, viii. 14–15; Palladius, Dialogus de Vita Chrysostomi (in Chrysost. Opp. ed. Montfaucon, tom. xiii.); Hieronym. Catal. Viror. Illustr. 114, Epist. ad Pammach. 38 (61), ad Theophil. 39 (62), Vita S. Hilarion, tom. iv. pt. ii. p. 72, ed. Martianay; Apolog. adv. Rufin. ii. passim. Compare also Vitae Patrum, ed. Rosweyde, tom.

v. (Antwerp, 1615); Acta Sanctorum, 12 Mai. Completely useless is the above-mentioned Vita Epiphani, by Polybius. Of works and treatises concerning Epiphanius may be mentioned the book attributed to the abbé Gervais, L'Histoire et la Vie de St. Épiphan, Paris, 1738; Tillemont, Mémoires, tom. x. p. 484, sq. 822 sq.; Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. ed. [R A. L.]

EPIPHANIUS (2), bishop of Cratia or Flaviopolis, in the province of Honorias adjoining Paphlagonia, present at the oecumenical council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 577; Mansi, iv. 1213.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (3), according to Idatius, the unlawful possessor of the see of Seville from A.D. 441 onwards, in which year Sabinus, the rightful bishop, was driven out. (Idat. Chron. § xvii. olymp. 805, in Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 831; Esp. Sagr. iv. ann. 441.) The conquest of Seville by Rechila, the Arian king of the Suevi, in 441, probably led to the expulsion of Sabinus and the intrusion of his successor. (Esp. Sagr. ix. 137.) [MARCELLUS.]

[M. A. W.]

EPIPHANIUS (4), bishop of Arce in Phoenicia. He was present at the synod of Antioch, A.D. 448. (Mansi, vi. 495; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 825.) [J. de S.]

EPIPHANIUS (5), bishop of Perga, the metropolis of the second Pamphylia, present at the Latrocinium Ephesinum, A.D. 449, where he spoke against Flavian of Constantinople and Eusebius of Dorylaeum (Mansi, vi. 918); he afterwards attended the council of Chalcedon, and subscribed to its decrees, A.D. 451 (Mansi, vii. 140). He received a letter from the emperor Leo, and sent back a synodal reply, concerning the murder of St. Proterius and the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458 (Mansi, vii. 573; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1015.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (6), bishop of Colossæ in Phrygia; his name was subscribed in his absence by his metropolitan, Nunechius of Laodicea, to the definition of the faith that was read before the emperor Marcian at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 815.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (7), bishop of Soli in Cyprus, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, by Soter of Theodosiana in Cyprus as his proxy. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1072; Mansi, vii. 159.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (8), bishop of Cestrus, in Isauria, to the north of Antioch (Wiltsch, Handbuch der kirchl. Geographie, i. 203, note 15). He was present at the fourth general council at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and also signed the synodical epistle of the Isaurian bishops to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 402; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1025.) [J. de S.]

EPIPHANIUS (9), bishop of Epiphania in Syria Secunda. He signed the synodical letter of the province of Syria Secunda, addressed to the emperor Leo, referring to the murder of Proterius, and the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 523; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 917.)

[J. de S.]

EPIPHANIUS (10), bishop of Aspona in Galatia, subscribed the answer of the synod of his province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458, to his enquiry concerning the murder of St. Proterius of Alexandria, and the faith of Chalcedon. The signatures are corrupted; Julianus is called bishop of Aspona, and Epiphanius (Eufanius) of Spona. (Mansi, vii. 616; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 481.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (11), bishop of Hispellum (Spello), a town about three miles from Perugia in Umbria. He was present at the synod held at Rome by pope Felix III. A.D. 487. The reading Spoletinus has been corrected to Spellates, both on the authority of MSS., and because Amasius was at that time bishop of Spoleto. (Mansi, vii. 1171; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. x. 115.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (12), bishop of Satala in Lesser Armenia, subscribed the letter of his province to the emperor Leo concerning the faith of Chalcedon and the murder of St. Proterius, A.D. 458. Atalenus, in the subscription, should be altered to Satalenus. (Mansi, vii. 589; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 434.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (13), ST., bishop of Pavia. We are indebted for all our knowledge of this estimable prelate to a Life of him written by St. Ennodius, who was intimately acquainted with him. He was born A.D. 438, and was from his infancy regarded with affectionate interest by St. Crispinus, bishop of Pavia, who ordained him deacon at the age of twenty. Designated by Crispinus as his successor, he was unanimously elected bishop by the clergy and people of Pavia in the year 467. His life was one of marked austerity and devotion; but what is most interesting about him is that he was largely employed as a peacemaker and public benefactor in the stormy strifes of the 5th century. In 469 he succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation between the emperor Anthemius and his son-in-law Ricimer; in 474 he made peace between the emperor Glycerius and Euric, king of the Visigoths. Euric was much impressed by him, and invited him to dinner, but Epiphanius, knowing that he was accustomed to have Arian bishops dining with him, excused himself from accepting the invitation. When Pavia was stormed by Odoacer in 476, Epiphanius was able to save his sister St. Honorata and other women from being taken as captives. He had influence enough with Odoacer to obtain for the town a five years' exemption from taxation. His reputation commended him equally to the conqueror of Odoacer, the great Theodoric, who sent him on a mission to Gundobald and his Burgundians, to redeem the captives whom they had carried away from Italy. Epiphanius is said to have brought back 6000 persons, partly given up freely by Gundobald, and partly purchased with a very moderate payment. "Such deeds," observes Gibbon, "are the best of miracles." In 496 he travelled to Ravenna, to ask of Theodoric the remission of the next year's tribute. Two-thirds of what he asked was granted. But this journey proved fatal to him, and he died some days after his return to Pavia, A.D. 495, in the 58th year of his age. Ennodius's Life may be found in Sirmoad, tom. i.; see also Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1078; Boll. Acta SS. 21 Jan. ii. 364.

[J. Ll. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (14), bishop of Beneventum, present at the first synod in March 499 under pope Symmachus at Rome. (Mansi, viii. 285; Hefele, § 220.)

[A. H. D. A.]

EPIPHANIUS (15), bishop of Midaſum (Midaſus, written also Midaſum and Midaum) in Phrygia Salutaris, present at the council of Chalcedon; his name occurs also among the bishops signing the synodal letter of that council to Leo I. (Leon. Ep. 98, 1106; Oriens Christ. i. 841). His name appears also in the list of bishops signing the decrees of the council held at Rome in 503, but this list certainly belongs to some earlier council (Baron. ann. 503, ix.).

[C. G.]

EPIPHANIUS (16), 14th bishop of Nantes, succeeding Clematius and followed by Eumerius. He was present at the first council of Orleans in 511. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 798; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. viii. 356, Flor. 1759-98.)

EPIPHANIUS (17), 16th bishop, 5th patriarch of Constantinople. He succeeded John II. A.D. 520 (Theophanes, A.D. 512), and died in A.D. 535, after a rule of 16 years.

He appears to have been a quiet, prudent, complaisant person, living unobtrusively in stirring times, exactly the character to submit gracefully to the ecclesiastical activity of his emperor. Seven years he was under the peasant general Justin; the other eight under Justinian. The contemporary popes were Hormisdas, John I., Felix III., Boniface, and Agapetus. The kings of Italy were Theodoric, Athalaric, and Theodahat, the ungrateful murderer of his queen Amalasontha. The eastern empire was now rising to a high degree of splendour through the victories of its generals, Belisarius and Narses. Idolatry was universally suppressed, heathen books were burnt, pagan images destroyed, the professors of the old religion imprisoned and flogged. At Constantinople, the zeal of Justinian for a church policy was shewn during the patriarchate of Epiphanius by such laws as those of 528 and 529, which regulated episcopal elections and duties. These enactments, and the passivity of Epiphanius and his clergy, are remarkable proofs of the entire absence in these times of any claims such as the clergy of later centuries asserted for exclusively clerical legislation for the spirituality.

The chief civil event in the city was the great sedition in 531, called Nika, which arose from the celebrated quarrel between the greens and the blues in the Hippodrome. The church of St. Sophia and other public monuments were burnt. Justinian even thought of flying to Heraclea, in Thrace; but Narses and Belisarius put down the insurrection by the slaughter of 30,000 of the insurgents. Through these varied scenes Epiphanius lived. His first conspicuous office was the charge of the catechumens of the church of Constantinople. In 519, the year before his election, he was sent with bishop John and Count Licinius to Macedonia, to receive the documents "libellos," or subscriptions of those who wished to accept reunion with the catholic church, at the request of the apocrisiarius of Dorotheus bishop of Thessalonica.

In 520, February 25, he was elected by the emperor Justin, with the consent of the bishops, monks, and people. He is described in the letter of the synod of Constantinople to pope Hormisdas as "flourishing in virtues, reproofs, Scripture meditations; holding the right faith, and maintaining a fatherly care for orphans; in fact, too good to be praised" (Patrol. Lat. lxiii. 483). He accepted the conditions of peace between east and west concluded by the patriarch John, his predecessor, with pope Hormisdas, and ratified them at a council held at Constantinople, where he accepted also the decrees of Chalcedon. Dioscorus, agent of Hormisdas at Constantinople, writes thus:—"His beginnings do not seem bad, for he talks reasonably, and promises that he will keep the rules of the fathers, and, far from dissipating the unity and peace that has been arranged, will increase them. So much he promises: what he can fulfil we don't know. He has not yet asked us to communion." (Patrol. Lat. lxiii. 482.) Four letters of Epiphanius remain, addressed to Hormisdas, telling him of his election, sending him his creed, and declaring that he condemned all those whose names the pope had forbidden to be recited in the diptycha. Hormisdas had written to Epiphanius, complaining that he had not heard from him, and that he had sent no deputies according to custom; that he might have congratulated him, and thanked him for the zeal which he had shewn for unity. Epiphanius adopts the symbol of Nicaea, the decrees of Ephesus, Constantinople, and Chalcedon, and the letters of pope Leo in defence of the faith. His second letter was accompanied by a chalice of gold surrounded with precious stones, a patina of gold, a chalice of silver, and two veils of silk, which he presented to the Roman church. In order to make the peace general, he advises the pope not to be too rigorous in exacting the extrusion of the names of former bishops from diptycha, about which the people of the see concerned might be reluctant. His excuse for the bishops of Pontus, Asia, and the East is composed in very beautiful language. The answers of Hormisdas are given in the Acts of the Council of Constantinople held under Mennas. He trusts to the prudence and experience of Epiphanius, and recommends lenity towards the returning, severity to the obdurate. Epiphanius is to complete the reunion himself. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1534, 1537, 1545, 1546, 1555, ed. 1671; Patrol. Lat. lxiii. 497, 507, 523.)

The severe measures by which Justin was establishing the supremacy of the Catholics in the east were arousing Theodoric, the Arian master of Italy, to a policy of retaliation in the west. Pope John I., the successor of Hormisdas, became thoroughly alarmed; and in 525, at the demand of Theodoric, proceeded to Constantinople to obtain the revocation of the edict against the Arians, and let their churches restored to them (Marcellin, Chron. ann. 525 Labbe, Concil. iv. 1600). Great was the honour paid to him in the eastern capital. Twelve miles the whole city went out to receive him, bearing ceremonial tapers and crosses. The emperor Justin prostrated himself before him, and wished to be crowned by his hand. The patriarch Epiphanius, with great civility, invited pope John to perform mass; but the pope, mindful of the traditional policy of encroachment, refused to consent until they had offered him the first seat. With high solemnity he said the office in Latin on Easter-day, communicating with all the bishops of the East except Timothy of Alexandria, the declared enemy of Chalcedon. Nothing was omitted at Constantinople which could do honour to the pope; there was universal joy because the old men of the Greeks declared that since the days of Constantine the Great and pope Sylvester the saint, no bishop of Rome had come into "Greece." John was less happy on his return. He was thrown into prison at Rome, and died in his cell. The reason assigned is that he refused to ask that Arians who had become Catholics should be allowed to return; and perhaps he owed part of his disgrace to his excessive honours at Constantinople. Theodoric, in fact, though once just and tolerant, had now become cruel; witness the deaths of Boethius and Symmachus (Baron. 525, 8, 10; Pagi, ix. 349, 351; AA. SS. May 27; Schröckh, xvi. 102, xviii. 214-16; Gibbon, iii. 473; Milman, Lat. Christ. i. 302).

In April, 527, Justinian was associated with Justin, and in August became sole emperor. In 532 he rebuilt the church of St. Sophia. In 529 he succeeded in extinguishing the last Pagan philosophy, Neo-Platonism, by the closing of the schools of Athens. In 529, also, pagans and heretics were excluded from civil and military office; a great mass of pretended conversions followed, some sectarians put an end to their lives; the Montanists in Phrygia burnt themselves in their churches (Procop. Hist. Arcan. xi. 34-5). How far Epiphanius acquiesced in all these measures we do not know; the meddlesome nature of Justinian allows us to give him the benefit of the doubt.

In 531 the dispute between Rome and Constantinople was revived by the appeal of Stephen, metropolitan of Larissa, to pope Boniface, against the sentence of Epiphanius. Stephen was eventually deposed, notwithstanding his appeal.

In 535, on June 5, Epiphanius died, after an episcopate of sixteen years and three months (Theoph. A.C. 529 in Patrol. Graec. cviii. 477.) All that is known of him is to his advantage.

Besides his letters to Hormisdas, we have the sentence of his council against Severus and Peter (Patrol. Graec. lxxvi. 783-786). Forty-five canons are attributed to him (Assemani Bibl. Orient. 619). [W. M. S.]

EPIPHANIUS (18), bishop of Ascoli (Asculum), one of the four Italian bishops present at the synod at Constantinople, in May, 536, presided over by Mennas, the patriarch. (Mansi, viii. 969; Hefele, § 250.) [A. H. D. A.]

EPIPHANIUS (19), bishop of Pitane in the province of Asia, on the Elaeatic gulf, present at the synod held at Constantinople by Mennas, A.D. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 706; Mansi, viii. 1147.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (20), bishop of Baratta, a town in Lycania, whose position and exact name is uncertain: present at the synod held at Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 974; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1079.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (21), bishop of Heraclea Pontica, in the province of Honoria, present at the council held at Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 573; Mansi, viii. 974.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (22), bishop of Raphia (on the seaboard of Palestine, to the extreme south), who in A.D. 518 signed the synodical letter of John of Jerusalem against Severus (Labbe, v. 191), and in A.D. 536 the sentence against Anthimus (ibid. 283). (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 629.) [E. V.]

EPIPHANIUS (23), bishop of Tyre and metropolitan at the beginning of the 6th century. He was strictly orthodox, and refused to hold communion with Severus of Antioch, and rejected his synodical letters. (Evagr. II. E. iii. 33.) A letter from him and his four suffragans to Theophilus, bishop of Heraclea and his synod detailing the evil deeds of Severus, was read on the fifth day's proceedings of the synod of Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536. (Labbe, v. 193-202; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 809; Baron. A. E. ann. 518, xl.) [E. V.]

EPIPHANIUS (24), metropolitan (or possibly called patriarch) of Grado, to which place the see of Aquileia had been transferred after the Lombard invasion, c. 612. "Ex illo tempore" (says Paul Diac. iv. 39) coeperunt duo esse patriarchae. The earlier metropolitans had been in schism with Rome on the subject of the three chapters, but Candidianus, the predecessor of Epiphanius at Grado, had made peace with Rome. At Aquileia itself, however, with the consent of the Lombard king and Gisulf, duke of Friuli, a metropolitan (or patriarch) was appointed. Probably the name of patriarch was usurped by the bishops of Aquileia, and therefore allowed by the popes to the bishops of Grado. See the Chronic. Patr. Grad. Mon. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 394, in which the patriarchs of Aquileia are spoken of as schismatics. In the year 707 the schism was finally brought to a close by a synod at Aquileia. See Paulus Diac. vi. 14, quoted from Bede. The two patriarchs of Aquileia and Grado—with no powers really beyond those of metropolitans—had controversy as to their rival jurisdictions. Their limits were ultimately defined by Leo IX. in the 11th century. (Wiltsch, Handbuch der kirchl. Geog. Engl. transl. vol. i. p. 296; Hefele, § 283.) [A. H. D. A.]

EPIPHANIUS (25), bishop of Albanum (Albano), at the first Lateran council, A.D. 649. (Mansi, x. 865; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 250.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (26), commonly called THE YOUNGER, bishop of Constantia or Salamis, the metropolis of Cyprus, in the latter half of the 7th century. He was represented at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, by Theodorus of Trimuthus, Stratoniceus of Soli, and Tychon of Citrus. Several of the discourses printed in the collected works of his eminent namesake and predecessor are suspected to be his, as also is a treatise "in Hexameron," which is still in MS. (Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. ed. Harles, ix. 94; iii. 113, 129; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1038, et seq.; EPIPHANIUS (3), Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Lit. ii. 38 B.) [T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (27), bishop of Euchaita in Helenopontus. His name is found both in the subscriptions to the canons of the sixth general council, A.D. 680, and also in those of the "Trullan" or Quinisext synod, A.D. 692. (Mansi, ii. 693, 992; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 543.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (28), bishop of Selymbria (Kastropolis) in Thracia, following Georgius, who was bishop in 692. He took part in the monastic controversy, according to Suidas, and wrote an useful work against the image-burners. (Index Scriptorum, ap. Migne, Patrol. Græc. cxvii. 1258.) [J. de S.]

EPIPHANIUS (29) (THEOPHANIUS), bishop of Silva Candida, not far from Rome, on the Via Aurelia, an episcopal seat combined in later times with Portus. This bishop lived during the pontificate of Zacharias, and was present at the councils held at Rome A.D. 743 and 745. (Mansi, xii. 367, 380; Hefele, § 367; Ughelli, Basis Sacra, i. 91.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (30), bishop of Pervgia, subscribed a letter of pope Paul I. in June 761, to the abbot John about the privileges of the monastery of St. Stephen and St. Silvester in Rome. (Mansi, xii. 649; Jaffé, Regesta Pont. 195.) [A. H. D. A.]

EPIPHANIUS (31), bishop of Miletus, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787, when he signed, not among the Carian bishops, but among the archbishops, as if he claimed the metropolitan chair; whilst Theophylactus, a deacon, signed as locum tenens for the bishop of Icaropolis (Aphrodisias), the proper metropolis of Caria. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 919; Mansi, xii. 1005.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (32), bishop of Perta in Lycania, present at the second Nicene council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1088; Mansi, xii. 998 B.) [L. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (33), bishop of Lappa, in the west of Crete. Present at the council of Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 735; Or. Christ. ii. 268.) [J. de S.]

EPIPHANIUS (34), bishop of Eleutherina, a central Crete, present at the seventh general Council at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 391 and 735; Or. Christ. ii. 270.) [J. de S.]

EPIPHANIUS (35), bishop and martyr in Africa with Donatus and others. Commemorated April 6 (Mart. Hier., Notker); April 7. (Ga.) [T. S. B.]

EPIPHANIUS (36), archdeacon of Alexandria; author of a letter in reply to one received from Maximian, bishop of Constantinople, about the end of 432 or beginning of 433 A.D. The letter is preserved only in a Latin version. After some account of the state of the controversy between St. Cyril and the Nestorians, the writer of the letter says that St. Cyril is vexed because Maximian has not been as zealous as he might be for him, and gives him various directions and suggestions as to services expected of him. He states that letters have been sent by St. Cyril to Pulcheria and other persons attached to the court, and that presents have been sent as well. So many gifts (benedictiones), the writer proceeds, were sent from Alexandria at this time that the clergy complained that the Alexandrian church was stripped naked (nudata), and already owed 1500 pounds of gold besides to Count Hammonius (see appendix, Concil. Baluz. pp. 907-909; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacr. viii. 385; Robertson, Ch. Hist. i. p. 453). [J. W. S.]

EPIPHANIUS (37), presbyter of Constantinople, sent with Memnon and Germanus to summon Eutyches the third time to the Council of Constantinople in 448. Their report was received on the 17th of November. (Mansi, vi. 496 a; Baronius, ad ann. 448, xxxix.) [W. M. S.]

EPIPHANIUS (38), the bearer of letters from the presbyters and archimandrites of Constantinople, A.D. 476, to pope Simplicius, informing him that Basiliscus had restored Timotheus Aelurus to the see of Alexandria (Simpl. Pap. ep. 7, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 43; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 50). Epiphanius seems to have also carried letters to Simplicius, from the patriarch Acacius a few months later (Simpl. ep. 19; Jaffé, u. s.). Ceillier (x. 402) calls Epiphanius a layman; but Simplicius, replying in the letters just cited, styles him "filius" and "diaconus." [T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (39) SCHOLASTICUS, an ecclesiastic about the beginning of the 6th century, A.D. 510, but of whose personal history almost nothing is known to us except that he was the friend of Cassiodorus, the celebrated head of the Monasterium Vivariense. [CASSIODORUS.] He seems to have borne the name Scholasticus, not so much because of any devotion to literature or theology, but in the sense frequently borne by that word in the middle ages, when it was applied to the chaplain, or amanuensis, or general assistant of any dignitary of the church (Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v.). It was in this relationship, in all probability, that Epiphanius stood to his distinguished master, by whom he was summoned to take a part in the great work then engaging his attention, that of urging his monks to classical and sacred studies, and especially to the transcription of manuscripts. The task assigned to Epiphanius was the translation into Latin of the histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. Cassiodorus himself revised the work, corrected its faults of style, abridged it, and arranged it into one continuous history of the church. He then published it for the use of the clergy. The book attained a high reputation. It was known as the Tripartite History; and, along with the translation of Eusebius by Rufinus, it became the manual of church history for the clergy of the West for many centuries. The book is generally published as if Cassiodorus were its author, under the title of Historiae Ecclesiasticae Tripartitae Epitome.

Epiphanius translated several additional works, such as the commentaries of Didymus upon the Proverbs of Solomon and the seven Catholic Epistles, those of Epiphanius, bishop of Cyprus, upon the Canticles, and perhaps others, all of which are said by Cave to have perished. One, however, survives, and may be found in Labbe (Conc. tom. v.), his Codex Encyclicus, a work to which he was also urged by Cassiodorus, and which consists of a collection of synodical letters addressed by different synods to the emperor Leo in defence of the decrees of the council of Chalcedon against Timotheus Aelurus. [TIMOTHEUS AELURUS.] [W. M.]

EPIPHANIUS (40), presbyter in Thessalonica, cir. 520, apparently one of the mission from pope Hormisdas for regulating the disordered affairs of that province, and possibly author of a report which is given in the 67th letter of Hormisdas (Hormisd. Pap. Epist. et Decret. Patrol. Lat. lxxiii. 481). [W. M. S.]

EPIPHANIUS (41), deacon, to whom Licinian bishop of Cartagena and Severus bishop of Malaga, cir. A.D. 581, addressed a letter on the incorporeal nature of angels, and of the human soul (Gams, Kirchengesch. ii. 1, 53; Esp. Sigr. v. Append. 4, p. 426). [M. A. W.]

EPIPHANIUS (42), abbat of St. Remigius at Rheims, by whose evidence mainly Aegidius bishop of Rheims was convicted of treason against king Childebert II., A.D. 590. Epiphanius was himself deprived of his abbacy about the same time. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 19). [T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (43), subdeacon of Rome, commissioned by pope Gregory I. to associate himself with Scholasticus, the "judex Companiae," in investigating an outrage perpetrated at Naples upon Paulus bishop of Nepesina. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. iii. ind. ix. epp. 1, 2, A.D. 592, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 603, 604; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 102). [T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (44), presbyter in Sardinia, accused of serious crimes. Gregory the Great, writing to Sabinus, Defensor of Sardinia, orders him to be sent to Rome. Writing later to Januarius bishop of Cagliari, Gregory sends him back, and declares him innocent. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iii. indict. xi. Ep. 36; lib. iv. indict. xii. Ep. 27; Migne, lxxvii. 632, 697.) [A. H. D. A.]

EPIPHANIUS (45), lector of Caralis (Cagliari) in Sardinia, who bequeathed money to found a monastery in that town. Januarius the bishop objected to the house selected for the purpose, as it adjoined a monastery of "ancillae Dei," and pope Gregory, to whom the decision was referred, directed either that the females should remove into another house, or that the foundation willed by Epiphanius should take effect in an untenanted monastery outside the city. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xi. ind. iv. ep. 25, Nov. 600; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 141). [T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (46), archpresbyter of Caralis (Cagliari) in Sardinia, present as a witness at Rome in Oct. 598 (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 7; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 646; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 126). In a subsequent letter of Gregory (lib. xiv. ind. vii. ep. 27, Sept. 603, he is called oeconomus of the church of Caralis, and Vitalis the defensor is charged to see that he takes proper care of the Xenodochia, which had been greatly neglected in consequence of the age and ill-health of Januarius the bishop of Caralis. [T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (47), ordained deacon by pope Gregory I. [ELIAS (39).]

EPIPHANIUS (48), deacon, who with Theodore bishop of Catania was ordered by the governor to accompany the envoy of the patriarch Tarasius to the pope Adrian in 785. At the Council of Nicaea in 787 he was the representative of the archbishop of Sardinia. He pronounced a panegyric, which is contained in the synodal acts of the Council, on the council itself, on Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, on the empress, whom he compared to St. Helena, on the emperor, and on the town of Nicaea, already famous for the council held there against Arius. (Mansi, xii. 1076; xiii. 442; Hefele, § 345, § 357; Ceillier, xiii. 630; Patr. Graec. xcviii. 1313-1332, from Mansi). [A. H. D. A.]

EPIPHANIUS (49), an archimandrite of Constantinople sent by Theodorus Studites, when he was exiled and in prison, to implore the aid of Leo III. bishop of Rome, A.D. 809. (Theod. Studit. Ep. i. 33.) He was kindly received by the pope, and when he returned brought letters from him to Theodore. Epiphanius was also sent by Theodore to Paschal I., A.D. 818, when the Studite was once more an exile and a prisoner. Theodore addresses him as "great Epiphanes," and with a play on his name bids him "manifest himself a faithful messenger." Paschal also received him kindly, and on his return he again brought with him letters of sympathy and encouragement for Theodore. (Baronius, Annal. a. a. 818, ix). [T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (50), a Sophist, friend of Apollinaris. [APOLLINARIS THE ELDER; EPIPHANIUS (10) in Dict. G. and R. Biog.]

EPIPHANIUS (51), a young man challenged by Gregory Nazianzen in a playful letter to contest of friendship in the form of an epistolary correspondence. (Greg. Naz. Ep. 239, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 381). [T. W. D.]

EPIPHANIUS (52), tribune, carried a letter Ep. 44, among the letters of Leo, dated October 13, 449, from pope Leo I. to the emperor Theodosius (Leo. Mag. Ep. 54, 956, Migne) and letter, Ep. 50, dated Oct. 15, 449, from Leo to the clergy and laity of Constantinople (cf. Mansi, lxi. 976). [C. G.]

EPIPHANIUS (53), a person in Sardinia who left the income of his property to Matrona his wife, for the support of a monastery in the house of her mother Pomponiana. Vitalis, the defensor of the Roman church in Sardinia, and bishop Januarius, were charged between them with diverting this property both from Matrona and the monastery, A.D. 603. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xiv. ind. vii. ep. 2 in Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1305). [C. H.]

sople, who was active in the prosecution of Maximus the Confessor, for his opposition to Nestorianism, towards the commencement of the latter half of the 7th century [MAXIMUS, CONFESSOR, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biogr. ii. 968, et seq.] At first, he appears to have been inclined to treat the Confessor with some consideration, but afterwards he allowed himself to indulge in very strong and abusive language, which he followed up by harsh and cruel treatment of him (Maximi Opp. in Migne, Patr. Gr. x. 114, 120, 162, 165, 166; Fleury, H. E. lxxxix. 12-20). [T. W. D.]

EPIPODIUS (1), one of the martyrs of Lyons. When the persecution had commenced, he retired, together with his friend Alexander, to a villa in the neighbourhood of Lyons, where they remained in safety for a considerable time, owing to the watchful care of a widow named Lucia. At length, however, they were discovered, brought before the governor, and Epipodius, after having been tortured, was put to death, A.D. 178. He is commemorated Ap. 22. (Mart. Hier., Ad., Ja.; Serius, Ap. ii. 22 and 24; Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. cap. 64; Baron. Annal. 179. 36.) [T. S. B.]

EPIPODIUS (2), ST., appears in the Catalogue as ninth bishop of Le Puy, between St. Sotarius and St. Suscius, before the year 451. (Gall. Christ. ii. 689.) [S. A. B.]

EPISEMON. The word ἐπισήμων is included in this dictionary, being strangely absent from Greek lexicons, ancient and modern, in the case in which it occurs in ecclesiastical writers. The Gnostic MARCUS laid much stress on the mysteries derived from names by calculating the numerical values of their letters. In the account of his system given by Irenaeus (I. xiv. p. 63 sq.), copied by Hippolytus (Ref. vi. 45) and by Epiphanius (Haer. 34), τὸ ἐπισήμων is repeatedly used to denote the numerical character for six; the number 6 is ὁ ἐπισήμων ἑξήκως; the six-lettered name Ἰησοῦς is τὸ ἑξήκως ἑξήκως, &c., language perplexing to the old Latin translator, who renders the word by "inigma." A similar use of the word is found in Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. 16, p. 812); but this cannot be called a quite independent illustration, for on comparison of the sections just cited from Clement and from Irenaeus the coincidences are found to be such as to put it beyond doubt that Clement, in his account of the mysteries of the number 6, makes unacknowledged use of the same writings of Marcus as were employed by Irenaeus. Eusebius (Unvers. ed. Maria. Mai, Nov. Pat. Bib. iv. 299), copied by Jerome or Pseudo-Jerome (Brev. in Paul. vii. 198, ed. Vallara.), suggests, as a way of reconciling the difference between the evangelists as to whether our Lord suffered at the third or the sixth hour, that a transcriber's error may have arisen from the likeness of Gamma and the Episeimon, i.e. apparently Γ and Ε.

The source whence all modern writers have learned their use of the word episeimon is Scaliger's essay on the origin of the Ionic letters (Animadv. in Chron. Euseb. p. 110). He there (p. 116) quotes as from Bede, de Indigitamentis (but we have not been able to verify the reference), a statement of an old grammarian, who, having mentioned that the Greeks denote numbers by letters, and for this purpose join to the letters of their alphabet three other characters, goes on as follows:—"Prima est ς quae dicitur Episimon et est nota numeri VI.; secunda est Γ quae vocatur kophe et valet in numero XC.; tertia est Ϸ quae dicitur enneacosia quia valent DCCCC." Here, as well as in the preceding passages, episeimon is used with special reference to the character for six; but Scaliger turns into Greek the phrase "nota numeri VI." τὸ ἐπισήμων τοῦ ς ἀριθμοῦ, and seems to have inferred that the marks for the numbers 90 and 900 had equal rights to the same title; and he also gives the name Episeimon to each of the six Phoenician letters said not to have been received by the Ionians, saying, for instance, that the letter ἦρα was originally an episeimon, and distinguishing between the episeimon of the number 6 and the digamma or episeimon of Van. He does not name his authority for this way of speaking, and we have not been able to find any; nor do we know that the character which was by some called βαῦ, and by others τὸ ἐπισήμων, was ever called by any one before Scaliger by the combination ἐπισήμων βαῦ. However this may be, Scaliger has been followed by all who have written on the subject since his time.

The true account of these three characters seems to be that though the Phoenicians themselves did not use the letters of their alphabet for purposes of numeration, the Greeks, who derived their alphabet from them, did so in the 5th century before Christ; that their alphabet then still contained two of the Phoenician letters which in the next century were disused, viz., βαῦ in the sixth place, and κώρρα, the Roman Q, coming after π; that these letters then took their natural place in the system of numeration, which was afterwards made complete by the addition, at the end of the letters of the alphabet, of another character to denote 900, which from its shape was at a considerably later period called σαρρι (Hankel, Geschichte der Mathematik, p. 34; Kirchhoff, Studien zur Geschichte des gr. Alphab.). The character for six had not come to be identified with the abbreviation for σ in the time of Marcus, as known through Hippolytus. In calculating the numerical value of χριστός he counts the σ and τ separately; and it is to be noted that he calls the former ς Sigma, and the latter Σα. It is possible that Marcus expressly identified his episeimon with the digamma, for though in Irenaeus, p. 71, line 9; p. 72, line 7, the reading is undoubtedly δὲ πλὴ γράμματα, the context gives probability to Dr. Hort's conjecture that Marcus wrote γάμματα. He says that this number added to the number of the twenty-four letters makes thirty. Now the double letters are already included in the twenty-four, but the Digamma stands outside the alphabet, and therefore its number might properly be added to that of the letters.

With regard to the properties of the number 6, Marcus and Clement were in part indebted to Philo, who explains (De Op. Mund. 3) that it is the first perfect number, i.e., according to Euclid's definition, one equal to the sum of the numbers 1, 2, 3 which divide it without remainder (Aug. de Civ. Dei, xi. 30), the second such number being 28,* which is the sum of its divisors 1, 2, 4, 7, 14 (Orig. t. 28 in S. Joann.); that being 2×8 it arises from the marriage of a male and female, i.e., odd and even number; that there are six directions of motion, forward, backward, right, left, up, down; &c. Marcus observed that not only was the world made in six days, but in the new dispensation our Lord after six days went up to the Mount of Transfiguration; that there, by the appearance of Moses and Elias, the number of His company became six; that He suffered at the sixth hour of the sixth day of the week; and thence concludes that this number has the power not only of production, but of regeneration. As seven is the number of the heavens, and eight is the super-celestial ogdoad, so six denotes the material creation (see also Heracleon, Orig. iv. 221); and, in particular, the material body through which the Saviour revealed Himself to men's senses, and conveyed to them that enlightenment of their ignorance in which redemption consisted. Clement, if not Marcus, finds the Saviour's higher nature represented by the episemon, which is not taken into account by one who looks merely at the order of the letters in the alphabet, but reveals itself in the system of numeration.

Irenaeus points out that the mysteries of Marcus all depend on the employment of the modern form of the Greek alphabet, and that they disappear when a Semitic alphabet is used. He shews also (ii. 24) that it is possible to say as fine things about the properties of the number 5 as about those of the numbers which are glorified by Marcus. [G. S.]

EPISTEME, martyr. [GALACTEON.]

EPISTLE TO DIOGNETUS. The Greek text known by this name has been known only since its publication in the year 1592 by Henricus Stephanus, in whose handwriting it is extant at Leyden (MS. Voss Q 30), as taken both by him and by Beurer, whose transcript is lost, from a single faded exemplar, the same which (as Gebhardt has shewn) was collated latterly by Cunitz at Strasburg, where it perished in 1870. In this codex the text given under the heading To Diognetus was broken into three fragments by two clear breaks with marginal notes from the old scribe in Greek penmanship of the 13th century, saying, "Thus I found a break in the copy before me also, it being very ancient," and "Here, too, the copyist had a break." No other copy of any portion has yet been found.

The author of the discourse directed To Diognetus is thus known to us only through a single mediaeval transcription of a very ancient and defective original, and is reported through this solitary channel of our knowledge to be "The same" as the author of a preceding oration To Greeks, preserved only by the same transcriber, and of some other previous work which bore his name in the title. No reason has ever been shewn for doubting this tradition taken by itself; but the mediaeval transcriber had no more such unique treasures to offer, and the place at the head of the series was usurped by the tailpiece of the series that preceded. For the codex contained in the same old hand, 1st, two pieces, each of "the holy Justin, philosopher and martyr," demonstrating the divine monarchy and admonishing Greeks; 2nd, a discourse of a man said to be "Justin, philosopher and martyr" expounding the faith Concerning Trinity; 3rd, the two discourses of the man said to be the same, To Greeks and To Diognetus; and lastly, after a few pages left blank and filled in by a later hand; 4th, "Athenagoras On Behalf of Christians," and "the same On Resurrection." Thus the pleader with Greeks and with Diognetus seemed to be identified with the ambiguous person of the Expositor said to be Justin, and so was ushered before the world by Stephanus as none other than JUSTIN himself.

In the discourses To Greeks and To Diognetus the author never says who he is, except that To Greeks, he begins: "Think not, men and Greeks that my secession from your customs was unreasonable or injudicious, for I found nothing right nor pious in them," which is as much as to say that he is 'the same' as had made some public refusal any longer to conform to Hellenism; but he proceeds with a review of Greek mythology without giving any more personal details till the closing appeal, "Come, be instructed, be as I am, for I was as ye are;" and when, just after, we find an applicant for instruction addressed in a fresh discourse: "Since I see thee, most noble Diognetus, much at pains to learn the religion of the Christians and so on, it is natural to be told that the speaker is the same again. In this latter discourse, the speaker says nothing of himself, but the piece seems to be the sequel to the preceding. It is not really an epistle.

Thus the direct assertion that the writer Diognetus is Justin, not being a pretension of his own, dates only from Stephanus; but the tradition on which the assertion is supported much earlier, and consists of three links, as to be annulled by the failure of any one of them. The first statement that Justin wrote the Exposition is now believed untrue, and the second that the same man wrote To Greeks fits with it, but may be due to accidental error, and in that case the third statement remains itself, as in no way invalidated by the failure of the other two. The pieces whose author is called merely 'The same,' 'The same,' may have been taken from a torn copy with a piece missing at the beginning, and have been copied with the same headings in immediate juxtaposition to the works of Justin, as they were afterwards again copied by Stephanus and bound up next a work of Amphilochius. The tradition that Justin wrote two pieces To Greeks is no tradition that he wrote this piece, as well as one extant in his name, and the tradition, as it is, that this piece is by the author of the Exposition is hardly an authentic tradition if it is by Justin. The traditional writer Diognetus is therefore not Justin, but a certain writer To Greeks, whom there is no traditional authority for identifying with Justin.

He is now found, as had been suspected, to be somebody quite different. For among the coveries published by Cureton in his Spicilegium Syriacum, from a 6th or 7th century Syriac

* It is curious that the Zoroastrian system counts as springing from Ormuzd first six Amshaspands, then twenty-eight Ineds. (Mansel, Gnostic Heresies, p. 26.)

(Add. 14,658 in the British Museum), is a version of what appears to be another set of notes or Hypomnemata of the same discourse To Greeks, which is there ascribed to one "AMBROSIOUS, a chief man of Greece, who became a Christian, and all his fellow councillors raised a clamour against him," and this was his Reply, Cureton's English rendering of the Syriac and Otto's recension of the Greek are collated on pp. 61-69 of the Spicilegium Syriacum, and the two reports are plainly reports of the same discourse.

Thus the only tradition respecting the writer To Diognetus is that he is the same as a certain writer To Greeks, concerning whom there is no further tradition, except that he is clearly the same as one concerning whom the only tradition is that he is a certain Ambrosius.

It is natural enough from facts otherwise known to us to find an Ambrosius addressing a Diognetus. Common as the name was in the old Greek world, the only Diognetus known to us in times after Christ was a painting master, who, about the year 133, had charge of the boyhood of a young noble, and led his little pupil, even through his failures in art, to turn from dilettante ways, cockfighting, and belief in charms, to give ear to people who spoke out their mind, and to attend the lectures of philosophers and begin writing dialogues, and to sleep on a hard bed, and live with Attic simplicity, for which lessons the youngster recorded his thanks, and probably gave substantial expression to his gratitude, when he had grown to manhood as the emperor Marcus Aurelius. Greek names became Roman surnames, and were transmitted from generation to generation, and those who received the Roman franchise not seldom took the gentile name of the reigning house. So, looking back from Aurelius Ambrosius, the royal defender of British Christianity against the Saxons, and from the senatorial archbishop of Milan with his sister Marcellina, sprung of illustrious martyr lineage, to the Ambrosius and Marcella of high station in the palace, encouraged to confession by Origen in the usurper Maximian's persecution in A.D. 236, and led into the church by the same father, probably at Athens in A.D. 229, from some Valentinian, Marcionitish, or Sabellian heresy, we seem pointed to some yet earlier Christian progenitor converted from actual heathendom, and to a first rise of the Ambrosian family of the gens Aurelia from a Grecian magnate of the age of the Antonines (cf. De Rossi, Roma Sotterranea, ii. 23). It is natural enough, therefore, to be told that such an Ambrose became a Christian on the days when persecution still came in outbreaks of local clamour rather than in imperial onslaughts interrupting a guaranteed repose, before the sanction of Christianity by Alexander Severus, and before the commencement of imperial connivance at Christians in high places under Commodus. It is natural to find such a convert at such a time following up his conversion by three discourses, the second addressed To Greeks, the third To Diognetus, and so taking his place beside MELITO, TATIAN, and THEOPHILUS, between Justin and ATHENAGORAS, among the APOLOGISTS of persecuted Christianity.

The characteristics of the pieces brought to light by Stephanus are in accordance with the tradition of identity of authorship. Alike vindicating the good sense of secession from Hellenism, whether on his own behalf in reply To Greeks or on behalf of Christians in response To Diognetus, the author speaks after the same fashion in the latter case as in the former; forcibly presenting facts, powerfully mingling indignation with contempt, abounding in telling antitheses, or expanding a single striking image, or rising into a lofty hymn, but ever in the same Attic diction with the same Roman dignity. He shews the same temper that was too sociable (Ad Graecos 1) to follow Plato in taking Homer's wild chiefs for patterns of self-mastery, too rational (ib. 2) to believe with Hesiod in potentates not righteous fostering righteousness, too lively and too orderly (ib. 3) to revere creatures like Hercules who on tragic shewing could not keep their first estate, too earnest (ib. 4) to be amused with the follies of his neighbours at the panegyric festivals. He exhibits the same change of mood (ib. 5) from the scornful vigour of the satirist to the joyous sweetness of the evangelist in turning to do homage to the discipline that trained men to more than mortal courage and to surrender himself to the strong charm of the Divine Word. He pursues the same method of teaching others (as he had himself been made to learn) by first shewing them their own folly, then pointing to the wisdom from on high; first bidding the Greek look at his manufactured gods (Ad Diogn. 2), and convicting the Jews of vain oblations (ib. 3) and ungrateful service (ib. 4) to the Giver of all to all; then (ib. 5) portraying the wondrous life of Christians, at home yet strangers everywhere, like (ib. 6) the soul in the body of the world, and so (ib. 7) passing from the earthly things to the heavenly to tell how it was God who implanted the Word by the mission of the Maker of all things, sent as an imperial Son, in love, to be sent again as Judge.

In the next fragment the same method is pursued, as the author, resuming (c. 7) in the middle of a sentence with pointing to martyrdoms as perpetual signs, not of the return, but of the presence of the Lord, passes (c. 8) to contrast the pretentious follies of philosophy, especially of the stoical worship of the fire everlasting, with the clear assurance wrought by the Father revealing Himself to faith. In explaining the delay of the revelation the author silently shews the method that he follows to be itself divine, on the model of Him who waited to shew forth what He had prepared from the beginning (c. 8) till iniquity was made manifest, then (c. 9), when the time came, took our sins (Is. liii. 4), gave His own Son for us, would have us trust Him, and so (c. 10) learn to know Him, and to rejoice in Him, and to be like Him.

Thus far, then, from the beginning of the Reply To Greeks the author appears and reappears in the same likeness as an accomplished orator and man of the world, nobly bred and responsible to his peers, still keeping all his wits about him on the unworldly quest of a wisdom not offered by the art of the rhetoricians, nor supplied by the ideals of the poets, nor to be hoped from the debates of the philosophers, nor to be found but in the heroes of the King incorruptible, nor to be learnt except from the Divine Word, and when found and when learnt to be offered to all who will come to it to share. He repeats the same succession of echoes, first of psalmist and prophet in their warnings, not their predictions (Ad Gr. 4, Ia. i. 14; ib. 5, Ps. ii. 10, lviii. 5; Ad Diogn. 2, Ps. cxv. 8; ib. 7, Mal. iii. 2); then of the simplicity of the Galilean teaching (Ad Gr. 5, Jas. iii. 17, Lu. xv. 18; Ad Diogn. 4, Matt. xii. 13; ib. 6, Matt. v. 44); then of the summons to submit to a new order heralded by Paul (Ad Gr. 5, 1 Tim. i. 17, Heb. iv. 12, Gal. iv. 12, v. 21; Ad Diogn. 4, Gal. iv. 10; ib. 5, Rom. viii. 12, 1 Cor. iv. 10, 2 Cor. vi. 9, x. 3, Phil. iii. 18; ib. 6, Eph. v. 29; ib. 7, Heb. xi. 10); then of the new commandment that was from the beginning as recorded by John (Ad Diogn. 6, John xvii. 16; ib. 7, Jn. iii. 17, v. 22). He shews the same liberal culture, as of one who had made the history of the Greek mind the story of his own, and the same plain independence of tone, as of one who had sworn fealty to no human dogmatist, and the same manly adhesion to that which he has now discovered to be the law of his being. And the same ingenuous desire to establish not immunity for his creed but community of belief in it, and the same vigilant and reverent caution in not choosing to give holy things to dogs till they have been brought to hunger for the crumbs of the Master's table. He never even says expressly that he is a Christian himself.

The connexion of the various portions of the treasure-trove of Stephanus, one with another and especially of the last appended fragment with the discourse to Diognetus remains to be considered. We shall distinguish the answers To Greeks and To Diognetus, no longer as orations and epistles, but as Reply and Responses. The author's peculiar position, as through study of the apostolic writings directly and immediately "a disciple of apostles" becoming in turn "a teacher of Gentiles," whether of Greeks at large or of a single inquirer like Diognetus in particular, is avowed after the second break. But in this concluding fragment, where the author is excusing himself for frank communication of Christian mysteries to Gentiles, a change of style is soon discernible. It is no longer a pleading of Greek with Greek, but the voice of a steward of the ancient revelation among his disciples, promising Paradise to the upright, but warning a new-comer that knowledge must not be parted from life, and that no serpent may touch the fruits. Even as he silences the scruples of the believers he passes on to unfold such depths of doctrine as seemed to Stephanus far too profound for the ears of Diognetus. Hence both Stephanus and nearly all the critics of the first quarter of a century take this whole section for an accidental accretion. As either of the gaps might represent a chasm in which the commencement of a fresh piece had dropt out, the question whether the appended peroration be proper to the body of the discourse is to be decided on internal evidence only, and therefore, before approaching it, it is needful to have a clear and just conception of the writer to Diognetus himself, and of the scope of his discourse. Now Stephanus is already found guilty of giving rise to four several misconceptions of the preceding discourse. If the writing were Justin's, if it belonged to any of the authors supplied by conjecture, if it were an epistle, if it were up to this point continuous, it would be impossible to suppose the peroration really to belong to it. Stephanus directly ascribed it to Justin, prefixed it to the oration To Greeks, distinguished it as an epistle, and omitted to print it as fragmentary. The two pieces, To Greeks and To Diognetus, being once disjoined from their true order, so obviously belonged to different classes of writing that they have never again been so much as printed side by side, and though they have been denied to Justin on precisely similar grounds, yet nobody seems to have thought of comparing them together till just the other day. Thus the writer to Diognetus has been set down to the first century, and supposed Apollos, or at least regarded as an apostolic father and referred to the reign of Trajan, or again he has been assigned to some school of thought, real or imaginary, that was antagonistic to Justin, in a supposed division of the early church between Judaizers and Hellenizers; but only in his capacity of writer to Diognetus, not as writer to Greeks. On all these hypotheses it has been found difficult or impossible to credit him with the entire Peroration, whereas the sober criticism of Dorner was able to point to the Peroration as the keynote of the whole. However, the early date assigned to the whole by Dorner (who supposed it prior to Justin) is rejected for the body of the discourse by the most recent German verdicts, but is still more difficult to accept in the case of the Peroration, and has never even been suggested for the oration To Greeks. Again, it has been argued that the Peroration could not form part of a first lesson in Christianity, but if the Response be the sequel to the Reply To Greeks, and that to a preceding refusal of conformity, the lesson was really not the first but the third. Again, the Peroration is manifestly not the conclusion of an epistle, but of a homily before the catechumens departed, and there is no reason whatever against accepting the previous discourse as such. Again, the piece has never been printed as three fragments, the second fragment so obviously belonged to the author of the first, and yet the former gap is presumably as important as the latter.

We claim, then, to have presented on ancient authority a view of the writing To Diognetus which is (strange to say) novel in modern times though really the oldest accessible, and thus we are entitled to demand a reconsideration of the current opinion regarding the connexion of the Peroration with the rest. For we have shewn grounds for believing that we have a complete discourse of the same author for comparison with this discourse, which is incomplete, to assist us in determining what kind of completion might have been expected for it. We no more intend to deny the strong contrast between the peroration and the body of the Response than we intend to ignore the contrast between the Response and the Reply. Yet, in the Response and the Reply, however dissimilar, judicious critics have discovered the same absence of anything unsuited to the age of Justin or incompatible with the general tenor of his teaching, and the same presence of a magnificent eloquence, superior sustained power to any effort ascribed to Justin excepting only the splendid triplet of excerpts from the Resurrection preserved by Damascen, as superior even to that in mellow richness. It is been on similar grounds that the Peroration is been denied to Justin also. Now, we have suggested that the Reply and Response, so similar yet so dissimilar, belong not only to the same author, but to the same argument. The resemblance between them is shewn by the recurrence in each, not only of the same style, but of the same two successive contrasted styles, and an author who has two styles may have three. The change of style in each piece is necessitated by the progress of the argument, and the contrast between the two pieces themselves is due to their difference of standpoint and of object. Having denounced worldlings and their rhetoric in renouncing the world, he replies upon the bigots with a review of their poetry, and then offers to introduce a desirous and candid inquirer to a better school than was to be found among the hypocrites with their philosophies. Thus, in the second discourse he is able to begin to take religious ground, but he is not yet able to withdraw his own person into the background, and so with a dignified reserve, quite unlike Justin's naive frankness, he gives a review of his own past error and tests false religion by its incompatibility with common human morality. But in the third discourse he prays that speech may be given him, and then that the Speaker may not be grieved (Eph. iv. 30), and throughout he strives to awaken the sense that it is possible to sin not only against self or against a neighbour, but against God, and that redemption is needed not only for the soul but for the world.

Thus, the Reply To Greeks alone might have left us in doubt whether the author were a Christian or a Gnostic; but in the Response To Diognetus he shews himself manifestly catholic, he reveals his delight in the beneficence displayed in creation, his admiration for the unworldliness of a simple, unpretentious, Christlike life, his reverence for the Son as author, not only of salvation, but of all harmony. There is nothing Marcionitish in the Reply, but in the Response every word uttered against Judaism tells against Marcion with equal force. In the Reply at the last he speaks of the Maker of the soul; but it is in the Response that he begins to speak with reverence of the God of the Jews, the Maker of the world. In the Reply he speaks of a Divine Word; but in the Response he shews that with him the Divine Word is the gospel of Christ, and though at first he merely opposes Christianity and Judaism, he says that God alone can reveal Himself, and yet that the Jews thought rightly of Him, and so he shews quite plainly that he regarded the old revelation as divine, and we might expect to find him saying so at last. Thus, again, though in the Reply he tells his own story, and in the Response he almost withdraws himself from view, he manifests more of himself in the Response than in the Reply. For in the Reply he is engaged on the common task of refuting Hellenism, in the Response he gives himself to his proper task of proving Christianity to be ordained the only possible substitute. But all the doctrines which are first brought to light in the Response belong to him as he sketches himself in the Reply. In shewing the possibility of sin against God, he appears the same man who could find nothing higher to adore than such virtues as may be human, who was, like the Hebrew prophets, unlike the Platonist Justin, led to abhor idolatry by the very anthropomorphism of his theology. In discovering his catholicity he shews himself to be the same man who unlike Marcion was quite averse to asceticism, and yet was not repelled, but attracted by discipline. He shews himself in the latter piece, as in the former, to be opposed to that philosophizing tendency in the church of which Justin and Marcion were themselves opposite representatives.

Now as the earlier piece changed in style when its work was accomplished, and a fresh standpoint was reached, so we might expect it to be with the latter. Moreover, we perceive that Diognetus was not now receiving his first lesson in Christianity, but his third. He had been carried along with the speaker in his renunciation of the ways of the Greek world and in his reply to Greeks. It was important that he should hold back no longer.

"If any chose to come to me," says Justin, speaking of his abode at the Christian meeting-house (Acta 3), "I imparted to him the words of truth." The great danger of the Christians in the reign of Marcus was that they could not celebrate the Eucharist in the presence of unbelievers. If a great man found his way into a Christian meeting, it must have been hard to induce him to withdraw with the catechumens. Now the Peroration is manifestly the conclusion of a homily before the withdrawal of the catechumens, and if Diognetus himself had shewn his desire for instruction by coming as men came to Justin, the whole discourse may have been delivered before just such an audience as is addressed in the Peroration at the close. Thus the author's refusal of conformity, Reply to Greeks and Response to Diognetus would be three successive utterances each growing out of the other, and each a brave act, as well as a solid work, though each successive act was less memorable, and each successive work more valuable.

The first question of Diognetus starts from the point to which he had been led in the previous discourse. He asks, "On what God relying and how worshipping, Christians all look above the universe itself and despise death, and neither reckon those gods who are so accounted by the Greeks, nor observe any superstition of Jews." He is answered that the reasons for non-compliance with Hellenism or Judaism are obvious, but the Christians' God is the one God of the Jews, and their religion consists of purity and charity, and was founded by the mission of the Son, whom God will send again. The answer probably continued after this fashion. An end of all things is the doctrine of your Greek sages, but the Jews looked for a perpetual earthly kingdom, and when Christ proclaimed a kingdom not of this world they killed Him. Yet (he resumes) you see He is not dead, and Christian worship is not to deny Him.

Thus far, then, Christianity has been vindicated as a sect, and as such has been vindicated completely. Diognetus had been before convinced that it was a thing religious and heroic, not quite unnatural, and perhaps not quite unphilosophical, but he had been offended by the seeming impertinence of Christian nonconformity, and he is now made to see that this is a proof not of contumacy, but of loyalty. Far from being clandestine enemies to society, they live openly and mingle freely with others, and only escape notice because they are peaceable good citizens, while the doings for which they are condemned are confessedly unknown, for their worship remains unseen. This passive submission to persecution does not make them less active as patriotic citizens. Even their close union and their recent origin are shewn to be no grounds for suspecting them, for they love all men, and their Founder was not man but God. Christian miracle is shewn to be conformable to the law of nature.

The second question of Diognetus is still unanswered. It yet remains to say, "What the kindly affection is that they have one for another." So the author passes to vindicate Christianity as a doctrine, as that question touched the inmost springs of Christian life. Christian love is indeed supernatural, as it comes from belonging to the family of God the Father. Now, having shewn Christianity to be superior to natural religion, and to Judaism, it remains to notice philosophy as a last refuge of lies, and to shew that it is the philosophers who are the charlatans and their disciples who are the dupes, while Christian love is just the natural expression of the knowledge that comes of Christian faith.

Thus having named the Lord of Christians, he goes on to speak of faith, revelation, the Saviour, a ransom, the Servant of God, the Only Begotten, &c., all which Christian notions were absent from the former part of the discourse. In the tenth chapter a fresh section seems to commence with the fruits of faith, first of all in the Father; but before he has gone any further into the Christian creed the piece is broken off. But the author has shewn that as his sect is not Marcionitish but Catholic, so his doctrine is not Sabellian but orthodox. For if in the Reply to Greeks he spoke of God and the Divine Word and the piercing power of the Word, as each personal, without setting them forth as a triad, and if in the first fragment of the response he described God as doing all the works in the Son, and thus shewed his deep sense of the unity of the Godhead, he here again sets forth the everlasting communion of the Divine Persons, as God shared His counsel with His Servant (wa's) from the beginning.

The third question asked by Diognetus was "What, in short, this new race or practice might be that has invaded society now and no earlier?" This question was the sum of the other two, and in answering the other two completely it would be answered with them. But the answer would not be complete and catholic and orthodox, till it had been carried further than merely saying that "it was God who implanted the Word," or that He did so "when the time came." "The Word that appeared new" must have been "found old," and this is the answer given in the third fragment. Again we are led into quite a new region, but the course is still straightforward, and the guide is still the same. The style is not really different, except as far as a difference is necessitated by the difference of subject. There is the same anarthrous use of nouns; there is the same accumulation of clause on clause, not pursued too far; there are the same unexpected turns at the close of the sentences. There is the same union of dignity with sweetness; there is the same blending of Pauline and Johannine teaching; there is the same persistent subordination of doctrine to life. To the last the writer never uses the word Spirit. If "the fear of the law is chanted," and "the grace of prophets is known," so it was before. We say without any hesitation that no other termination was probable from that author to that discourse than that which we find actually appended to it, and again that the peroration itself must have belonged to some such discourse as that to which it is found appended.

The frank unfolding of doctrine is justified by the example of the Word who was believed among Gentiles. "This is He that is from the beginning, who appeared new and is found old, and is always young in hearts of saints being engendered. This is He that is ever reckoned a Son to-day." At His bidding in presence of His Grace, which rejoices and may be grieved, the man is stirred to speak with pain, out of love. But those who love rightly become a paradise yielding all manner of fruits. Knowledge and life grow side by side, for the knowledge that (as the apostle says puffs up), is knowledge pursued apart from the bidding of truth unto life. "Let thy heart be knowledge, and life, the true Word entertained. Whose tree if thou bearest and fruit if thou chooseth, thou shalt eat those things that with God are desired, which the serpent toucheth not, neither doth error approach, nor is Eve corrupted, but a virgin is trusted, and a salvation is shewn, and apostles are made intelligible, and the Lord's passover cometh forth, and wax is brought together and is fitted up in order, and teaching saints the Word is gladdened, through Whom the Father is glorified, to Whom be glory world without end." We have adopted Beurer's interpretation of the phrase κηροὶ συνάγονται καὶ μετὰ κόσμου ἀρμόζεται. Compare Virg. Georg. iv. 57, "Excudunt ceras." Stephanus renders "wax tapers"—the usual sense of the word. Sylburg conjectures καίροι; Maranus, χεροὶ; Lachmann, πηροὶ; Bunsen, κληροὶ.

It is worth while comparing with this whole Peroration a homily ascribed in the MSS. to Cyril of Jerusalem on the feast of the Hypapante, or Presentation in the Temple, where Christians are told to bring their tapers to the true light (Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxiii. col. 1187). This discourse has been denied to Cyril, because its style is contrasted with the style of his catechetical homilies much in the same way in which the style of this Peroration is contrasted with the style of the preceding discourse, and also because the observance of the Hypapante and the ritual use of wax lights have both been supposed later than Cyril's time. The occasion, however, of Cyril's discourse was the Hypapante on the day before the Epiphany, the old manner of observing the feast, which we find noted in the Feilire of Aengus and in the Hieronymian Martyrology. Thus the meeting of Christ by Simeon the day before His manifestation to the Magi, and the meeting of the Lamb of God by Nathanael the day before the manifestation of His glory at Cana, were made typical of the meeting of the Lord in the air by the church before His manifestation to the world. This manner of observing the feast may very well be as ancient as the 2nd century, and be the occasion of the present discourse. At that time wax lights were neces-early used in the underground services, and as a matter of course were filled with mystical meanings.

The epochs to which we should assign the whole group of writings may be determined with great probability, not with absolute certainty, except that, if genuine, they cannot be Post-Nicene. The picture of the church presented to Diognetus, and the account given of the life of Ambrosius, pretty plainly belong to a date earlier than the accession of Commodus. The chief school of Christian thought would seem still to be at Athens, though on the eve of its transference to Alexandria by Athenagoras.

In the reign of Marcus it was death either to confess Christianity, or to accuse another of being a Christian. Hence Ambrose is arraigned, not for Christianity, but for abstinence from Grecian rites. Yet he defends himself, not for atheism, but for fanaticism. The charge of atheism had been exploded by Justin: it revived in A.D. 177 as a fresh charge of atheistic priest-worship, to be refuted by Athenagoras.

It is among the writings of Tatian, Melito, and Theophilus and the fragments of Apollinaris, Abercius, &c., that these pieces seem most at home. The writer seems to appear in his freshness beside Justin in his ripeness, and to be the meeting-point of the teachings of Justin and Marcion, as he is at the point of departure of Irenaeus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, and Origen on the one hand, and Praxeas, Noetus, and Sabellius on the other.

It is worth noticing that the Ambrose of the 3rd century was accused of Marcionism and Sabellianism, and that the writer to Diognetus has been taken for Marcion himself, while the peroration furnished a model for a Sabellian formula found in an inscription at Rome, "Qui filius diceris et pater inveniris" (De Rossi, Bullettino, 1866, pp. 86, 95). The words, "This is he that is ever reckoned a Son to-day," seem to furnish the germ both of Hippolytus' doctrine of the fresh birth of the Virgin's Son in every believer, and of Origen's doctrine of the eternal generation of the Son of God. In the second fragment we find two phrases unwarranted by scripture, which seem to be derived from reminiscences of heathen poetry. The "wrathless" God gave His Son, "the deathless for the dying." The doctrine of Irenaeus that "violence appertaineth not to God" is anticipated in this piece.

Lost in the crowd of predecessors whom Irenaeus and Clement hardly ever name and merged in Justin's shadow, convinced that God alone can reveal Himself and, content to be hidden in his Saviour's righteousness, the old writer has gradually emerged by virtue of an inborn lustre, obscurest at once and most brilliant of his contemporaries, and has cast a glory on the early church while remaining himself unknown. It is time that he should take his own place, and receive his proper name, for some have begun to take him for a forger, though when or why or how a man should have forged such master-pieces in Justin's name no one has ever been able to say.

EPISTLES, APOCRYPHAL. I.—1. The Epistles of Abgarus or Agbarus, King of Edessa, to Christ and The Answer of our Lord are given by Eusebius (H. E. i. 13), who professes to derive them from the archives of Edessa, and to have carefully translated them out of the Syriac. Abgarus expresses his faith that Christ must be "either God or the Son of God," requests the cure of a disease, and since the Jews reject Him, offers Him a share in the kingdom of Edessa. The Lord replies by blessing Abgarus, since it is written of Him that they who see Him should reject Him, that they who see Him not, believing, may obtain life. He must accomplish that for which He is sent, but after his departure one of His disciples shall come to cure Abgarus, and endow him with the gift of life. And to this is added, according to Eusebius, a narrative in Syriac of the despatch of Thaddeus, the apostle, one of the seventy by "Judas, who is also called Thomas," to cure Abgarus and many of his subjects, and convert them to the faith. The story and the letter of Abgarus are found in a different form in the Acta Thaddei, first published by Tischendorf (Acta App. Apoc. p. 261). Thaddeus there (as in St. Jerome's version of the story, vii. 57, ed. Vallars.) appears as one of the twelve, and is said to have been an Edessene by birth. The name Ananias is given to Abgarus's messenger; the letter contains the offer of the kingdom, and far more severe expressions against the Jews, but not the alternative suppositions concerning the nature of the Lord's person. Ananias also receives from Abgarus the commission to bring back an exact description of the appearance of Jesus, who, miraculously discerning the man's desire, gives him a napkin on which He has impressed His portrait by wiping His face in it after washing. At the same time He delivers a verbal message to Abgarus, promising the visit of Thaddeus by name. Abgarus, adoring the sacred picture, is cured before the arrival of Thaddeus, who baptizes him and his people. Tischendorf (Proleg. p. lxxi.) supposes these acts to have possibly been drawn from some very ancient original. Ephrem Syrus (in Testam., quoted by Reading in his note on Eusebius, l. c.) gives the legend without the addition concerning the picture, quoting Abgarus's letter, but representing the answer of Christ to have been an invocation of blessing upon the city of Edessa. The whole story is probably a local legend invented for the glory of Edessa; see Heinichen's note on Eusebius, l. c. The epistle of Christ to Abgarus is said by Fabricius (Cod. Ap. iii. 511), on the authority of Hickey, to be extant in an Anglo-Saxon MS. in the Bodleian. 2. Other supposed writings of Christ. Augustine (De Consens. Evang. cc. ix. and x.) mentions some who believed in writings of Christ revealing the secret by means of which His miracles were worked, and in letters of His to Peter and Paul. Augustine derides their ignorance in supposing that because Peter and Paul were placed with the Lord in sacred pictures they were therefore the most likely persons to have received letters from Him. The same Father (contra Faustum, xxviii. 4) mentions a pretended letter of Christ alleged by the Manicheans. St. Leo (Serm. iv. de Epiph.) accuses the Manicheans as confincentes sub apostolorum nominibus et sub verbis Salvatoris ipsius multa volumina falsitatis. Timotheus, presbyter of Constantinople, in his epistle published by Meursius (Var. Div. p. 117), gives a long catalogue of Manichean apocrypha, third among which is ἡ τῶν ἐπιστολῶν ὁμὰς, farrago epistolarum. Licinianus, bishop of Carthage, reproves Vincentius, a bishop, for believing in an epistle of Christ sent down from heaven, and from the account which he gives of its contents, it appears to be the same which Adelbert, a Gallic bishop of the 8th century, declared to have fallen from heaven into the city of Jerusalem. It is chiefly directed to urging the observance of the Lord's Day. (Fabricius, Codex Apoc. i. 314.) II. Epistles of the Blessed Virgin. 1. To Ignatius. This letter fills but nine short lines in Fabricius (Cod. Ap. i. 843). It is an exhortation to faith and courage. The letter of Ignatius to the Blessed Virgin, is said by Ussher (Diss. ad Epp. S. Ign. c. 19) to be quoted by St. Bernard. But this is owing to a mistake in the earlier editions of that saint, who is really referring to the well-known letter to Mary of Castabala. (Zahn, Iq. von Ant. p. 81.) The letter of the Blessed Virgin was first printed at Paris, 1495, filling—with that of Ignatius to her, and one to the Apostle John—a blank page at the end of a Life of Thomas à Becket. They do not appear ever to have existed in Greek, and their genuineness is surrendered by Baronius, Bellarmine, and Suarez (Fab. l. c.). 2. Epistola S. Mariæ ad Messanenses, ten lines in Fabricius, conveys an exhortation to faith and a blessing. The priest who seems to have forged it (see Mabillon in Fabricius) pretended that it existed in Hebrew, but it is unknown in any language but Latin. 3. Epistola S. Mariæ ad Florentinos was expounded by Savonarola in a sermon, Oct. 25, 1495; but no ancient testimony to it exists. It is but of four lines, exhorting to prayer and patience. (Fab. i. 852.) III. Epistles of St. Paul. 1. The Epistle of St. Paul to the Laodiceans. This forgery is founded upon Coloss. iv. 16. It is only extant in Latin, and has been generally supposed to have been originally written in that language. The Greek version given by Fabricius (Cod. Ap. i. 873) is that of Elias Hutter, published in his polyglot New

Test. 1599. But Professor Lightfoot, in his exhaustive treatise upon this epistle (appended to his edition of Coloss. p. 347 sqq.) gives reason to think that it was originally composed in Greek, and he appends a new Greek version of his own, in which the Pauline phrases which constitute the staple of the work are given as they stand in the Greek Testament. Rejected by St. Jerome (who says ab omnibus exploditur) and by Theodoret, it obtained a species of recognition (or what seemed such) from Gregory the Great (Mor. in Job, lib. xxxv.), and under the sanction of his name was widely used. Professor Lightfoot gives a list of nineteen MSS. of the Vulgate which contain it, and two pre-Reformation English versions. It consists of twenty brief verses, most of which are extracted from St. Paul, but the connecting matter is so rapid that the result is inexpressibly poor. It has no doctrinal object whatever, and must have been a mere exercise of perverted ingenuity, or composed under the idea that it was well by a pious fraud to obviate the supposition that an inspired epistle had been lost. 2. A third (or rather first) Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians. On the question whether 1 Cor. v. 9 refers really to an earlier epistle now lost, see Meyer and Stanley in loc. Ussher, in a note upon Ignat. ad Trall. (see Cotel. Pat. Apost. ed. Cler. ii. 67), mentions a spurious Epistle of the Corinthians to St. Paul, with the reply of the apostle, as existing in an Armenian MS. in the library of Gilbert North. The text was published by Wilkins (Amst. 1715; see Fab. Cod. Ap. i. 918; iii. 670). The Corinthians announce that Simon and Clobius had come to Corinth preaching that it is not right to read the Prophets, that God is not omnipotent, that there is no resurrection, that man is not the creature of God, that Jesus was not born of Mary in the body, that the world is not the creation of God, but of some angel; to these errors the apostle himself should reply. St. Paul replies that he had taught what he himself received from the apostles who walked with the Lord, that Jesus was born of Mary, was sent to her from the Father in order that He might be made one with the world, and might free every body by His body, and might raise us from death, who shewed His person as an example that man was created by the Father, and was not left in his perdition but sought, that by the hand of adoption he might remain living. It has been conjectured that this epistle, of very doubtful orthodoxy, was composed by some Armenian Christian after the condemnation of Nestorianism and Eutychianism, and when the latter heresy was spreading in Armenia; the Eutychian doctrine being aimed at under the names of Simon and Clobius. Ussher, however, considers it to have been written in reference to Gnosticism, while La Croze (quoted by Fabricius) ascribes it to some monk of the 10th or 11th century, who intended it against the errors of the Bogomili. The names Simon and Clobius were probably taken from the Apost. Constit. [CLEOBIVUS.] 3. The correspondence of St. Paul and Seneca. The whole question of the relations of this philosopher to Christianity and to St. Paul is discussed by Professor Lightfoot (on Philipp. 268 sq.). The extant correspondence, including eight letters of Seneca and six of the apostle, may be read in

Best's edition of Seneca (Teubner). They are given in a less correct text in the earlier editions of that author, and in Fabricius (Cod. Ap. i. 892 sq.). They are first mentioned by St. Jerome (Fr. Ill. cap. xii. ed. Vallara. ii. 851). But he speaks of them as so widely received that he considers their existence a sufficient reason for placing Seneca in his catalogue of sacred writers. St. Augustine also apparently accepts them. (Seneca, cujus quaedam ad Paulum Ap. leguntur epistolae, Ep. cliii. ad Macedonium. See, too, De Civit. Dei, vi. 10, where the allusion seems very doubtful.) The correspondence was very widely read in the middle ages. Among the moderns Faber Stapulensis ventured to append these pretended letters of St. Paul to the genuine epistles and to defend their authenticity. But they have been generally given up both by the Romanists and the Reformed. Baronius (ad an. 68, num. 13) supposes himself to have discovered the origin of the fiction in the spurious Acta passionis Pauli ascribed to Linus, in which mention is made of the friendship of the apostle and philosopher. But these Acta Pauli were little known (see Fabricius, i. 888); and the early belief that Seneca was at least half a Christian, suggests that the object of the forgery may have been the mere satisfaction of the curiosity of Christian readers as to an intercourse which would have so naturally taken place during the apostle's visit to Rome. If any more deliberate motive be looked for, it may be found in Professor Lightfoot's suggestion that the letters were written "either to recommend Seneca to Christian readers, or to recommend Christianity to students of Seneca." Certainly the reader will search them in vain for any of that interchange of spiritual ideas which a qualified forger of such an imaginary correspondence might have devised. They are little more than an interchange of empty compliments. The date of the forgery is placed by Professor Lightfoot in the 4th century. See the subject amply discussed in his appendix to the essay above mentioned. (Comm. on Phil. p. 327.)

IV. Epistles of other Apostles. 1. An Epistle of Peter to James is mentioned by Photius (Cod. 113) as prefixed with the epistle from Clement (printed by Cotel. Pat. Ap. i. 611) to the Recognitions of the latter author. The import of Peter's letter according to Photius is, that he sends his Acts in consequence of a request to that effect from James. This letter, therefore, appears to be different from the letter of Peter to James, first printed by Turrianus (Pro Ep. Pont. lib. 4 and 5) and given by Cotelierius (i. 608). For the latter is an admonition from Peter to keep his teaching strictly secret. Both these letters belong to the Clementine literature, and their genuineness falls with it. 2. An epistle of St. John to a dropsical man, healing his disease. It is given by Pseudo-Prochorus in a forged narrative of the acts of St. John (Fab. i. 927).

EPITACIUS (EPITATIUS, EPICTETUS, EPICTETUS, EPICTETUS, EPICTETUS), said to have been bishop of Tude (Tuy) in Galicia, and afterwards of Ambratia in Lusitania, where he suffered martyrdom, A.D. 57. Ambratia is the modern Placentia in Estremadura, still preserving, says Bivar, a memory of its earlier name in a small tower named Torre de Ambroz.

He was commemorated on May 23. (Dexter, Chron. ann. 37, Bivar's note 8, in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxi. 128 A; id. ann. 268, note 4, p. 388; Mart. Rom. May 23; Boll. Acta SS. 23 Mai. v. 248; Sandoval, Antigüedad de la Ciudad y Iglesia de Tuy, 1610, fol. 11.) [T. W. D.]

EPITHYMIA in a Gnostic system described by Irenaeus (i. 29, p. 108), one of the evil offspring of the Maker of the world. [G. S.]

EPITIMITUS (EPATHIMITUS), bishop of Naples in the 1st century according to the received lists; he stands third, following Patrobas, in one reckoning, and second, Patrobas being omitted, in another. He is commended for his munificent charities; his body was translated to the church of St. Stephen. (Ughel. Ital. Sacr. vi. 26.) [C. H.]

EPITYNCHANUS, bishop of Germa in the province of the Hellespont, present at the synod held at Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 768; Mansi, viii. 974.) [L. D.]

EPLICIUS, EPLETUS. [EPLICIUS.]

EPODIUS, bishop of Opitergium in Italy, A.D. 421, according to Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. x. 152) on the authority of an ancient inscription which he gives (v. 1178). [T. W. D.]

EOLONUS, one of three children baptized by Babylas [BABYLAS (1)], and martyred with him at Antioch during the Decian persecution. Commemorated Jan. 24. (Mart. Bedae, Us.; Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. i. 28.) [T. S. B.]

EPPA (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 717 D), presbyter. [EAPPA.] [C. H.]

EPPA, bishop of Ilici (Elche), subscribes the acts of the sixteenth council of Toledo, under Egica, A.D. 693. (España Sagrada, vii. 241; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333.) [SERPENTINUS.] [M. A. W.]

EPPOALDUS. [EGOALDUS.]

EQUITIUS (1), tribune of the first schola of scutarii at the time of the death of the emperor Jovian, 364. His name was proposed as successor to the empire, but without success, his want of polish ("asper et subagrestis") being felt to disqualify him (Amm. xxvi. 1, § 4). In the following year he was made commander of the army in Illyria, and afterwards magister for his services during the rebellion of Procopius (Amm. xxvi. 5, §§ 3, 11). He still held this office in 371 (Amm. xxix. 6, § 3). The Quadi suspected him of being the instigator of the murder of their king Gabinius (Amm. xxix. 6, § 12), and St. Jerome (Chron. sub ann. 376) accuses him of being the real author of the troubles in Illyria, which Ammianus attributes to Probus. On the death of Valentinian I. Equitius was instrumental in raising the young Valentinian to the purple (Zozim. iv. 19).

[M. F. A.]

EQUITIUS (2), a deacon of Apamea, about 389. Theodoret tells us that when Marcellus the bishop of that city was trying to destroy the temple of Zeus, the fire refused to burn until Equitius sprinkled holy water upon it.

after which the building was quickly reduced to ashes (Theodoret, H. E. v. 21, § 13).

[M. F. A.]

EQUITIUS (3), bishop of Hippo Diarrhytus, notorious for his turbulence and misconduct, but in what respect the latter consisted is not known. The Council of Carthage, A.D. 401, in consequence of his repeated misbehaviour, appointed a commission of twenty bishops to take steps for deposing him and appointing a bishop in his stead. But their purpose was not carried out immediately, for we find that in 404 Theasius and Evodius, the deputies appointed by the council to convey to Honorius its request concerning the Donatists, are desired also to request the emperor that Equitius might be expelled from his diocese. This was in accordance with the law of Gratian, A.D. 378. (Cod. Eccl. Afr. 78, 93; Bruns, Canon. i. 175, 185; Cod. Theod. lib. xvi. tit. ii. 35; Tillemont, art. 134, vol. xiii. p. 356; Mansi, Concil. iv. 490, 500; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 180.)

[H. W. P.]

EQUITIUS (4), one of three bishops addressed by pope Simplicius, Nov. 19, 475, on the subject of Gaudentius bishop of Ausonium (Simpl. Pap. Ep. 3 in Pat. L. lvii. 37, and Mansi, Concil. vii. 973; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 49; Ceillier, Aut. Sac. x. 402).

[C. H.]

EQUITIUS (5), bishop of Matelica, a town at the source of the Esino in the March of Ancona; present at the third council of Rome, A.D. 487, under Felix III. (Mansi, vii. 1171 c).

[T. W. D.]

EQUITIUS (6), a Roman noble, father of the abbat St. Maur, whom at the age of twelve he placed under St. Benedict, A.D. 522 (Greg. Mag. Dial. ii. 4 in Migne, lxvi. 140). Faustus, the contemporary biographer of Maurus (Vit. S. Maur. cap. i. § 8), has Eutychius instead of Equitius, and the Bollandist editor notes Euitius, Aequitius, Euthitius, as other variants of the name (Acta SS. 15 Jan. i. 1040).

[T. W. D.]

EQUITIUS (7), abbat of a monastery in the province of Valeria, of whom an account, mixed with legend, is given by pope Gregory I. (Dial. i. 4) and quoted by Baronius (A. E. ann. 504, xi. sq.) and the Bollandists, the latter assigning his commemoration to March 7 (Acta SS. Mart. i. 649), while the Roman martyrology commemorates him on Aug. 11. The "province of Valeria" is explained to be that district about the Lacus Fucinus in the land of the Marsi (Abruzzo Ulteriore) traversed by the Via Valeria, which reaches it from Rome through Tibur. The small town of Pescara near the east shore of the lake is thought to represent the general locality of Equitius (Ferrarius, Lex. Geogr. voc. "Valeria"). Basilus the Magus, expelled from Rome in the reign of Theodoric the Great, sought an asylum under Equitius, having disguised himself as a monk, but the abbat soon detected and repelled him. Baronius places this story under the year 504. Equitius lived as an humble rustic, working with his monks on their farm, often preaching as an itinerant in the neighbourhood, poorly mounted, meanly clad, carrying the Holy Scriptures in his saddle-bag. The Roman clergy (Symmachus in the chronology of Baronius, but unnamed by Gregory), who invited him to an interview, and ultimately stood his friend. (Cf. Fuller, Ch. Hist. vol. iii. pp. 260, 261, ed. Brewer.)

ERACLEAS. [HERACLEAS.]

ERACLIANUS, sixth bishop of Sens, between Audactus and Lunarius, in the 4th century (Gall. Christ. xii. 4; Gams, Ser. Ep. 628).

[R. T. S.]

ERACLIUS. [HERACLIUS.]

ERACLIUS (1) (HERACLIUS, in the older editions ERADIUS), deacon of the church of Hippo, A.D. 425. He had inherited a considerable property, part of which he spent in raising a "memoria" of the martyr [Stephen]; the rest he offered as a gift to the church. St. Augustine, fearing that the acceptance of such a gift from so young a man might be the subject of future reproof or regret, would not receive it in the form of money to be spent; but caused Eraclius first to invest the money permanently in the purchase of land, which might be given back to him, should any unforeseen reason for restitution arise. On becoming one of Augustine's clergy, Eraclius made his poverty complete by setting free a few slaves whom he had retained. (Aug. Serm. 356, vol. v. 1387.) In the year 426 Augustine was summoned to Milevis, to obviate some threatened dissensions. Severus, the late bishop, had designated his successor in his lifetime, but had only made his choice known to his clergy, without publishing it to his people. This caused some discontent, and the interference of Augustine was judged necessary to secure the unanimous acceptance of the bishop so chosen. Augustine, being then in his seventy-second year, was thus reminded of the expedience of taking steps to secure his own church from similar trouble in the event of his death, and he made choice of Eraclius, then apparently the junior presbyter of the church, to be his coadjutor, and designate successor. (See Dict. Christ. Ant. i. 228.) Only, though he had himself been ordained bishop in the lifetime of his predecessor, Valerius, he now held that this had been an unconscious violation of the Nicene canon against there being two bishops in the same church, and therefore resolved that Eraclius, while discharging all the secular duties of the see, should remain in the office of presbyter until his own death. To remove all possibility of future dispute, he assembled his people (Sept. 26, 426), to obtain their consent to the arrangement, having the notaries of the church in attendance to draw up regular "gesta" of the proceedings, which the persons present were asked to subscribe (Ep. 213, vol. ii. p. 788). These gesta contain an interesting specimen of the recording of popular acclamations. According to present English parliamentary usage interruptions to a speaker are usually inarticulate, or at most amount to an "Oh, oh," or "hear, hear." In the Roman Senate usage permitted the interruption of a speaker by calling out a short sentence, which was duly recorded by the reporters of the proceedings. When the cry found favour, it was often taken up by the assembly and repeated by them (probably in a kind of chant), and the acts then carefully record the number of times it was repeated. Thus (Trebellius Pollio, (laud.) "Auguste Claudi di te nobis praesent; dictum sexagies; principem te aut qualis tu es semper optavimus; dictum quadragies; te respublica requirelnt, dictum quadragies," &c. Similar instances are common in the Augustan historians. On the whole subject of such acclamations, see Ferrarius, de Vet. Actum in Graevii Thea. Ant. Rom. Christian assemblies of course followed the usage of their time; and the reader of the acts of councils will be familiar with the record of acclamations sometimes as interrupting the proceedings, and ordinarily as testifying the assembly's approval of the final result. In the present instance the gesta record the different acclamations by which the discourse of Augustine was interrupted, and the final acclamations made at his special request, "Fiat, fiat, dictum vicies quinquies, Dignum est justum est dictum vicies octies. . . . Exaudi Christe, Eraclium conserva dictum octies decies."

The fall of Hippo into the hands of the Vandals prevented the arrangements of Augustine from taking effect, and he does not appear to have had any successor in his see. Eraclius, in 427, held a private discussion with Maximinus, the Arian bishop, which led to the subsequent public disputation between Maximinus and Augustine. (Call. cum Mar. viii. 650.) Two sermons by Eraclius are preserved, the first of which, preached in Augustine's presence, is almost all taken up with compliments and apologies (v. 1523 and 72, Append. p. 131). [G. S.]

ERACLIUS (3). Isidore (Orig. viii. 634) enumerates a heretic of this name and a sect of Eracitae; but on comparison with Augustine (How. 47) it becomes apparent that HIERAX and his followers are intended. [G. S.]

ERADIUS (1), martyr at Tudertum in the Diocletian persecution, together with Cassian the bishop. (Baron. Annal. 303. 21.) [T. S. B.]

ERADIUS (2), bishop of Orange, mentioned in the letter of the bishops of the province of Vienne, A.D. 356, as a supporter of Saturninus, the Arian bishop of Arles. (Gall. Christ. i. 765; Gama, Ser. Ep. 591.) [R. T. S.]

ERADIUS, deacon. [ERACLIUS (1).]

ERAMBERTUS, bishop of Senlis. [EREMBERTUS (2).]

ERAMBOLDUS (Gall. Christ. xi. 350), bishop of Bayeux. [FRAMBOLDUS.] [C. H.]

ERARD (EBERHARD, ERHARD), bishop at Ardagh and Ratisbon. Commemorated Jan. 8. The life and acts of this saint are involved in great obscurity, and there is much uncertainty as to the time when he lived and the places where he exercised his ministry. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. tom. i. 533-546) give three Lives: two of these are also given by Colgan (Acta SS. 22-38), who says six lives of this saint have come into his hands, but the other four contain nothing which makes them worthy of publication; he adds extracts, however, from two Breviaries of Augsburg, the Breviary of Herhipolis (Würzburg), and the Breviary of Ratisbon, and gives an Appendix of four chapters upon the commemoration, &c. time, and country of St. Erard. Yet even these form but a small portion of the accounts compiled of this very celebrated missionary preacher. St. Erard is generally allowed to have been a native of Ireland, and to have had two companions, whom some call his brothers, Albert and Hildulph. Before leaving Ireland, he was bishop at Ardagh, in the county of Longford. With nineteen companions he set out for Germany, and first joined himself to St. Hildulph in his place of retirement in the Vosges Mountains in the east of France; whether this was St. Hildulph of Treves, or another of the same name and brother of St. Erard, is matter of dispute, and for decision will depend upon the time when it is supposed that St. Erard lived, as Hildulph, bishop of Treves, is stated to have retired about A.D. 676 to the Vosges, and there founded a monastery. From the Vosges St. Erard went to Bavaria to proclaim the Gospel, and is said to have become a great favourite with Pepin, king of the Franks (A.D. 741-68). But here there is evidently, on the one side or the other, a slip in the chronology, which Lanigan attempts to rectify by supposing that the Pepin now spoken of was not the father of Charlemagne, but the father of Charles Martel, Pepin d'Heristal, Mayor of the Palace.

While in Bavaria, he had his chief place of abode at Ratisbon or Regensburg, where the Regen falls into the Danube, but it is not agreed as to what position he occupied there. Tradition asserts that he built a church, which he dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, and seven different monasteries; but Mabillon (Ann. O. S. B. tom. i. lib. xvi. sec. xv. 507), while affirming this, does not believe that he was bishop of Ratisbon, or acting otherwise than as a zealous missionary. There he spent the remainder of his life, and we hear of only one journey he undertook beyond the Bavarian frontier, namely, to baptize the infant daughter of Etto or Ethicus, duke of the Alemanni, who was living in Alsace, near the Rhine. This infant was afterwards known as the famous St. Odilia, of whom Mabillon (Ann. O. S. B. tom. i. lib. xv. sec. lxi. 489-90) gives an account. From the Rhine St. Erard returned to the banks of the Danube, built in Ratisbon the Lower Monastery, which he dedicated also to the Blessed Virgin, and, after a lingering illness in the scene of his labours, died there on Jan. 8. The year is unknown. Colgan thinks he flourished A.D. 750, and in this Ware agrees; so also does Baronius, whom Colgan follows. But Mabillon and Lanigan, with more probability, maintain that he lived before Charles Martel (A.D. 714-41) and belongs at latest to the end of the seventh century. The Bollandists also seem to prefer an early date, but do not fix a year. Tanner (Bibl. 248) adopts Dempster's date of A.D. 675, and his ascription of the work Ad Bavaros fidei rudimenta, lib. i. St. Erard's tomb was, as usual, surrounded with miracles, and multitudes of pilgrims attended to participate in the gifts of healing. And such was the celebrity it had attained, that about A.D. 1052, when Pope Leo IX. visited Germany, and was staying at Ratisbon, the saint received formal canonisation, and his relics were removed to a more spacious shrine. (Colgan and Bollandists, ut supra; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 18, §§ 7, 8; Ware, Bishops, by Harria, vol. i. "Bishops of Ardlagh," pass.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 87, 114 sq. 152, ii. 445; Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. ii. 781; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Feb. 9; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 51-2; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. viii. 31; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 247; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 100, Feb. 9.) St. Erard is usually commemorated on Jan. 8, though Jan. 6, Feb. 9, Apr. 14, and Oct. 8 are occasionally given to him, and by some he is called Eberhard. [J. G.]

ERARIO, one of the tribe of the Rugii who had accompanied Theodoric into Italy, and always kept themselves distinct from the Ostrogoths. He was elected king by his own people after the murder of Ildibald, whom the Ostrogoths had chosen as king when Vitigis was carried prisoner to Constantinople. The Ostrogoths, however, were thoroughly discontented with the inefficiency of Eraric, and called Totila, nephew of Ildibald, to be their head, ann. 541. But Eraric entered into secret negotiations with the emperor Justinian to betray Italy to him, and receive the title of Patrician. During the absence of his messengers Eraric was murdered by the Goths after a five months' reign, and Totila became sole king. His life illustrates one of several phases of disunion which existed among the followers of Theodoric after his death. (Procopius, de Bell. Goth. iii. 2, ed. Bonn. ii. pp. 287-290; Dahn, Die Könige der Germanen, ii. 227.) [A. H. D. A.]

ERASISTRATUS, bishop of Corinth, present at the robber-synod of Ephesus, A.D. 449, where he spoke in favour of Eutyches (Mansi, vi. 837). Le Quien (Or. Chr. ii. 151) puts him thirteenth bishop of Corinth, between Perigenes and Peter. Pope Leo I., addressing certain bishops in Illyricum (ep. 13, cap. 3, in Patr. Lat. liv. 665), mentions a certain metropolitan of Achaia (unnamed) who was slighting the papal authority and acting independently of Anastasius bishop of Thessalonica, the papal vicarius; who had, moreover, offended the Thespians by consecrating for their bishop a stranger whom they had never seen. This metropolitan is identified with Erasistratus bishop of Corinth by Migne's editor, and Ceillier (x. 206) takes the same view. Jaffé (Reg. Pont. 35) dates Leo's letter A.D. 444. [C. H.]

ERASMA, a noble Roman virgin, said to have suffered martyrdom at Aquileia with Euphemia, Dorothea, and Thecla, under Nero; commemorated Sept. 3. (Rom. Martyrol.; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. i. 606.) [T. W. D.]

ERASMUS (1), sent, together with Onesimus and fourteen others, to Rome to Licinius: by him they were delivered to Diomedes the prefect, who had them conducted to Puteoli, where they were beheaded. They are commemorated May 10. (Men. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

ERASMUS (2) (HERASMUS, Us.), bishop and martyr in Campania, during the Diocletian persecution. Commemorated June 3. (Mart. Ad., Us., Notker., Flor.) [T. S. B.]

ERASMUS (3), bishop of Cibyra, on the borders of Caria and Phrygia, present at the fifth

general council, A.D. 553. (Le Quien, Oris. Christ. i. 204; Mansi, ix. 393.) [L. D.]

ERASMUS (4), a martyr at Antioch; commemorated Nov. 25. (Mart. Us.) [T. S. B.]

ERASTUS, the οικονομος of the city of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23), reputed bishop of Philippi. The pseudo-Dorotheus, confusing his title and his locality, says he was first oeconomus of the church of Jerusalem and afterwards bishop of Paneas, or Caesarea Philippi, in North Palestine (Doroth. De lxx. Discip. in Patr. Gr. xcii. 1063). Other traditions place Erastus at Philippi in Macedonia (Rom. Mart. July 26; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 67, 833; Boll. Acta SS. 26 Jul. vi. 298 E). [C. H.]

ERATAOTH, the name of a dogfaced demon in the diagram of the Ophites (Origen, adv. Cels. vi. 30). [HEBDOMAD.] [G. S.]

ERBIN, brother of St. Digain, and son of Cystennin Gorneu, a prince of Devon, was himself included among the Welsh saints, and was the ancestor of many holy persons; he flourished in the 5th century, but is remembered in no dedication. (Myv. Arch. ii. 42; Rees, Welsh Saints, 113, 134.) [J. G.]

ERC (1) (EARG, ERCUS, HERCUS), bishop of Slane. Commemorated Nov. 2. He was son of Deg or Decc, of the race of Corb Olum, descended from Rudraighe, king of Ireland (A.M. 4912-81 by the Irish calculation); he himself belonged immediately to the royal house of Ulster, but his progenitors came from the province of Munster, and he is always spoken of as belonging to Munster (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 544 n. ⁴³, for his kindred; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 293). As the Four Masters (by O'Donovan i. 197) say his age was fourscore and ten years when he died in A.D. 512, he must have been born in A.D. 622, or, as Ussher prefers, A.D. 624, which is the date assigned for his birth by the Annals of Tigernach. When St. Patrick landed at Colptha Inbher Colptha or Colbdi (now Colp in the barony of Lower Duleek, at the mouth of the Boyne), and had travelled with his companions to the great plain of Bregia, he arrived at nightfall on Easter Eve, A.D. 433, at Ferta-fer-Feic (the "graves of the men of Fiacc"), now Slane, on the north bank of the Boyne, in Meath (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. p. 167 n. ⁴). He set up his tent and kindled his Paschal fire; but this was the time when, according to the Pagan custom, every fire had to be extinguished in Ireland, and kindled again from the sacred fire on Temoria or Tara Hill at the idolatrous feast. Whether knowingly or in ignorance, St. Patrick began his Paschal feast as usual by lighting a fire, and his fire on the hill of Slane was seen in amazement by King Laeghaire on the hill of Tara. The king at once took counsel with his people, and set out to see the reason, but as his Druids would not permit the king to enter the Christian enclosure for fear of magic, St. Patrick was required to come before the king and give an account of his doings. St. Patrick entered the royal assembly, intoning the verse of the Psalm (xx. 7): "Some put their trust in chariots, and some in horses; but we will remember the name of the Lord our God." But while the king had commanded that none should rise to shew the Christian bishop reference, there was one of the king's pages, "Uas eo juvenibus regis, nomine Ercus," &c., who rose up, is said by some even to have offered St. Patrick his seat, received, at any rate, his blessing, and became the famous bishop of Slane, the place where the assembly was then held. (This story of the first meeting between St. Patrick and king Laeghaire, and of the first appearance of Erc, is told in the Lives of St. Patrick, as given by Colgan, and also by Tirechan in his Annotations in the Book of Armagh: see also upon it Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 5, § 5; Todd, St. Patrick, 414 sq., and the account of St. Erc's baptism from Tirechan, in pp. 442-3; Usher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 409 sq.; Petrie, For Hill, 84 sq.) By the Four Masters (by O'Donovan, i. 136 n. 1, 137) he is included among the family of St. Patrick as "Bishop Erc, his secret-spoken Judge," and Evinus (Vit. Trip. S. Pat.) calls him "Sanctus Ercus Episcopus, Cancellarius, et Supremus Judex in spiritualibus." He is spoken of as a teacher and the teacher of St. Brendan (May 16) of Clonsfert, who also received the monastic garb from him: this may have been the case, as both belonged to Munster, and may have been related by kindred. He was also a friend of St. Brigida (Feb. 1), and accompanied her into Munster, where they attended a large synod for some days. His obit is given by the Four Masters at A.D. 512. "St. Erc, bishop of Lileach and of Feartha-fear-feig, by the side of Sidhe-Truim, to the west, died on 2 Nov. His age was fourscore and ten years, when he departed," and the Mart. Doneg. gives the same story, adding his genealogy, and the testimony of the "very ancient old vellum book" that in habits and life he was like St. Martin; but Usher places his death in A.D. 514, and this Lanigan accepts as the true date. His relic appears to have been enshrined with those of St. Finian of Clonard in 776 (Ann. Ult.). In the Annotations of Tirechan (preserved in the Book of Armagh, fol. 10, a a) St. Patrick would appear to have built eight churches in the plain of Rega (in Meath), in which he first preached the gospel and built churches; of these in order is, "a ecclesie Cerne, in qua sepultus est Hercus in portavit mortalitatem magnam," but the reference in the closing words is unknown, though pointing apparently to his dying of the plague. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 167, c. 98, 535, c. 71, 536, c. 72; Usher, Eccl. Antiq. vi. Ind. Chron. c. 514; O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. ii. 88, 128; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 8, § 4, c. 10, § 7; O'Donovan, Irish Saints, ii. 80 sq.; O'Connor, Ep. Jac. 106; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 64, 75 n., 76, 251) [J. G.]

ERC (2), bishop of Domnach-mór-Maigheladhat in the north of Ui-Faelain. Commemorated Oct. 27. O'Clery says this may be Erc, bishop, son of Fergna, son of Folachta, of the race of Brual Breac, from whom the Osraighi are descended. Erc, son of Fergna, is included by Lanigan among the saints belonging to the house of St. Kieran (Mar. 5) of Saighir. If so, he belonged to Leinster, about Kilkenny or Waterford, but O'Donovan (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 1128 n. 1) is of opinion that Magh Luadhat or Magh Leaghat, though the name is now obsolete, is probably the ancient name of the plain now called Maghera-Cregan, situated near Newton-

Stewart, in the barony of Omagh, and county of Tyrone. Colgan thinks he may be the Erc who was a disciple of Senan, but the identification of this Erc is very uncertain (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 31, 91, 95). Colgan calls him "Martyr," and the Drummond Kalendar "confessor." (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 287; Colgan, Acta SS. 472, c. 3, 540; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 7, c. 11, § 4; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 26.) [J. G.]

ERC (3) Nasca, of Tulach-lis, now Tullylish, in the barony of Lower Iveagh and county of Down, commemorated May 12. O'Clery's full entry on this day (Mart. Doneg. 125) is: "Herc Nasca, of Tulach-lis, in Ui-Eachach Uladh. And Earc is of the race of Art Corb, son of Fiacha Suighdhe," but Dr. Reeves' version (Eccl. Antiq. 316 n. 1) is: "Bearnosga of Tulach-lis ('hill of the fort') in Iveagh of Ulidia," while Mart. Tullaght (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. xxiv.) gives "Nasci" as a different individual, and the Drummond Kalendar (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 13) has "apud Hiberniam sancti confessoris Erci natale celebratur." Among the saints who are descended from the family of St. Mida or Ita (Jan. 15) Colgan (Acta SS. 73, c. 2) includes an Erca, virgin daughter of Ernin, whose feast is May 12, but Erc of Tullylish is the only person of the name who stands in the kalendars on that day. [J. G.]

ERC (4), ST., or Herygh, brother of St. Ia gives name to the Cornish parish of St. Erth ("ecclesia St. Erci," in early documents), at the head of the Hayle estuary, in which St. Ia and the other Irish devotees landed. His feast was on the vigil of All Saints, i.e. Oct. 31, and the parish feast at St. Erth is still on the Sunday nearest to the festival of All Saints (Whitaker, Cathedral of Cornwall, i. p. 291, ii. p. 4 and 210; see, too, Leland, Itin. iii. p. 20). Some identify him with St. Erc, the first bishop of Slane [ERC (1)], in Ireland, who died A.D. 514, and whose day is also at the beginning of November. William of Worcester makes St. Herygh the patron saint of Chittlehampton, in Devonshire, as well, and calls him a bishop, and adds, "jacet in quadam ecclesia sita sub cruce ecclesiae Sancti Pauli Londoniarum." [C. W. B.]

ERCA (1), virgin, daughter of Ernin, of the family of St. Ita, is confounded by Colgan with Erc of Tullylish. [ERC (3).]

ERCA (2), one of St. Patrick's embroiderers (Four Mast. A.D. 448). [ERCNAT.] [J. G.]

ERCA (3) (ERTHA), mother of St. Blane. [BLANE.]

ERCAMBERT is given in the list of the bishops of Beauvais as twentieth, succeeding Radingus and followed by Rocoaldus. (Gall. Christ. ix. 696.) [S. A. B.]

ERCANBALD (ERCELBALD, Baron. Annal. ann. 801, xx. ed. Theiner), an officer (notarius) of Charlemagne, sent by him to Liguria in 801 to bring home the presents of the king of Persia. (Einhardi Ann. s. a.) An Ercanbaldus 'cancellarius' (possibly identical with the above), is mentioned by Leo III. in a letter to Charles, written between the years 806 and 810 (Mon. Carol. ed. Jaffé, p. 322). [T. R. B.]

ERCANRAD, bishop of Paris. [ERCHENRAD.]

ERCEMBERT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. lib. ii. in M. H. B. 717 E), ERCENBERHT (A. S. C. ann. 640, in M. H. B. 310), king of Kent. [EARCOMBERT.] [C. H.]

ERCENUALD (Kembla, C. D. 35, 38, 40), ERCENWALD (ib. 18), bishop of London. [ERKENWALD.] [C. H.]

ERCHAD, ERCHAN, ERCHARD. [ERCHARD.] [J. G.]

ERCHAN, clerical witness to the liberation from laical possession of the church of Trylec Lann Mainuon (Trelech, Monmouthshire) by Meurig, son of Arthfael, in the time of Cerenhir, bishop of Llandaff (Léb. Land. by Rees, 453). [J. G.]

ERCHANFRIDUS, named as bishop of Laureacum, and likewise of Juvavia (Salzburg), in the 6th century (Gams, Ser. Ep. 307, 327), the former town having been the primitive, and Juvavia the later, seat of the Noricum bishopric. The transfer of the see is discussed by Fiedrich, Das wahre Zeitalter des heil. Rupert, 1866, pp. 18-44). Laureacum, on the right bank of the Danube, near the junction of the Enns opposite Mauthausen and below Linz, is the modern Lorch (Ferrarius, Lex. Geog.; Wiltach, Handbook, i. 122). Neither in Friedrich nor in Hund (Metrop. Salisburgens. 1582) does the name of Erchenfridus occur. Hansiz (Germ. Sacr. i. 100) makes him bishop of Patavia (Passau) from 598 to 623. [T. W. D.]

ERCHANWALDUS (Fredegar. Chron. continuat. i. 91, in Patr. Lat. lxxi. 665), mayor. [ERCHINOALDUS.] [C. H.]

ERCHEMBRIOT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. in M. H. B. 719 B), ERCHENBERT (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1377, in M. H. B. 780), ERCHENBRIOTH (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iv. in M. H. B. 723 B), king of Kent. [EARCOMBERT.] [C. H.]

ERCHENEGODE (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1285, in M. H. B. 780), daughter of Earcombert, king of Kent. [EARCONGOTA.] [C. H.]

EROHENRADUS I. (HERCHENRADUS) was the forty-third bishop of Paris, following Deodafridus, and succeeded by Ermenfredus. There is extant a placitum dated in the seventh year of king Charles the Great (A.D. 775), in which judgment is given against Herchenradus in a dispute between him and Folradus, abbat of St. Dionysius concerning the monastery of St. Mary and St. Peter, at Plaisir (Placitum), near St. Germain (Cod. Dip. xxv. in Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 945, reprinted from Mabillon, de Re Diplom. lib. vi. num. 50, p. 518. The document does not occur in the collections of either Baluze or Pertz). In a diploma or charter of Louis the Pious given in the seventh year of his reign (A.D. 820) to the church of Paris, it is recited that Charles the Great had, upon the petition of Erchenradus, given a charter to the same church confirming it in the possession of property of which the title-deeds had been burnt or lost. (Migne, Patr. Lat. civ. 1102.) He is said to have been present at the council of Frankfort in A.D. 794 (Gall. Christ. vii. 29). [S. A. B.]

ERCHERBRICHT (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1275; M. H. B. 780), king of Kent. [EARCOMBERT.] [C. H.]

ERCHINOALD succeeded Aega as mayor of the palace in Neustria to Clovis II. in 640. Erchinoald was of the Merovingian royal race, and is described by the chronicler (Fredegar, 84) as a man full of long-suffering and kindness, gentle and respectful towards the clergy, and without pride or rapacity. On the death of Flaochat in 642, Erchinoald became the ruler of Burgundy, if not titular mayor of the palace. (Pertz, Geschichte d. Merovingischen Hausmeier, p. 46). On the death of Sigebert III. of Austrasia in 656, when Clovis became king of the united Frankish realm, Erchinoald became mayor of the palace in all three kingdoms (Pertz, ib.; Bonnell, Anfänge d. Karolingischen Hauses, p. 113), being the first to unite in his own person these three dignities. Shortly afterwards (c. 658) he died (Gesta Reg. Fr. 45), and Ebroin was appointed in his place in Neustria and Burgundy, Wulfoald in Austrasia. [T. R. B.]

ERCNAT (ERGNAT, ERCA HERENAT), virgin, of Dun-da-en, now Duneane, in the barony of Upper Toome and county of Antrim. Commemorated Jan. 8, Oct. 30. Colgan (Acta SS. 41-2, Jan. 8) gives an account of this virgin from the references made to her in the Lives of St. Patrick. Her father was Daire, Derga, or Darius, son of Fincadh, son of Eugenius, son of Niall, of the race of Colladachrioch, a noted chief of the Hy-Neill, in that part where Armagh now stands; he gave Druimsailech, now Armagh, to St. Patrick. So worthy in grace and virtue did St. Erchnat appear that St. Patrick gave her the charge of the sacred vestments, to make, cleanse, and repair them. This charge she received along with St. Lupita St. Patrick's own sister, and St. Crumtheresia, daughter of a British king. But falling in love with St. Benignus (Nov. 9) through her fondness for that art in which the psalmist of St. Patrick excelled, she is said to have actually died of love and been brought to life again, thenceforward to love the saint only spiritually. She rests in Tamlacht-bo, a church in the province of Ulster, supposed by Dr. Reeves (Eccles. Antiq. 300 n. b) to be Tamlaght, anciently called Tawlaghta-bo, a townland in Eglisli, near Armagh, and her feast is observed there and at Duneane. According to Colgan she flourished A.D. 460, and had a double commemoration, Jan. 8 and Oct. 30; on the former the Mart. Doneg. commemorates "Eargnat, virgin, of Dún-dá-én, in Dal Araidhe;" and on the latter "Hercnat, virgin, of Dún-dá-én, in the Fiodhbhadh, in Da' Araidhe." The Four Masters call her Erca, and count her one of the three embroiderers of St. Patrick. But in the Felire of Aengus the Culdee, there is a curious note on "Cuach, virgin, of Cill-Cuaiche in Cairbre-Ua-Ciardha" (as she is entered in the Mart. Doneg. at Jan. 8): "Erchnat, the virgin nun, was cook and robe-maker to St. Columb Cillé, and her church Cille Choca, in Cairbre-na-Ciardha."

Erast was her true name, which means an embroiderer, because Ercudh, in the ancient Gaelic, was the same as drawing and embroidering now: for it was that virgin who was the embroideress, cutter, and sewer of clothes to St. Colum Cille and his disciples." [COCCA.] (O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. iii. 122; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, ii. 299; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 300 sq. and Anc. Ch. Armagh, 11-2; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 138 n. 1, 139; Bp. Forbes, Kel. Scott. Saints, i. 27; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 124-6.) [J. G.]

ERCOMBERT (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. in M. H. B. 716; Malm. G. R. A. i. § 76, ed. Hardy), ERCOMBIRCHT (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 11), ERCONBERCT (Bed. H. E. iv. 1; v. 19), ERCONBERHT (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 640, 664, 675, in M. H. B. 529 c, 532 c, 531 c; id. Gen. Reg. Cant. in M. H. B. 627, 638 c, D), ERCONBERT (Flor. Wig. Chron. 636 B, 637 E, 638 A; Wend. F. H. ann. 654, 676), ERCONBYRHT (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 616, in M. H. B. 645), king of Kent. [ERCOMBERT.] [C. H.]

ERCOMBERT, king of Kent. [ERCOMBERT.]

ERCONGOTA (A. S. C. ann. 640, in M. H. B. 310; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 640, in M. H. B. 529 D; id. ad Chron. App. ib. 635 c; Malm. G. R. A. i. § 11, ed. Hardy), daughter of Ercombert, king of Kent. [ERCONGOTA.] [C. H.]

ERCONVALD (Bed. H. E. iv. 11, in M. H. B. 221 A), ERCONWALD (Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 664, 675; M. H. B. 532 c, 535 A, B; id. Non. Episc. Lond. ib. 617 B; Boll. Acta SS. 4^a iii. 781), bishop of London. [ERCONWALD.] [C. H.]

ERCUNBERHT (Nennius, Hist. in M. H. B. 74 c), king of Kent. [ERCOMBERT.] [C. H.]

ERCUNUALDUS (Bed. H. E. iii. 19, in M. H. B. 193 A), patrician in Gaul. [ERCHINUALD.]

ERCUS, Cornish saint. [ERC (4).]

ERECHOREUS (ERECHTIUS, ERETIVS, ERYCHORICA, ERYTRIUS), bishop of Laganian, in the province of Galatia Prima. (Wiltsch. Handb. i. § 104.) He was present at the Council of Eusebius, A.D. 314, and also at that of Nicaea, A.D. 325. The MSS. not only give the name correctly, but also the designations of the see, some having Daumasiae, others Gadanitanus, Gadanitanus, Laganianensis, Plamatonsensis, Platonensis, and Platanensis. Le Quien supposes all these variations to have arisen with Latin translators, who mistook the Greek letters of their originals. (Oriens Christ. i. 488; Gams, Ser. Episc. 441.) Laganian is the only known Galatian name to which the designations can apply. [T. W. D.]

ERECHTHIUS, bishop of Antioch in Pisidia, c. 440. A fragment of a sermon delivered by him in the great church at Constantinople before the feast, at the Theophania, is given by Mai (Script. Vet. vii. 165; and Migne, Patrolog. lxxvi. 2, p. 3321). [E. V.]

ERECHTIUS, bishop of Laganian. [ERECHOREUS.]

ERECLECH (ERECLACIUS), commemorated March 3. Colgan gives a short memoir of St. Ereclacius, presbyter and confessor, from the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick. He was the friend and fellow-traveller of St. Patrick; when St. Patrick was in the region of the descendants of Aengus (probably the father of Eochaidh Muinreamhar), and had built the church of Fothrath, he in the same region built the church of Rathmudain which was so called from Muadan, father of Enan [ENAN (2)], and gave it to Ereclacius. Colgan thinks this must have been about A.D. 450. (Colgan, Acta SS. 455-6, and Tr. Thaum. 146, c. 130, 180 n. 107; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 79, 284, 322; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14 n. 20; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. p. 82.) [J. G.]

EREDNAT (ERETNATAN, HEREDNAT), commemorated Apr. 10. Known under these names in the Irish Martyrologies, she is identified with the Ernait, virgin daughter of a king of Ciannacht, in Ulster, who went south and took up her abode at Tulach Bennain, which is unidentified but appears to have been in Munster, and was a cell of St. Fintan (Jan. 3), abbat of Dunleisique. (Colgan, Acta SS. 11 c. 7, 13 n. 14-15; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 46.) [J. G.]

ERELIEVA, a concubine of Theodemir, by whom she was the mother of Theodoric the Great, c. 454. She became a Catholic, and was known by the name Eusebia. (Excerpta Valesiana, i. e. the Chronicle of Maximian, archbishop of Ravenna; so Waitz and Holder Egger, Monumenta Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 273; ed. Gardthausen, 1875, 58, p. 295.) She was living in 490, and probably later. (Jordanis ed. Closs. 180; Dahn, Die Könige der Germanen, ii. 63.) [A. H. D. A.]

EREMBERCHT (Willibald. Vit. Bonif. § 28, in Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 603 B; Baren. Annal. ann. 739, i.), bishop of Freising. [ERIMBERT.] [C. H.]

EREMBERTUS (1), ST., eleventh bishop of Toulouse, succeeding Willegisilus. He was born at a place called Villolicorte, on the Seine, about five leagues above Paris, in the time of Dagobert I. or his son Clovis II. He joined the monastery of Fontanelle, while Wandregisilus, or, according to another account, Lantbertus was abbat. At this time he must have been no longer young, as from the Life of St. Wandregisilus it appears that he already had a son, Hartbainus, who is spoken of as vir illustris and a benefactor of the monastery. In the time of Clotaire III. he was elected to the bishopric of Toulouse (about A.D. 656). Nothing definite is related of his acts while bishop, except that he miraculously quenched a fire which broke out during a visit to his native place. After twelve years' labour in his see, he retired to his former monastery of Fontanelle, now ruled by Lantbert, afterwards archbishop of Lyons. His successor in the bishopric was Aricius. He is said to have died in A.D. 671 or 678, and was buried in the church of St. Paul, though his remains were more than once translated. He is commemorated on the 14th day of May. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 389; Gall. Christ. xiii. 8; Vita S. Wandregisili and Vita S. Ansberti in Bouquet, tom. iii. pp. 563, 617.) [S. A. B.]

EREMBERTUS (2) (ERAMBERTUS), the eighteenth bishop of Senlis, between St. Antbertus and Vulfredus; present at two councils, that of Gentiliacum near Paris in A.D. 767, and that of Rome in 769. (Gall. Christ. x. 1384; Labbe, Conc. viii. 463, 484.) [S. A. B.]

EREMITAE, given by Macarius Magnes (Apocrit. iii. 43, p. 151) as another name for ENCRATITES. [G. S.]

EREMIUS, bishop of Thessalonica. [HERMIUS.]

EREMWULFUS, a Bavarian condemned for heresy, and excommunicated by St. Boniface in A.D. 732. (Willebaldi Vita S. Bonif. c. 6, ap. Jaffé, Mon. Mogunt. p. 455; Baronius, s. a. 733, § 4; Hansiz, Germ. Sac. i. 121.) [T. R. B.]

ERENA, sister of pope Damasus (Boll. Acta SS. 21 Feb. iii. 244.) [IRENE.] [J. G.]

ERENAEUS (ERNENEUS), confessor and Eremite, is a saint in Marr, Aberdeenshire, mentioned by Dempster and Camerarius, but he is probably a Scotch reflexion of the Irish Ernín (Aug. 18), son of Crasen, of Rathnoi. Dempster calls him the friend of St. Columba and author of Acta St. Columbae, lib. i. He says he flourished A.D. 587, and had his feast on Feb. 15, but Camerarius says Apr. 26. [ERNIN (3).] (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 192, 237; Tanner, Bibl. 263; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 135; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 265.) "Reliquiae colebantur in Sutherlandia" (Fordun, Scoticar. iii. c. 14.) [J. G.]

ERENBRECHTUS (ERENBERTUS), tenth bishop of Worms, succeeding Folcwicus, and followed by Bernhardus. From a distinguished abbat at Weissenburg, he became bishop. He is said to be mentioned as bishop in a diploma of Charles the Great, dated in A.D. 798, confirming a gift made by king Dagobert I. to St. Amandus, fifth bishop of the see, and to have died in the same year. The document attesting the original gift of Dagobert is in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 505. (Gall. Christ. v. 663.) [S. A. B.]

ERENDRUDA (ERENDRUDIS, ERENTRUDE, EREDRUDA, ERNDRUDA, ARIODRUDA), abbess at Salzburg cir. 585 or later. She was niece of Rudbert or Rupert bishop of Worms, afterwards of Salzburg, and the apostle of Bavaria (first Vita S. Rudb. cap. 2, § 9, Boll. Acta SS. 27 Mart. iii. 704 A; second Vita, cap. 2, § 5, ibid. 705 E). Owing to the title "soror" by which Rudbert addressed the abbess in her spiritual capacity, they have been, as observed by Pagi (viii. ad Baron. 718), erroneously considered brother and sister (vid. Boll. Acta SS. 30 Jun. v. 580 C, marg.; Hund, Metrop. Salzburg. i. 2, ii. 409, ed. Ratisp. 1719), while some have increased the confusion by making the Irish St. Trudpert their brother (Boll. 26 Apr. iii. 425 B; ibid. 427, Syllab. Capit. 3, 7, note). As Rudbert belonged to the royal stock of the Franks (Boll. Mart. iii. 703 D), his niece was a lady of rank, "nobilis virgo," and she was residing at Worms when invited by her uncle to preside over the female monastery he was founding at Salzburg. Thither she proceeded, accompanied by a body of matrons and virgins, one date of the event being

A.D. 585; but much uncertainty attaches to the precise chronology of this abbess (second Vita, cap. 2, ut sup.). The monastery was seated high up the hill beyond the city walls, and was originally named Cella, but it subsequently became known as Nonnenberg, "Nunnarum mons" (Hund, ii. 409). The Bollandists, who reckon Erendruda's period cir. A.D. 630, commemorate her death on June 30 (ut sup.), but the feast of her translation was observed at Salzburg on Sept. 3 (ibid. 582 C). An account of this abbess will be found also in Hansiz, Germ. Sac. ii. 46. [C. H.]

ERENFRIDUS, bishop of Constance. [ERENFRIDUS.]

ERENNIUS (HERENNIUS; IRENAEUS, Jerome; 'Αρρήνιος, Soc.; 'Επέννιος, Soz.; 'Επέννιος, Epiphan.), one of the bishops intruded into the see of Jerusalem by the Acacians after the deposition of Cyril in A.D. 349. Jerome places him second, as successor to Eutychius. Eutychius is ignored by Socrates (H. E. ii. 45), Sozomen (H. E. iv. 30), and Epiphanius (Haer. lxvi. 20), who all place Erennius immediately after Cyril's deposition. See on this perplexed and intricate subject, Tillemont's note, Mém. Eccl. viii. 782. [E. V.]

ERENWALDUS (Baron. Annales Eccles. A.D. 724, 13), bishop. [ERKENWALD.] [L. G. S.]

EREPTIOLUS, bishop of Coutances, died about A.D. 475. He was, according to some accounts, a native of Coutances, sent from Rouen as a missionary to his countrymen; according to others he was sent thither by St. Germanus while in Britain. (Gall. Christ. xi. 864; Gams, Ser. Ep. 542.) [R. T. S.]

ERETIUS (Labbe, Concil. i. 1488 D, ed. 1671), bishop. "Eretius Placianensis Galatiae Primae." [ERECHOREUS.] [T. W. D.]

ERFO, A.D. 762. His name occurs in an ancient charter of a monastery of Friuli, found in the monastery of S. Mary, Val d'Aoste. In a corresponding copy found elsewhere the name is printed Herto. Whatever his name was, he states that he and his two brothers have founded certain monasteries at Friuli. In one of the copies he signs as abbat (Patr. Lat. xcix. 627). [W. M. S.]

ERFOINUS, A.D. 720. In a charter dated at Anninchova, February, in the reign of Chilperic II., Erfoinus and his sons Teotarius and Rotarius make a grant of lands and goods in favour of the monastery of St. Coll. The land are Oppenwiller (probably Popenwiller, now Pfaffenweiler, near Freiburg), and Eberinger (Ecclesiast. Monum. num. lv. saec. vii. et viii. Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1268). [W. M. S.]

ERFURWIN (EVURWIN, EFORWIN), a benefactor, with his coheirs Hildirad and Irminevis to the monastery of St. Saviour at Verden on the Aller, founded by St. Ludger the apostle of Saxony. Erfurwin's deed, dated at Diapanbe Sept. 17, in the thirty-second year of Charlemagne, grants land in the wood of Hoissi to the presbyter Ludger "and the relics of the Hol Sever which he always carries with him." (Chartularium Werthimense, charter 11, in Patr. Lat. lxi. 802.) [C. H.]

ERGNAT, Irish saint. [ERGNAT.]

ERHARDUS (Gama, Ser. Ep. 304), bishop of Ratibon. [ERARD.] [C. H.]

ERHART, a Northumbrian abbat who attended the synod in which the legatine canons of 787 were accepted. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 462.) [J. R.]

ERIBALDUS, eighteenth in the list of the bishops of Viviers, succeeding Arcontius, and followed by Thomas I. at the beginning of the 9th century. There is an instrument of gift in favour of the church of Viviers bearing his name, but without date. (Rouchier, Hist. religieuse etc. du Vivarais, tom. i. p. 556; Gall. Christ. xvi. 547.) [S. A. B.]

ERIBALDUS CERNUUS, praepositus or provost of the cathedral of Arles, mentioned in the years 796, 799, during the pontificate of bishop Elifantus. From an early period down to modern times the head of the chapter of Arles has borne the title of provost; though that of dean, which was a distinct office, occasionally occurs. Eribaldus Cernuus commences the extant series of provosts; but no successor occurs until A.D. 869. (Gall. Christ. i. 595 c.) [C. H.]

ERICIUS (ARRIUS), bishop of Lausanne, present at the council of Chalon-sur-Saône, A.D. 650. (Gall. Christ. xv. 329; Mansi, x. 1194.) [T. W. D.]

ERIMBERT (EREMBERT, ERMBERT), second bishop of Freising, brother (apparently the elder brother) of Corbinian, his predecessor, and the son of Waldekia, a Frankish noble (Vit. Corbiniani by Aribio, cap. 1, § 1, in Boll. Acta SS. i. Sept. iii. 281, and cap. 5, § 43, ibid. p. 291 A, etc.; Swyskin's Comment. Præf. cap. 7, § 84, ibid. 776). He was consecrated to the see by Boniface, the apostle of Germany, according to the biographers of that saint (Othlon. cap. 31, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 649; Willibald, cap. 21 ibid. 623), and the date of this event is computed by Baronius (A. E. ann. 739, i.) to have been A.D. 739 (see also Wiltach, Handbook, i. 17). Not much reliance can be placed on this date. Hund (Metrop. Salisburg. i. 70, Ratisp. 1719) quotes one ancient authority, making Erimbert to have sat twenty-eight years, and another, which he prefers, giving him only fifteen. His successor Joseph was (according to Hund) elected in 758. Hansiz (Germ. Sac. ii. 71) believes he did not live later than 748. The Annales Altobonenses Majores (Pertz, Monum. Germ. Script. xi. p. 782) give 750 as the year of his consecration. Erimbert's episcopate appears to have been contemporary with the reign of (Ludwig of Bavaria, Freising (on the Isar, north of Munich) being then the capital of Upper Bavaria and the ducal residence. In Erimbert's time the dioceses of Bavaria are said to have been distinctly marked out. During his rule also many benefactors of the church of Freising appeared, a certain Mandebert with his wife being especially named. Erimbert com-secrated the monastery of Tegernsee, in Upper Bavaria, among the northern slopes of the Tyrolean mountains (Hund, ut sup.). [T. W. D.]

ERINALDUS, thirty-seventh bishop of Auch, succeeding Anerius and followed by Lupus or Aster, about the middle of the 8th century (Gall. Christ. i. 976; Gama, Series Episc. 497.) [S. A. B.]

ERINNYS in a Gnostic system described by Irenaeus (i. 29, p. 108), one of the evil offspring of the Maker of the world. [G. S.]

ERIPHIUS, addressed by Sidonius Apollinarius (v. 17), who describes to him the solemnities of the feast of St. Justus at Lyon. (Ceill. x. 389.) [R. T. S.]

ERKEMBODUS, or ERKEMBODO, ST., fifth abbat of the monastery of St. Bertin (also called the monastery of Sithu from its position) in the diocese of St. Omer. There are extant a charter of Chilperic II., given in the third year of his reign (719), confirming to Erkembodus and the monastery gifts of his predecessors, and two of Theoderic IV. in A.D. 721, of similar import, all making mention of venerabilis vir Erkembodus (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1129-1132). In 723, upon the death of Ravengerus, he was made bishop of Terouanne (ecclesia Morinensis), but retained the government of the monastery, and in the same year enriched it by the purchase of various lands, the deed conveying which may be seen in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1279. He died April 12, on which day he is commemorated, about the year 737, and was succeeded in the bishopric by Adalgerus. He was buried in the church of St. Omer. (Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 92; Gall. Christ. iii. 487, x. 1531; Le Coigne, Ann. Ecol. Franc. ann. 723, n. xl. tom. iv. p. 699.) [S. A. B.]

ERKENBERT (1) (Gama, Ser. Episc. 294), bishop of Minden. [HEHUMBERT.] [C. H.]

ERKENBERT (2) (Wend. F. H. ann. 640), ERKENBRIGHT (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1283, in M. H. B. 780), king of Kent. [EABCOMBERT.] [C. H.]

ERKENGOTA (Wend. F. H. ann. 640), daughter of Earcunbert, king of Kent, abbess of Brie. [EABCONGOTA.] [C. H.]

ERKENWALD, the fourth bishop of the East Saxons, whose capital and episcopal see was London (M. H. B. 617); brother of St. Ethelburga, founder of the abbey of Barking and Chertsey, and specially honoured at St. Paul's. On the early life of Erkenwald we have no historical light, but the legendary biographers assert that he was born at Stallington, in Lindsey, and was connected by birth with the family of Offa, king of the East Angles, by which statement probably the "Uffings," the family denomination of the East Anglian kings, is denoted. (Capgrave, f. 130.) According to the same authorities he was brought early under the influence of Mellitus, who was bishop of London from 604 to 619. From Bede we have more trustworthy information as to the next stage in his career. We learn that before he was raised to the episcopate he had gained a high reputation for sanctity, and become the founder of two monasteries, one at Chertsey in Surrey, in the kingdom of the West Saxons, the other at Barking in Essex. Chertsey he governed himself; Barking he committed to the care of his sister Ethelburga as a school for women. (Bede, H. E. iv. 6.) In the foundation of Chertsey Erkenwald was assisted by Frithewald, who is called by William of Malmesbury (G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 143) a subregulus or ealdorman of Wulfhere, king of Mercia. This statement is to some extent supported by charters of Chertsey, in which Erkenwald and Frithewald are mentioned as joint founders, and which, though not beyond suspicion as charters, are good evidence of ancient tradition. In one of these (Kemble, C. D. 986) Wulfhere confirms the grants made by the two founders; in another (ib. 987) Frithewald bestows estates on the monastery which Erkenwald rules, and which had been founded in the days of Egbert, king of Kent; in a third (ib. 988) Erkenwald and Frithewald join in a full settlement of the monastic estates, and in another (ib. 151) Offa, in 787, confirms the grants of the two founders settled a century before. If these documents are to be trusted Chertsey must have been founded whilst Surrey was in the hands of Egbert of Kent, who died in 673; it must later have come under the rule of Frithewald, the minister of Wulfhere of Mercia, who died in 675, and who was Egbert's brother-in-law; the foundation could therefore have preceded Erkenwald's elevation to the episcopate by a very few years. The foundation at Barking probably kept pace with that of Chertsey. To instruct his sister in the monastic rule, Erkenwald, according to his late biographers, invited Hildelitha from Chelles; if the nun Eadgyd died of the plague in 664 (Bede, H. E. iv. 8), Barking must have been founded before that year; the Chertsey register, however (Mon. Angl. i. 436), gives 666 as the year of the foundation of Barking, and there is a charter of Erkenwald, no doubt spurious but ancient, in which the date 677 is given (ibid. p. 439). [ETHELBURGA (3).]

On the death of Wina, to whom Wulfhere had sold the see of London, and probably, after the death of Wulfhere, to whom the East Saxon kings Sebbi and Sighere were subject (Bede, H. E. iii. 30). Theodore consecrated Erkenwald as Wina's successor, or rather, as the legendary life puts it (Dugdale, Hist. Paul. ed. 1658, p. 182), as successor to St. Cedda, the apostle of the East Saxons. The exact date of his appointment is not given by Bede, but as it is placed directly after the deposition of Winfrith, bishop of Mercia, in 675, it was probably in that or the following year, and may denote the recovery of some independent power for the East Saxons after the death of Wulfhere. In 676 the name "Frignwaldus," which probably represents Ercenwaldus, is found attached to a copy of a charter of the Hwiccan prince Oeric. (Kemble, C. D. 12.) The other charters throw no light upon this point, unless we may trust the above quoted charter of Barking, in which Erkenwald is made to say that he had visited Rome in the time of pope Agatho and in the year 677; even this he might have done as

The length of his episcopate is uncertain; eleven years are assigned to it in the notice of his life cited by Wharton (Epp. Lond. p. 17); if this be accepted, his death would fall in 687, but 685 is the year assigned by the same authority (Dugdale, Hist. Paul. p. 113); in the Barking charter he is represented as alive in 695, eighteen years after his visit to Rome. On this point we have two important evidences; the king of Wessex, who began to reign in 688, in the preface to his laws, issued in or about 690, describes himself as legislating with the counsel of Eorcenwold his bishop. (Thorpe, Ancient Laws, p. 45; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 214.) With this the evidence of charters agrees; there are two attested by him in his closing years, one of which, undated, he witnesses a grant to Barking made by Hodilred, a kinsman of king Sebbi, attested by bishops Wilfrid and Haedde, and therefore probably belonging to the period of Wilfrid's exile in Mercia after the year 692. (Kemble, C. D. 35.) In another which is less trustworthy and dated 688 (ib. 994) he attests an act of Caedwalha of Wessex. It seems probable, then, that Erkenwald survived Theodore, who died in 690, and did not live to see the consecration of Brihtwald in 693. When Sebbi king of Essex, shortly before his death in 695, went into a monastery, he received the monastic habit from Waldhere, Erkenwald's successor. The year of Erkenwald's death may thus be provisionally fixed about 693; the day as observed among the festivals at St. Paul's was April 30.

Erkenwald is one of those early prelates whose posthumous fame, bearing no proportion to the known events of their history, shews that their whole life and character impressed their generation more than any single act or trait. He was in close relations with three if not four of the rival dynasties of southern England, Kent, Wessex, Essex, and Mercia. He was summoned by Theodore when on his deathbed to advise him as to the restoration of Wilfrid in 686. (Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 42.) He was the founder of two famous monasteries, and such a benefactor to his cathedral church that he was reputed as almost its founder. His personal sanctity is spoken of by Bede in language which even his professed encomiasts in the biographies do not exceed, and the tradition that miracles of healing were ordinarily wrought by the horse-carriage which he had used in his illness is recorded with an expression of doubt by the venerable historian himself.

To the details of his life, as given by Bede, the biographers add little, except the story of a miracle in which his carriage is represented running on one wheel when the other had parted from the axle, and some circumstances about his death and funeral. According to this story he was attacked by his last illness at Barking; he called his friends and servants around him and blessed them before he breathed his last. Whilst he was dying the chamber was filled with a sweet odour. As soon as he was dead the monks of Chertsey and the nuns of Barking each claimed his body for burial in their own church. During the quarrel the citizens of London broke in, and insisted that, as he had been ordained bishop in their city, he should be buried there. They then proceeded to carry off his body, followed by the monks and nuns. As a

as they quitted the monastery the torches were put out by a storm of wind and rain. When they came to the river Lea, they found it swollen and impassable without boats, which were not at hand. The monks and nuns claimed this as a divine interposition on their behalf; the Londoners stoutly resisted, and declared that they would not yield. The quarrel was allayed by the mediation of one of Erkenwald's clergy, who advised both parties to pray for a sign from heaven that might determine the question; and the multitude immediately betook themselves to prayers and hymns. Thereupon the water divided and allowed the procession to advance to Stratford, where the torches were miraculously relighted and the storm ceased. The remains of the bishop were carried into London, being met by a crowd of rejoicing citizens, and placed in a shrine in the body of the church of St. Paul. On Feb. 16, 1140, the body was placed in a new shrine in the same place. From that place the relics were translated on Nov. 14, 1148, and placed in a new shrine on the east side of the wall above the high altar. (M. Westm. p. 245.) In 1386 bishop Braybrooke decreed that the feasts of the deposition and translation of St. Erkenwald should be kept on equal terms with the highest festivals; offerings were made and miracles recorded at the shrine down to the Reformation; it had considerable endowments, and was the centre of a religious guild. (Dugdale, pp. 20-22.) An engraving of the shrine is given by Dugdale, who has likewise preserved the short biography of the saint which was hung by the side of it, and which gives 675 as the date of his consecration, 685 as that of his death. (Ib. p. 113.) The tablet containing this was erected apparently in 1632.

At St. Paul's Erkenwald received all the honours due to a founder. His festivals were kept as first-class feasts, "sicut sacrum diem Dominicum," by bishop Braybrooke's ordinance (statutes of St. Paul's, ed. Simpson, p. 393); on those days the bishop was bound to personal attendance on the service (ib. p. 11); there were special forms of Secreta and Post-communio. (ib. p. 394.) Among the muniments was preserved a privilege brought by the saint himself from Rome (ib. p. 379; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 161), by which pope Agatho (A.D. 678-681) among other benefits secured to the clergy (congregatio) of the monastery the right of electing their bishops, who were to be confirmed at Rome. The continuity of the miracle-working at the shrine is remarkable even in an age of such wonders; and the indulgences granted were in proportion to the reputation of the sanctuary.

At Chertsey the memory of Erkenwald was cherished as long and as continuously. Besides the charters already noticed, the cartulary contained a privilege of exemption granted by pope Agatho to Chertsey, probably forged in the time of Edgar, but seemingly the model on which the privilege of St. Paul's was framed; by which the monastery was exempted from all interference from without, and the election and confirmation of the abbat were provided for. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 161-163.) A more genuine as well as more ancient evidence is found in a letter addressed by Sigebald, abbat apparently of Chertsey, to St. Bonifacio, in which he entreats him to allow himself to be recorded as a patron of the writer, together with bishop Daniel of Winchester, his diocesan; and, should Sigebald survive, the saint's name is to be inserted with that of St. Erkenwald in his prayers. (Mon. Moguntina, pp. 166, 167.) The Cartulary (MS. Vitellius A. 13) also contains a history of the foundation of the abbey, which is placed in 666. (Mon. Angl. i. 426.)

At Barking also the memory of Erkenwald was had in honour. The charter granted by Erkenwald himself secured to the monastery privileges analogous to those contained in the papal grants to St. Paul's and Chertsey (Mon. Angl. i. 438, 439), which privileges the grantor had been empowered by pope Agatho to bestow, when eighteen years before the granting of the charter, in 677, he had visited Rome. If this charter was genuine, which it is not, it would prove that Erkenwald lived until 695; it is attested by the same witnesses as those who attest the charter of Hodilred above mentioned. The fact of Erkenwald having visited Rome rests on the evidence of these charters and on the words of the biographer, that he was "de urbe Romulea destinatus." (Dugdale, p. 183.) It is not in itself improbable, but cannot be accepted as true without better evidence.

The historical materials for St. Erkenwald's life and miracles are those which have been quoted, a Vita S. Erkenwaldi, preserved in two 12th century MSS., Cotton, Claud. A. 5, and C.C.C.C. 161, is printed by Dugdale (ed. 1656 p. 181; ed. 1818, p. 289). This life is supposed by Sir T. D. Hardy to be the work of a canon of St. Paul's, nephew of bishop Gilbert Universalis (1128-1134), who also wrote the book on the miracles, which is found in the same C.C.C. MS. (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 292, 293.) Two other lives, one based upon this and printed by Capgrave, and in the Acta Sanctorum, Bolland. Apr. 30, vol. iii. p. 780; and another unprinted of the 14th century are also noticed by Sir T. Hardy. But all these are really of too late date to add anything trustworthy to the account of Bede, or the local tradition exemplified in the charters, which were probably fabricated in the reign of Edgar. The real fame of Erkenwald must rest on the fact that under the guidance and advice of Theodore he developed the condition of his great and influential diocese from the missionary stage in which Cædæ had left it to the full-grown state in which it became a well-organised church. Unfortunately the history of London during the whole Anglo-Saxon period is very obscure, but the great fame of Erkenwald, and the continuous honour shewn to him, seem to prove that he had been the greatest founder and benefactor whom the city recognised through the space of the four centuries that followed the conversion. More can scarcely be said; the continuity of his cultus and the permanence of the work ascribed to him, tell more than the most minute biography.

ERLAUREUS, twenty-eighth bishop of Meaux, following Sigenoldus, and succeeded by Aidenerus, in the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1602.) [S. A. B.]

ERLEFRIDUS. In the Chartulary of Saint Bertin, compiled by Folquinus, a monk of that abbey, about A.D. 875, chapter xix. recounts the succession of Erlefridus to Rigobertus as abbat of the monastery of Sithiu chapter xx. is a deed of purchase of certain lands executed by him; chapter xxi. relates the death of St. Bertin (the founder of the monastery), under the rule of Erlefridus; chapter xxii. the death of Erlefridus and succession of Erkenbodo. The death of St. Bertin took place in the fifteenth year of king Childebert, A.D. 709. (Patr. Lat. cxxxvi. 1199, Folquin St. Bertin. Monach. Chartul. cc. xix.-xxii.) [W. M. S.]

ERLINGUS, an archbishop of Tours, said to have been the forty-third, succeeding Gavienus, and followed by Josephus I., but there is great uncertainty as to the order of the bishops of this see, between Gregory and Josephus I. He lived towards the close of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 33; Gams, Series Episc. 640.) [S. A. B.]

ERLOMHAN had been kept in chains by Moenach, king of Munster, but on being released at the intercession of St. Fechin, he embraced the monastic life, lived under Fechin's rule, and died in sanctity. He does not appear in the kalendar. (Colgan, Acta SS. 137-38; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 370, 371.) [J. G.]

ERMARICUS appears among the signatures of the third Council of Toledo as Ermaricus Laniobrensis. The see of Laniobria cannot, however, be identified. The name appears in three councils—the third, thirteenth, and sixteenth, and nowhere else. Florez supposes the name to be a copyist's error for Britoniensis, a theory which Gams has adopted in his Series Episcoporum. (Esp. Sagr. xviii. 20; Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, vol. ii. part ii. p. 15; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238, iv. 287, 333.) [MAILLOC.]

ERMBERT (Annales Altahenses Major. ann. 750; Boll. Acta SS. 8 Sept. iii. 291 A), bishop of Freising. [ERIMBERT.] [C. H.]

ERME, Cornish saint. [HERMES.]

ERMEDHACH (AIRMEDHACH, EIRMBEADHACH, ERMEDUS, HERMITIUS), abbat of Craebhlaisre, commemorated Jan. 1. He was the founder and patron of the monastery of Craebhlaisre ("the tree of St. Laisre"), now Creevagh, near Clonmacnoise, and on the banks of the Shannon, King's County. He is called Eirmbeachach in the Ann. Four Masters, which place his death on Jan. 1. A.D. 681. In attempting to identify Aithmet or Ermedus, bishop of Clochar (Clogher), who is named in the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick among those who wrote the acts of that saint, Colgan suggests that he may be this Ermedhach or Hermitius of Craebhlaisre, but the only likelihood lies in the similarity of names. (Colgan, Acta SS. 742, c. 6, and Tr. Thaum. 128, c. 69 172 n. 4; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 288, n. 2, 289; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 19, ii. 261; Irish Nennius, by Todd and Herbert, 208; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 5.) [J. G.]

ERMEFREDUS, bishop of Lugo from about A.D. 653 onwards, signs the eighth council of Toledo in 658, under Rekesvinth, and the tenth in 656. He was, therefore, the contemporary and, after the tenth council of Toledo, the suffragan of St. Fructuosus. For an inscription which is declared to have been found in 1753 in the cloisters of the monastery of Samos, in the diocese of Lugo, in which Ernefredus appears as the founder or restorer of the monastery, see Esp. Sagr. xiv. 367. Hubner has not admitted it into his Inscriptiones Hispaniae Christianae, and the authority of Florez and Risco is not sufficient in matters of inscriptions. (Esp. Sagr. xlv. 80; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448, iv. 158.) [M. A. W.]

ERMEGUNDIS, an Anjevin woman, healed of blindness and contraction of the limbs on the feast day of St. Martin at Tours. (Greg. Tur. Mirac. S. Martin. iv. 23, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 1000.) [T. W. D.]

ERMELENDIS, a virgin anchoress in Brabant, cir. A.D. 600. She was born of noble parents, Ermenoldus and Ermensindis, and was related to Pippin and his daughter, St. Gertrude, a saint whose virtues she was desirous of emulating. As she was resolved to spend her days in celibacy and solitude, contrary to the wish of her parents, they assigned her the profits of their little village of Odenca. This spot, where was probably their abode, is the modern Donck, not far from the left bank of the Demer, near its junction with the Geete or Gette, its principal affluent, below Hasselt. She would not remain however, but, divesting herself of her locks, set out alone, and, after a narrow escape with her honour in one place where she attempted to settle, reached the village of Meldric, now Meldert, some eight miles distant, beyond the Demer, on a little beck named the Zwart that runs into that river. Here she subsisted on wild herbs for the rest of her days. Forty-eight years after her death her obscure tomb was discovered in a vision to a wayfarer, who built a chapel over it in her honour. She was commemorated on Oct. 29. Her life, from an ancient manuscript belonging to the church of Maestricht, is given by Surius. (De Prob. Hist. SS. 29 Oct. iv. 398.) [C. H.]

ERMELIUS, a Belgian saint. [ELMERUS.]

ERMEMBERTUS (ERMINBERTUS, Mon. Carol. 278), thirty-ninth occupant of the see of Bourges, succeeding Deodatus. There is extant a letter of pope Adrian to Charlemagne, assigned to the year 786, from which it appears that the king had sent Ermembertus to Rome to obtain from the pope the pallium, which at this time was worn by archbishops only. Bourges being the metropolitan see of Aquitaine, the request was granted, as appears from Adrian's letter. Ermembertus is said to have died A.D. 788, and was succeeded by Segolenna. (Gall. Christ. ii. 20, and Instr. 2; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 392; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. ann. 786, n. 59-60; ann. 788 n. 19, tom. vi. pp. 315, 370.)

[S. A. B.]

ERMEN, virgin, commemorated on Feb. 13 and perhaps to be identified with Mar. O'Gorman's Ernengilda of the same day, but both are otherwise unknown (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 49, and n.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 516.) [J. G.]

ERMENALDUS, bishop of Senlis. [ERMI-
BERG.]

ERMENARIUS (1), bishop of Limoges.
[ERMENTA.]

ERMENARIUS (2) (HERMENARIUS, HER-MENARIUS), twenty-sixth bishop of Autun, succeeding St. Leodegarius (Léger) and followed by Ansebertus. Our information concerning him is derived from the earliest and best of the Lives of St. Léger dedicated by the anonymous and contemporary author to Ermenarius himself. During the persecution which ended in the martyrdom of his predecessor, Ermena-rius was abbat of the monastery of St. Symphorian. St. Léger being shut up in Luxeuil, the people, wishing for the presence of a bishop among them, asked Childeric II. to appoint Ermenarius, and it seems that the latter at the same time begged earnestly of the king that St.
Léger might not be brought forth from Luxeuil, fearing that his enemies meant him harm. It appears that the motives of Ermenarius were misinterpreted, and he was accused of being his bishop's foremost enemy, in order that he might obtain his place (a. 6). Later, when St. Léger was lying in the custody of Wanigus with his features mutilated, Ermenarius obtained access to him, tended his wounds, and gave him food and drink (a. 13). Lastly, he came forward to claim, though unsuccessfully, the body of the martyr for his own church of Autun (a. 17).
This life is published by Mabillon in the Acta
SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. ii. p. 680 seqq., Paris, 1668-1701. Ermenarius's episcopate began in 678, the year of St. Léger's death, but its duration is unknown (Gall. Christ. iv. 356).

[S. A. B.]

ERMENBERGA (1), daughter of Betteric or Witteric, king of the Spanish Visigoths. In 697 she was sought in marriage by Theuderic king of Burgundy, and was allowed to be conducted to him by his ambassadors, Aridius bishop of Lyon and two others, after they had engaged by oath that she should never be degraded from her royal dignity. She became, however, the victim of court intrigues, which made her disliked by Theuderic, who sent her back to her father, but kept the treasure she had brought with her. (Fredegar. Chron. ann.
697, § 30, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 621.)

[T. W. D.]

ERMENBERGA (2) (Flor. Wig. ad Chron.
App. in M. H. B. 635 C, 638 A), queen of Mercia, daughter of Eormenred king of Kent. [EOR-MENBURH.]

[C. H.]

ERMENBURGA (1) (Flor. Wig. Gen. Reg.
Cont. in M. H. B. 627; id. ad Chron. App. in
M. H. B. 635 C), daughter of Eormenred king of Kent, sister of Ermenberga queen of Mercia.
Wendover (F. H. ann. 854, 876) makes her daughter of Eormenred king of Kent, wife of Merewald king of Mercia, and the foundress of an abbey; but see EORMENBURGA (1). [C. H.]

ERMENBURGA (2), supposed abbess of Lestry [EORMENBURGA (1).]

ERMENBURGA (3), queen of Northumbria and abbess. [EORMENBURGA (2).]

ERMENFREDUS (1), son-in-law of Aega or Aeganes the mayor of Neustria. Having in 640 slain count Aenulf or Ainulf in a mallus held at a vicus named Albioderum (unidentified; see Bouquet, Recueil, iii. Geog. Index), he fled for sanctuary to the church of St. Remigius at Rheims. (Fredeg. Chron. cap. 83, ann. 640, in Patr. Lat. lxxi. 658; Aimoin, iv. 37, in Patr.
Lat. cxxxix. 37.) [C. H.]

ERMENFREDUS (2), forty-fourth bishop of Paris, succeeding Erchenradus I. and followed by Inchadus. He is said to have been present at the council of Aix-la-Chapelle in A.D. 809, but it is only a conjecture. (Gall. Christ. vii. 30.)

ERMENFRIDUS (1), abbat of Cusantia (Cuisance) in Franche-Comté, a spot about seven miles from the left bank of the Doubs at the source of a little stream, the Cuisancin, which flows into that river near Beaume-des-Dames, above Besançon. It is still marked by some castle and monastic ruins. Ermenfrid was born of noble parents, and with his brother Wandalen passed some years of early life at the court of Clotaire II. About 627 he entered monastic life under abbat Waldebert at Luxovium (Luxeuil), the foundation of Columbanus, and at that time in the freshness of its fame. A monastery had been already erected at Cusantia by a nobleman named Iserius, and the property came by inheritance to Ermenfrid, who restored or enlarged the buildings, and, withdrawing from Luxeuil, went to preside there in person.
Before the third year of Dagobert he subjected the house as a priory to Luxeuil. After a good old age he was buried near his brother in the church of St. John the Baptist at Cusantia, and his memory was long afterwards venerated in those parts. He was commemorated on Sept.
25. His life by Egilbert or Gilbert, a subsequent prior of Cusantia, is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Sept. vii. 111). The monastery was in the 12th century made a priory of St.
Eugendus Jurensis, now St. Claude, on the southern slopes of the Jura, at the junction of the Bienne and its affluent the Tacon.

[T. W. D.]

ERMENFRIDUS (2) (ERMENFREDUS, HER-MANFROIZ), the slayer of Ebroin mayor of the palace, was a Frank noble, who held a fiscal office in the kingdom of Theodoric III. Ebroin had deprived him of the greater part of his property, and threatened him with death.
Ermenfridus, driven to despair, resolved to anticipate his persecutor. Stationing himself one Sunday morning at daybreak before Ebroin's door, he struck him down with his sword as he issued forth to attend matins (A.D. 681). He made good his escape to Austrasia, where he was welcomed by Ebroin's foe, duke Pippin.

ERMENFRIDUS (3) (Gall. Christ. v. 894), abbat of Augia Dives, and bishop of Constance.
[ERMFREDUS.] [C. H.]

ERMENGITHA (Flor. Wig. ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 635 c), daughter of Eormenred king of Kent. [EORMENGITHA.] [C. H.]

ERMENHILDA (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 76, ed. Hardy; Wend. F. H. ann. 676, ed. Coxe), ERMENILDA (Flor. Wig. ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 635 d, 637 e; Thom. Eliens. in Ang. Sac. i. 596; Dugd. Monast. i. 458, ii. 49; Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 368, 369), daughter of Earcombert king of Kent, queen of Mercia, abbess. [EORMENGILDA.] [C. H.]

ERMENIUS, thirty-first occupant of the see of Avignon, succeeding Eucherius and followed by Antoninus. The compilers of the Gallia Christiana (i. 865) quote an old codex to the effect that he was born in Burgundy, and that, when ordained bishop by St. Caesarius of Arles, he was a priest or abbat of the monastery of the Holy Cross at Arles. Pope Boniface II., in a letter to Caesarius, speaks of Armenius, presbyter and abbat, as the bearer of letters from Caesarius (A.D. 530). The variation in the initial letter is of no great weight. He is said to have died in A.D. 547. (Gall. Christ. i. 865; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxv. 31.) [S. A. B.]

ERMENO, bishop of Senlis. [ERMINUS.]

ERMENRED (A. S. C. ann. 640, in M. H. B. 310; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 675, in M. H. B. 534 e; id. ad Chron. App. in M. H. B. 638 a; Wend. F. H. ann. 640, 654; Malm. G. R. A. i. § 78, ed. Hardy), son of Eadbald king of Kent. [EORMENRED.] [C. H.]

ERMENTHEUS, nineteenth bishop of Toul, succeeded Adeodatus, after whose death the see was vacant for some months, owing to the wars between Dagobert II. of Austrasia, and Theodoric III. of Burgundy. He flourished about 680, and is said to have obtained from Theodoric the restitution of a piece of land called Ociacavilla, wrongly held from the church by count Hildrannus. He was succeeded by Magnaldus. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 964.) [S. A. B.]

ERMENTRANNUS, an archdeacon who subscribed the council of Rouen, held in A.D. 682. (Baron. an. A. E. 682, n. xi.; Labbe, Conc. vii. 1449.) [S. A. B.]

ERMENTRUDA, a matron of rank, who bequeathed certain possessions to certain churches about A.D. 700 at Paris. A long fragment of her will remains, signed by her friend count Mummolus and other distinguished persons. Its Latinity is extremely barbarous. Among churches she mentions the basilica of the Holy Cross or of St. Vincent of Paris, also that of St. Symphorian. Among her bequests is the chariot in which she was driven, with the oxen that belonged to it. This was the custom of noble ladies under the Merovingian kings. (Greg. Turon. Hist. iii. 26. The will is given in Eccles. Monum. saec. vii. et viii. in Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1243.) [W. M. S.]

ERMENUS (ERMENARIUS, ERMENO), 23rd bishop of Limoges, succeeding Caesarius, and followed by Salutaris. In A.D. 690 he is said to have buried the remains of St. Tillo (St. Theau), the recluse of Solignac, and to have been by them miraculously healed of an infirmity. (Gall. Christ. ii. 505.) [S. A. B.]

ERMESINDA (BERMESINDA), Pelayo's daughter and the wife of Alfonso the Catholic duke of Cantabria. Through her marriage (? before 737) with Alfonso the two small Christian states of Cantabria and Asturias were, after Favila's death, united, when Alfonso succeeded his brother-in-law, in right of his wife, and in the absence of other sons of Pelayo. The union thus achieved of the whole of the country north of the Asturias mountains, between the Pyrenees and Galicia under one head, is of course an important step in the history of the infant kingdom. [ALFONSO I.] Ermesinda was the mother of Froila I. (q. v.) and Vimaranus, and of Adosinda, who afterwards became the wife of Silo, and who is mentioned in the Libellus of Beatus and Etherius against Elipando. [ADOP-TIONISTS.] Alfonso the Catholic and his wife were buried together in the monastery of St. Mary, near Cangas (Seb. Sal. cap. 15, apud Esp. Sagr. xiii.), but her tomb, together with Alfonso's, is now shewn in the church of Covadonga (Flores, Reynas de España, i. 44). [M. A. W.]

ERMINA. [ERNIN (?).]

ERMINFRID, son of Eadbald king of Kent. [EORMENRED.] [C. H.]

ERMINUS, ST., born at Laudunum (Laon) in Picardy. Becoming famous for his learning and piety, he was removed to the monastery of Laubium (Lobbes), on the left bank of the Sambre, nearly opposite Thuin, in Hainault, where he succeeded St. Ursmarus as abbat and bishop. He excelled as a preacher, and was held in great repute as a prophet. He died A.D. 737, and was commemorated on April 25. (Acta SS. 25 Ap. iii. 374; Baron. Annales Eccles. A.D. 737, 3.) [I. G. S.]

ERMINUS (ERMENO, HERMINIUS, ERMEN-ALDUS), twenty-fifth bishop of Senlis, following Ragnaldus, and succeeded by Godefredus. All we know of him is that he was present at three councils held at Rheims in A.D. 813, at Noyon in 814, and at Aix-la-Chapelle in 816. (Gall. Christ. x. 1384; Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rhem. ii. 18 - Labbe, Conc. ix. 339, 393, 399.) [S. A. B.]

ERMIUS, bishop of Nantes. [ERNIUS.]

ERMOALD (1), a Frank noble near Chartres in the 6th century, who after an ill-spent life sent a present of forty solidi on his death-bed to the abbat Launomarus with a request that he would pray for his recovery. The abbat returned the money with this text, "The sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord." (Vita Launomari, cap. iv. § 19, Boll. Acta SS. 19 Jan. ii. 233.) [T. W. D.]

ERMOALD (2), abbat of the monastery of St. Salvator ("domini Salvatoris locus qui dicitur Leones") c. 760. (Catalogus Rerum Langob. et Ital. Brixiensis et Nonantulus, in Monum. Rerum Ital. 1878, p. 503.) [A. H. D. A.]

ERMOLANDUS, bishop in Brittany, 710.

ERMULFUS, bishop of Coimbra in 633, in which year Renatus, archpriest of Coimbra, signed as his vicar the acts of the fourth council of Toledo. (Esp. Sagr. xiii. 73, Aguirre-Catalan. iii. 385.) [LUCENCIUS.] [M. A. W.]

ERMUVOLFUS (Baron. A. E. ann. 798, iv., heretic. [EREMWOLFUS.] [C. H.]

ERNACHUAG, of Dun-da-en, is given in the Felire of Aengus at Oct. 30 as "Ernachua, son of Jairnn his name, and at Dun-da-en in the Feevah (wood) of Dalaradia he is commemorated" (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 300, 380). The place is now Duneane, in the barony of Upper Toome, co. Antrim, and the person is to be distinguished from Ercnat or Heremat virgin of Duneane (Oct. 30), and Ernach, son of Echin (Oct. 30). [J. G.]

ERNADHACH (ERENACH), son of Echin, abbat of Leithghlinn (Leighlin, co. Carlow), died A.D. 774 (Ann. Ult. 773; Four Mast. 769). [J. G.]

ERNAEUS (ERNEUS, ERINEUS, HERNEUS), founder and abbat of the monastery of St. Martin, near Le Mana, in the 6th century. His name appears only in modern martyrologies. (Boll. Acta SS. 9 Aug. ii. 425; Gallia Christ. xiv. 432.) [T. W. D.]

ERNAN is a name which assumes many forms, such as ERNEN, ERNIN, also MERNOC, MARNOCK (from the use of the affectionate prefix Mo and of the diminutive oc), and is sometimes turned into the Latin equivalent FERREOLUS; it frequently occurs in the Scotch and Irish Hagiologies. O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, i. 175 n. 6) gives a list of twenty-five with their days of dedication in the kalendars. [J. G.]

ERNAN (1), son of Aedh. Commem. May 16. O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 133) supposes this to be Ernin, son of Aedh, of the race of Irial, son of Conall Cearnach, as he does not find any other Ernan, son of Aedh, in the Saint History or Naomhseanchus. Colgan (Acta SS. 17 n. 11) says he flourished in Ulster about A.D. 660. [J. G.]

ERNAN (2), son of Eoghan. Commem. Jan. 1. Colgan (Acta SS. 7-9) gives a short memoir of this Ernan, and in a note adds an interesting account of this and the other Ernans, associated with the name of St. Columba, namely, the uncle and two nephews of that saint, and the little boy whom he blessed and declared would be in course of time so famous. St. Ernan of Jan. 1 was nephew of St. Columba, being son of Eoghan, son of Feilim or Feidhlimidh, and thus was connected with the ruling families of the Dalriadic Scots. In the Appendix to Adamnan (Vit. S. Col.) in Codex B we find "logen germanus frater Ccolumbae junior." But concerning Ernan Boethius and Dempster have these serious mistakes, which Colgan has generally accepted; they have confounded him with Ernan, the uncle of St. Columba and praepositus of Hinba, and thus have included him among the twelve who accompanied St. Columba from Ireland; they have given him the name of Ethernan, and made him brother of Cibthachus or Cobthach, brother of St. Baithen (June 9) Ethernan; and based on these, they have, rightly or wrongly, supposed that he was many years with his uncle in Scotland before returning to take up his residence in Ireland (Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 15, works, vi. 237; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 157; Colgan, Acta SS. 7, 8). Whether he was in Scotland or how long he remained we really do not know, but he outlived St. Columba by a long time, as when he was a very old man he related to St. Adamnan (who was born A.D. 624) the wonderful vision vouchsafed to himself and others when they were fishing in the river Finn, in Donegal, on the night of St. Columba's death; he assured St. Adamnan, who was then a youth, that the whole vault of heaven suddenly became illuminated, and, when he raised his eyes and looked to the east, he saw something like an immense pillar of fire, which seemed to be ascending into heaven, and when it penetrated the heavens darkness followed, as if the sun had just set. St. Adamnan's informant was, he says (Vit. St. Colum. iii. c. 24), "a very old man, a servant of Christ, whose name may be called Ferreol, but in the Scotie tongue Ernene, of the race of Mocufirroide, who, as being himself a holy monk, is buried in the Ridge of Tomma (now Drumhome), amidst the remains of other monks of St. Columba, and awaits the resurrection with the saints" (Reeves, Adamnan, 237-8). He is called Mocufirroide, because he was descended from Fergus, son of Conall Gulban. He established himself, apparently neither as abbat nor bishop, at Druim-Tomma, in the region of Tyr-Aedha (now Drumhome, in the barony of Tirhugh, co. Donegal), and, as said above, died and was buried there about A.D. 640 or a few years later (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 10; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 21, 429; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 332-3). With so many Ernans identification is difficult, but this person is said to be patron of Kilviceuen, (the Church of the Son of Eoghan), in Mull, and of Killernan. He may also have given its name to Killearn, Kilearnadil, or Kilearnadale, a parish in Jura, Argyleshire, and now united to Colonsay (C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 276; Monro, West. Islands, 117; Martin, West. Islands, 239). Ussher (Eccl. Ant. c. 17, works, vi. 540) identifies him with the Ernian who appears in pope John's pastoral letters, but the person was really St. Ernan (Aug. 17), of Torach or Tory. In the Scotch kalendars he is called Ethernan, and commemorated on Dec. 21 and 22. Thus Adam King has "Dec. 22, St. Ethernane, bishop and confess., disciple to St. Colme in Scotland under king Aidanus, A.D. 582." Dempster has on the same day, "In Scotia Ethernani episcopi qui in Insulis Sooticis natus, sancti Columbae discipulus fuit;" and Cameraarius completes the identification, "Dec. 21, S. Ethernanus, abbas et confessor, S. Columbae, ex fratre nepos" [ETHERNAN.] (Bp. Forbes, Kal. 170, 222, 243). [J. G.]

ERNAN (3), abbat of Hinba. He was uncle of St. Columba, and accompanied him to Iona. Being brother of St. Columba's mother Eithne, he was son of Dina, son of Noe, of the race of Cathair Mór. He was placed by St. Columba in charge of the monastery founded by St. Columba at Hinba, but the place, though evidently a favourite resort for St. Columba and the scene of many wonders, such as the appearance of the fiery pillar above St. Columba's head when he celebrated the Eucharist in the presence of St. Comgall (May 10), of Bangor, St. Cainnech (Oct. 11) of Agnaboe, St. Brendan (May 16) of Clon-fert, and St. Corbmac Ua Luathain or O'Lethan (June 21) of Lary, and again the "glorious and unspeakable visitation" made for three days and three nights by the Spirit to St. Columba (Adamnan, Vit. S. Columb. iii, cc. 17, 18), is not clearly identified, though probably it was Elachnave, one of the Garveloch group of islands. He died at Iona immediately on his arrival from Hinba, and before St. Columba and he could meet, according to the prophecy of St. Columba (Adamnan, Vit. S. Columb. i. c. 35). (On his life, see Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 13; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 15, works, vi. 237 sq.; Tanner, Bibl. 264; Colgan, Acta SS. 8, n. 2, and Tr. Thaum. 379-80, 490; but Colgan errs in regarding him as the same with Ernin or Mernoc, of Rathnoi; Reeves, Adamnan, 26, 87, 246-7, et al.) Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 253) ascribes to him Exhortationes ad fratres in Hinba insula, lib. i., and In regulom S. P. Columbae, lib. i., but they probably never existed. [J. G.]

ERNAN (4), nephew of St. Columba, son of his sister Cumania and her husband Degillus, but it is doubtful as to whether he has any dedication, either as Ernan or Mernoc, the latter name being given him in the list, in Codex B, of St. Columba's relations. (Colgan, Acta SS. 8 n. 2, and Tr. Thaum. 490 n. 2, 491 n. 1; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 15, works, vi. 231; Reeves, Adamnan, 246.) [J. G.]

ERNAN (5) of Cill-na-sagart, Oct. 26. In the Martyrologies he is "Ernan of Miodhlua-chair, of Cill-nasagart" (Mart. Doneg.), Miodhlua-chair being the name of the great road which led from Leinster to Armagh, but beyond this we have no information regarding his time, place, or history. Dr. Reeves, however, suggests the probability of his being Ternoc, son of Ciaran, who died A.D. 716 (Ann. Tyh.), and whose memorial is still seen in the form of a pillar-stone at Kilnasagart, near Jonesborough, co. Armagh. [TERNOC.] (Ulst. Journ. Arch. i. 223-24; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 285.) [J. G.]

ERNAN (6) of Cluain-deochra, Jan. 11. In St. Fechin's Life (Colgan, Acta SS. 138, c. 38, 142 n. 29) there is a notice of his paying a visit to St. Ernan in his monastery of Cluain-deochra, in Meath; he was so annoyed with the sound of the mill beside the guest-house or hospice that he gave it his blessing, and thereby delivered the guests of all future time from the noise of the grinding. O'Clery, by his entry in the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 13) evidently seeks to identify this Ernan as Ernin, son of Crasen, but they are probably different persons; others regard him as the same with Ernan, of Torach; and Archdall has placed Cluain-deochra at Clonrass on the Brosna, co. Westmeath. But by either name the place is unknown, and the facts regarding the saint remain in uncertainty (Archdall, Mon. Hib. 708; Reeves, Adamnan, 238; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 174-75, ii. 448.) [J. G.]

ERNAN (7) of Tech-ernain, Jan. 17. He is thus designated in Mart. Doneg.; in Mart. Tallaght on this day is "Ernain ocus Hernind o Tigh-Ulltain," Tigh probably being the place, and Ulltain the name of another person, as in Mart. Doneg. Colgan somewhat doubtfully suggests his identification with Ernan or Mernoc, nephew of St. Columba and son of Degillus (see above, No. 4); efforts also are made towards localising Tigh or Tigh-ernain, in the counties of Meath and Westmeath, but with no very marked success. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 491 n. 2; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 21; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xii.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 297, 298.) [J. G.]

ERNAN (8) of Torach, Aug. 17. He was son of Colman, son of Maenan, son of Muiredhach, of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall, and thus second cousin to Damongoch, son of Saran, pilgrim of Tory. O'Donnell (St. Columb. i. cc. 73) relates the wonderful history connected with the foundation of the first church on the island of Torach or Tory, on the north coast of Donegal, and the placing St. Ernan over it as its first abbat, but Colgan is mistaken in trying to identify him with Ernan (Jan. 11) of Cluain-deochra, in Meath. He was evidently a well-known person in his day, and his name appears as Ernianus or Hernianus in the famous letter which John the pope-elect (Bede, ii. c. 19) addressed in A.D. 640 to the clergy of the north of Ireland, urging them to conformity with the rest of Christendom upon the Paschal questions and to a firm opposition to Pelagianism. [ERNAN (11).] St. Ernan, of Torach, flourished about A.D. 650 (Colgan, Acta SS. 17 n. 11, and Tr. Thaum. 401, 451 n. 10, 490 n. 2; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. ii. c. 15, § 11; Reeves, Adamnan, 238; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, works, vi. 540-1; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 174; Ulst. Journ. Arch. 150 n., 153; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 253.) [J. G.]

ERNANIA was a nun in a monastery called Druim-forachadh or Kill-Ua-sona, in Carbery, co. Longford, who is said in the Vit. St. Fechin to have drawn milk from a hind for the use of those labouring in the mill (Colgan, Acta SS. 138, c. 41, 140 n. 21.) [J. G.]

ERNDRUDA, abbesa. [ERENDRUDA.]

ERNENEUS, Scottish saint. [ERENAEUS.]

ERNENGILDA, Irish saint. [ERMEN.]

ERNESTUS, abbat, mentioned as present at a council held at Dingolvinga, or Dingolfing, in Bavaria (Baron, Annales Eccles. A.D. 772, 24.) [I. G. S.]

ERNEUS, abbat of Le Mans. [ERNAEUS.]

ERNFRIDUS (ERENFRIDUS, ANEFRIDUS), abbat of Augia Dives, and 18th bishop of Constance, succeeding Rudoltus or Rodulfus, and followed by Sidoinus or Sidonius. In the Chronicle of Hermannus Contractus (ad an. 736, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxliii. 157), he is given as the successor of Audoinus, who preceded Rudoltus, but a letter addressed by pope Gregory III. in 738 to various German bishops, and amongst them Rodulfus (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 580), has induced the authors of the Gallia Christiana (v. 894) to insert his name between those of Audoinus and Ernfrid. The latter's episcopate lasted ten years, and his death is placed in the year 748. [S. A. B.]

ERNIN (ERNENE) is only another form of the name of ERNAN, and often, like it, becomes MERNOC, MARNOC, and MARNAN. In the Irish Martyrologies there are many Ernins, but con-positively few admit of identification or present any point of use or interest.

(1) Of Cluain-railgheach, commemorated Aug. 5. In the Life of St. Faranan (Feb. 15) this Ernia is included in the list of those prelates who met St. Columba on one occasion of his returning to Ireland, but from this, which is so full of anachronisms, nothing can be deduced as to his time or history; Cluain-railgheach is said to be in Meath (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 213; Colgan, Acta SS. 337, c. 7, 339 n. 27).

(2) Of Cremchoill, commemorated May 31. He has his commemoration on this day in Mart. Doneg., but in Mart. Tallaght he is mixed up with Eghan, abbat of Magh-bile. [EOGHAN (6).] The name of his church has passed through a series of changes, Crawmkill, Croghill, Craughill, Crewill, to the present Cranfield, a parish in the barony of Upper Toome, co. Antrim. (Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 87 et al.; Joyce, Ir. Names of Places, 2 ser. 329; Colgan, Acta SS. 650, c. 8.)

(3) Of Rathnoi, commemorated Aug. 18. The entry in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 223) is "Ernia, i.e. Mernog, of Rath-noi, in Ui-Gardua, i.e. in Fotharta, of Leinster; and of Cill-tuaghnech, in Ui-drona;" and the entry in Mart. Tall. (by Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xxxij.) is "Erni Mac Creisini, o Rathnui, in h. Garrcha." The person thus designated is the saint who in Ireland is usually known as Ernin or Mernoc, and in Scotland as Marnoch,—mo-ernin-ox, "my dear little Ernin." [MARNOC.] He was son of Crasen or Cressin, and probably belonged to the neighbourhood of Clonmacnoise, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's County. On one occasion when St. Columba visited that monastery, while he was founding his own one at Derry, as related by St. Adamnan (Vit. St. Columb. i. 3), and was being conveyed with great state and acclamation by the assembled monks into the precincts of the monastery, there came, among the crowd, a poor lad, mean in dress and bearing, and evidently not much thought of by his seniors. Yet St. Columba prophesied his piety, eloquence, and renown. "This," says St. Adamnan, "was Ernene, son of Crasen, who was afterwards famous and most highly honoured in all the churches of Scotia" (Ireland) (Reeves, Adamnan, 25-6). This was about A.D. 590. His death, unnoticed in the Ann. Four Mast., took place in the year 635 (Ann. Tig.). Ussher says he flourished about that time in Ireland, but evidently that great antiquary's mind was in the utmost confusion regarding the saint. His churches are Rathnai, or Rathnew, the parochial name of Wicklow, and Kill-droighneach, in Ui-drona, now Kildree, a townland in the parish of Dunleckny, barony of Idrone East, and county of Carlow. (Reeves, Adamnan, 256; Montalembert, Monks of the West, iii. 209-10, Edinb. 1861; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 17, § 1; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 502, 540-41; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. 4; Colgan, Ir. Thaum. 142, c. 3, 373 n. 20, 401, c. 71, 434, c. 17, 450 n. 9.)

(4) Son of Finachan, abbat of Leithglinn (Leighlin, co. Carlow). Commemorated Nov. 13 (Mart. Doneg.).

(5) Cas, of Leithglinn (Leighlin, co. Carlow) is commemorated in Mart. Doneg. and Mart. Tall. on Feb. 23, but otherwise unknown (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 681).

(6) The sons of one of this name had their dedication on Sept. 22, in Inismac-n-Ernin or Inishmacnerin, now Church Island, in Lough Key, co. Roscommon (Mart. Doneg.).

(7) Ernin or Ermina, daughter of Airchuin or Archenn, and by some identified with Febair or Fedbair (Nov. 6), is commemorated in the Irish Martyrologies on Feb. 28, and placed by the Bollandists among their praetermissi. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 733.) [J. G.]

ERNISIUS, presbyter, one of two who are said to have founded Llanthony, Monmouthshire, in the time of St. David, its original patron (Girald. Cambr. Itin. Camb. i. c. 3, wks. vi. 40). [J. G.]

ERNTRUDIS (Hund. Metrop. Salisburg. p. 2, ed. 1719), abbes. [ERENDRUDIS.] [C. H.]

ERONUS (HERO), twenty-eighth bishop of Langres, succeeding Garobaldus, and followed by Astoricus. In the chronicle of the Monastery of St. Benignus (quoted Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 686, n. xxxix., tom. iv. p. 159, and Gall. Christ. iv. 524), it is related that in the time of Wulfecrannus, the abbat, the head of the church of Langres was the venerable bishop Eronus, who, among other benefits which he conferred upon that monastery, obtained from popes Johannes and Sergius a mandate that none should dare to make or consecrate any cemetery besides that belonging to the church of St. Benignus. And, in accordance with this, there is extant a charter given by pope Sergius in the tenth year of his reign, confirming to the monks of St. Benignus the privileges of their cemetery. The genuineness of this instrument, however, is called in question by Le Cointe, from internal evidence. Eronus died about A.D. 713, (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 35; Gall. Christ. iv. 524; Le Cointe, an. 697, n. iii., tom. iv. p. 336, and an. 713, n. xxxvii., tom. iv. 526). [S. A. B.]

EROS ("Epos, HEROS, HERUS), fifth bishop of Antioch, coming between Cornelius and Theophilus (Euseb. H. E. iv. 20; Niceph. Call. H. E. iii. 25, p. 258; Georg. Syncell. p. 350 a). He has been called (as by Constantius, ut inf.) Heros II. through the mistake of supposing that the name of the third bishop (Heron, "Hepor") might be a slight variety of "Epos." Fleury (lib. iii. 33, 39) miscalls him Heron. There is some discrepancy as to the dates of Eros. The Chronicle of Eusebius places his accession under A.D. 143, there stating that he ruled twenty-four years, while Theophilus is made to succeed under A.D. 170, so that either there was an interregnum or there must be an error in the "twenty-four years," which, however, is the authoritative reading: it is the one adopted by Migne. The episcopate of Eros is stated to have lasted twenty-six years by Syncellus, who is here followed by some in preference to Eusebius, as e.g. by Boschius, who gives A.D. 142-168. Constantius (in Neale's Patriarchs of Antioch) has 151-169. Eros of Antioch is thought by Neale (Pat. Ant. p. 24) to be the "Epos of 8

Greek iambic couplet at June 24 of the Menaea. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 701; Boschini, Patr. Ant. p. 11, in Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iv. Introd.) [C. H.]

EROS, bishop of Arles. [HEROS.]

EROTEIS, martyr. [CAPITOLINA.]

ERPULION (EXPULSION), son of Witiza king of Spain. On his father's death he fled with his brother Farmarius or Furmalus to Africa, where count Julian (the husband of their father's sister) espoused their cause against Roderick, and occasioned the Moorish conquest of Spain. Mariana calls the two brothers Eba and Sisebutus. (Lucas Tudens. Chron. ann. 748 in Schott. Hisp. Illust. tom. iv. p. 70; Marian. De Reb. Hisp. lib. vi. cap. 19, vol. i. 239, 240, 243; Baron. A. E. 713, 19.) [T. W. D.]

ERPWALD (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. iii. ann. 582, in M. H. B. 720 D), king of East Anglia. [ERPWALD.] [C. H.]

ERTHA, Irish saint. [BLANE.]

ERTHAD, Pictish saint. [IRCHAD.]

ERVIGIUS (1), ERVIG, ERWICH, Gothic king of Spain from A.D. 680 to 687. Sebastian of Salamanca, a 9th-century chronicler (Esp. Sagr. xiii. 476) says that his father Ardabastus was a Greek exile from Byzantium, who married a relation of king Kindasvinth. What is more probable is that Ardabastus was a native of one of the coast towns which remained under Byzantine rule up to 625, or possibly of Tingis or Septum, which still obeyed Byzantine governors at the time of the Moorish invasion. Anyhow, his marriage had brought him within the circle of the Gothic nobility, and we find his son Ervig among Wamba's palatini at the time of the extraordinary conspiracy which overthrew that king. [WAMBA.] What was Ervig's share in the plot cannot now be made out with certainty. The poison story, however (Sebastian of Salamanca, in Esp. Sagr. xiii.), seems to be a legendary accretion of later times. What probably happened was that in the unconsciousness of illness Wamba was hurried into the penitential habit (see for an account of this custom and its abuses, legislated upon before Wamba's time by Kindasvinth, Masdeu's Hist. de España, vol. xi. España Goda, p. 272), that when he returned to his senses he found arrayed against him a conspiracy of the nobility and clergy, headed by Ervig and the famous Julian of Toledo, too formidable to be resisted, and by which he was forced first to surrender his crown, and secondly to subscribe to two documents: (a) nominating Ervig his successor, (b) entreating the metropolitan of Toledo to anoint Ervig king. Accordingly, on the 22nd of October, 680, eighteen days after the monastic habit had been imposed upon Wamba, Ervig was anointed king by Julian (the second instance of anointing known in Spanish history; Wamba's is the first). On the 9th of January the twelfth Council of Toledo, called by Ervig, met in the church of the Holy Apostles. It consisted of thirty-four bishops, four abbats, three proxies, and fifteen virii illustres officii palatini. The king appeared, asked, kneeling, for the prayers of the bishops, implored them to find remedies for the diseases of the state, and handed to them a tomus containing his wishes and recommendations. He then retired, and the tomus was read. In it the council was asked to confirm his election to the throne, to approve his fresh laws against the Jews, twenty of which had been drawn up by himself and Julian in the interval between his accession and the assembly of the council, as well as to reaffirm the existing laws (Lex Visigothorum, edition by Spanish Academy, Madrid, 1815, tit. 12, lib. 5). The modification of Wamba's law of military service, De his qui ad bellum non vadunt, is recommended also on the ground that half the population of Spain had forfeited civil rights under its over-strict provisions. The king had indeed resolved to amend the law for the future, but the council is asked to reinstate those who have already suffered from it.

The four canons which follow are of considerable historical and constitutional interest. The first recognises the legality of Ervig's title to the throne. The council have, it says, examined three documents laid before them: (1) a declaration signed by the seniores of the palace, describing the assumption of the ecclesiastical dress and tonsure by Wamba; (2) a paper in which Wamba names Ervig his successor; (3) a document addressed to Julian by Wamba, in which Julian is directed to anoint Ervig king. After inspection of these it declares Ervig elected king by the unanimous consent of all the bishops, and releases the people from the oath of allegiance to Wamba. May anathema and the vengeance of God overtake any who lift a hand against Ervig.

The second canon provides that all who have assumed the garb of penitence, even against their will, shall thenceforward be compelled to keep their oath, and to refrain from all temporal employments. The argument that the vow was made for them, and the dress assumed by them without their assent and consciousness, is to avail them nothing. Children are not conscious in baptism of what is done for them, but the baptismal vow is none the less binding. Notwithstanding the priest who rashly imposes the penitential dress upon an unwilling or unconscious person is to be punished by a year's excommunication. It shall be sufficient, however, if he can prove that the penitential dress was asked for by signs only, manuum indicibus. (Under Kindasvinth, Co. Tol. x. 3, a declaration in writing had been required.) This canon is of course levelled against the still living Wamba.

The third canon provides for the readmission into ecclesiastical communion of certain political offenders who had been pardoned by the king and invited by him to the royal table. It is not fitting that those "who eat with the king" should lie under the ban of the church. Dahn (Könige der Germanen, Vte Abtheilung, 477) takes this as referring to Ervig's co-conspirators, who had been the traitors of Wamba's reign, and most probably concerned in Paul's rebellion and by whose help, together with that of the church, Ervig had risen to power.

Stephen, metropolitan of Merida, is then introduced, and implores the pardon of the assembled bishops for his complicity in certain acts of Wamba. Wamba had attempted with "his asserted self-will" to institute two new bishoprics, upon his own responsibility only. Ervig pleads compulsion by the king, and the sixth canon absolves him, and arranges what is to be done with regard to the bishoprics. The fifth canon restores to all those who had suffered outlawry for the violation of Wamba's military law, the capacity of giving evidence, together with the titles of their former rank and class. In the sixth canon the laws against the Jews, of which the titles as given in the acts correspond exactly with those now standing in the above-quoted book and title of the Fuero Juzgo, are confirmed. The sixth canon is perhaps the most important of the council. It provides for the transference of the right of election to bishoprics to the metropolitan of Toledo and the king only, abolishing thereby at one fell swoop all the constitutional process of election by clergy and people, consecration by metropolitan and suffragan, and confirmation by the crown, which had been decreed by Cc. Tol. iv. 19. We shall have more to say of this famous canon under the head of Julian. In connexion with Ervig it is interesting, as throwing light upon the character and objects of the conspiracy to which he owed his throne.

The twelfth council of Toledo, as Helfferich has already pointed out (Entstehung und Geschichte, &c. 194), was imitated in all points from the eighth council under Rekesvinth. "Like Rekesvinth, Ervig calls the council in January, makes a speech, brings forward proposals of legislation, has the decisions drawn up in twelve canons, the thirteenth canon being merely a thanksgiving which has its parallel also in the eighth council, orders the same complete list of signatures, and that decretum and lex shall not be wanting (see C. Tol. viii.; Aguirre-Catalani &c. 446) appends a decretum and constitutio from Gundemar's time." [GUNTHER.] The intention seems to have been to connect the new era immediately with that of Rekesvinth, Ervig's relation, passing over the reign of Wamba, and thus to give it, if possible, an air of legitimacy.

Early three years later (Nov. 4, 683) Ervig summoned the thirteenth council of Toledo, which, under the presidency of Julian, consisted of forty-seven bishops, nine abbats, twenty-six monks, and twenty-six viri illustres. The same ceremonies were observed as at the preceding council, and we have again the king's appearance among the bishops, his prostration before the altar (coram coetus vestri reverentia humilis tractatus prosternor), and the delivery of the laws. In this council those who had suffered outlawry and confiscation of goods under the previous reign on account of Paul's rebellion were still further propitiated. Canon 1 ordered the restitution of the forfeited property except in cases where the property had been already bestowed on others. All that still remained in the royal treasury (fisci—juribus applicata) of the confiscated goods was ordered to be restored. Canon 2 forbade the arbitrary imprisonment or treatment of palatini or ecclesiastics. Accused persons of high ecclesiastical or secular rank were not to be tortured or chained or robbed of their goods before trial. They were to be brought without delay before the tribunal of the law, and there judged after a fair hearing.

By canon 3 all arrears of taxes up to the first year of Ervig's reign were remitted, a measure which looks like a bid for popularity on the part of a consciously weak government. Canon 4, de Munitione Regis Proles, is the first appearance of a form which recurs in later councils under Egica. Decrees on the same subject, differently worded, are to be found in C. Tol. v. 2 and C. Tol. vi. 16. Attempts to murder the queen or the royal family, to despoil them of their goods, to impose the tonsure upon the sons or the religious habit on the daughters or daughters-in-law, to inflict exile, mutilation, or stripes upon any of them, are described and denounced with singular minuteness. We shall find this canon first attacked and then imitated by Egica, Ervig's successor (q. v.) Canon 5, which no doubt had a clear political meaning at the time, is now inexplicable to us. It forbids the marriage of a king's widow with any one, even though a king himself, much less with a subject. It cannot be allowed that a former queen, a part of the body of the deceased king, should give herself to a subject. The third council of Saragossa, held in 691, went further than this, and drew up a canon (Can. 5, Hefele, Conc.-Gesch. iii. 297) directing that a royal widow should be compelled to retire into a cloister immediately after her husband's death. Canon 6 provided that henceforward no slave or freedman should ever be admitted to the palace offices. "Exceptis servis vel libertis fiscalibus," no non-noble person should be made administrator of the fiscus or of the royal property. The canon contains an interesting reference to past slave revolts.

For the remaining six canons of C. Tol. xiii. on matters of ecclesiastical discipline see Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 285, or Hefele, Conc.-Gesch. iii. 289. The council was scarcely over, and all the members of it had not yet left Toledo, when legates arrived from pope Leo II. (towards the end of Nov. or Dec. 683) asking for the confirmation in council by all the Spanish bishops of the acts of the sixth general council against the Monothelites. The king and Julian, however, replied that it was impossible immediately to reassemble the national council which had just broken up, and to compel distant bishops to undertake another winter journey. They consented, however, to call a council for the following year, and meanwhile copies of the acts of the Council of Constantinople were sent to every metropolitan to receive the signatures of the bishops of his province. In Nov. 684 the fourteenth council of Toledo met. Only seventeen bishops from Carthaginensis were present, though the metropolitans of Tarragona, Narbonne, Merida, Braga, and Seville sent vicars. Taken in connexion with the canon of the twelfth council upon which rests the primacy of Toledo, it is noticeable that here, as in the thirteenth and fifteenth councils, Julian alone signs as metropolitanus out of the six Spanish metropolitans. All the rest (Merida, Braga, Tarragona, Narbonne, and Seville) sign as plain episcopi. Julian indeed was at this time the greatest power in the state, and seems to have completely governed the vacillating and often conscience-stricken Ervig.

At the C. Tol. xiv. the acts of the sixth general synod were approved, and the acts of the council of Chalcedon were ordered to be incorporated as the Codex Canonum of the Spanish church (drawn up probably before 633). Three years afterwards, on the 14th November, 687, Ervig laid down his ill-won dignity, and died a few days afterwards in a monastery. He had previously, to the exclusion of his own sons, named Egica, Wamba's nephew and the husband of his daughter, Cixilo, as his successor—an act no doubt of amends and conciliation towards the party of the dispossessed king. Ervig made certain alterations in the Fuero Juzgo, for an account of which see Helfferich, p. 200. Sebastian of Salamanca says of him "leges a Wambane institutas corrumpit et alias ex nomine suo edidit." The truth, however, seems to be that, putting the Jew laws out of count, the revision of which he himself speaks in i. 2, 1 of the Fuero Juzgo was confined to the alteration of Wamba's law of military service (ix. 2, 8), the abolition of a law of Kindasvinth on the subject of false witness (ii. 4, 7), and the addition of certain unimportant laws, one of which certainly was afterwards rehandled by Egica.

The acts of the twelfth and thirteenth councils of Toledo throw a curious and uncertain light on this reign of crime and disaster. Ervig seems to have come to power as the instrument of the vengeance of the church and nobility upon his predecessor, who had attacked the privileges and attempted to tame the excesses of both orders. His own reign appears to have been little more than a series of efforts, more or less successful, to maintain by concessions to the powerful parties who had carried him to power, the sceptre thus obtained. By the modification of the law of military service, by the atrocious laws against the Jews, and by the concentration of the whole power of the church in the hands of the metropolitan of Toledo, the stability and coherence of the Gothic state were sensibly shaken. The primacy of Toledo had been Julian's reward for his share in the conspiracy against Wamba. He used it mainly in those frigidul persecutions of the Jews, which had an important influence upon the coming downfall of the Gothic kingdom (Dozy, Hist. des Mussulmans d'Espagne, ii. 26). On the other hand the weakening of Wamba's military law left the country defenceless against the attacks of Mousa and Tarik thirty years later. "With Ervig's accession," says Gama, "began the thirty years of agony and anarchy ended by the battle of the Guadalete."

See the Latin and Spanish texts of the acts of the twelfth and thirteenth councils of Toledo, which are the chief sources for the history of this reign, with notes, in Tejada y Ramiro's Coll. de Canones de la Igl. Illus. The best modern account is that of Dahn, Könige der Germanen, Vte Abtheilung, 215; see also Helfferich's Entstehung und Geschichte des Westgothen-Rechts. The older French and German histories of Romey, Rosseuw St. Hilaire, Lemkke, Schaefer, and Aschbach have been superseded by Dahn. For the Spanish accounts, and indeed for the whole literature of the subject, see lists given at the beginning of Dahn's Vte Abtheilung. For an inscription containing Ervig's name, but of a certain date, see Hubner's Inscr. Hisp. Christ. 23A. [M. A. W.]

ERVIGIUS (2) or ERVINGIUS, ninth bishop of Beziers, succeeding Pacotaxis (Gall. Christ. vi. 299). Among those present at the sixteenth council of Toledo occurs "Beterrensis ecclesiae episcopus" (Mansi, xii. 84 c). See the following article. [S. A. B.]

ERVIGIUS (3), bishop of Calabria, subscribes the fifteenth and sixteenth councils of Toledo, 688 and 693, under Egica. The Ervig of the sixteenth council has been held erroneously to have been a bishop of Beziers (Biterra), in Gallia Narbonensis. Florez gives various reasons against this (Esp. Sagr. vi. 227), and certainly the order of the signatures in the fifteenth and sixteenth councils seems to identify the two Ervigs. Ervig is the last bishop of Calabria (Esp. Sagr. xiv. 47; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 313, 333.) [SERVUS-DEL.] [M. A. W.]

ERWALD (1) (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. in ii M. H. B. 719 D), king of East Anglia. [EARP-WALD.] [C. H.]

ERWALD (2) (ANNUALIS, ARNUAL, ERUALD, ERUALDUS) was a Scotie monk, companion and disciple of St. Kilian of Franconia; he was martyred Jan. 19, A.D. 680, but is not found in the Acta St. Kiliani, and much doubt surrounds his history. The Bollandists place him among their praetermissi of Jan. 19, Feb. 15, July 8, and Oct. 2, while the Scotch annalists also commemorate him, but can give no authentic information. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 244; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 178; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 565.) [J. G.]

ERYTHARIUS, praetorian prefect under Leo I. and Zeno. (Cod. Just. lib. i. tit. 4, 16.) Finding that the taxes which Zeno was trying to levy were excessive, he asked leave to retire from his office, to the universal regret of the state (Swid. ad nom.) [M. F. A.]

ERYTHRAEUS (ERYTHRIUS), bishop of Amisus, in the province of Helenopontus, who signed the letter addressed by the bishops of that province to the emperor Leo on the subject of Timotheus Aelurus, c. A.D. 458. (Acta Co. Chalced. pt. iii. c. 54; Mansi, vii. 608 A; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 536.) [T. W. D.]

ERYTRIUS, bishop of Lagania. [ERECHTIUS.] [T. W. D.]

ESADDAEUS, the name of one of the paternal angels in the system of JUSTINUS (Hippol. Ref. v. 26, p. 151). The name is apparently the same as that given by the NAASSENES to the Maker of this world, $\tau\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \tau\acute{\omicron}\upsilon\tau\eta\varsigma\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \kappa\tau\acute{\omicron}\sigma\epsilon\omega\varsigma\ \delta\eta\mu\iota\omicron\upsilon\rho\gamma\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \eta\sigma\alpha\lambda\delta\alpha\iota\varsigma\ \theta\epsilon\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \kappa\upsilon\rho\acute{\iota}\nu\varsigma\ \delta\rho\iota\theta\mu\acute{\omicron}\varsigma\ \tau\epsilon\tau\acute{\alpha}\rho\tau\epsilon\varsigma$ (Hippol. Ref. v. 7, p. 104). Both forms no doubt represent the Hebrew רֵשֶׁתְּ לֵךְ . In the Gnostic systems the Hebrew names for God are commonly used to denote subordinate agents; and Epiphanius (Haer. 40, p. 296) notes this in particular of the name Σαδδαΐ . Harvey (Irenaeus I. 225), adopting the form Esaddaeus, attempts, with little probability, to connect the word with שֶׁדַּי , a tree. [See GNOBIA.]

[G. S.]

ESAIANI, heretica. [ESAIAS (8).]

ESAIAS (1), an Egyptian, who suffered martyrdom with others at Caesarea, in Palestine, under Diocletian (Euseb. Mart. Pal. c. 11; Basil. Hom. Feb. 16; Rom. Mart. Feb. 16; Boll. Act. SS. 16 Feb. ii. 865). Baronius assigns the martyrdom to A.D. 308 (A. E. ann. 308, iv.).

ESAIAS (2), a Persian knight of the royal guard, and the son of Adabus of Arzun in Armenia. He was present at the torture and execution of Brichjesus, Elias, and their companions under Sapor II. in 327. [ELIAS.] He wrote the narrative of their acts in Chaldee, whence Metaphrastes translated it into Greek. (Assen. Mart. Orient. i. 211, 224.) [G. T. S.]

ESAIAS (3) (ISAIAS), an Egyptian abbat. There are assigned to one of this name and designation twenty-nine Orationes on the monastic life, apparently addressed to those who were under the author's care, and nineteen Capitula on the monastic life, entitled De Iohannis Exercitationes et Quisita. Both these works are given by Migne (Patr. Gr. xl. 1104-1211). Cotelerius, in his Ecclesiae Graecae Monumenta, has published several sayings of a abbat Esaias, as well as the saying of an ascetic who mentions Esaias as one well known (Apophtheg. Patr. in Eccl. Gr. Mon. i. 445, 596, 601, 603). Among the works of Benedict of Nursia (797-821) there are sixty-eight Regulae ad Monachos by "Isaias abbas" (Patr. Lat. ciii. 427-437). John of Damascus also has preserved two fragments of an abbat Esaias (Patr. Gr. x. 1212). Whether all these works are to be ascribed to the same person or not is by no means clear. Ammonius, a bishop (apparently Egyptian, possibly Ammon of Antinoe, c. A.D. 34), writing to Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria (385-412), mentions an Esaias whom he did not know, and respecting whom Theophilus had made some enquiries; but he acquaints us with nothing more than his name and the fact of his being an ascetic. Rufinus of Aquileia (c. 410), in his Historia Monachorum (Patr. Lat. iii. 427), speaks of three ascetics (Esaias being one) who met on the banks of the Nile and went in company to visit the anchorite Anuph, and he adds that they were present at Anuph's death. Anuph, otherwise known as Isuph, seems to have died c. A.D. 401 (Boll. Act. SS. Jun. i. 643). Palladius (c. A.D. 400) relates a story very similar to that of Isidore (Hist. Laus. cc. 55-58, in Patr. Gr. xiv. 1138). He also (cc. 15, 16) speaks of an Isaias, the son of a wealthy Spanish merchant, leaving himself along with his brother Pappianus, on the death of their father, to an ascetic life, one of them founding a monastery, the other becoming an anchorite; but which of them it was that became an abbat cannot be determined from the narrative. (Galland. Notit. praef. Esaias Is. Abbat.; Tillemont, vii. 711, Vie des Abbés en Thébaïde; Cave, Hist. Lat. i. 254.)

ESAIAS (4), bishop of Hermopolis Parva (Pachomet) on the Egyptian Delta. He took part in the Ephesine "Latrocinium," A.D. 449, but also in the fourth general council in 451, having apparently changed his opinions. (Mansi, vii. 404; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 516.)

[J. de S.]

ESAIAS (5), bishop of Elaea, in the province of Asia, signed the decrees of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 699; Mansi, vi. 1085.)

[L. D.]

ESAIAS (6) (ISAIAS), bishop of Naucratis, in the province of Aegyptus I., in the latter half of the 5th century (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 523). He was one of the Egyptian bishops who wrote to the emperor Leo, after the murder of Proterius bishop of Alexandria by Timotheus-Aelurus and his followers, A.D. 457 (Act. Co. Chalced. pt. iii. c. 22; Mansi, vii. 530 c), and also one of the signatories to the synodical letter of Gennadius bishop of Constantinople, condemning simony, A.D. 459 (Mansi, vii. 917 E). When the emperor Zeno restored Timotheus Solofaciolus, the successor of Proterius, to his see, Esaias was one of the legates whom that bishop sent to Simplicius, bishop of Rome, to announce the fact of his return (Simpl. Pap. ep. 11, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 49; Baron. A. E. ann. 478, ix.; Le Quien, ii. 523).

ESAIAS (7), bishop of Rhodes and metropolitan, under which designation his name is attached to the report of the synod of Constantinople, A.D. 520, to pope Hormisdas, respecting the ordination of Epiphanius (Mansi, viii. 492 D). In the following year, as related by Theophanes, Esaias of Rhodes was deposed and punished for corrupt morals by the emperor, together with Alexander of Diospolis in Thrace. (Theoph. Chronog. ann. 521, p. 151, in Patr. Gr. cviii. 407; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 925.) [C. H.]

ESAIAS (8) (Ἡσαίας), a deacon, apparently, of Palestine, who was ordained bishop of Alexandria in succession to Peter Mongus (Liberatus, Brev. c. 18, in Migne, Patr. lxxviii. 1029 A; Le Quien, Oriens Chr. ii. 420). Sophronius calls him the "associate of another Peter," whom he denounces in no measured terms (τὸ ἑτεροκίνητον καὶ φρενοβάρβαρον μύσθημα, Ep. Synod. ap. Act. Conc. Const. A.D. 680, actio xi.; Labbe, vi. 889 B, ed. 1671; Conc. Gener. iii. 167, ed. 1628). His election being opposed, and the validity of his ordination being challenged, on the ground that the hands of the ordainer, Epiphanius of Perga, the metropolis of Pamphylia Secunda, had been laid on him by others after that prelate was dead, on which account his opponents called Esaias νεκροχειροτόνητος, and numbers still adhering to him, a schism took place, and his followers were designated "Esaiiani" (Liberatus, u. s. 1029 B; Timoth. Presb. de Recept. Haeret. in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxvi. pt. i. 45, § 14; Asseman. Diss. de Monophysit. Bibl. Or. ii. s. i.). Sophronius (u. s.) charges Esaias and Peter with having originated "another Acephalian heresy among the Acephali" (Neale, Patriarchate of Alexandria, iii. § 3, p. 22).

ESALDAEUS. [ESADDAEUS.]

ESCHATOLOGY. The word, of comparatively late origin in theological language, is applied to that branch of theology which deals with the ultimate destinies of mankind, with the four last things (τὰ τελευτά)—death and judgment, heaven and hell. Other subjects, which may be thought of as belonging to the last stage of the great drama of the world's history, presented in the apocalyptic language of Scripture with more or less clearness—such as the coming of the antichrist, the millennial reign of Christ—are dealt with separately [ANTICHRIST; CHILIASTS]. In closer connexion with eschatology properly so called, lying so closely on the border-land that they naturally come within our view, are the questions as to the intermediate state of souls between death and judgment, which are dealt with under DEATH AND THE DEAD and PURGATORY. Three distinct elements may be noted as working upon the minds of the Christian church in the period in which their belief as to the future state of the souls of men was taking definite shape. There was (1) the teaching of the New Testament; (2) the belief inherited from Judaism; (3) the mythical or philosophical speculations of the Greek and Roman world. A full examination of (1) lies outside our present province, but it may be noted, as in part explaining the varying phases of the Church's doctrine, that its language also seems to look in three different directions. On the one hand, stress is laid, in parables, and the interpretation of parables, on the separation between the good and the evil as the last act of the Divine Judge. The angels of judgment "sever the wicked from among the just" (Matt. xiii. 49). "The wicked go into aeonian punishment, the righteous into aeonian life" (Matt. xxv. 46). Words that express an indefinitely prolonged duration are piled one on the other as representing the result of that separation. "The smoke of the torment of the lost ascendeth up for aeons of aeons" (Rev. xiv. 11). Even those who hold that the finality of that judgment, or the perpetuity of the sufferings to which it leads, is not asserted in terms must admit that it is at least a natural inference from the language in which Christ and His apostles speak of it. In reference to the intermediate state, its teaching is less definite. On the one hand, the fact that the day of judgment, when the books shall be opened and men shall be judged according to their works, is thought of as in the near or distant future (Matt. xxv. 31; 2 Cor. v. 10; Rev. xx. 14, 12), seems to preclude the thought that an irrevocable sentence is passed at the moment of death, leaving nothing for the Judge to do but to proclaim what had been already, as it were, registered in the books of God; while, on the other hand, the adoption of the Hebrew phraseology which spoke of Abraham's bosom and Paradise for the souls of the righteous, of the language of Greek thinkers as to a punishment retributive or reformatory in Hades; of departing and being with Christ, as better than the continuance of the present life (Luke xvi. 22-23, xxiii. 43), excludes the thought of a long sleep, in which the soul is unconscious, between death and the resurrection, while this again is, in its turn, balanced by the language which speaks of death, as others spoke of it, as a sleep (1 Thess. iv. 13, 14; 1 Cor. xv. 20; Matt. xxvii. 52; John xi. 11). That the sleep was not one of unconsciousness, and that some were capable of rising to a higher stage of knowledge and holiness seemed to be implied in the statements that Christ "went and preached to the spirits in person," and that the "Gospel was preached to the dead" (1 Pet. iii. 18; iv. 6). It cannot be wondered at that starting from these data the conclusions of Christian eschatology have, for the most part, affirmed the endlessness alike of the rewards and punishments which shall be awarded by the Judge after the resurrection, that they have looked to the intermediate state with both hope and fear; that there, if anywhere, they have seen the region in which a work of illumination and purification might be carried on behind the veil.

On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the teaching of the New Testament tends in not a few passages to the thought of an universal restoration. The very term "restitution of all things" (Acts iii. 21) seems to imply a return to the primeval state in which God looked on the work of His hands, and saw that it was good (Gen. i. 31) before sin and pain, evil, moral or physical, had marred its perfection. If evil in both its aspects was the devil's work, Christ came to destroy the works of the devil (Heb. ii. 14; 1 John iii. 8), and that destruction is hardly accomplished by rescuing here and there, as it were, one soul in a thousand. He is to reign, this reigning apparently being closed by the judgment, and therefore including the whole intermediate state, until He has put all enemies under his feet (1 Cor. xv. 25). And among these enemies are death and Hades (1 Cor. xv. 26, 55), which are to be cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death (Rev. xx. 14). The argument of St. Paul in the great Theodicy of the Epistle to the Romans halts in chap. v. if we make the ultimate result of the work of the second head of the human race narrower in its range than that of the first. "The many" who "shall be constituted righteous" are represented as corresponding with "the many" who were constituted sinners (Rom. v. 19), and the language of the previous verse shews that "the many" are equivalent to "all." The hope of St. Paul for his kinsmen that "all Israel shall be saved" (Rom. xi. 26) is not satisfied by the conversion of a few, or even of many, individual Israelites in some far-off future generation. Even those who stumbled at the rock of offence had not so stumbled as to fall irretrievably (Rom. xi. 11). All, Jews and Gentiles alike, have been concluded under unbelief that God might have mercy upon all (Rom. xi. 32). Lastly, there were not a few passages in the apostolic writings which might suggest, and, as a matter of fact, have suggested, rightly or wrongly, the idea of "destruction" in the sense of "annihilation" as the ultimate punishment of the wicked. There is the constant use of the words "destruction," and its equivalent "perdition" (ἀπώλεια) of the various forms of the cognate verbs "destroy" and "perish." There is the prominence given to the thought that life, eternal life, is represented as the gift of God (Rom. vi. 23); that unrepented sin brings the loss of that life; that the King destroys his enemies; that the extremest penalty is described as the second death (Rev. xx. 14; xxi. 8). The language of the New Testament writers, it has been urged, does not assume, on philosophical grounds, as Plato did, the natural immortality of the soul. It speaks of God only as having immortality as belonging to His essential being

(1 Tim. vi. 15); of the gospel of Christ as having brought to light or illumined that hope of immortality (2 Tim. i. 10). Death, which is, at least, the ever-recurring symbol of the punishment of evil, suggests the thought of the loss of conscious existence rather than of a perpetuated consciousness of misery (Gen. iii. 17; Rom. vi. 22).

It is obvious that as the language of the New Testament was, for the most part, addressed to those who had been trained in the popular beliefs of Judaism, it was likely, so far as it did not protest against them, to be interpreted by those beliefs. We have to ask, accordingly, what they were, what sense was attached in them to such terms as "death," "destruction," "hades," "Paradise," "Gehenna." As far as one Jewish sect, that of the Sadducees, is concerned, there is no room for doubt (Matt. xxii. 23; Acts xxiii. 6). They denied the resurrection, and did not fall back, as the Greek thinker did, upon a belief in the immortality of the incorporeal soul. They confined the action of the retributive justice of God, following, as they urged, the teaching of Moses, to the rewards and punishment of the present life. With the Pharisees and the great body of the Jews of the dispersion, who attached themselves to no school or sect, the case was otherwise. They believed in a resurrection (Acts xxiii. 26), and, if we accept the statement of Josephus (Ant. xviii. 13), in the natural "immortal vigour" (τοῦτο αὐτῶν) of the soul. They spoke of the joy of Paradise, of the flames and torments of Gehenna. There is no room for doubt that they looked on the state of the dead as one capable of being influenced for good by the prayers of the living [DEATH AND THE DEAD]. Prayers for the dead were an established part of the ritual of the synagogue at the time of the Maccabees, and in that of the temple sacrifices were added to the prayers (2 Macc. xii. 43-45). They are apparently implied in St. Paul's prayer for Onesiphorus (2 Tim. i. 16-18). They appear in the earliest inscriptions, probably in the 2nd century after Christ, in Jewish cemeteries (Garucci, Cimitero degli Ebrei). How far the Pharisaic, or the popular, belief accepted the endlessness of punishments is, from this point of view, a question of great importance. It has been broadly asserted by those who speak with the authority of experts that the Talmud is altogether silent on that point; that the punishment even of the worst sinners is, in the judgment of the Rabbis, but for a season, and that the sacrifices, or even the prayers of the day of atonement avail to obtain pardon for those who have deserved condemnation (Deutsch, Remains, p. 35, and the authorities cited in Farrar's Eternal Hope, Exc. 1). It may be questioned, however, whether this is not a somewhat one-sided statement. Josephus, who, at least, represents a widely extended form of Hellenistic Pharisaism, speaks of the Pharisees not only as holding the natural immortality of the soul, but as thinking that those who have done evil are kept in an everlasting (αἰώνος, not αἰώνιος), prison-house (Ant. xiii. 1, § 3), and Schöttgen (Hor. Hebr. in Matt. xii. 46), quotes from the Midrash on Koheleth (Eccl. 74), "In hoc mundo quae peccata sunt possunt reparari, sed futuro tempore quod non potest reparari." "If a man prepares no food before the sabbath, how can he expect to share in the sabbath meal?" Taking, however, the great stream of Rabbinic traditions, as represented e. g. in Eisenmenger's Entdecktes Judenthum (part ii. c. 6), it may be admitted as true that they surround the idea of Gehenna with well-nigh all imaginable alleviations. They think of the condemned as allowed to rest on sabbaths and new moons; Abraham and Moses and Elias, and the prayers of kindred and of friends have power to deliver from it; the souls that are tormented praise God in the midst of the fire for the mercy that is mingled with His judgments. Some are punished for a few days, or weeks, or years (Ugolini, Thes. xxx. p. 177), and when they are purified pass to Paradise. A few only, apostates and "Epicureans" (i.e. unbelievers in the resurrection), suffer for "many generations;" but in the end, Gehenna, which even now is separated from Paradise only as by a party-wall two hand-breadths thick, shall be itself purified and be made fit for the habitation of the blessed.

Lastly, there were the beliefs which Gentile converts, who were not deterred by physical or metaphysical difficulties from accepting the doctrine of the resurrection, would bring with them, and which were likely to modify more or less, consciously or unconsciously, their interpretation of the teaching of Scripture. It is, of course, admitted that the cultivated intellect of the age had engendered a widely-spread scepticism as to the existence of a life after death:—

"Esse aliquos manes et subterranea regna

Juvenal, Sat. ii. 149.

The hopes of Tacitus did not go beyond, "Si quis piorum manibus locus; si, ut sapientibus placet, non cum corpore extinguuntur magnae animae," holding, as it were, an aristocracy of immortality, while the great mass of mankind slept the "eternal sleep," which is almost the stereotyped formula of Greek and Roman epitaphs (Agric. c. 46). Cicero, after an eloquent utterance of his hope, confesses his misgiving, "Quod si in hoc erro, quod animos hominum immortales esse credam, lubenter erro" (de Senect. c. 23); and though he speaks much of the glory of the just, is silent as to the punishment of evil doers. Julius Caesar urged torture and imprisonment rather than death as a punishment for those who were traitors to the republic, on the ground that, as men looked for nothing after death that penalty had lost its deterring power (Sallust, Catil. c. 50). On the other hand, the old belief was not without its followers. The teaching of Plato in the Phaedon, the Gorgias, and the Republic, had been popularised by Virgil in the sixth book of the Aeneid, and those who accepted it thought of the unseen world as a scene partly of retribution, partly of purification. Some pass to the Elysian fields, and some are cleansed in the Stygian lake, and some are sent to Tartarus for a year, and some remain there for ever (Phaed. p. 113).

... "allis sub gurgite vasto

Infectum eluitur scelus, aut exuritur igni;

Quisque suos patimur manes. Exinde per amplexum

Mittimur Elysium et pauci laeta arva tenemus."

Virg. Aen. vi. 743-746.

The Eleusinian and other mysteries perhaps, helped to diffuse and sustain this belief among those who were initiated, and the language of Lucretius is that of one who sees in the belief in endless punishment not an extinct superstition, but one against which the philosopher has to do vigorous and earnest battle.

"Nam si certam finem esse viderent
Aerumnarum homines, aliqua ratione valerent
Religionibus atque minis obistere vatum.
Nunc ratio nulla est restandi, nulla facultas, Aeternas quoniam poenas in morte timendum."*
De Nat. R. l. 107-111.

II. It remains for us now to trace the course of Christian thought working upon these materials. For the most part it will be necessary to notice only those who held some modification of what may be recognized as historically the general belief of Christendom, that the punishment assigned to evildoers after the resurrection will be endless as the blessedness of the righteous, or who taught that a redeeming and purifying work might be carried on in the intermediate state, giving fresh opportunities, and therefore a fresh probation to some, if not to all, who, at the time of their death, were not qualified by their faith or works for the peace and rest of God.

Of the two methods which present themselves,—that of noting chronologically the views maintained by the great fathers and teachers of the church on the point now before us, or classifying them, still retaining as far as may be, subject to that classification, a chronological arrangement, according as they represented this or that school of thought,—the latter will be adopted, as presenting, on the whole, most advantages.

1. It would not be true to say that the theory of the annihilation of the wicked after they have endured, subsequent to the resurrection, a penalty commensurate with their guilt, is altogether without patristic authority; but Taylor's language (Christ's Advent to Judgment, vol. v. p. 45, ed. Heber), that it was what "the primitive doctors were willing to believe," is unduly coloured by his own manifest leaning towards that view, and his shrinking from the popular belief in equal and endless tortures for all the lost. The passages that look in that direction are, indeed, very few, and their main purpose is less to assert the finite character of punishment than to protest against the Platonic assumption of an inherent immortality involving, as that seemed to do, an eternal pre-existence, and a perpetual series of transmigrations. Thus Justin speaks: "Our souls are not immortal nor uncreated, yet I say not that all souls die, for that indeed would be a godsend (εἰσμαίον) to the wicked, but that those of the godly abide in a better place, and the unrighteous and evil in a

* The passage is not without its importance as bearing on the sense of the word "aeternus," which Latin writers accepted as the nearest equivalent of the Greek αἰώνιος, and which was, in fact, derived from the same root. Lucretius sees it, as Augustine does afterwards (infra), meaning that there is no "certa finis." Comp.

worse, waiting for the time of judgment. And thus some, appearing worthy of God, die no more, and some are punished (κολάζονται) so long as God wills them to exist and to be punished" (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 5). The words clearly admit the thought of an ultimate "ceasing to be" in the lost, but they cannot be said to do more. Elsewhere, in the same treatise (Dial. c. Tryph. c. 130), he speaks, in reference to Isai. lxvi. 24, of the very bodies of sinners as consumed by the worm and the ceaseless fire, and yet remaining immortal (ἀθάνατα), and in his Apology he speaks freely of αἰώνιος κόλασις as contrasted with the thousand years of Plato (Rep. p. 615; Phaedr. p. 249; Apol. i. 12), of the punishment as lasting for a limitless period (ἀρέσαστον αἰῶνα), (Apol. i. 28). What has been said of Justin holds good also of Irenaeus. He, too, speaks of life as the gift of God: "And he who shall reject life and prove himself ungrateful to his Maker . . . deprives himself of continuance for ever and ever" (ii. 34, § 3). "Good things are eternal, and without end in God, and therefore the loss of them is also eternal and never ending" (v. 27, § 2). Taken by themselves, these words, though they are compatible with, and perhaps even suggest, the thought of the annihilation of the wicked, cannot be said to affirm it. Irenaeus, like Justin, argues against the Platonic theory of the pre-existence and natural immortality of the soul. Eternal life is God's gift to those who are worthy of it, but the privation of that life may mean the loss of the blessedness of being rather than of being in itself, and his language elsewhere shews that this is what he actually did mean. "Those who fly from the eternal light of God . . . are themselves the cause of their inhabiting eternal darkness, destitute of all good things" (iv. § 39, 4). "The word of God prepares a fitting habitation for both those who seek and those who shun the light . . . for those who are in the light that they may rejoice in it, for those in darkness that they may partake in its calamities" (v. 28, § 1). So a passage in the Epistle to Diognetus (c. 10), which speaks of the eternal fire as punishing μέχρι τέλους admits of being interpreted of ultimate annihilation. Hints of the annihilation of the lost after this period are few and far between. Arnobius, however (Dispp. adv. Gentes, ii. 15-54) teaches that the soul has no natural immortality, and that after the resurrection souls and bodies are gradually consumed and annihilated in Gehenna. [ARNOBIUS.]

2. The belief in a universal restoration is commonly associated with the great name of Origen. It would be truer to say, and this was afterwards treated as the vulnerable point in his system, that he taught the perpetual freedom of the will, and therefore set no time-limits to the capacity for restoration. The fullest statement of his views is found in the treatise περὶ Ἀρχῶν, noticeable as the first attempt at the systematic and scientific treatment of theology in Christian literature. He is brought face to face with the question, What does the whole scheme of redemption issue in; what is the end and consummation of all things? He opens, as if half fearing the charge of heresy from prejudiced hearers, and premises that he speaks with caution, discussing rather than dogmatizing. But he openly proclaims his belief that the goodness of God, when each sinner shall have received the penalty of his sins, will, through Christ, lead the whole universe to one end. This seems to him involved in the promise that all enemies shall be put under the feet of Christ (Pa. cx. 1; 1 Cor. xv. 25). The end will be like the beginning, and all shall be very good. The statement in Phil. ii. 10, that "At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven and things under the earth," seems to him to involve a willing subjection, and therefore the cessation of a rebellious and resistant evil. Even the angels who kept not their first estate may, some of them at least, profit by the help of their unfallen brothers and be capable of restoration. The prayer of Christ for unity (John xvii. 21), which embraces the universe, as also does St. Paul's vision of the "perfect man" in whom all shall be united (Eph. iv. 13). Is this hope to be extended to the devil and his angels, or has inveterate habit hardened in them into a second nature? He, for his part, will not refuse to extend that hope even to them. Aeons may pass, greater punishments be endured; but if the will is free, any nature endowed with reason may pass from one order of being to another, each act of rebellion bringing with it its own punishment or reward (De Princ. i. c. 6). The change, as distinct from the destruction, of the heavens or the earth (Pa. cii. 26) so that they become new (1 Pet. iii. 13), witnesses for him to a like change, not destruction, of those who are wending their way to that final blessedness. He is led to examine into the nature of the fire which tries every man's work and is the penalty of evil, and he finds it in the mind itself—in the memory of evil. The sinner's life lies before him as an open scroll, and he looks on it with shame and anguish unspeakable. The Physician of our souls can see His own processes of healing. The "outer darkness" and Paradise are but different stages in the education of the great school of souls, and their upward and onward progress depends on their purity and love of truth (Princ. i. 6).

The same wide hope shews itself, though less definitely, in his general method of interpretation. He who is saved is saved as by fire, that if he has in him any mixture of lead the fire may melt it out, so that all may be made as the pure gold. The more the lead, the greater will be the burning, so that even if there be but a little gold that little may be purified. If any one has come to be nothing but lead then "here he seems to tend to the annihilation theory) "then shall come to pass that which is written, and he shall 'sink as lead in the mighty waters'" (Rom. vi. in Exod.). In the legal purification after childbirth he sees an adumbration of the truth that "even after the resurrection we shall all still need a sacrament to cleanse and purify us" (Rom. xiv. in Luc.). The fire of the last day will, it may be, be at once a punishment and a remedy, burning up the wood, hay, stubble, according to each man's merits, yet all working to the destined end of restoring man to the image of God, though, as yet, men must be treated as children, and the terrors of the judgment rather than the final restoration have to be brought before those who can be converted only by fears and threats (Cont. Cels. v.). Gehenna stands for the torments that cleanse the soul, but for the many who are scarcely restrained by the terrors of eternal torment it is not escape dient to go far into that matter, hardly indeed to commit our thoughts to writing, but to dwell on the certain and inevitable retribution for all evil (Cont. Cels. vi.). God is indeed a consuming fire, but that which He consumes is the evil that is in the souls of men, not the souls themselves (ibid.). The hope of Origen colours even his view of the guilt of Judas, and he sees in his suicide the act of one who wished to meet his Master in the world of the dead, and there to implore forgiveness (Tract. xxxv. in Matt.) It is noticeable, however, that he does not there speak of the final salvation of Judas, and that his doctrine of reserve shews itself in his dwelling on the separation of the evil and good in Matt. xxv. 46 as final, without speaking of the hope of a restoration as lying beyond it in the remote future.

What Origen thus whispered, as it were, to the ear in the secret chamber was proclaimed by Gregory of Nyssa as from the housetop. His universalism is as wide and unlimited as that of bishop Newton of Bristol. The whole course of this life was for him a discipline leading to virtue. If any one remain uncured by it the healing process (θεραπευσις) is continued in the life that follows. It may take for some, sharp and severe forms, the work of the knife and cautery; for others, the work of God, restoring the creature of His hands to its original likeness will be sufficient (Orat. Catech. viii.). Those who are not sharers in the purification by baptism will be purified by fire (Orat. Catech. xxxv.). Men are angry often with those who use severe remedies, but afterwards they thank them, and so, in like manner, when the evil now intermingled and implanted in their nature has been, after long periods of time, eradicated, and there shall be a restoration (ἀποκατάστασις) of those who are now lying in evil to their primal state; there shall be an accordant thanksgiving to God from all creation, both of those who needed and those who did not need purification (Orat. Catech. xxvi.). The same thought of an ιατρειά is developed more systematically in the treatise de Animæ et Resurrectionis. "The process of healing shall be proportioned to the measure of evil in each of us, and when the evil is purged and blotted out, there shall come in its place to each immortality and life and honour" (vol. iii. pp. 255, 260, ed. 1637). Now the race of man is by its evil shut out from the divine, but the barriers by which sin excludes us from that within the veil will one day be broken down, and when our nature shall be reconstructed, as in a new tabernacle (σκηνοπηγή), and all the corruption that sin has brought in shall be blotted out from the universe; then shall there be the great feast of God for all whom the resurrection has brought together as His guests (iii. p. 245). In the end there shall be one common joy for all, and those who are now through sin outside the sanctuary of the divine blessedness will then cling to the horns of the altar, e.g. to the Founder of the world above (De Animæ, Opp. ii. p. 677). It is true that he, too, speaks of punishment through aeons to which no limit can be assigned (De Animæ, Opp. ii. p. 650) of a chastisement that shall extend through an eternal interval (εἰς αἰώνιον διαστήμα); but it is clear, as indeed the last word shews, that he looks forward beyond this to the ultimate mate extirpation of evil and the restoration of manzind, to a time "when there shall no longer be a sinner in the universe (in Psalm. iii. vol. ii. p. 289), and the war between good and evil shall be ended (ibid.), and the nature of evil shall pass into nothingness, and the divine and unmingled goodness shall embrace all intelligent existence." (vol. i. 844). What is noticeable in Gregory of Nyssa is that in thus teaching there is no apparent consciousness that he is deviating into the bye-paths of new and strange opinions. He claims to be taking his stand on the doctrines (δόγματα) of the church in thus teaching with as much confidence as when he is expounding the mysteries of the divine nature as set forth in the creed of Nicaea (ii. p. 663). And the same absence of any sense of being even in danger of heresy is seen in most of those who followed in his footsteps or those of Origen. The Apologia for Origen, which was the joint work of Eusebius and Pamphilus, defends him without any hesitation. Theodore of Mopsuestia teaches that in the world to come "those who have done evil all their life long will be made worthy of the sweetness of the divine bounty. For never would Christ have said 'until thou hast paid the uttermost farthing,' unless it were possible for us to be cleansed when we have paid the penalty. Nor would He have spoken of the many stripes and few unless after men had borne the punishment of their sins they might afterwards hope for pardon." (Fragm. ed. Fritzsche, p. 41.) Even Gregory of Nazianzus, when speaking of the fire that is not quenched, throws out the thought, as though it were at least admissible, that there may be a πῦρ φιλανθρωπότερον καὶ τοῦ κολάζοντος ἐπαξίως (Orat. xl. 36). Diodorus of Tarsus taught that the penalty of sin is not perpetual, but issues in the blessedness of immortality, and was followed by Stephanus, bishop of Edessa, and Solomon of Bassora, and Isaac of Nineveh. "Even those who are tortured in Gehenna are under the discipline of the divine charity" (Assemani, Biblioth. Orient. iii. p. 323); and they were followed in their turn by Georgius of Arbela and Ebed Jesu of Soba (ibid. iv. p. 204). Timotheus II. patriarch of the Nestorians, wrote that "by the prayers of the saints the souls of sinners may pass from Gehenna to Paradise" (ibid. iv. p. 344). Many of these teachers were, it is true, like the last-named, followers of Nestorius, and were so far not in communion with the orthodox churches of the East, but it is obvious that the special point on which Nestorius was condemned had no direct connexion with this or that form of eschatology, and that it was derived by them from those whose orthodoxy, like that of Gregory of Nyssa, was unquestioned. We have no evidence that the belief in the ἀποκατάστασις, which prevailed in the 4th and 5th centuries, was ever definitely condemned by any council of the church, and so far as Origen was named as coming under the church's censure it was rather as if involved in the general sentence passed upon the leaders of Nestorianism than singled out for special and characteristic errors. So the council of Constantinople, the so-called fifth general council, A.D. 553, condemns Arius, Eunomius, Macedonius, Apollinarius, Nestorius, Eutyches, and Origen in a lump, but does not specify the errors of the last-named, as though they differed in kind from theirs, and it is not till the council of Constantinople known as in Trullo (A.D. 686) that we find an anathema which specifies, somewhat cloudily, the guilt of Theodore of Mopsuestia and Origen and Didymus and Evagrius as consists in their "inventing a mythology (μυθώματα) after the manner of the Greeks, and inventing changes and migrations for our souls and bodies, and impiously uttering drunken ravings (εμπαρουσήσαντας) as to the future life of the dead" (Conc. Quinis. can. i.). It deserves to be noted that this ambiguous anathema pronounced by a council of no authority under the weak and vicious emperor Justinian II. is the only approach to a condemnation of the eschatology of Origen which the annals of church councils present.

So even in the West, where the harder nature of the African and the practical character of the Roman section of the Latin church made men indisposed to share in the wider sympathies and hopes of the great Alexandrian thinker, there was no formal sentence on the part of any synod, no tone of horror in the language of individual writers. Jerome, who does not accept Origen's view, speaks of it with a tolerant fairness, as though it were almost or altogether an open question: "Those who think that the punishment of the wicked will one day, after many ages, have an end rely on these testimonies," sc. on Rom. xi. 25, Gal. iii. 22, Mic. vii. 9, Isai. xii. 1, Ps. xxx. 20, which he gives in extenso: "And this we ought to leave to the knowledge of God alone, whose torments, no less than His compassion, are in due measure, and who knows how and how long He ought to punish. This only let us say, as suiting our human frailty, 'Lord, rebuke me not in thy fury, nor chasten me in thine anger'" (Hieron. in Esai. lvi. ad fin.). So in commenting on Isai. xxiv. "post multos dies visitabuntur." "This," he says, "seems to favour those friends of mine who grant the grace of repentance to the devil and to demons after many ages, that they too shall be visited after a time." He explains the text so as to shew that it does not of necessity involve this, and then, as before, falls back upon man's ignorance. "Human frailty cannot know the judgment of God, nor venture to form an opinion of the greatness and the measure of His punishment" (Hieron. in Esai. xxiv.).

The drift of Augustine's mind, with his exclusion of all outside the visible church from the hope of salvation, his levissima damnatio for unbaptized infants, his doctrine of the divine decrees, hardly leads us to expect anything at his hands less than an absolute rejection of the Origenistic views. It deserves to be noted, however, that it was Pelagius rather than Augustine who laid stress upon the eternity of future punishment, insisted on Matt. xxv. 46 as involving their endlessness, and taunted his Catholic opponents who held a remedial discipline as applicable at least to Christians dying with an imperfect holiness as being followers of Origen (de Gest. Pelag. c. 9-11). The taunt apparently had its effect. Augustine shrank from the term "Origenista," as the framers of the forty-second article of 1552 shrank from being classed with the Anabaptists who revived Origen's wider hope in the 16th century, and was led to disclaim more emphatically any approach to the special view of Origen. On the other hand, he continued also to assert even more definitely his own view of a purgatorial punishment for the baptized. Even in him, however, there is at times a strange absence of the horror and alarm with which the assertion of the hope of universal restoration has not unfrequently been met in later times. He admits that that view was held by "nonnulli, imo quam plurimi," who were led by feelings of human pity. He does not accept it, but he allows men to believe, if they like, that there will be mitigatio and remissio of the punishments of the lost (see infra). When he deals more systematically with the question it is in the same half-supercilious tone as Jerome: "We must now enter on a peaceable discussion with our compassionate friends" . . . He names Origen as holding that even the devil and his angels would after long ages of punishment be restored to fellowship with the holy angels. On this ground, he says, and for other reasons, especially for the "unceasing alternation" of blessedness and misery which Origen's theory was supposed to have involved, the church had rightly rejected (reprobavit) it. He condemns two modified forms of the Origenistic view—(1) that of the universal restoration of all mankind, but not of fallen angels, or even spirits, through the goodness of God, or (2) that of a like restoration obtained by the intercession of the saints, as inconsistently stopping short of their logical consequence. If the assumption that the divine compassion will include the whole human race, why should it stop short there? Those who held the latter view, and Augustine states that he had met many who held it, rested (1) on the belief that the saints in Paradise will not cease in their perfection to pray for those for whom they used to pray on earth; (2) on the words of Ps. lxxvi. 10 in the Latin version, Num obliuiscetur misereri Domini, aut continebit in ira sua miserationes suas? and (3) on the fact that the history of Jonah's mission to Nineveh proved that punishments threatened in unconditional language might yet be withdrawn. He notices further modified forms of the wider hope which held out the promise of salvation to all who have been baptized, even though it be with heretical baptism, or to all who have received baptism in the Catholic church, even if they have fallen afterwards into heresy, or, at least, to all who have kept the Catholic faith, irrespective of holiness of life, or have not failed, whatever other sins they may have committed, in works of charity. He urges against all these views that the scriptural word eterna, with its equivalent "in saecula saeculorum," can only mean "quod finem non habet temporis," and that it must bear the same meaning in Matt. xxv. 46, whether describing the blessedness of the righteous or the punishment of the wicked (de Civ. Dei, xxi. 17-27). It may be noted that in this discussion of all the views on this matter that seemed to him at variance with the language of scripture, Augustine does not even name the theory of the annihilation of the impenitent doers of evil. That theory, if it had been ever really held in the Christian church, had clearly been thrown into the back-ground, and was practically nowhere. From this period, with the authority of the great African father thrown into the scale against it, the doctrine of universal restoration tended to fall into the same position, as far as the Western church was concerned, and though never formally condemned, may be said to have virtually been rejected. It was, perhaps, partly as a consequence of that rejection that the intermediate view, the history of which now remains to be traced, came into greater prominence.

3. Those who shrank from the consequences, real or supposed, of the teaching of Origen were able to cherish the hope of an undefined though not an universal restoration, even in the case of those who departed this life in a state so imperfect that it called for punishment. As the greater includes the less, it is obvious that the followers of Origen and Gregory of Nyssa would admit both the beliefs and the arguments of those who maintained the more moderate and cautious view. The dominant thought in the mind of these latter was that the redeeming work of Christ and the possibility of repentance, and the remedial agency of the church in her prayers and sacraments, and the sanctifying work of the Spirit, are not confined within the narrow limits of this life, but have a wide range of action in the period that lies between death and judgment. Here again it is in the church of Alexandria, as represented by Origen's master, Clement, that we find the earliest and most distinct utterances of the wider hope. He recognises that Christ preached the gospel to those in Hades, and that it brought repentance not to the souls of patriarchs and Jewish saints only, but to heathen seekers after righteousness. Then also the apostles had been fellow-workers with their Master in proportion to their likeness to Him, some working, according to the task assigned to them on earth, among the souls of the Hebrews, some among those of the Gentiles (Strom. vi. 44, 45). The punishments (κολάσεις) of God in Hades are remedial and reformatory (σωτήριοι καὶ παιδευτικοί), and lead to repentance, and this work is easier for those who are no longer hampered by the temptation of the flesh (ibid. c. 46). God is all-good and all-powerful, and is able to save all who turn to Him, whether it be here or there (ibid. c. 47). He quotes the Κήρυγμα Πέτρου as shewing that the moral government (οἰκονομία) of God requires that those who have had no opportunity of knowing the truth in this life should have that opportunity elsewhere, since otherwise they would have no adequate probation (ibid. c. 48). He recognises in the ἐκπύρωσις of the Stoics an anticipation of the Christian doctrine of the purification by fire of those who have lived evil lives (ibid. v. 9). The souls that are punished (κολαζόμενοι) are yet purified by the fire (Fragm. 14).

The wide acceptance of the gospel of Nicodemus, with its vivid pictures of the descent into Hades, and the work of deliverance accomplished there, robbing death and Hades of all their prisoners (Evang. Nicod. c. 24), wiping away these tears from all faces (ibid. c. 23), rescuing those whom Satan had held bound, and placing him in chains in place of Adam and his sons (ibid. c. 23), testifies to the prevalence of the belief which Clement thus asserts, and we must not forget that when the article "He descended into hell" was received into the Apostles' Creed, in the earlier text of which it does not appear, it came weighted, so to speak, with all the associations that had thus gathered round it. It was received because it spoke to men of the work of Christ as not limited to this world, but extending to the unseen. Even in Hades the cross had been set up as the symbol and pledge of deliverance. Even there He was drawing all men unto Him. So Athanasius (if the treatise de Passione et Cruce Domini is his) speaks of Satan as cast out of Hades at the time of the descent, and seeing all whom he had kept prisoners set free by the victorious Christ (Opp. ii. p. 1017, ed. 1586). So Chrysostom (de Coemet. et Cruce, Expos. in Ps. xli.) speaks of the descent into Hades as binding the devil and bringing his prey, the human race, into the treasury of the eternal King. So Cyril of Jerusalem, almost reproducing the very language of the gospel of Nicodemus, speaks of Christ as descending to Hades that He might ransom the just. He descended alone, but He returned with many following Him. The souls that had been long in prison were set free (Catech. iv. xiv.). So Epiphanius describes the descent as made to rescue those who had not fallen away utterly from God, but were kept on account of their frailties in Hades, by giving them, as it were, an amnesty (ἀμνηστία) (adv. Haer. i. 3). And in this view the Latin fathers are at one with the Greek. Ambrose refers the gospel preached to the dead of 1 Pet. iv. to the descent into Hades "ut quotquot cupidi ejus essent, liberarentur" (in Eph. iv.). He ascended into heaven with the souls that He had rescued (in Rom. x.). Some of these were they who appeared to many after His resurrection (in Eph. iv.). Comp. also the statements in the De Myster. Pasch.

It was natural that men like Origen and his school should interpret the "fire that tries every man's work" of 1 Cor. iii. 13, the "saved so as by fire" of a purifying punishment in the intermediate state, and should extend that idea even to the "aeonian fire" of Matt. xxv. 46, and the "unquenchable fire" of Mark ix. 43. It is more suggestive to note that even those who shrank from that conclusion, did not confine the redeeming or purifying work in Hades to the brief periods of the actual descent. So Synesius (Ep. 44), though he speaks of the deathless soul paying, if its guilt is incurable, a deathless penalty, teaches that there are δαίμονες, whose work it is to purify souls, as fullers cleanse a soiled garment. Even Tertullian (de Animâ, c. 58) teaches that the last farthing "of the sinner's debt, if it be but a modicum delictum," may be paid by sufferings there. Even Cyprian (Ep. lx.) holds that some of those who are sent, on death, into the prison-house may come forth when they have paid the uttermost farthing, while martyrs receive their crown at once; that it may be necessary for some to be cleansed and purified by fire by long-continued suffering, waiting for the judgment of the great day. Even Jerome, while holding that there are eternal torments for the reprobate and godless, speaks of the works of Christians as "having to be tried and purified by fire" (in Esai. lxvi. ad fin.); of Christians who have fallen into sin as "salvandi post poenas" (Dial. c. Pelag. i. 28), and adopts the general ("a plerisque") explanation of the undying worm and the fire that is not quenched, of the anguish of conscience (in Esai. lvi. 24). Even Augustine admits that between death and judgment there may be punishments that endure for a season only (de Civ. Dei, xxi. 13); that some sins not forgiven in this world are forgiven in the world to come, sc. in that interval (de Civ. Dei, xxi. 24) and are purgatorias in their nature (ibid. xxi. 16; Enchirid. ad Laurent. c. 18). We pray for those who have not fallen utterly from grace, that after punishments the Divine compassion may be shewn to them, so that they may not go into eternal fire (ibid. xxi. 24). The fire which tries and purifies is not eternal, and of this view that each soul will suffer according to its need of suffering, Augustine says: "Non redarguo quod forsitan verum est" (ibid. xxi. 26). The effect of this earlier doctrine of purgatory on devout souls is well illustrated by the touching prayer at the close of the Hamartigeneia of Prudentius already quoted (Art. DEATH AND THE DEAD, vol. i. p. 796). Those that are suffering that "ignis purgatorius" may be helped in the interval between death and the resurrection, by the prayers and alms of the faithful, and by the "sacrificium altaris." The fact that that sacrifice was offered in the liturgies of Augustine's time for all souls, and not for the elect only, to whom his theory limited the hope of salvation, presented a difficulty which he meets with a characteristic subtlety. These sacrifices differ in their effect according to their object: "pro valde bonis gratiarum actiones sunt; pro non valde malis propitiationes sunt; pro valde malis etiamsi nulla sunt adjuncta mortuorum, qualescunque vivorum consolationes sunt. Quibus autem prosunt aut ad hoc prosunt, ut sit plena remissio, aut certe ut tolerabilior fiat damnatio" (Enchirid. c. 29). But after the resurrection the door of hope will be closed. Admitting the fact that the belief in a respite or cessation of the "aeterna damnatorum poena" was held by "nonnulli immo quam plurimi" (a doctrine so held must have been at least regarded by the church as not incompatible with the faith of which she was the keeper), he for his part rejects it. He barely allows ("non ideo confirmo quia non resisto," de Civ. Dei, xxi. 24) the possibility of a levamen of the cruciatus or poena sensûs of the lost, but the poena damni, the alienatio a vita Dei will be the common portion of all (Enchirid. c. 29).

And so the dark shadow of Augustine fell on the theology of the Western church, and condemned its thoughts of the love of God to many centuries of disastrous twilight. It started from the assumption that the whole human race was, through the sin of Adam, una massa perditionis. From this Divine grace elected some to salvation. But none are elected outside the range of those who believe and are baptized. The whole heathen world, therefore, was left to eternal torments: its virtues were but "splendida vitia" (de Civ. Dei, xix. 25). Even for unbaptized infants dying before they had done good or evil there was but the "levissima damnatio" of the alienation from the life of God, which was the common lot of all the lost, and compared with the eternity of which, as torments enduring for ages and then ceasing could be a light thing to bear (Enchirid. c. 29). And baptism, though indispensable, was yet not sufficient. To hold the true faith, to live a holy life, these he rightly saw were conditions of eternal blessedness, and these were possible only for those who came under the decree of God's electing grace. The narrowness of mediaeval scholasticism, the hardness of Calvinistic Protestantism are each of them traceable to the influence of the great bishop of Hippo. And to that influence also, it must be added, is traceable the whole scholastic and Tridentine doctrine of purgatory, with all its practical corruptions. The instincts of mankind led them to turn to the one mitigating feature in the terrible theology that shut out ninety-nine hundredths of mankind from all hope of escaping hell, and the "ignis purgatorius pro non valde malis," admitting of mitigation, capable even of being shortened by prayers, alms, the sacrifice of the altar, etc.: its greater and greater prominence. Practically each man thought of his own husband and friends as non valde mali, and natural affection, or even the conventional decorum which required the shew of affection, led men to provide the means of mitigation. They could repeat prayers, give alms, pay for masses. The indulgences of Tetzel were but the natural development of the theology of Augustine. It was reserved for Calvinism and popular Protestantism to reproduce all that was hardest in it without even that element of mitigation. The teaching of the Western church from this period offers hardly any exception to the reproduction of Augustine's leading lines of thought. The language of the next great Latin father, Gregory the Great, is indeed even sterner: "There is a purgatorial fire, but it is only for very small sins." Admitting the natural meaning of Matt. xii. 31, it is only for such sins as "an idle word or immoderate laughter" that remission may be looked for in the other world, and then only by those who have deserved remission by good deeds in this life (Dialog. iv. 34). Even the "mitigatio" of Augustine has passed into the back-ground, and he teaches a progressive increase in guilt and therefore in punishment: "ad deteriora quotidie impulsus cadit" (Hom. in Job, viii. 8-10). The speculations of the schoolmen as to the punishment of the lost and their development of the purgatorial theory, interesting as they are, do not fall within the scope of the present work.

ESCONN, bishop of Bochlun, commemorated Nov. 20. He is thus designated at his commemoration in Mart. Donej., but in Dr. Ferris's Calendar he is said to be "of Druim-begada." The attempt is made, though not very successfully, to identify this Esconn under his Latin name, Mo-Esconn, with Maxentia, Virgin Martyr, who is venerated on the same day, and also on April 16 and Oct. 24. [MAXENTIA.] (Mart. Donej. by Todd and Reeves, 314-15, 45-7; Reeves, Ecccl. Ant. 381; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Nov. 20, xi. 429; Bp. Forbes, Kal.

ESCUUALD, a presbyter of Kent, A.D. 761 (Kemble, C. D. 107, 132).

ESCWINE (ÆSCWINE, ÆSCUINE, ESCUINUS, ESCUINE, ESEWINE, OSWINE, CHENFUSIEN, i.e. CENFUSING or son of Cenfus), king of Wessex, succeeding Sexburga, to whose husband Coinwalch he was distantly related in the royal line. According to the A. S. C. he became king in 674, died in 676, and was succeeded by Centwine, the brother of Coinwalch. His reign is marked by a great battle fought in 675 against Wulfhere, king of Mercia, at Biedanheafde, Bedanheafd, Bidanheafd, or Chef de Bede (in Gaimar), which is placed by Camden (Brit. i. 109, ed. Gough) at Great Bedwin in the east of Wilts, near which town are the striking Saxon earthworks known as Chisbury Castle. This locality implies an invasion from Mercia. Malmesbury assigns the victory to Escwine, and Henry of Huntingdon to Wulfhere. Wessex was very unsettled at that time, and writers vary in their statements. Florence makes the reign last nearly three years, Hardy calculates its commencement early in 675, and its close late in 676. Malmesbury differs from the A. S. C. and Florence in the pedigree. According to king Alfred (as stated by Florence), it was Cenfus that succeeded Sexburga. The whole of the reign of Escwine falls within the period of ten years, following the death of Coinwalch, which Bede (H. E. iv. 12) describes as anarchical, the several ealdormen attempting independent rule. The importance of Escwine's place in West Saxon history arises chiefly from the fact that it furnishes a proof that some attempt was made to continue the line of succession in the royal house. In this reign Wessex formed a single diocese, occupied by Leutherius, who sat at Winchester. The foundation of the monastery of Malmesbury (near the borders of Mercia) under its first abbat Aldhelm is assigned to the year 675 (Dugd. i. 257), which would fall within the reign of Escwine. The charter of Leutherius conveying the site is a fictitious one, bearing date Aug. 26, 675, according to Kemble's text (C. D. 11), but Aug. 26, 672, in the copy used by Malmesbury (G. R. A. i. § 30, ed. Hardy). Haddan and Stubbs (iii. 124) give the year of foundation as 675 or earlier. The year 675 (Dugd. i. 505) for the foundation of Abingdon, another Wessex, monastery seems very doubtful. (A. S. C. ann. 674, 676; Flor. Wig. Chron. in M. H. B. 534, 535, *Ad. Chron. ESDRAS (EZR, JESER), catholicos or patriarch of Armenia. He was born at P'harihajnerd in the canton of Nik or Nica, and the province of Ararad in Great Armenia, and in 628 succeeded Christophorus Abrahamita. Le Quien (Or. Chr. i. 1386), who does not date his accession, quotes a catalogue which assigns ten years to his rule, but Saint-Martin makes him succeeded by Nerses III. in 640 (Mém. sur L'Arménie, i. 438). For the important synod of Charnum (A.D. 632 or 633) which distinguishes the pontificate of Eadras, see ARMENIANS, Vol. I. p. 165. [C. H.]

ESICHIUS. [HESICHIUS.]

ESICHUS I. and II., bishops of Poitiers, stand respectively eleventh and twelfth in the episcopal lists of that see, but nothing whatever is known of their history. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1143; Gams, Ser. Ep. 59.) [R. T. S.]

ESICIA (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. i. ind. ix. ep. 6, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 450), a lady. [ESYCHIA.] [C. H.]

ESIMPHAEUS (ESIMIPHAËUS), king of the Homeritae or Himyari, the people of Yemen in Arabia Felix. He was a Christian, and was raised to the throne of his country by Hellestheaeus the king of Aethiopia, on the condition, however, that he became his tributary. During his reign he rendered valuable aid to Justinian in his war with the Persians. After the death of Hellestheaeus Esimphaeus was deposed, and Abraham, who also was a Christian, was chosen in his stead. (Procop. de Bell. Pers. i. 20.) [T. W. D.]

ESITIUS, bishop of Grenoble. [HESYCHIUS.]

ESLINGUS, bishop of Tours. [ERLINGUS.]

ESNE (ÆNE), the tenth bishop of Hereford. (M. H. B. 621.) Under the form of Æne his name appears among the signatures to the legatine canons of 787. As his predecessor Aldberht was at Brentford in 781, and his successor Ceolmund attests charters in 788, the date of Esne is so far ascertained, but nothing more is known of him. The name, which signifies a servant, or a serving man (see Schmid, Ges. p. 569) seems to be peculiar to this bishop as a distinctive appellation; but it appears in the will of king Alfred as belonging to a bishop of his time, unassigned to any see, and may there be an interpolation: see Lib. de Hyda, p. 65; Kemble, C. D. No. 314. [S.]

ESNIG, Armenian patriarch. [EZNIK.]

ESOTIUS. [EXOTIUS.]

ESPASANDUS, bishop of Complutum (Alcala de Henares), subscribes the acts of the fifteenth and sixteenth councils of Toledo, under Egica. He was bishop from about 686 till after 693 (Esp. Sagr. vii. 189; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 313, 333) [ASTURIUS.] [M. A. W.]

ESPERAINDEO, bishop of Italica, signs the twelfth Council of Toledo, called by Ervig, and presided over by Julian. [ERVIG.] His name comes eleventh among thirty-five. He died probably about A.D. 682, and was succeeded by Cuniald, whom Wamba had endeavoured to make bishop of Aquis (Esp. Sagr. xii. 267, Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270). [EULALIUS.] [M. A. W.]

ESPIAN, venerated at Beauvais in France is said, by Guerin and Giry, to have been son of Ella, king of Scotland and Northumbria, and of his queen Pantilomena in the 5th century, and thus the brother of SS. Maura and Brigida (the first Ella reigned in Deira 559-588: another Eila, or Aella usurped the throne of Northumbria, A.D. 867. Anglo-Saxon Chron.). On the death of his father he declined the throne, and went with his sisters to France, where, after visiting Rome, they were set upon by barbarian hordes and murdered at Balagny, near Creil, in the diocese of Beauvais. Their bodies were enshrined at Nogent-les-Vierges in the 12th century. But the whole story is legendary, and does not rise to the value of history (Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, July 23, pt. ii. 306-309). [J. G.]

ESPIUS, fifth bishop of Syracuse, probably early in the 2nd century. He succeeded Eulalius I., and was followed by Ethimotheus. (Rocca-Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, i. 600.) [R. S. G.]

ESSENES or ESSAEANS (Ἐσσαῖοι or Ἐσσηνοί). One of the three sects of Judaism at the time of Christ, the other two being the Pharisees and the Sadducees. The etymology and import of this name will best be considered after an examination of the tenets and practices of this sect or brotherhood, as well as of their rise and development.

I. The Doctrines and Practices of the Essenes.—Being Hebrews of the Hebrews, the Essenes firmly believed in God as the Creator and Disposer of all things. They believed in the immortality of the soul, and in a future state of retribution, where the righteous and the wicked will be rewarded according to the deeds done in the body. They regarded death as a great gain, inasmuch as it was the entrance into glory. With the discarding of this corruptible body, the incorruptible soul obtained her liberty from bondage, and mounted upwards to the region of pure spirits, whilst the souls of the wicked were consigned to a dark and tempestuous dungeon, full of never-ceasing punishments. But if we are to accept the opinion of Josephus, which, as we shall see hereafter, is very doubtful, they did not believe in the resurrection of the body. Their faith in the inspired law of God was so intense that they were led thereby to pay the greatest reverence to Moses the lawgiver, and to consider blasphemy of his name a capital offence. They divided their doctrines into three classes: 1. Love to God; 2. Love of virtue; and 3. Love to mankind. "Of their love to God," Philo tells us, "they give innumerable demonstrations, by their constant and unalterable holiness throughout the whole of their life, their avoidance of oaths and falsehoods, and by their firm belief that God is the source of all good, but of nothing evil. Of their love of virtue they give proofs in their contempt for money, fame, and pleasure; their continence and endurance; in their satisfying their wants easily; in their simplicity, cheerfulness of temper, modesty, order, firmness, &c. As instances of their love to man, are to be mentioned their benevolence, equality, and their having all things in common." Their aim of life was to be separate from the world with its evil practices, to live a life of holiness and devotion to God, to benefit mankind.

to become the temple of the Holy Spirit, so as to be enabled to prophesy and perform miraculous cures, and to prepare themselves for a future state of bliss and reunion with the Father of Spirits. To obtain this end they had to adopt stringent regulations which should keep them from the contaminations of the world.

The Levitical and ceremonial laws of purity which were developed after the restoration by Ezra, and especially during the Maccabean period, and which were observed with more or less rigour by the different schools of the Jewish nation, constituted the foundation upon which the Essenes reared the whole edifice of their domestic arrangements and regulations. As, according to these laws, contact with any one who did not observe the rules of purity, or even did not observe them to the same degree, rendered the faithful followers impure, the Essenes had to form themselves into a separate society or community. Moreover as contact with things manufactured or prepared by any one who did not keep the same rules, likewise produced impurity, the Essenes were also obliged to cultivate and manufacture all the articles of food and dress which their commonwealth required. The rigorous observance of the laws of purity also led some of the Essenes to choose a celibate life, inasmuch as conjugal intercourse, and the periodical defiled state of women arising from their courses and childbirth were a perpetual source of defilement to a sanctified life. Their regulations were therefore religio-industrial.

II. Their Daily Occupation and Manner of Life.

—To raise the supplies, all the members took their share in the work day by day, according to the talent or trade which they possessed. They got up before sunrise, and never talked about any worldly matters till they had all assembled together, and, with their faces turned towards the sun, offered up their national prayer for the renewal of the light of day. Immediately after the morning service they betook themselves, under the direction of the stewards whom they elected by universal suffrage, to their respective employments. The farmers among them cultivated the ground and reared the bees; the shepherds tended the flocks, the bakers prepared the food, the tailors and shoemakers made and repaired the articles of dress. At this work they remained till the fifth hour, i.e. 11 o'clock A.M., when the labour of the forenoon regularly terminated. Hereupon all of them assembled together, submitted to their daily rite of baptism in cold water, discarded their working-clothes, arrayed themselves in white garments, being the symbol of purity, and resorted to the refectory, which they entered in solemn silence, as if it were the holy Temple. Having seated themselves according to their age and order, the brethren who were the bakers and cooks placed before each a little loaf of bread and a dish of the most simple food, consisting chiefly of vegetables. The silence which was continued all this time was broken by the priest of Aaronic descent, who invoked God's blessing upon the repast. The mysterious silence was again resumed, and continued during the meal, which had the character of a sacrament. After the meal, the priest offered thanks to the bountiful Supplier of all wants, which was the signal of dismissal. All then withdrew, put off their white garments, dressed in their working clothes, resumed their several employments till the evening, when they again assembled to partake of a common meal, under the same regulations. All of them devoted certain hours of the day to the study of the mysteries of nature and revelation, as well as of the celestial hierarchy. Such was their manner of life during week days. The Sabbath they observed with the utmost rigour. Even the removal of a vessel from one place to another, they regarded as a violation of this holy day. They took special care not to forsake the assembling of themselves together. Ten persons constituted a complete and legal number for Divine worship in the synagogue. In the presence of such an assembly they would never spit. As at meals, each one took his seat in the synagogue according to age, and in becoming attire. They had no ordained ministers, whose exclusive right it was to conduct the service. Any member who felt moved to do it, took up the Bible and read in it, whilst those who had much experience in spiritual matters expounded the portion thus read. The distinctive ordinances of the brotherhood, and the mysteries connected with the Tetragrammaton, as well as with the angelic worlds, constituted the principal theme of Sabbatic instruction. The study of logic and metaphysics was eschewed as injurious to a devotional life.

III. Candidates for and Mode of Admission into the Brotherhood.—Every candidate for admission into the order had to pass through a noviciate of two stages, extending over three years. Upon entering the first stage, which lasted twelve months, the novice had to cast in all his possessions into the common treasury, he then received (1) a copy of the regulations of the brotherhood, which he had carefully to study, and rigidly to follow the rules contained therein; (2) a spade to bury the excrement (comp. Deut. xxiii. 12-15); and (3) a white robe to put on at meals, being the symbol of purity. But though in possession of these symbols, he was an outsider during the whole of the twelve months, and was not admitted to the common meals. At the expiration of his probationary period, the novice was admitted into the second stage, if the community found that he had properly acquitted himself. He was now called an "approacher" (προσών ἔγγιον), and during this stage, which lasted two years, he was admitted to closer fellowship with the brotherhood, and shared in their lustral rites. But he was still excluded from the common meal, and was ineligible for any office. If he passed satisfactorily through the second stage of probation the approacher then became "an associate" or full member of the society (δμλητής), when he bound himself by solemn oaths, "First to fear God, and next to exercise justice to all men; neither to wrong any one of his own accord, nor by the command of others; always to detest the wicked, and side with the righteous; ever to keep faith inviolable with all men, especially with those in authority, for no one comes to office without the will of God; not to be proud of his power, nor to outshine his subordinates, either in his garments or greater finery, if he himself should attain to office; always to love truth, and strive to reclaim all liars; to keep his hands clear from stealing and his mind from unholy gain; not to conceal anything from the brotherhood, nor disclose anything belonging to them to those without, though it were at the hazard of his life. He has, moreover, to swear not to communicate to any one their doctrines in any other way than he has received them: to abstain from robbing the commonwealth, and carefully to preserve the writings of the society, and the names of the angels" (Josephus, War, II. viii. 7).

The whole brotherhood was divided into four classes—(1) the novices, (2) the approachers, (3) the new full members, and (4) the old members. Each class advanced so much in holiness above the others by the longer number of years of their membership, that if the senior member of a class happened to touch the member of a class below him, he had to purify himself by lustration in the same way as if he had been defiled by contact with a stranger. If a brother was accused of sin he was brought before the brethren, and could not be judged unless there were, at least, a hundred of them present, and agreed in their verdict. If he was pronounced guilty, he was excommunicated, yet was he not regarded as an enemy, but was admonished as a brother, and received back after due repentance.

IV. The Relationship of Essenism to Judaism.—The fact that the Essenes professed to be guided by the teachings of the Hebrew Scriptures, that a rupture between them and the Jewish community is nowhere mentioned, and that, on the contrary, they are described by the orthodox Jews themselves as the holiest and most consistent followers of the Mosaic law, would, apart from anything else, shew that they were an order of the orthodox Jewish faith. We have, however, more minute and definite data, which incontestably prove that in doctrine, as well as in practice, Essenism is simply an intensified or exaggerated form of Pharisaism, which was the national religion in the time of Christ. It is unfortunate that the only two contemporary Jewish accounts of the Essenes as a separate brotherhood are those of Philo and Josephus, which are manifestly shaped to exhibit the Jews to the cultivated Greeks in a Hellenistic garb. In spite, however, of this mystification a careful examination of these strongly-coloured records will show the identity of the cardinal doctrines and principal practices of Essenism and Pharisaism. Passing over their belief in God the Creator and Disposer of all things, as requiring no proof that this also constituted the most essential article of the faith of the Pharisees, we shall examine the other doctrines and practices which Josephus describes, and which might be deemed to be distinctive features of Essenism.

1. The Essenes, we are told, believed in the immortality of the soul, and in a future state of reward and punishment. So the Pharisees, "This world is the outer court to the world to come; prepare thyself in the outer court so as to be admitted into the palace" (Aboth, iv. 16). "Those that are born are destined to die, those that die are destined to live again, and those that live again are destined for judgment" (Aboth, iv. 22).

2. The Essenes considered blaspheming the name of Moses a capital offence, so did the Pharisees. It was to bring him under the penalty of this law that Stephen was charged with having spoken "blasphemous words against Moses" (Acts vii. 11).

3. The Essenes were divided into four classes, according to the age of membership, and according to the degree of holiness which they practised, and the member of a higher class became defiled if he touched anything belonging to a member of the lower class; so the Pharisees. In consequence of a conscientious desire to discharge their religious duties in a state of legal purity, prescribed in Levit. v. 2; vii. 20, 21; xii. 1-8; xv. 19-31; Numb. xix. 14-22, the authoritative expounders of the canon law ordained that since one does not know whether he has been defiled by contact with any unclean person or thing, every member of the Pharisaic association is "to wash his hands before eating his ordinary food, the second tithes or the heave-offering; to immerse his whole body before he eats the portions of holy sacrifices; and to bathe his whole body before touching the water absolving from sin, even if it is only his hands which are unclean. If one immersed himself for ordinary food (לִחְיוּל), and designed it only for ordinary food, he could not eat second tithes; if he immersed for second tithes (לִשְׁמֵעָ) he could not eat of the heave-offering; if he immersed for the heave-offering (לִתְרוּמָה), and meant by it the heave-offering, he was not allowed to eat the portion of the holy sacrifice; if he immersed for the holy sacrifice (לִשְׁלֵחָה), and meant it for the holy sacrifice, he could not as yet touch the water absolving from sin (לִמְחֻלָּה), but he who immersed for the more important could share in the less important" (Mishna Chagiga, ii. 5, 6). This gave rise to four degrees of purity, and to four divisions in the Pharisaic association. Each degree of purity required a greater separation from the above-named Mosaic defilements. Hence "the garments of an Am Ha-Aretz (אִם הָאֶרֶץ or a non-member of the Pharisaic association) defile the Pharisee (i.e. him who lived according to the first degree of purity); the garments of the Pharisee defile those who eat the heave-offering (i.e. the second degree); the garments of those who eat the heave-offering defile those who eat the holy sacrifice (i.e. the third degree); and the garments of those who eat the holy sacrifice defile those who touch the water absolving from sin (i.e. the fourth degree) (comp. Mishna Chagiga, ii. 7; Taharoth, vii. 5). Hence it was declared that "he who takes upon himself to become a member of the Pharisaic association may neither sell to an Am Ha-Aretz moist or dry fruit, nor buy of him moist fruit, nor become a guest of an Am Ha-Aretz, nor receive him as a guest in his garments into his house" (Mishna Demai, ii. 3).

4. A candidate for admission into the order of the Essenes had to go through a novitiate of twelve months. The same was the case with the Pharisees. When any one applied to become a member of the Pharisaic association he had to pass through a novitiate of twelve months (Berachoth, 30 b).

5. The novice among the Essenes received an apron the first year of his probation. The same was the case in the Pharisaic association. The newly-admitted associate received a garment called דְּבִדָּה, and having duly qualified himself this stage, he was afterwards admitted to the no-ber instructions, מקבלין לכנסים ואחר כך מקבלין אחר לטווח (Tosephta Demai, ii. p. 48, ed.

 Zuckermann, Berlin, 1877; Jerusalem Demai, ii. 3; Babylon Berachoth, 30 b).

6. The Essenes rose early, and offered up prayer for the renewal of the light of day, and many of the Pharisees, too, considered it essential to offer morning prayer at the break of the rays of the sun (Berachoth, 12).

7. The Essenes were chiefly engaged in cultivating the land. So were some of the most distinguished spiritual leaders of the Pharisees.
 The many Talmudic treatises which exclusively treat on agriculture, and the numerous maxims dispersed throughout the Talmud which set forth its importance, shew the great respect in which this pursuit of life was regarded among the Jewish community at large. Hence we find
 R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanos, R. Ismael, R. Eliezer b.
 Asariah, R. Jehudah b. Shema, R. Gamaliel, and a host of others of the most celebrated teachers engaged in cultivating the soil as the most favourable of all work (Comp. Hamburger, Real-Ency-clopædie für Bibel und Talmud, s. v. ACKERBAU).

8. The Essenes regarded their social meal as their sacrament. The Pharisees, too, regarded the refectory as a sanctuary, and compared its table to the altar in the temple, because the altar in the temple is represented as the table of the Lord (Ezek. xli. 22). Thus we are told,
 "Three persons who eat at a table and recite at it the words of the law are as if they were eating off the table of the Lord, blessed be he, for it is written, 'And he said unto me, This is the table that is before the Lord'" (Aboth, iii. 3).
 Hence R. Jochanan and R. Eliezer remark, "As long as the temple stood the altar atoned for the sins of Israel, but now it is man's table which atones for his sins" (Berachoth, 55 a; Chagiga, 11 a; Menachoth, 97 a).

9. The Essenes "not only prepare their Sabbath-day's food the day before, that they may not kindle a fire on that day, but they will not move a vessel out of its place, nor go to ease nature." The Pharisees, too, prepare their Sabbath-day's food on Friday, and will in no wise kindle a fire on the Sabbath, in accordance with the command laid down in Exod. xxxv. 3, nor move a vessel from place to place (comp. Tosephta Succa, iii.). The orthodox Jews to the present day not only kindle no fire on the Sabbath-day, but will not even carry a handkerchief in their pocket; they tie it round their body to serve as a girdle, in order to avoid carrying even so small a weight on the sacred day.

10. The Essenes endeavoured so to regulate their life that with them conversation was yea, ya, and nay, nay. Hence they would not use much to corroborate or attest anything which they stated. So the pious Pharisees. On Ruth
 i. 18 we are told that R. Huna said, in the name of R. Samuel b. R. Isaac, "With the pious their yea is yea and nay, nay" (Midrash on Ruth, Avia vi. p. 70, ed. Stettin, 1863). On Levit.
iii. 30 the Talmud remarks, "It is designed to teach thee that thy yea should forsooth be yea, and thy nay should forsooth be nay" לומר לך שירא הן שלך צדק ולא שלך (Baba Metzia,
 8 a).

11. The highest aim of the Essenes was to attain to such a state of holiness as to be able to perform miraculous cures and to prophesy.
 So the Pharisees. Thus Josephus, among other things, foretold the coming of Vespasian and Titus to the Roman empire (comp. Antiq. iii.
8, 9; Life, § 42; War, III. viii. 39).

12. The Essenes "being bound by oaths and customs cannot receive food from any out of the society, so that when any are excommunicated they are forced to eat herbs" (Josephus, War, II. viii. 8). So the Pharisees.
 Josephus himself tells us when at Rome while Felix was procurator of Judea, he pleaded before Caesar the cause of certain captive priests who were his friends, and who were so God-fearing that even under affliction they subsisted on figs and nuts (Life, § 3).

13. The Essenes had esoteric doctrines and ancient books on magical cures and exorcisms, and the novice had to swear that he would "preserve the writings of the society, and the names of the angels" (Josephus, War, II. viii.
 8). So had the Pharisees. Josephus himself assures us that "God enabled Solomon to learn that skill which expels demons, which is a science useful and sanative to man. He composed such incantations also by which distempers are alleviated. And he also left behind him the manner of using exorcisms, by which they drive away demons so that they never return, and this method of cure is of great force until this day. For I have seen a certain man of my own country whose name was Eleazar releasing people that were demoniacal in the presence of Vespasian and his sons, and his captains, and the whole multitude of his soldiers" (Antiq.
VIII. ii. 5). The esoteric doctrines of the Jews which comprised the mysteries connected with the Tetragrammaton (שם המפורש) and the other names of God and the angels, the theosophy (מעשה מרכבה) and the cosmogony (מעשה בראשית) could only be communicated to the initiated. Hence the injunction in the Mishna, "The mystery of the cosmogony (מעשה בראשית) must not be explained when two are present, and the mystery of the theosophy (מרכבה) not even to one unless he is a sage" (Chagiga, ii. 1).

The real differences between Essenism and Pharisaism are—(1) The Essenes, or rather a portion of them, led a celibate life; (2) they were not present at the offering of their sacrifices, though they sent their holy gifts to the temple; and (3) they did not believe in the resurrection of the body, though they firmly believed in the immortality of the soul and a future state of reward and punishment. The first and second differences, as we shall see hereafter, were exaggerated, but still strictly logical developments of the Levitical and Pharisaical laws of purity, whilst the third was not peculiar to the Essenes, if it can be attributed to them at all.

V. The Relationship of Essenism to Christianity.—Two diametrically opposite opinions are advocated with equal dogmatism and pertinacity on the relationship of Essenism and Christianity. On the one hand it is declared that Christianity is "Essenism alloyed with foreign elements" (Graetz, Geschichte der Juden, iii. 288, 3rd ed. Leipzig, 1878), and on the other hand it is as firmly asserted that the supposed coincidence in doctrine and social institutions of the two communities simply exhibit the natural outgrowth of the moral sense common to mankind which may be seen whenever and wherever circumstances favour its development. As is often the case in controversies both these antagonistic views suffer from admixture of truth and error. The advocates of the former betray prejudice against Christianity and a want of appreciation of its true nature, whilst those of the latter shew ignorance of the varied opinions and institutions which obtained among the Jews before the time of Christ, and are equally prejudiced against Judaism. They seem, moreover, to be possessed by an unwholesome fear lest the admission that Christ belonged to a branch of the national synagogue established by law, into whose membership He was admitted by the prescribed rites, and whose services He attended and publicly took part in, and that He found some excellent doctrines and commendable practices in the religion of His people which He deemed worthy to incorporate into His own teaching would betray the sacred ark into the hands of the enemy. The truth will be found between these two extremes, as will be seen from the following comparison.

The ruling principle of Essenism was, above all, to seek the kingdom of God. Christ urged on His disciples to seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness. (Matt. vi. 33; Luke xii. 31.) The Essenes demanded of those who wished to join their community, to sell their possessions and give to the poor. (Josephus, War, II. viii. 3.) Christ told the young man who kept the commandments, and whom He loved, "If thou wilt be perfect, sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come and follow Me." (Matt. vi. 19-21; Mark x. 21-23; Luke xii. 31.) The Essenes regarded the laying up of treasure upon earth as injurious to leading a spiritual life, hence they despised riches, and were content with self-imposed poverty. (Josephus, War, II. viii. 3.) Christ told His disciples, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth . . . for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also"; and—"that a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven." (Matt. vi. 19-21; xix. 23, 24.) Love of the brotherhood was the soul of Essæan life, and was the basis of all their actions. So intense was this feeling amongst them, that the love which they manifested for the brethren called forth the greatest admiration, and was declared to be without a parallel in the rest of the Jewish nation. (Josephus, War, II. viii. 2.) Christ made love the basis of His teaching: "This is My commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you." (John xv. 12, 17.) "This is the message which ye have received from the beginning, that ye love one another." (1 John iii. 11; v. 7, 8, 11.) Indeed it was regarded as the test of Christianity: "We know that we have passed from death to life because we love the brethren." (1 John iii. 14.) To realise the idea of brotherhood, the Essenes lived together like one family; had all things in common, and appointed one of the brethren steward to manage the common bag. (Josephus, War, II. viii. 3.) So the primitive Christians: "All that believed were together, and had all things common, and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men as every man had need." (Acts ii. 43, 44.) One managed the common bag. (John xii. 6; xiii. 29.) Even in travelling the Essenes "go to those whom they have never seen before, as if they had been most intimate, so that they take nothing with them when they go on a journey." (Josephus, War, II. viii. 4.) Christ, too, commanded His disciples that they should take nothing for their journey save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money in their purses; but be shod with sandals, and not put on two coats. (Mark vi. 9, 10.) As a result of this mode of living together like brethren, the Essenes put all their members on the same level, forbade the exercise of authority of one over the other, and enjoined mutual service. (Josephus, Antiq. XVIII. i. 5.) Christ declared that all His disciples are equal; forbade them to lord one over another; but commanded them to be servants to each other. (Matt. xx. 25, 28; Mark ix. 35-37; x. 42-45.) Again, as a result of the great moral law which was the foundation of Essenism—viz. love to God and love to all mankind—the Essenes absolutely proscribed slavery. (Josephus, Antiq. XVIII. i. 5.) Though no single detached precept can be adduced in which Christ explicitly condemns this social institution, yet who can fail to see that the whole spirit and genius of his teaching is antagonistic to this degrading practice? Owing to the same great moral law, the Essenes proscribed all offensive war and warlike pursuits; they even refused to manufacture martial instruments, and only took weapons with them when they went on a perilous journey. Christ, too, who declared that "all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword" (Matt. xxvi. 52), told His disciples, when about to start for the Mount of Olives, "He that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one." (Luke xxii. 36-38.) The aim and end of Essenism were to be meek and lowly in spirit, to mortify all sinful lusts, to be pure in heart, to hate evil but reclaim the evil-doer, to be merciful to all men. (Josephus, War, II. viii. 7.) The same qualities Christ sets forth as constituting the blessed, in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 1-10.) With the Essenes, therefore, truthfulness was the natural result of their life. Hence, swearing to attest the veracity of a statement was strictly forbidden; their communication was "Yea, yea," and "Nay, nay." (Josephus, War, II. viii. 6.) So sacred was the word, that Herod the Great, who exacted the oath of allegiance from the other Jews, exempted the Essenes. (Josephus, Antiq. XV. x. 4.) Christ enjoined His disciples, "Swear not at all . . . but let your communication be Yea, yea, Nay, nay." (Matt. v. 34-37.) The Essenes especially devoted themselves to alleviate the ailments of the sick, thus combining the healing of the body with that of the soul; and regarded the power to perform miraculous cures, to cast out evil spirits, &c., as belonging to the highest state of discipleship. Christ, too, combined the two functions, and gave His true disciples power "to heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out evil spirits," &c. (Matt. x. 1-13; Mark xvi. 17, 18; Luke x. 9, 17.) It was the aim of the Essenes to live such a life of purity and holiness, and so to devote themselves to study of the sacred Scriptures, as to become the temples of the Holy Spirit, and to be able to prophesy; and Josephus assures us that they hardly ever failed in their predictions. (Josephus, War, II. viii. 12.) And this eye-witness describes several of their prophets, and the fulfilment of their predictions. (War, I. iii. 5; II. viii. 3; Antiq. XII. ii. 11; XV. x. 5.) St. Paul urges the Corinthians to desire, of all spiritual gifts, the gift to prophesy. (1 Cor. xiv. 1, 39.) Though all the Essenes as a body waited for the kingdom of heaven, and aimed to live a life of more immediate communion with the Deity, which involved abstention from conjugal intercourse, yet it was not given to all to attain to the highest state of perpetual sanctification. Only a portion of the brotherhood attained to that elevated spiritual life which enabled them to be celibates, or, as it is called in the language of the New Testament, "eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake." (Josephus, War, II. vii. 2, 13.) It is the striving after this gift which Christ commends to His disciples. To reach that state of holiness which will enable one to abstain from marriage for the kingdom of heaven's sake, is indeed not within the power of all, for it is a special gift of God; "but he that can receive it, let him receive it." (Matt. xix. 11-12.) Hence the declaration of St. Paul, who had this gift: "I would have all men to be unmarried, as I myself am; but every man hath his proper gift." (1 Cor. vii. 7.) This agreement between Christ and the Essenes on the doctrine of celibacy in connexion with holiness is all the more remarkable, inasmuch as it is at variance with the general Pharisaic opinion. The Talmudic law regards marriage as a Divine command, implied in the words "Be fruitful, and multiply" (Gen. i. 28), which is binding on all. Hence it declares that "a man without a wife is without the law of God, and without a wall of defence against sin;" and, "a man without a wife is without joy, without a blessing, and without happiness." (Yebamoth, 62 b.)

Ignorance and special pleading may, indeed, obscure and attenuate the identity of these precepts and practice, but the great aim of Essenism to attain to the highest state of moral purity and excellence cannot be gainsaid. The solemn obligations which every novice had to take upon himself before he was fully admitted into membership, and which have been given above, show that the vital principle of Essenism was to make its members seek true religion, not in external works and outward observance of rites and ceremonies, but in an inward and sanctified life, in holy thoughts, in a conscience void of offence towards God and towards men, which spontaneously and irrepressibly manifests itself in acts of charity, benevolence, and self-denial. There lies the great resemblance between Essenism and Christianity. It was this which kindled forth the unbounded admiration of even the Greeks and the Romans for the Essenes, and it was this which made Philo and Josephus describe them as the most holy and most virtuous of men. When it is remembered that the whole Jewish community at the advent of Christ was divided into three parties, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes, and that every devout Jew belonged to one of these sects, it is natural to suppose that Jesus, who in all things conformed to the Jewish law, belonged to this portion of His religious brethren. He who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, would naturally associate himself with that order of Judaism which was most congenial to his holy nature, and it would be unlike Christ who taught us lessons from the sparrows in the air and the lilies in the field, and who made the whole realm of nature tributary to his teachings, to refuse to avail Himself of moral precepts and divine truths simply because they were more fully developed and more earnestly practised among the Essenes than among the rest of his co-religionists. Christ, however, in His words and in His deeds condemned many of the rigorous observances which developed themselves among the Essenes or were adopted by them, and which necessarily prevented Essenism from ever being more than a limited brotherhood. They were ascetics; he ate and drank the good things of God (Matt. xi. 19), and shewed that "not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man" (Matt. xv. 11). They considered themselves ceremonially defiled by contact with any one who practised a lower degree of holiness than their own, and hence had to be recluses. Christ associated with publicans and sinners to redeem them from their evil ways and make them fit for the kingdom of heaven. The Essenes sacrificed the lusts of their flesh to gain spiritual happiness for themselves. Christ sacrificed Himself for the salvation of others. Essenism by its organization shut out all but a limited community. Christianity, by breaking down the middle wall of partition, admitted all kindreds and nations and tongues.

VI. Origin and Date of Essenism and its Relation to Pythagorism, &c.—Essenism, like its less intensified form, Pharisaism, arose out of the rules which were enacted after the return from the Babylonish captivity for the observance of the Mosaic institutions. Besides the feasts and fasts, the national religious party bound themselves by solemn promise (1) to keep the tithal laws, and (2) to observe the laws of Levitical purity. According to the Mosaic law, the neglect of these two enactments was a heinous sin. The non-separation of the tithes rendered the whole produce unlawful, thus affecting every article of food, whilst the non-eschewing of defiling objects hampered every action in public life and every movement in family intercourse. Thus not only are numbers of animals proscribed as food, but contact with their carcasses pollutes both man and things (Levit. v. 2; xi. 1-47). A man who has an issue not only defiles everything upon which he lies, or which he touches, but his very spittle is polluting (Levit. xv. 1-13). The same is the case with a man who comes in contact with a corpse (Numb. xix. 14-22), with a woman in menstruum and childbirth (Levit. xii. 1-8; xv. 19-31), and with a husband after conjugal intercourse (Levit. xv. 18). Individuals thus defiled were forbidden to come into the sanctuary (Numb. xix. 20), and were visited with the severe punishment of excision if they ate the flesh of a peace-offering (Levit. vii. 20, 21). The effect of these laws was that thousands upon thousands were daily rendered unclean, that these thousands of unclean men and women legally defiled myriads of people and things by contact with them either wittingly or unwittingly, and that it therefore became absolutely necessary for those who were conscientiously desirous of discharging their religious duties in state of legal purity to adopt such precautionary measures as would preclude the possibility of violating those laws. Hence obtained those rules and those four different degrees of purity with the four corresponding classes into which the whole Pharisaic body was divided, already described (sec. iv. 3). Any one who did not belong to the established national religion, that is, to one of the four classes, was termed an Am Ha-Aretz (עַם הָאֶרֶץ)—one who lives for earthly things, publican, sinner. Contact with him was defiling, and no articles of food or raiment would be purchased by the religious from such an one. It was for eating with such persons that Christ was upbraided (Matt. ix. 10-13; Mark ii. 16, 17, etc.), which shews beyond doubt that he belonged to the national religious body, else the rebuke would have no meaning, since all the unattached, that is, Amme Ha-Aretz (עַמֵּי הָאֶרֶץ), could have intercourse among themselves. Besides, as an unattached or defiling person, Christ could not mix with the national and religious body. Of St. Paul we know, from his own words, that he was not only a Pharisee, but that he belonged to the strictest order, that is, he practised the fourth degree of holiness. (Acts xxvi. 5.)

With such a wide field for difference of opinion before them, with the tendency of some to regard the ritual observances as paramount and the only vehicle of divine grace; with the conviction of others that though necessary they are secondary emblems, and that a holy consistent life is the bond of union and communion with God; and with the feelings of others again that they are altogether useless, and are only to be observed because to disregard them would offend the national conscience and expose the nonconformists to penalties and disabilities, different schools arose among the ranks of the Pharisees, who represented the national religion. It is only by a careful study of the post-biblical Jewish writings, and by thoroughly realising their spirit, that one can appreciate their sentiments and minute shades of differences, and is able to see that the apparent outstanding and mal-shaped sections are in reality only different but genuine branches of the same parent stem, deriving their sap from the same root. The two somewhat different lists in the two recensions of the Talmud—the Jerusalem and the Babylonian, enumerating the different branches of Pharisaism—shew how fully alive the spiritually-minded Pharisees were to the conscientious extremes and the unconscionable abuses to which these stupendous observances gave rise among the various schools of thought comprised in the national religion. As we have given the Babylon recension elsewhere, we here give the one from the Jerusalem Talmud. "There are seven kinds of Pharisees:—(1) the Shoulder Pharisee (פָּרִישׁ שֶׁלִּשְׁכָמִי), who carries, as it were, his good works on his shoulder that they may be seen by all, in order that he may be praised of men; (2) the Time-gaining Pharisee (פָּרִישׁ נִיקְמָה), who, when asked for anything, always says, 'Let me go first and perform a divine command'; (3) the Deducting Pharisee (פָּרִישׁ קִיּוּא), who says, 'My few sins will be deducted from my many virtues'; (4) the Saving Pharisee (פָּרִישׁ מִן הַנֶּכֶי"ה), who says, 'I save from my scanty income in order that I may perform a good deed'; (5) the Searching Pharisee (פָּרִישׁ אֲדַע חֻבְתִּי וְאֶעֱשֶׂנָה), 'who always searches for any sin which he may have committed, in order that he may atone for it by an act of piety'; (6) the Pharisee from fear (פָּרִישׁ יִרְאָה), who is one because he dreads Divine punishment; and (7) the Pharisee from love (פָּרִישׁ אֶהְבָּה), who is one from pure love to God like Abraham" (Jerusalem Berachoth, ix. 5, with Jerusalem Sotah, v. 5). These seven classes comprise all the different ramifications, all the various tendencies, and all the offshoots. It is the seventh class, the Pharisees from pure love to God and His divine commands, which the Talmud commends, and it is from this class that Essenism proceeded. What those who belonged to this class had to practise, and how identical they are with Essenism, will be seen from the following declaration in the Talmud, which describes the gradual growth in holiness:—(1) "The study of the divine law leads a man to circumspection; having practised circumspection, he is (2) accepted as a novice, and receives the apron, the symbol of purity, whence he attains (3) to the state of outward purity by lustrations. Thence he progresses (4) to that stage which imposes abstention from connubial intercourse. From celibacy he advances (5) to the stage of inward or spiritual purity; thence to (6) the higher stage of holiness; thence (7) to meekness and lowliness; thence (8) to the dread of every sin; thence (9) to the highest degree of holiness; thence (10) to becoming the temple of the Holy Spirit and to prophesy; and thence, finally (11), to the stage which enables him miraculously to heal the sick and raise the dead."* With impartial students who have no special theories to advance this will sufficiently shew the origin of Essenism. It will demonstrate that the individuals here described exhibit an ultra type of Pharisaism, and are none other but the Essenes. Bearing in mind that the name Essene does not exist in the whole range of Talmudic literature, and that the brotherhood has to be identified from the description of its features, simply because they were a branch of the Pharisees, it will readily be conceded that this is as faithful a picture of the Essenes as can be expected.

We have now to examine several practices which obtained among the Essenes which some maintain are heterodox and of non-Jewish origin, and which we are assured constituted them heretics and separatists. 1. "The most crucial note of heresy which is recorded of the Essenes"

* There are no less than five recensions of this Boraita, two in the Jerusalem Talmud, Sabbath, ii. 3; Shabkalis, iii. 3; two in the Babylonian Talmud, Aboda Sara, 20 b, Mishna Sota, ix. 15, and one in the Midrash Rabba, Canticles, 1a-2b, ed. Stettin, 1863. We have carefully compared all the recensions, and give the one from the Babylonian Talmud, Aboda Sara, 20a. The erudite Dr. Jellinek, who we believe was the first to call attention to this important Boraita (Ben Chanania, iv. 374) most unhesitatingly declares that it is a description of Essenism. Those who are Talmudic scholars will readily concede that this distinguished Rabbi understands the Talmud, knows what his own Judaism is, and will accept his opinion about the tenets of his brethren.

that "they declined to take part in the sacrifice" Josephus, who mentions their abstention from offering sacrifices in the temple, distinctly says that it is owing to the different degrees of holiness which they practised. His words are, "Though they send offerings to the temple they do not offer the sacrifices themselves on account of the different rules of purity which they observe, hence, excluding themselves from the sacred sanctuary, they offer sacrifices in themselves" (ἐφ' ὧν τὰς ἐκείνας ἐπιτελοῦσι), or, as it may mean, "have the sacrifices offered for them" (Antiq. XVIII. i. 5). To understand the meaning of Josephus, we must advert to the sacrificial regulations which obtained during the second temple. Those who had the arrangement of the Temple service aimed at making the people at large realise that they were a nation of kings and priests. Hence they ordained that every individual should personally participate as much as possible in the offering up of the sacrifice. Not only had the offerer, who was present, to lay his hands on the victim, but permanent delegates of the people (דבני עמ) represented the entire nation, which could not be personally present at the daily sacrifices. These were divided into twenty-four divisions, answering to the twenty-four divisions of the priesthood. Even the slaughtering of the sacrifices was performed by the laity themselves, and it was the sprinkling of the blood and the actual altar work which were left to the priests. Now the Essenes, who were more rigorous about the law of defilement than the other Pharisees, were afraid to enter the temple, and thus to participate personally in the sacrifices, lest they had not been properly purified. They therefore sent thither their sacrifices and partook of their sacrificial meal at home. It is therefore evident that they did not break off their connexion with the national sanctuary, for they periodically sent their consecrated gifts, for its maintenance, and for the keeping up of the temple worship, nor did they repudiate sacrifices in themselves. They were simply precluded from being present in the temple to participate in offering by a difference of opinion about the degree of holiness which those practised who officiated in the sanctuary. The specific nature of this difference Josephus was precluded from giving by the plan of his work, which was intended for the cultivated Greeks. The erudite Frankel, however, has rightly pointed it out. The Mosaic law ordained the burning of a red heifer, the ashes of which mixed with water were to be used for the sprinkling of those who were defiled by a corpse (Numb. xix. 1-22). The entrance into the sanctuary was made dependent upon the purification by this "water of separation," and he who entered the tabernacle of the Lord without this was "cut off from Israel" (Numb. xix. 20). The sacred nature of the ashes and the momentous consequences involved in the use of "the water of separation" required the utmost care and the most minute ceremonial in the preparation thereof, as the efficacy of the water and the validity of the purification depended upon the fulfilment of all the conditions prescribed in connexion with the burning of the heifer. The omission of a single item rendered the ashes inefficacious. In consequence of this the Mosaic law on this subject was minutely explained by the canon law, and a whole treatise in the Talmud is devoted to the subject. Children were trained from their birth to engage in this ceremonial. "There were special courts in Jerusalem built upon a rock which was hollowed underneath to prevent the penetration of any Levitical pollution. Thither pregnant women were brought to be confined; here they brought up the children" (Mishna Para, iii. 2). "An arched bridge was made from the temple mount to the mount of Olives, constructed in such a manner as to preclude defilement from beneath. On this bridge only the priest, and those who assisted him in burning the heifer, and the heifer itself were allowed to cross to the mount of Olives" (ibid. iii. 6). But the most extraordinary part connected with this ceremonial was that the Pharisees, contrary to the law laid down in Levit. xxii. 6, 7, commanding the defiled person who had undergone the necessary lustration to be unclean till sunset, "purposely defiled the priest on the very day in which he had to burn the heifer, and made him immerse in the baptistery on the mount of Olives, and immediately after perform the service, because of the Sadducees, who maintained that it must be done after sunset" (Mishna Para, iii. 7). As the Essenes regarded this act as illegal, and hence "the water of separation" inefficacious, they had no means of purifying themselves before entering the sanctuary, as prescribed in the Mosaic law. They demanded another purification than the one practised by the managers of the temple service; their water of purification the Essenes regarded as impure^b (Frankel, Monatsschrift, iii. 64, 65).

To this must be added, that throughout the whole of the prophetic writings and the hagiographa sacrifices are regarded as of very inferior value, and that the greatest importance is attached to inward purity and to holiness of life. Of the numerous passages we can only quote a few:—"Sacrifice and burnt offering thou didst not desire" (Ps. xl. 6); "Thou desirest not sacrifice, else would I give it; thou delightest not in burnt offering; the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit," &c. (Ps. li. 16, 17). I will praise the name of God with a song, and will magnify him with thanksgiving; this shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs (Ps. lxxix. 30, 31). "I hate, I despise your feast days. . . though ye offer me burnt offerings and your meat-offerings, I will not accept them," etc. (Amos v. 21, 22). More remarkable still is the declaration of Jeremiah that sacrifices as a part of worship were no divine ordinance at all. "I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day I brought them out of the land of Egypt concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices" (Jerem. vii. 21, 22). Hence Rashi (1040-1105) who is the highest authority in Talmudic matters, and represents traditionally the doctrines of the Pharisees (Chullin, 5 A); Maimonides (1135-1204), who is called the "second Moses," and who for the first time formulated and introduced into the synagogue the Jewish creed which is recited by the orthodox Israelites to this day (More Nebuchim, iii. 32, 46), and Kimchi (1163-1235), the celebrated expositor and lexicographer (Levit. i. 1; Jerem. vii. 23), maintain that sacrifices were altogether optional, they were permitted on account of the hardness of heart, and that the Mosaic ordinances aimed to restrict them as much as possible. The Essenes could therefore easily be satisfied with sending their gifts to the temple to mark their union with the national sanctuary, and believe that "the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit," which they conscientiously endeavoured to offer. It is for this reason that Josephus, though himself a Pharisee, does not describe them as cut off from Judaic orthodoxy in matters of sacrifices, and that he tells us himself of distinguished Essenes frequenting the temple and instructing their disciples there without let or hindrance (War, I. iii. 5).

^b Professor Lightfoot's assertion that "Frankel supposes that their only reason for abstaining from the temple sacrifices was that according to their severe notions the temple itself was profaned, and therefore unfit for sacrificial worship" (Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, p. 371, 2nd ed. London, 1876), seems due to a mistake. What he says is shown false also by the fact that they sought to purify themselves, sie hatten kein Reinigungswasser für den sich an einer Leiche Verunreinigten, they, i.e. the Essenes, accordingly had not the means to purify themselves, they had no water of purification for one who contracted defilement by a corpse. Professor Lightfoot has therefore mistaken Frankel's meaning, they themselves are not the temple.

(2) It is maintained that the Essenes offered up prayers to the Sun, and that this practice not only shews a Parsee influence, but cuts them off from the body of orthodox Jews. The ground for this assertion is the statement of Josephus, "their piety towards God is extraordinary, for they never speak about worldly matters before the sun rises, but offer up, with their faces towards it, certain prayers, handed down by their forefathers, as if supplicating it to rise" (War, II. viii. 5). But the most inconceivable part about it is that those who advocate this opinion make Josephus, who was a Pharisee (1) describe their extraordinary piety towards the God of Abraham to consist in offering up prayer to the sun, i.e. in an idolatrous practice expressly forbidden in the very law of Moses (Deut. iv. 10), which the Essenes revered in the highest degree, and that (2) for this idolatrous worship they used the national orthodox prayers transmitted by their forefathers, thus insulting the national conscience by this degradation of the prayers of the faithful. The prayer here spoken of is the well-known national morning hymn of praise (הַמְּאִיר לְאֶרֶץ) for the return of the light of day, which forms a part of the Jewish service to the present day, and which according to an ancient canon had to be offered up at sun-rise (Mishna Berachoth, i. 4). The orthodox or Pharisaic Jews to this day offer up the following prayer, every month, on beholding the new moon, "A good sign, good fortune be to all Israel! (to be repeated three times) Blessed be thy (the moon's) Creator! Blessed be thy possessor! Blessed be thy Maker (repeated three times)! As I leap towards thee (i.e. the moon) but cannot touch thee, so may my enemies not be able to injure me (said three times, leaping)," &c. (Sopherim, xx. 2). It would be fairer almost to charge the Pharisees with moon-worship, than to conclude from the remark of Josephus that the Essenes were cut off from the Pharisees by sun-worship.

(3) On the subject of marriage again, we are told the antagonism between the Essenes and the Pharisees is a vital matter. The following are Josephus's remarks. "They disregard marriage, but they do not repudiate marriage and its consequent succession of the race in themselves, but they are afraid of women, and are persuaded that none of them preserve their fidelity to one man" (War. II. viii. 2). "There is another order of Essenes who in their way of living, customs, and laws exactly agree with the others, excepting that they differ from them about marriage, for they believe that those who do not marry cut off the principal part of human life" (ibid. II. viii. 13). The reason which Josephus here assigns for the celibacy of some of the Essenes, like that of Philo, is simply shaped to suit the taste of those cultivated Greek readers whose maxim was "a handsome wife would be common, one deformed a punishment, therefore we should have none" (Whitby's Commentary, 1 Cor. vii. 3). He tells his Greek readers that in Exod. xxii. 27 Moses forbids the Jews to revile the heathen gods (Antiq. IV. viii. 10; Contr. Apion. ii. 37). That the law prohibits to spoil our enemies (Contr. Apion. 26), that the law of Moses commands the Jews to kill themselves rather than go into slavery among heathen (War, III. viii. 9; VII. viii. 7; with I. xiii. 10), etc., and in order to expose the Egyptian custom of married men being subordinate to their wives he positively declares "the Scripture says a woman is inferior to her husband in all things" (Contr. Apion. i. 25). Because the Greeks and Romans ridicule the Jewish rite of circumcision, he actually suppresses the fact that the sons of Jacob imposed it on the Shechemites, and says that the brother fell upon them at night whilst they were revelling and feasting (Antiq. I. xxi. 1). For the same reason he alters the text of the Bible which says that Saul demanded of David hundred foreskins of the Philistines, as dowry for his daughter, into six hundred heads of the Philistines (Antiq. VI. ix. 2). The reason, therefore, which he assigns for the celibacy of some of the Essenes belongs to the same category. The very nature of Essenism supplies the cause of it. The foundation of their arrangements is based upon the avoidance of every kind of defilement. According to the law connubial intercourse was defiling and required sanctification (Levit. xv. 18), as Josephus himself says "the law enjoins that after the man and wife have lain together, in regular way, they shall bathe themselves, for there is a defilement contracted thereby both soul and body" (Contr. Apion. ii. 25). Even Bathsheba underwent this lustration after violating her conjugal fidelity (2 Sam. xi. 4). Keeping from women was, therefore, considered indispensable to a holy life (Exod. xix. 15; 1 Sam. xxi. 5, 6; 2 Sam. xi. 4; Enoch, lxxxiii. 1; lxxxv. 3). Even Ben-Azai, who agreed with the theory that men should marry to propagate the race in accordance with Gen. i. 28, was himself a celibate, and when asked for the reason replied "What can I do? my soul is wedded to the Divine Law, and the world can be propagated by others" (Yebamoth, 63 b). The Essenes therefore, who felt themselves constrained to celibates, because they were devoted to a ha

He, were quite as orthodox as the Pharisee Ben Azzai. It must, however, be added that Josephus most explicitly states that the Essenes do not repudiate marriage in itself, that celibacy was quite optional, since it was an open question, and that a portion of them were married, and still were faithful members of the brotherhood. How such statements can be made, that "marriage was to him [i.e. the Essene] an abomination" (Lightfoot, St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians, etc. p. 85), and that "R. Chaninah's wife is a prominent person in the legends of his miracles reported in Taanith, 24 b, and thus we need hardly stop to discuss the possible meaning of אנשי מעשה, since his claims to being considered an Essene are barred at the outset by this fact" (ibid. p. 363) is surpassing strange.

(4) The Essenes did not believe in the resurrection of the body, which the Pharisees held as a cardinal doctrine. What Josephus says on this subject is as follows: "They firmly believe that the bodies perish, and that their substance is not enduring, but that the souls are immortal" (War, II. viii. 11). Any impartial student who will carefully read the whole of this section will at once perceive that Josephus's aim here is to show that the Essenes, to use his own words, "agree with the opinion of the Greeks, they say that for the good souls there is a life beyond the ocean, and a region which is never molested either with showers or snow or intense heat, is always refreshed with the gentle gales of wind constantly breathing from the ocean." To take this piece of Paganism as a sober description of an article of creed believed by a Jewish brotherhood whose distinguishing features were an extreme veneration and a more rigorous observance of the Mosaic teachings than the rest of their co-religionists is betraying a want of appreciation of evidence. Speaking of the Pharisaic doctrine on this subject, Josephus says, "the soul by being united to the body is subject to miseries, and is not freed therefrom again but by death" (contr. Apion. ii. 25). Here Josephus represents the Pharisees as maintaining that "the soul was confined in the flesh as in a prison-house. Only when disengaged from these fetters would it be truly free. Then it would be released, rejoicing in its newly-attained liberty." Fortunately, however, the stupendous Jewish literature which has come down from ancient times enables us to correct this anti-Jewish view contained in a piece of special pleading whilst in the case of the Essenes we are obliged to Hippolytus (Haer. ix. 27), who distinctly declares that they did believe in the resurrection of the body (comp. also Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift, iv. 49). The Messianic doctrine was, to say the least, as firmly believed by the Pharisees as the doctrine of the resurrection. The orthodox Jews expected the Messiah to be not only of Jewish descent but the son of David. Yet Josephus declares that "the oracle found in the sacred Scriptures certainly denoted the government of Vespasian, who was appointed emperor of Judea" (War, VI. v. 4).

(5) Again, great stress is laid on the Essene abstention from the use of ointments. Josephus says "they regard ointment as defiling, and if one of them happens to be anointed against his will he immediately wipes it off his body"

(War, II. viii. 3). This is not only declared to be a point of divergence between them and the Pharisees, but a distinct proof of Buddhist influence. But as Geiger has pointed it out, the question about the use of ointment constituted one of the differences of opinion between the older conservative Pharisaic school represented by the followers of Shammai, and the younger progressive Pharisees represented by the followers of Hillel. The latter, who opposed vehemently the arrogance of the Romans, regarded this custom, though practised among the Jews from time immemorial, as an aristocratic luxury. Hence they laid it down as a principle that "it is not seemly for a learned disciple-Pharisee to walk about anointed" (לפי שאין ירכה)

(Tosephta Berachoth, v. p. 13, ed. Zuckermann, 1877; Babylon Berachoth, 43 b). The Essenes, therefore, in this respect, as on all other points, simply followed the practices of the more rigorous portion of the Pharisees (Geiger, Jüdische Zeitschrift, vi. 105-121; vii. 174; ix. 32).

VII. The Name and its Signification.—It has already been said that the name Essene does not occur in the whole range of Talmudic and Midrashic literature. Not even of the gate of the Essenes, which Josephus assures us was at Jerusalem (War, V. iv. 3), is a trace to be found in the description of the temple and of the holy city given in the Mishna and Talmud. This is all the more remarkable when notice is taken of all other sects and offshoots of Judaism. We have the Samaritans, the Sadducees, with the Boëthusians, their offshoot; the Zealots, the Chassidim, both earlier and later; the Daily Baptists, and all shades of Pharisees. It is this which makes it so difficult to ascertain its etymology and signification. It is still disputed whether it is Greek, Hebrew, or Aramaic; whether it is to be derived from a proper name, of a person, or of a place. Some idea of the difficulty may be obtained from the following enumeration, which we arrange according to the sequence of the letters in the alphabet. It is derived from asā (אסא), to heal, whence asya (אסיה), a physician, because they paid great attention to the healing of diseases; from asar (אסר), to bind, to associate, whence assarim (אסרין), associates, because they united together to keep the law; from chāzā (חזא), to see, whence chazyā (חזיא), a seer, because they possessed prophetic powers; from chazzin (חזין), watcher, guardian, whence chazzanim (חזנים), watchers, servants of God, because this was the whole aim of their life; from the Hebrew chāsīd (חסיד), to be loving, good, pious, whence chassidim (חסידים), the pious, because of their extraordinary piety; from the Syriac chāsi (חסי), pious, or chuso (חוסו), pious for the same reason; from cham (חם), powerful, strong, because they were morally strong to subdue their passions; from chōtzin (חצין), a fold of a garment, an apron, because every neophyte obtained this symbol of purity; from chāshā (חשא), to be silent, whence chashaim (חשאים), the silent ones, because they meditated on mysteries; from choshon (חשון), endowed with the gift of prophecy; from Isa (ישע), the disciple of R. Joshua b. Perachia; from sēchā (סחא), to bathe, which with Alaph prefixed yields asachai (אסחאי), bathers, because of their daily lustrations; from asāh (אשא), to do, to work, whence the doers of good deeds, or the workers of miracles; from ashin (אשין), strong, because of their strength of character; ixēna (יחנא), retired, modest, or from the Greek ἅγιος, holy, or from the Greek ἵσος, companion, associate, whence the associates because they united together into a brotherhood. So the Greek and the Hebrew, the Chaldee and the Syriac, names of persons and names of places have thus in vain been tortured to yield up the secret connected with this appellation, and a scholar must indeed be bold to dogmatise upon the subject. If the name has not been coined by Philo and Josephus to suit the Greek readers, which we strongly suspect, asāh (אשא), whence Osin (אשין), and Anshē miasē (אנשי מעשה) on chasyo (חסיא), pious = chassideim (חסידים) may be its etymology.

VIII. The Literature on the Essenes.—The oldest accounts of this brotherhood are by Josephus, Bell. Jud. ii. viii. 2–15; Antiq. xiii. v. 9; xv. x. 4, 5; xviii. i. 2 ff.; Philo, quod omnis probus liber, sec. xii. ff.; Pliny, Hist. Natur. v. 16, 17. Moderns of value are Bellermand, Geschichtliche Nachrichten aus dem Alterthume über Essäer und Therapeuten, Berlin, 1821; Gfrörer, Philo und die jüdisch-alexandrinische Theosophie, Stuttgart, 1835; Frankel, Zeitschrift für die religiösen Interessen des Judenthums, 1846, 471 ff.; Monatschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judenthums, ii. 30 ff.; 61 ff. ESTERUIN, abbat of Wearmouth. [EASTERWINI.]

ESTHA, according to the account given by Africanus to reconcile the two genealogies of our Lord, the name of the wife of Matthan, who afterwards married Melchi. (Ep. ad Aristid. ap. Euseb. H. E. i. 7.) [G. S.]

ESTHENI, given by Procopius of Gaza on (2 Kings xviii. 4) as another name for OPHITEA. He came by this name from a corrupt reading in his copy of Theodoret's Commentary on the same passage, where the title Naassenes is connected with the word Nessōdā (see Cotelier, Mon. Ecc. Gr. i. 769). [G. S.]

ESUS (Esi), an abbat from whom Bede obtained his few details respecting the foundation of the East Anglian Church. (H. E. praef.) [S.]

ESYCHIA (ESICIA), a lady to whom, along with two others, Dominica and Eudochia, pope

Gregory the Great sends greetings through Narses Patricius. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. i. ind. ix. ep. 6. Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 450.) In a subsequent letter (ep. 30) Gregory has been informed by Narses of her decease, and rejoices that that good spirit has reached its own country, having had a toilsome existence in a foreign one. The mention of Eudochia and Dominica again in the second letter shews the identity of this lady, whose name is spelt differently each time.

[C. H.]

ESYCHIUS, a "vir illustris," who carried a letter from Julian, bishop of Coa, to pope Leo I. in A.D. 453. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 118, 1210, Migne.) [C. G.]

ETAOIN (EDANA, EDAENA), virgin, commemorated July 5. According to O'Clery, she was of the race of Brian, son of Eochaidh Muighmeadhoin, and lived in Magh Luirg, on the banks of the Buill (Boyle). She is the same as Edana or Edaena, who was the patron saint of what Butler calls the parish of new Tuamia in the diocese of Elphin, and of another in that of Tuam. She is also identified with St. Moduena or Moninne of Sliabh Cuillinn, and with the "Sancta Moduenna, virgo in Laudonia et Galovida, scotiae provinciis celebris" at July 5 in Camerarius' Kalendar, yet not without some doubt. The ancient Magh Luirg is a plain in the barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 187; Butler, Lives of the Saints, vii. 70; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 238, 333; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 38, n.) [J. G.]

ETBALT (Brut y Tywysog. text, in M. H. B. 842, and note), king of the Saxons. [ETHELBALD (1).] [C. H.]

ETBIN, confessor. [ETHBIN.]

ETCHAENIUS. [ETCHEN.]

ETCHEN (ECHEN, ECHEUS, ETCHAEINIUS, ETIAN), bishop of Cluain-foda in Fir-Bile, in Meath (Mart. Doneg.), commemorated Feb. 11. Of this saint the Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. 11, tom. ii. 551–2) and Colgan (Acta SS. 305–6) present short memoirs, mostly taken from the Lives of St. Brigida and St. Columba. Near the close of the 5th century, when Ireland was glittering with saints, numerous as the stars of heaven, St. Etchen, Etian, or Echen, was born of an illustrious family of Leinster, ennobled by both his parents. His father was Maine Eiges (or the Sage), son of Fergus Lamderg, of the race of Laeghaire Lorc, through Mesincorb, the Milesian ancestor of the Dal Mesincorb, and the kings of Leinster (see his genealogy traced through twenty-four generations in Todd, St. Pat. 253). His mother was Briga, daughter of Colthach, descended by a collateral line from the same Mesincorb, and his birth is said to have been through the special blessing of St. Brigida. He had three uterine brothers, bishop Aidan of Keshmore, abbat Segene, and Aedh, son of Ainmire, who was slain by Bran Dubh, son of Eochaidh, in the battle of Dun-bolg, in Leinster, in the year 590. He is represented by Colgan as a great physician, who was consulted by St. Brigida for the cure of her ailments, and Colgan quotes a long passage from the Life of St. Brigida, by Laurence of Durham, in which a bishop Echeus is mentioned.

contemporary with her and S. 25a (Feb. 6) of Ardagh, but as St. Mel died A.D. 488, St. Etchen, who was probably born about A.D. 490, could not have been a bishop in his day, and the whole story is extremely doubtful. That, however, for which he is most famous, and of which there appears to be no reason for doubt, was the ordination of St. Columba, though the form of the legend may be largely fictitious. The point of it is the showing how by mistake on the part of the consecrating bishop, that is, of St. Etchen, the presbyterate only was conferred on the candidate for episcopal orders. It is preserved in a note on the Fair of Aengus, and is given in the original Irish with an English translation by Dr. Todd (Obits and Martyrology of Christ Church, Dublin, introd. liii.-iv.), by Colgan (Acta SS. 26 a. 17), and in an English translation by Dr. Todd (St. Patrick, 71). O'Donnell also (Vit. S. Columb. i. c. 47) gives his own version of the same story, and this version is what Colgan gives in his memoir of the saint. [COLUMBA (1).] (See O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 472-75, on the legend, its origin, and general teaching.) St. Etchen also ordained St. Berach (Feb. 15) of Clon-Cairpthe, now Kilbarry, in Roscommon, St. Coemgen (June 3) having brought him to Bishop Etchen from Glendalough for the purpose (Colgan, Acta SS. 306, c. 10). St. Etchen seems first to have lived on the borders of Ossory, then at Clonfad in Westmeath; and at last, after many illustrious works, he exchanged the earthly for the heavenly in the year 578 (Ann. Tig.); his festival is Feb. 11. He is commemorated in all the Irish calendars or martyrologies, and in the Scotch calendar of the Drummond missal. (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 9; Todd, St. Patrick, 70 sq. 253, and Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 171 a.; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. ii. 153, iv. 28; Dr. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 5; Reeves, Admon. lxxii. 22, 349, 371; Archdall, Monast. Hib. 708; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 73; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 45.) [J. G.]

ETECUSA, also called Numeria, a Carthaginian woman, who, with her sister Candida, lived at Rome under the Decian persecution. Fell causes the confusion which he complains of when he makes three sisters. Their brother CELERINUS (q. v.) writes to an intimate friend (Cyp. Ep. xxi.) that she had bribed others in order to be exempted from sacrificing, and he begs that the first martyr selected for each among those in prison at Carthage may "his sororibus nostris Numeriae et Candidae talia peccata remittant. Nam hanc ipsam Etecusa semper appellavi . . . quia pro ea hanc numeravit ne sacrificaret." As translated, "our sisters Numeria and Candida, for the latter I have always called Etecusa . . . because she gave gifts"; the passage is, as Dr. Vallis himself says, "altogether unintelligible." Hence the conjectures of aēcusaam, for ἀέκουσαν, ἐνέκουσαν (Dodwell, Diss. ad loc.), and even Martell's circumstantiam. There is no various reading, except etecusaam and et recusaam, which confirm the usual one.

We must observe, however, that Numeria is not a real praenomen (Varro, Ling. Lat. ix. 55); that the whole letter is incorrect in taste and in grammar; that hanc ipsam may perfectly well be predicative; and that hanc need not refer to the last-named, who in this Latin would be more commonly istam. Hence we may understand that Numeria is the sobriquet which Celerinus says he has affixed to his sister, because she paid (numeravit) for immunity. Translate thus, "Beg remission for these sisters of mine, Numeria and Candida; for so, indeed (hanc ipsam), have I ever called Etecusa, because she paid down bribes to be excused from sacrificing."

As to the name itself I do not know if it occurs elsewhere. Tecusa occurs in an inscription at Ainbon-Tellis (Soc. Archéol. de Constantine, 1863, p. 81); in the Passion of Theodotus of Ancyra, A.D. 503 (Ruinart); and in De Rossi, vol. ii. p. lvii. we have it in conjunction with the name Laurentius, which was the name of a martyr under Decius in the same family of Celerinus. Neither Tecusa nor Etecusa occurs in the inscriptions of Gruter or Muratori.

ETELATUS, bishop. [HADULAC.]

ETELIG is witness, as a cleric, to two grants of land made to the see of Llandaff, in the time of bishop Berthgwyn, in the end of the 5th or early in the 6th century (Lib. Land. by Rees, 428, 442). [J. G.]

ETERNITY, from a patristic point of view solely, which, however, was not original, but culled from Greek and other philosophies in agreement with Scripture. Αἰών, the Greek equivalent, may, according to Aristotle (de Cael. i. 9), have several meanings, but all deducible from, and subordinate to, the idea it was intended to express when the word was formed—duration without beginning or end: ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰὸς εἶναι εἰληφὸς τὴν ἐκωνυμίαν. In this sense it cannot, of course, be predicated of anything short of God. Of His existence alone could this and nothing short of this, be truly said—as Tertullian puts it, writing against Hermogenes, who asserted that matter was co-eternal with God—"Quis enim alius Dei census, quam aeternitas: quis alius aeternitatis status, quam semper fuisse, et futurum esse, ex praerogativa nullius initii et nullius finis . . . Adequabitur Deo materia, cum aeterna censetur" (adv. Hermog. c. 4). Which last is a pregnant remark. This deification of matter, he tells us in an earlier chapter (c. 1), Hermogenes borrowed from the Stoics. He refutes it himself at great length, and with much point. "Veritas autem," he maintains, "sic unum Deum exigit, defendendo ut solius sit, quicquid Ipsius est" (c. 5). Origen (de Princ. iii. 3) was of opinion that as this world was not the first that God created, so neither would it be the last. Others, on the contrary, saw no reason why the world should not have been eternal, had God so willed it (Erius, Diss. in II. Sent. dist. i. § 11); orthodox, they thought indeed, would not allow them to follow Aristotle in asserting it was this in fact. Origen expressed what strict orthodoxy required in terse terms, as follows:—"Species eorum, quae per praedicationem Apostolicam manifestè traduntur, istae sunt. Primum, quod unus Deus est, Qui omnia creavit atque composuit: Quique, cum nihil esset, esse fecit universa." (ib. i. 4). This position was accepted, uno ore, by all; and it was within its enclosures solely that they considered themselves free to speculate. "Eloquar quemadmodum sentio," says Minucius

Felix (Oct. § 18): "magnitudinem Dei qui se putat nosse, minuit: qui non vult minuire non novit . . . Cum palam sit parentem omnium Deum nec principium habere nec terminum; Qui nativitatem omnibus praestet, Sibi perpetuitatem; Qui, ante mundum, fuerit Sibi Ipse pro mundo?" Eternity was from their point of view the negation of time, and infinity the negation of place; yet it was from time and place that they obtained their notions of both, as St. Thomas says: "Sicut enim ratio temporis consistit in numeratione prioris et posterioris in motu; ita in apprehensione uniformitatis ejus, quod est omnino extra motum consistit ratio aeternitatis . . . Sic ergo ex duobus notificatur aeternitas; primo ex hoc, quod id quod est in aeternitate est interminabile: id est, principio et fine carens, ut terminus ad utrumque referatur; secundo per hoc, quod ipsa aeternitas successione caret, ita nec principium aut finem habere potest." (S. Theol. P. i. q. x. art. 1.) This was analogous to getting at a conception of God from His works, and rising from finite causes to the first cause of all. As St. Augustine says (on Ps. cix. 3), "Quod est ante luciferum, hoc est ante sidera: et quod est ante sidera, hoc est ante tempora: si ergo ante tempora, ab aeternitate. Noli quaerere quando: aeternitas non habet quando; Quando, et aliquando, sunt verba temporum . . ." And again (on Ps. ci. 25), "Non enim aliud anni Dei, et aliud Ipse; sed anni Dei aeternitas Dei est: aeternitas, ipsa Dei substantia, quae nihil habet mutabile. Ibi nihil praeteritum, quasi jam non sit, nihil est futurum, quasi nondum sit: non est ibi, nisi est. Non est ibi, fuit et erit: quia et quod fuit, jam non est: et quod erit, nondum est, sed quidquid ibi est, non nisi est." . . . Conversely, when other things were measured by the standard of His immutability, there were some that might deserve to be called eternal from their approaches to it. Though there could be no duration without beginning—retrospective eternity—but His; there might be, and there was actually, duration without end—prospective eternity—by His gift: "Solus Deus est omnino immutabilis," . . . continues St. Thomas: "secundum tamen quod aliqua ab Ipso immutabilitatem percipiunt secundum hoc aliqua ejus aeternitatem participant. Quaedam ergo quantum ad hoc immutabilitatem sortiuntur a Deo, quod nunquam esse desinunt . . . Et sic aeternitas angelis attribui potest." (Ib. art. 3.) Such, he adds, will be the portion of those who inherit eternal life.

Creations in time, whether everlasting or not, are thus harmonised by St. Augustine with eternal purpose.

"Novimus, Domine, novimus quoniam in quantum quidquid non est quod erat, et est quod erat, in tantum moritur et oritur. Non ergo quidquid Verbi tui cedit atque succedit; quoniam verè immortale atque aeternum est. Et ideo Verbo tibi coaeterno simul et sempiternè dicis omnia quae dicis, et fit quidquid dicis ut fiat; nec aliter quam dicendo facis: nec tamen et simul et sempiternè fiunt omnia quae dicendo facis. Cur quaeso, Domine, Deus meus? Utrumque video: sed quomodo id eloquar nescio; nisi quia omne quod esse incipit et esse desinit, tunc esse incipit et tunc esse desinit, quando debuisse incipere vel desinere in aeternâ Ratione cognoscitur, ubi nec incipit aliquid nec desinit."

(Conf. xi. 7, 8.) Whether all things, once created, are to last for ever, is a further point.

Scripture says of the earth itself, that it "abideth for ever" (Eccl. i. 4); besides speaking of the everlasting hills (Gen. xlix. 26). Here, no doubt, the general view taken by the Fathers is, that by the phrase "for ever" is expressed "a relative eternity, an unbroken perpetuity for a given time, holding on through a period or system of things" (Davison, On Proph. p. 205), and ending only when that system ends. At the same time we nowhere find them affirming categorically, that anything, once summoned by God into being out of nothing, would return to nothing again. Porphyry, says St. Augustine, "Christianos ob hoc arguet maxime stultitiae etiam ex oraculis Deorum suorum, quod istum mundum dicunt esse perituum" (de Civ. D. xx. 24). This he shews was an unfounded charge. "Peracto quippe judicio, tunc esse desinet hoc caelum et haec terra, quando incipiet esse caelum novum et terra nova. Mutatione namque rerum, non omni modo interitu, transibit hic mundus. Unde et Apostolus ait: 'Praeterit enim figura hujus mundi'; volo vos sine sollicitudine esse. Figura ergo praeterit, non natura." (Ib. c. 14.) When they talked of the world perishing by fire, they meant no more than St. Peter, who talked of its having already perished by water. "Indicatis quippe his, qui scripti non sunt in libro vitae, et in aeternum ignem missi (qui ignis, cujusmodi et in qua mundi vel rerum parte futurus sit, hominem scire arbitrator neminem, nisi forte cui Spiritus Divinus ostendit) tunc figura hujus mundi mundanorum ignium conflagratione praeteribit, sicut factum est mundanarum aquarum inundatione diluvium. Illa itaque, ut dixi, conflagratione mundanae elementorum corruptibilium qualitates, quae corporibus nostris corruptilibus congruebant, ardendo penitus interibunt: atque ipsa substantia eas qualitates habebit, quae corporibus immortalibus mirabili mutatione convenient; ut scilicet mundus in melius immutatus aptè accommodetur hominibus etiam carne in melius innovatis" (Ib. c. 16). From that new state of things, however, they were unanimous in holding that there was to be no further change. "Quod igitur de sempiterno supplicio damnatorum per suum prophetam Deus dixit, fiet—omnino fiet—'Vermis eorum non morietur, et ignis eorum non extinguetur' . . . (Ib. xxi. 9.) Neque enim tot sancti et sacris veteribus ac novis literis eruditi mundationem et regni caelorum beatitudinem post qualiacunque et quantacunque supplicia qualibuscunque et quantiscunque angelis inviderunt: sed potius viderunt Divinam vacuari vel infirmari non posse sententiam, quam se Dominus praenuntiavit in iudicio prolaturum atque dicturum: 'Discedite a me, maledicti, in ignem aeternum, qui paratus est diabolo et angelis ejus'—sic quippe ostendit aeterno igne diabolum et angelos ejus arduos—et quod scriptum est Apocalypsi: 'Diabolus, qui seducebat eos, missus est in stagnum ignis et sulphuris, quo et bestia et pseudopropheta: et cruciabuntur die et nocte in saecula saeculorum.' Quod ibi dictum est aeternum, hic dictum est in saecula saeculorum, quibus verbis nihil Scriptura Divina significare consuevit, nisi quod finem non habet temporis." (Ib. c. 23.) Origen, says St. Augustine, was more merciful in pleading for the ultimate release of the devil and his angels from their abyss of woe, than some of his own contemporaries, who were for assigning a limit to the torments of the better class of the wicked amongst men. "Sed illum," he adds, "et propter hoc, et propter alia nonnulla, et maxime propter alternantes sine cessatione beatitudines et miserias, et, statutis saeculorum intervalla, ab istis ad illas atque ab illis ad istas itum ac reditus interminabiles, non immerito reprobavit ecclesia: quia et hoc, quod misericors videbatur, amisit, faciendo sanctis veras miserias quibus poenas luerent, et falsas beatitudines in quibus verum ac securum, hoc est sine timore certum, sempiterni boni gaudium non haberent. Legit autem aliter istorum misericordia humano errat affectu, qui hominum illo iudicio damnatorum miseras temporales, omnium verò qui vel citius vel tardius liberantur, aeternam felicitatem putant. Quae sententia, si propterea bona et vera, quia misericors est, tantò erit melior et verior quantò misericordior. Extendatur ergò ac profundatur fons hujus misericordiae usque ad damnatos angelos, saltem post multa atque prolixa quantumlibet saecula liberatos. Cur usque ad universam naturam amittat humanam, et cum ad angelicam ventum fuerit, mox arescit? Non audent tamen se ulterius miserando porrigere, et ad liberationem ipsius quoque diaboli pervenire. Verum si aliquis sciat, vincit nempe istos: et tamen tanto invenitur errare deformius, et contra recta Dei verba perversius, quantò sibi videtur sentire deusitiam." . . . (Ib. c. 17; comp. St. Hil. in Matt. v. 12; Tertull. Apol. c. 45.)

These passages may suffice to illustrate the teaching of the Fathers on the points to which they relate; but the fundamental principle which underlies them all, is what Butler calls "the probability that all things will continue as we experience they are, in all respects, except those in which we have some reason to think they will be altered." (Anol. c. 1.) And the Fathers found no change propounded or foreshadowed in Scripture which implied annihilation even where inanimate matter alone was concerned; nor, again, any probability suggested, that wills which had deliberately resisted Divine grace in this life would ever be persuaded or coerced into receiving and being influenced by it in the next.

Other secondary senses of the Greek aión, and the Latin aevum, are noticed by the Fathers as being current, in explaining their own views. "Aetas," says St. Isidore, "plerumque dicitur pro uno saeco, ut in annalibus, et pro septem, ut hominis: et pro centum, et pro quovis tempore. Unde et aetas, tempus quod de multis saeculis accipitur: et dicta aetas, quasi aevitas, id est similitudo aevi. Nam aevum est aetas perpetua, cum neque initium neque extremum noscitur, quod Graeci aiónas vocant, quod aliquando apud nos pro saeculo, aliquando pro aeterno ponitur. Unde et apud Latinos est derivatum." (Etym. v. 33.) On the other hand, St. John Damascene says, even of the Greek aión, that it means occasionally as more than the life of a man, or present life in the abstract. He notices other meanings, of course, which are wider. A period of 1000 years, for instance, and life beyond the grave that has no end. According to the first of these meanings, he adds, there are commonly said to be seven aeons, or ages, of this world, from its creation to its consummation, that is. But, with the eighth, aión resumes its proper and primary sense. "Ὅπερ γὰρ τοῖς ὑπὸ χρόνον ὁ χρόνος, τοῦτο τοῖς αἰῶσις ἐστὶν αἰὼν (De Fide O. ii. 1). And the same view had been expressed, centuries before, by the author of the treatise de Div. Nom., ascribed to Dionysius (c. x. 2). Δὲ καὶ ἡμᾶς, ἐνθάδε κατὰ χρόνον ὀρίζομεν, αἰῶνος μεθέξειν ἢ θεολογία φησὶν, ἥνικα τοῦ ἀφάρτου καὶ ἀεὶ ὁσαύτως ἔχοντος αἰῶνος ἐφικώμεθα. Eternity, without beginning or end, was the primary meaning according to both, which aión bore. Its other meanings were derived from, and dependent on, this one: and so far they were both in accord with Aristotle and with Scripture.

ETERNITY OF PUNISHMENTS. [ECHATOLGY.]

ETESIUS (AEDESIUS), bishop of Claudopolis in Isauria, on the river Calycadnus. He was present at the first general council at Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 695; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1027.) [J. de S.]

ETFRID, presbyter of Leominster, Herefordshire, whose legend is recorded in a manuscript (Harl. 2253, ff. 132, 133) described by Hardy. On his journey from some northern locality to convert Merewald, a pagan king, he has a vision of a lion. Merewald is converted and founds a monastery (A.D. 660), which, in consequence of the vision, is named Leominster. (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 257.) [C. H.]

ETGAL, abbat of a monastery on one of the Skellig islands, off the coast of Kerry, was taken by the Northmen, whom the Irish Annals represent as exceedingly active at the time in their attacks upon the Irish coasts, and was starved to death A.D. 824 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 823; Ann. Inisf. A.D. 811). [J. G.]

ETHBALDE (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 39, ed. Hardy), king of Mercia. [ETHELBALD.] [C. H.]

ETHBIN (EBIN, ETBIN), commemorated Oct. 19, Dec. 30. Of this saint a life is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Oct. 19, viii. 474, and by Capgrave (Nov. Leg. Angl. 122; and see Surius, De Prob. SS. Hist. Oct. 19, iv. 307). He was a Briton, and said to have belonged to a noble family. At the time of the great emigration to Armorica, he too passed over to France and was a disciple of St. Samson of Dôle, and of St. Winwaloe; he retired to the abbey of Taurac, and lived there till the community was dispersed by an attack of the Franks in A.D. 560. He went thence to Ireland, and remained there "Nectensis abbas" till death, which took place about the close of the 6th century; he is said to have attained the age of 83 years, and to have died on Oct. 19, the day on which his name stands in the Roman Martyrology, but the Scotch calendars commemorate him on Dec. 30. Yet even his existence at all is not without suspicion, as its evidence is entirely legendary, and his time is placed by some in the 6th and by others in the 7th century. (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. i. 160, ii. pt. i. 89; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Oct. 19, vol. ix. 539-40; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 204; Dempster, *Hist. Eccl. Gent. Pitseus calls him a "scriptor egregius," whose writings are lost even to the titles, but Dempster does not scruple to supply the missing names. (Acta Sanctorum Magistri, lib. i., Meditationes et Preces, lib. i. He is placed among the holy confessors and monks in the Dunkeld Litany. Bp. Forbes, Kul. Scott. Saints, pp. lx, 333.)

ETHELARDE (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 39, ed. Hardy), king of Wessex. [ETHELHARD (1).] [C. H.]

ETHELARDUS (Malm. G. R. A. i. §§ 89, 94, ed. Hardy), archbishop of Canterbury. [ETHELHARD (3).] [C. H.]

ETHELBALD (1), king of Mercia, 716-757. He was the son of Alwih or Alweo, son of Eawa, the brother of Penda (Chr. S. A.D. 716). He succeeded Ceolred, the son of Ethelred, who died in 716, and who seems to have been the last descendant of Penda. According to the life of St. Guthlac, the anchorite of Crowland (AA. SS. O.S.B. saec. iii. pt. 1, pp. 267-271), Ethelbald had been in exile during the reign of Ceolred, and had been accustomed to visit the anchorite in his retirement; on these occasions he and his attendants, Wilfrid, Egiga, and Obba, seem to have witnessed some of the miraculous acts of Guthlac. Ethelbald also received from Guthlac a prophecy of his future exaltation; he had come, after exhausting all means of human help, to seek divine assistance; Guthlac encouraged him, and told him that he knew the misery in which all his life hitherto had been spent; he had prayed for him, and God would shortly deliver him. He would obtain his kingdom "non in praeda nec in rapina," but from God's hand. His enemy would be crushed without his agency. The prediction was fulfilled, and Ethel-bald quietly on the death of Ceolred.

After the death of Guthlac, Ethelbald honoured his burial-place with special buildings and gifts, and frequently visited Crowland; but unfortunately the history of the monastery there is so obscured by forgery that nothing can be certainly stated as to his share in the foundation. (V. Guthlac ut supra, pp. 273, 275.)

Ethelbald's career as a warrior and as the great creator of the Mercian power, which reached its climax under Offa, seems to have begun soon after he obtained the crown. Bede, who only once mentions him in his history, describes him as supreme in 731 over all the south of England from the Humber to the sea (H. E. v. 25). How this supremacy was attained we are not told; but, in point of fact, Wessex was the only competing power, and Wessex, which had been disturbed by intestine war during the latter years of Ine, was, at the moment when Bede wrote, under the rule of Ethelheard, who had not yet made any struggle for independence. It was on the side of Somersetshire that the struggle was renewed. In 733 Ethelbald conquered Somerton, and so probably completed the humiliation of Ethelheard. Ethelheard died in 739 or 741, and Cuthred, his successor made a bold struggle for the independence of the West Saxons.

This part of Ethelbald's reign has some illustration on the ecclesiastical side. Almost immediately on his accession he is introduced as patronising and furthering the work of Ecgwin at Evesham (Chr. Evesham, ed. Macray, pp. 72, 73; Kemble, C. D. no. 65, 68, 75). Under Ecgwin's influence he also granted a charter to the church of Worcester (Kemble, C. D. 67), which was followed by other donations under bishop Wilfrith (Kemble, C. D. 69, 70, 79, 80, 83). Many of these, however, were grants to smaller monastic establishments which afterwards were absorbed by the cathedral church. Other charters of this period testify to the fact that Ethelbald's influence extended far beyond Mercia. He appears as a benefactor to Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 71; Mon. Angl. i. 49), to Rochester in 734 (Kemble, C. D. No. 78; Mon. Angl. i. 184), and to Abingdon (Kemble, C. D. 81; Chr. Abend. i. 38). In a Worcestershire charter of the date of 736, he entitles himself as "rex non solum Mercensium, sed et omnium provinciarum quas generali nomine Sutengli dicuntur" (Kemble, C. D. 80; Mon. Angl. i. 585; see also Kemble, C. D. 83). It was also possibly by Ethelbald's influence that three archbishops of Mercian connexion were successively chosen to the see of Canterbury—Tatwin, Nothelm, and Cuthbert; the last of whom was translated from Hereford. Ethelbald was during the episcopate of Cuthbert regarded as the leading king in ecclesiastical as well as civil affairs. In a council held at Clovesho in 742 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 340, 341), in which the privilege of king Wihtred was confirmed, Ethelbald is said to have presided. Soon afterwards St. Boniface and five other German prelates addressed to him a letter of exhortation and remonstrance, from which it appears that Ethelbald had never married a lawful wife, but was accused of adultery and fornication, especially with virgins dedicated to God. They likewise tell him that infanticide prevails in the monasteries, that he has himself been accused of seizing ecclesiastical property and subjecting the clergy to undue imposts.

and they especially warn him of the fate of his predecessor Ceolred, who had died suddenly at a feast (Mon. Mogunt. No. 59; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 351-357). Notwithstanding this plain speaking, Boniface was on friendly terms with Ethelbald; made him presents of a hawk and two falcons, two shields, and two dishes (ib. p. 357); and wrote also to Herefrith, a Mercian priest, on whose influence with Ethelbald he seems to have relied, asking him to urge the king to comply with the advice given him (ib. 357). A similar letter was addressed to the archbishop of York (ib. 358-360). In consequence of this urgency a great church council, the decrees of which are extant, was held in September, 747, at Clovesho (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 360-376). It is clear from these facts that the character of Ethelbald had not improved as his power increased, that the religious state of his dominions was very bad, and that his conduct instead of emulating that of his pious predecessors, resembled that of the Frank and other German princes after the first decline from the Christianity of the conversion.

The temporal supremacy of Ethelbald was not as yet endangered by the hostility of Cuthred and the West Saxons. In 740 he took up arms against Eadbert, king of Northumbria, and devastated the border, but was repelled (Cont. Bed. M. H. B. 288). In 743 (Chr. S. M. H. B. 329) Ethelbald and Cuthred appear united in war against the Welsh. Ethelbald's liberality to the monasteries continued, Worcester especially owing him as a patron (K. C. D. 88, 89, 90, 91, 95). In 744 Ethelbald and Cuthred appear conjointly in a grant to Glastonbury (K. C. D. 92; Mon. Angl. i. 47). The grants to Minster in Thanet, dated 747 and 748 (K. C. D. 97, 98), are probably spurious. In 749 Ethelbald seems to have completed his series of benefactions by a general grant, dated at Godmundsleah, in which he releases the clergy from all ordinary taxation except the building of bridges and the national defence (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 386, 387). Ethelbald's benefactions to the churches of his kingdom after the year 749, noted above, were much fewer than before; a grant to abbat Eanberht, who possibly was abbat of Malmesbury, is given in Kemble, C. D. 100; attested also by Cynewulf of Wessex, who began to reign in 755 or 756. The long supremacy of Ethelbald, however, was now contested. In 750 a struggle between Cuthred and Ethelhun the proud ealdorman, probably a potentate who had prevented him from acquiring supreme control in Wessex, is recorded; and in 752 the West Saxon king, in a battle at Beorgford or Burford, put the great Mercian ruler to flight. Cuthred died in 755, and Wessex after his death was disturbed by intestine division. Ethelbald, however, did not recover his power.

In 757, at Seccandune, or Segeswald, perhaps Beckington in Warwickshire, Ethelbald was killed. Henry of Huntingdon affirms that he fell in battle, but the older authorities say that he was killed in the night by his guards (Cont. Bed. M. H. B. 289; Sim. Dun. ib. p. 662). His ill success or growing infirmities had probably wearied out his servants and his people as well. Beornred, who is called a "tyrannus" or usurper, may not improbably have put himself at the head of a conspiracy among the "comites" or "gesiths" of Ethelbald, who thus perished in the same way as many of the Northumbrian kings. The date for his death, 757, as given by the continuator of Bede and Simeon of Durham, is preferable to that given by the Chronicle, 755, which, like many of the dates between 731 and 849 requires to be adjusted by the addition of two years (Anglo-Sax. Chron. S.; Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 289, 662). He was buried at Repton. In a vision recorded in one of the letters preserved among the memorials of St. Boniface, Ethelbald's soul was seen in torments (Moniment. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, pp. 375, 376). His character seems to have combined the lust, violence, and pride, which are specially noted by historians, with an amount of official liberality to the churches and a great neglect of the duty of spiritual supervision. But it is not impossible that it underwent a change during his long reign, and that the earlier uneventful years were not devoid of promise. His position as a great consolidator of the Mercian power, and as a king recognised on the continent as a great sovereign, is less questionable. He was no doubt the most powerful king since Ethelbert of Kent, not excepting the Northumbrian rulers.

A letter to St. Aldhelm, when abbat, accompanied by a long poem, written by a certain Aedilwald (Mon. Mog. ed. Jaffé, pp. 35 sq.), are ascribed by Jaffé to Ethelbald, afterwards king of Mercia. The writer refers to the troubles of his country, and compares himself to Rehoboam; but the few allusions in the poem are to Devonshire and Cornwall. There is no doubt about the reading "Aedilwald," and it is most probable that it is the work of a West Saxon pupil of Aldhelm. [S.]

ETHELBALD (2) (AETHELBALD, EADBALD), abbat of Wearmouth and Jarrow (see references under EADBALD (4)). He does not appear in Dugdale (i. 502), nor is he included in Birch's Fasti Monastici (p. 63). His existence is known from a letter addressed to him by Alcuin, an extract of which was given by Reyner, and afterwards copied by Alford, before the letter was printed in full by Jaffé (Mon. Alcuin. 839). [C. H.]

ETHELBERHT (1), (Flor. Wig. Geneal. Reg. in M. H. B. 633), ETHELBERT (Malm. G. R. A. i. §§ 72, 93, ed. Hardy), king of Northumbria. [ETHELRED (4).] [C. H.]

ETHELBERHT (2), called king of Wessex and Kent in a spurious or doubtful charter of 781, bearing the signatures of archbishop Jaenbert and Dora bishop of Rochester (Kemble, C. D. 144). No king of the name in Wessex is known from any other source, and no king of Kent after the death of Ethelbert II. cir. 762 until the reign of Ethelbert, son of Ethelwulf, in the following century. [C. H.]

ETHELBERHT (3) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 790, in M. H. B. 667 c), bishop of Candida Casa. [ETHELBERT (7).] [C. H.]

ETHELBERT (1) I. (properly AETHELBERHT or AETHELBRHT; Bede, AEDILBERCT), king of Kent. He was the son of Irminric, and great-grandson of Oeric, surnamed Oisc, the son of Hengist, and succeeded to the kingdom of the Kentishmen as the heir of the "Aescingas," in 560 (the date 565, given in the Chronicle, is inconsistent with Bede's reckoning given below). Some years after his accession, he provoked a conflict with Ceawlin, the West-Saxon king, and Cutha, his brother, was defeated at Wimbledon with the loss of two of the ealdormen, and driven back into Kent (Sax. Chron. a. 658). He had already married Bertha or Berhte, daughter of Charibert, king of Paris, on the understanding that she should be free to practise "the rites of her own Christian religion," under a bishop named Liudhard, whom her parents had appointed the guardian of her faith (Bede, i. 25). Ethelbert faithfully observed this compact, but shewed no curiosity to hear more about his wife's creed. She and her episcopal chaplain worshipped undisturbed in the old Roman-British church of St. Martin, on a hill to the east of Ethelbert's city of Canterbury (Bede, i. 26). Ethelbert succeeded on the death of his old enemy Ceawlin in 593, to that pre-eminence among the Saxon and Anglican kings which is usually described as the Bretwaldadom (see Freeman, Norm. Conq. i. 542). And four years later, in the spring of 597, he was brought face to face with a band of Christian missionaries, headed by Augustine, whom pope Gregory the Great had sent to "bring him the best of all messages, which would ensure to all who received it eternal life and an endless kingdom with the true and living God" (Bede, i. 29). Ethelbert had sent word to the foreigners to remain in the Isle of Thanet, where they had landed, and "supplied them with all necessities until he should see what to do with them." He soon came into the isle, and sitting down with his "gesiths" or attendant thanes in the open air, (for he feared the effect of spells under a roof), listened attentively to the speech of Augustine [AUGUSTINUS]. Then he spoke in some such words as Bede has rendered immortal. "Your words and your promises are fair; but seeing they are new and uncertain, I cannot give in to them, and leave the rites which I, with the whole race of the Angles, have so long observed. But since you are strangers who have come from afar, and, as I think I have observed, have desired to make us share in what you believe to be true and thoroughly good, we do not mean to hurt you, but rather shall take care to receive you with kindly hospitality, and to afford you what you need for your support; nor do we forbid you to win over to your faith, by preaching, as many as you can." He gave them also a dwelling in Canterbury, somewhat to the north-west of the present cathedral precinct. They took possession of their new home, and began to make converts, as Bede tells us, through the charm of their preaching, and the still more powerful influence of lives consistent with what they taught. In a short time afterwards Ethelbert himself expressed his belief in the truth of those promises which he has described as unheard of; he believed and was baptized; the time, according to Canterbury tradition, was the Whitsun-eve of 597, which fell on the 1st of June; the place, undoubtedly, was St. Martin's. The king thenceforward proved himself to be one of the truest and noblest of royal converts. He even removed from Canterbury to Regulbium or Reculver, where he built a new palace, abandoning his old abode to Augustine, now consecrated as archbishop, and adding to it the gift of various "needful possessions" (Bede, i. 26). He assisted Augustine in the work of converting an old Roman-built church into "the cathedral church of the Holy Saviour," and also built "after exhortation," a monastery outside the eastern wall of the city, dedicated in the names of SS. Peter and Paul, but afterwards known as "St. Augustine's." He received by the hands of Mellitus, who, with others, joined the mission in 601, a letter of congratulation and exhortation from pope Gregory; and he lent his aid as Bretwalda to the arrangements for a conference, near the Bristol channel, between his archbishop and some bishops of the ancient British church. Among the many "good services which he rendered to his people," Bede reckons those "dooms" or decrees which, "after the example of the Romans, he framed with the consent of his wise men" . . . and among which he first of all set down what satisfaction (bōt) was to be made by any one who robbed the church, the bishop, or the clergy. For he was "minded to afford his protection to those whose doctrine he had received" (Bede, ii. 5). For these dooms, extant in the "Textus Roffensis," see Thorpe's Ancient Laws and Institutes of England, p. 1. They are 90 in number; the first, just as Bede says, establishes a scale of penalties for wrong done to the property of the church, of the bishop, of a priest, of a deacon, of a cleric. Ethelbert's nephew Sabert, the son of his sister Ricula, held the dependent kingship of the East Saxons, and embraced the faith under the persuasion of his uncle and overlord, who built a church of St. Paul in London for Mellitus as bishop of that kingdom. He also built at "Hrof's Castle," i.e. at Rochester, a church of St. Andrew for a bishop named Justus; "gave many gifts to both prelates, and added lands and possessions for the use of those who were with them." It was, we may be sure, in Ethelbert's reign and under his influence that Redwald, king of the East Angles, while visiting Kent, was prevailed on to receive baptism, although, as his after conduct shewed, his convictions were not deep (Bede, ii. 19). After Bertha's death, Ethelbert married a young wife whose name is unknown. His last days must have been saddened by anxiety as to the future reign of his son Eadbald, who refused to receive the faith of Christ." Ethelbert died, after what Bede describes as a most glorious reign of 56 years, on the 24th of February, A.D. 616, and was buried beside his first wife in the "porticus" or transept of St. Martin, within the church of SS. Peter and Paul, leaving behind him a memory long held in grateful reverence as that of the first English Christian king. (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 176, 214-216, 259.) [W. B.]

ETHELBERT (2) II., king of Kent. He was a son of Wihtred, probably the eldest, and left on his father's death in 725, coheir with Eadbert and Alric. [EADBERT, ALRIC.] If the act of the council of Beccaneld, in which the privilege of Wihtred was granted be received as genuine, Ethelbert, who attested it on behalf of his brother Eadbert and himself, must have been of age to be admitted to share in the proceedings; Haddan and Stubbs iii. 240. Although, however, there is a presumption that Ethelbert was the eldest son the chroniclers give more prominence to Eadbert, who is said to have reigned from 725 to 748, leaving Ethelbert as his successor in the latter year. From charters the inference may be drawn that the brothers reigned contemporaneously or conjointly; but if Eadbert really died in 748, Ethelbert must have then assumed the position of chief king; sole king he could hardly be, as Eardulf appears in 747 as king, and other competitors appear before Ethelbert's death, of whom it is uncertain whether they were partners or mere pretenders to the crown. The joint acts of Eadbert and Ethelbert have been noted under the article EADBERT (2). Ethelbert reigned after Eadbert's death, or at least after the year 748, for about fourteen years, dying in 762 or thereabouts. Ethelbert is best known as the writer of a letter to St. Boniface, written before the year 755, in which he reminds him of a promise made some years before to the abbeſs Bega, that he would pray for him. He also sends presents, through his messenger Ethelhun, a silver "caucus" or goblet weighing three pounds and a half, and two "reptae;" and asks Boniface to procure him two falcons, such birds being scarce in Kent. He also begs to have an answer in writing. (Bonif. Ep. ad Wärdtwein, Ep. 84; Mon. Moguntina, pp. 254-256.)

The only charter of Ethelbert after the death of Eadbert is a grant to St. Augustine's of a mill at Chart, attached to the royal township of Wyth, on the condition that the tenant should have the pannage of a herd of swine in the wood of Andred. (Elmham, ed. Hardwick, p. 325; Kemble, C. D. no. 108.) The charter is dated 762, and the same year appears in the same cartulary of St. Augustine's, a grant by Dunwald, a thane of Ethelbert, of a property in Queen-Gate, Canterbury, in memory of Ethelbert, for whose soul also he was going to carry money to Rome. (Elmham, p. 326; K. C. D. 109.) It appears from this charter that Ethelbert was buried at St. Augustine's.

There is a coin of a Kentish king Ethelbert which is of course attributed to this king rather than to Ethelbert I.; and it is not of unquestioned authenticity. It is a sceatta, bearing the head of Ethelbert, on one side, with the Runic name of Lal, the moneyer; on the other side Rex, with the wolf suckling Romulus and Remus. It is in the character of the head not unlike the coins of Offa, and Lal was a moneyer under Offa. Another candidate for the coin is St. Ethelbert of East Anglia. (Hawkins, English Silver Coins, ed. Knyon, pp. 30, 31.) [S.]

ETHELBERT (3), ST., king of the East Angles. He is known to history as one of the victims of the aggressive policy of king Offa of Mercia. In the year 792 (rather 794) Offa ordered him to be beheaded. Such is the brief statement of the Chronicle, which Florence of Worcester expands in the statement that the most glorious and most holy king of the East Angles, "Ægelbertus," a prince acceptable to Christ by the merit of his virtues, and affable to all, was by the detestable command of Offa, at the instigation of his wife Cynethritha, deprived of his life and kingdom, and, as a king and martyr, entered the court of blessed spirits. (M. H. B. 57a.) The same writer (M. H. B. 636) says that he was the son of Ethelred, king of the East Angles, and his wife Leofruna. William of Malmesbury says that Ethelbert was treacherously allured by Offa, and killed within the precincts of the palace (G. R. § 86), having been enticed thither in hope of becoming Offa's son-in-law. (Ibid. § 210; Gesta Pontificum, § 170.) He also mentions that St. Dunstan regarded Ethelbert as a martyr. It is obvious that the fame of Ethelbert gained ground as years went on, and we have the complete form of his legendary history in the Life of Ethelbert, incorporated by Richard of Cirencester in the Speculum Historiale, and existing in more or less complete form in Capgrave, in the so-called Chronicle of John Brompton, and in several MSS. According to this legend Ethelbert was the son of Ethelred and Leovorona, a Mercian lady of royal descent, piously educated, and raised to the throne on his father's death by the lords of the kingdom. After winning the good will of all by wisdom and piety, he was urged by his "optimates," or "witan," to take a wife, and an ealdorman named Gwero specially recommended Soledria (or Seledritha) the daughter of a ruler named Egeo, who had succeeded to her father's kingdom. Ethelbert declined this proposal because Egeo had been a traitor to his father Ethelred, and by the advice of another ealdorman, Oswald, determined to apply for a daughter of Offa. After prayer and other preparation Ethelbert set out for Offa's court, although strongly pressed by his mother not to proceed; he left his city Baderogi (Bedrichesworth = St. Edmunds), and in spite of an earthquake and eclipse of the sun, which was ended at Ethelbert's prayer, he sent on presents to Offa as he approached "Villa Australis," where the king was encamped. He had next a vision which Oswald unfortunately misinterpreted, but which was sadly explained by subsequent events. On his arrival he found acceptance in the eyes of Alfrida [ELFTHRITHA (2)], Offa's daughter, who expressed her admiration in language so strong as to provoke her mother to special hatred of Ethelbert. Cynethritha warned Offa that Ethelbert would supplant him, and Offa determined to sacrifice him. A courtier named Gwinbert offered to contrive the murder, and induced Ethelbert to visit Offa in his chamber, where he was seized, bound, and beheaded, by Gwinbert himself. His body was ignominiously buried, but, being discovered, owing to the heavenly light which marked the spot, was translated to Hereford, and there buried in the cathedral, where many miracles attested Ethelbert's sanctity. His head was preserved in a magnificent shrine at Westminster. (Ric. Cirenc. Spec. Hist. i. 262-295.) Some additional particulars are supplied by Brompton: (Twysden, cc. 748 sq.) Alfrida became an anchoress at Crowland: Ethelbert was buried in the first instance on the bank of the Lugg; three nights after he appeared to a man named Brithfrith, and bade him remove his body to "stratus Wye," or some place on the banks of the Wye. Brithfrith obeyed, and with the help of Egmond removed the body, with the head, which by the way fell off the waggon and restored to sight the blind man who picked it up; they then buried it at Fernlega, which was afterwards called Hereford. In after times a king of the Mercians named Milfrith exalted Hereford, in honour of St. Ethelbert, into a cathedral city. (See also Capgrave, Æ 127-129.)

However the legend grew, it is certain that Ethelbert soon became the patron saint of Hereford. The story of Milfrith is of course apocryphal (Mon. Angl. vi. 1210), but bishop Ethelstan, 1012 to 1036, built a church and monastery in his honour; and although this was burned by the Welsh in 1055, it was rebuilt soon after the Conquest by bishop Robert of Lorraine. The services of St. Ethelbert occupy an important place in the Missal, Breviary, and Hymnal of the use of Hereford. The 20th of May is observed in his honour, and to him are dedicated, besides the cathedral, the churches of Marden in Herefordshire and Little Dean in Gloucestershire, besides six churches in Norfolk, three in Suffolk, and one in Suffolk and one in Essex in honour of St. Mary and St. Ethelbert. The author of the life of St. Ethelbert is said to have been Osbert of Clara, a monk of Westminster in the reigns of Henry I., Stephen, and Henry II. (See Hardy, Cat. Mot. i. 485, 496.)

(A.A. SS. Boll. May 20, tom. v. pp. 241*-246*; MSS. C. C. C. Cant. 306; Coll. Univ. Oxford, No. 135; Cotton, Nero E. i.; Parker, Anglican Missal, p. 232.)

Matthew Paris, or the author of the life of Offa ascribed to him, tells the story of Ethelbert's martyrdom more favourably to his hero, throwing all the blame upon Cynethryth, and making Offa ignorant of the plot until after the murder was committed. He also called Offa's daughter Ælfleda, ed. Wats, p. 24. [B.]

ÆTHELBERT (4), king of the South Saxons. He is known only from the Selsey charters, in which he appears as a contemporary of Offa, and possibly he is to be identified with one of the claimants of the Kentish throne during the latter half of the 8th century (Kemble, G. D. 1010, 1011.) More probably the charters are fabricated without any regard for dates. [B.]

ÆTHELBERT (5), ST., martyr with his brother St. Ethelred at the court of their cousin Egbert king of Kent. Their father Eormenred was a brother of Earcumbert the predecessor of Egbert, and their murderer was one of the royal household named Thunor. Neither the princes nor their father are mentioned in Bede, and the Saxon Chronicle casually relates (sub ann. 540) only that Eormenred's two sons (unnamed) were afterwards martyred by Thunor. A detailed legendary account of the murder (for it was no true martyrdom) occurs at the commencement of the Gooda Regum Anglorum of Simeon of Durham editions of that author until Mr. which it is made a separate piece. story Eormenred was an elder son Saxon Chronicle also implies, naming his brother Earcumbert), Thunor's murder to Egbert for the security union, and the king connived. The submitted at a royal residence in the Eastrege, which must be Eastry, a co south of Sandwich, and the bodies rared were solemnly interred at the am monasterium Wacrinense." Eor- r Domnava, a sister of the martyrs, am the conscience-stricken king a great of land in Thanet, where she founded a memorial monastery and made her daughter Mildred abbess of it. A council that was held to investigate the murder was presided over by archbishop Deusdedit, who also consecrated the nuns of the new foundation; but as, according to Bede, Deusdedit and Earcumbert died the same day, Deusdedit's appearance in the story is an impossibility. The account in Goscelin makes the archbishop to have been Theodora, and as defines the period as that between 662, when Theodora arrived in England, and 673, when Egbert died. Simeon's narrative does not name the spot in Thanet where Eormenred's monastery was built, but Thorn in a later century gives it as Minster, a place to which he himself belonged. In Dugdale's list the monastery occurs as that of St. Mildred in Thanet (Monast. Angl. i. 447). As the tradition of this martyrdom involves the question whether there ever existed, besides that monastery at Minster, a second one at Eastry and another at Wakering, it becomes necessary to follow up the story in other early writers.

Goscelin, about A.D. 1090, a few years before Simeon, introduces the tragedy of St. Ethelbert and St. Ethelred at the commencement of his life of St. Mildred (M.S. Harl. num. 105, Æ 127-129, see Hardy, Cat. Mot. i. 376), but makes no mention there of the burial-place or of the subsequent translation, passing on, after describing the life of Thunor, to the main subject of his mist. Thorn, three centuries afterwards, in his life of St. Mildred closely follows Goscelin (Twysd. Scriptt. col. 1905). Goscelin, in another of his lives, briefly introduces the martyrdom of the princess, but there again he is silent both as to sepulture and translation (Vit. S. Wacry. cap. 1, § 1, in Boll. Acta SS. 3 Feb. i. 386 x). A few years later (cir. A.D. 1124), and about the time of Simeon, the story is related by William of Malmesbury (G. P. iv. § 181, pp. 318, 319, ed. Hamilton), who states that the martyrs were buried at a place in East Anglia "cujus nomen excidit"; but according to Savile's reading (Scriptt. post Bed. p. 292, 7), which is adopted by the Bellandists, it is "cujus nomen Estreia," which means either that the burial-place was at an Estreia in East Anglia, or that the burial-place was in East Anglia a province also called Estreia. Malmesbury evidently had not identified Simeon's "Wacrinense." He goes on to say that Ethelwin the earl of East Anglia conveyed the relics of the martyrs "celebri pompa" from the "obscure church" of their sepulture to the abbey of Ramsey, and this is the first intimation we have met of the connexion of St. Ethelbert and St. Ethelred with that house, of which Ethelwin was himself a founder (cir. 974 or 991), dying in 992. (A. S. C. ann. 992; Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 991, 992, in M.H.B. 580 D, 581 A; H. Hunt Hist. v. in M.H.B. 747 x; cf. Tanner, Notitia Huntingdonshire, v.) Here it may be mentioned that the Historia Romanorum (Gale, Scriptt. iii. 405) makes the martyrs to have been buried in a villa of the earl Wacringa, who caused them to be translated to Ramsey; clearly shewing that the Ramsey monks of that period were ignorant of the place meant by Wacrinense. John of Tinmouth (cir. 1347) devoted a separate title to our two martyrs in his Sanctilogium (M2 see Tanner, Biblioth. p. 439), a list of the lives of which work is given by Dr. Thomas Smit (Scriptura Librorum MSS. Biblioth. Cotton. 1696, p. 25), and Tinnmouth's legend of St. Ethelbert and St. Ethelred (num. 121 in Smith) was one of those transferred to Capgrave's collection (see En. Leg. Angl. ff. 143). Here it is stated that the martyrs were buried at "Wakering" and afterwards translated to Ramsey. Thorn, whose chronicle is later than Tinnmouth, repeats Goscelin, as already stated, and adds the information that Eormenbarga's monastery was at Minster. (Thorn has also a brief mention of the martyrs sub ann. 686, col. 1770). From Tinnmouth and Capgrave the "Wakering" has been adopted as representing Simeon's "Wacrinense" (M. H. B. prae. p. 89; Stevenson's Eng. transl. of Simeon, p. 430). The only Wakering known is that in Essex, near Shoeburyness. It is a very ancient name, the history of which is detailed in Wright's History of Essex (vol. ii. p. 614), but without a hint of a monastery having ever existed there; as to which matter Camden also is equally silent. Nor do either Tanner or Dugdale speak of a Wakering monastery. The absence of all local trace and all literary record is noticed by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 17 Oct. viii. 94 F) as an objection to the proposed identification, and the editors of the M. H. B. in the body of their work (p. 648 note) are doubtful as to "Wakering Essexiae."

In regard to a monastery at Eastry arising out of our story, it is to be noted, in the first place, that the spot is exterior to Thanet, within the limits of which it was that Eormenbarga received her grant. In recent times Harpsfield (Hist. Eccles. Angl. 1622, saec. vii. cap. 10), calling the princes Ethelbert and Ethelbriht, makes their martyrdom give birth to two monasteries, one at Eastry and the other at Minster, intending probably to combine the statements of Matthew Paris (with whom agrees Matthew of Westminster, cir. 1326) and Thorn, the first two writers placing Eormenbarga's monastery at Eastry and saying nothing as to Minster. Cressy (Ch. Hist. Brit. 1668, lib. xvii. cap. 4, § 6) puts "a church" at Eastry, perhaps to place himself in conformity with Malmesbury. On the joint authority of Harpsfield and Cressy, Tanner (Notit. Kent. xxii.) inserts an Eastry monastery, but without vouching for it, and the Monasticon (vi. 1620) simply copies Tanner's paragraph without observation.

As for the legend itself in its present form, perhaps a clue to its origin may have been furnished by a remark of the editors of the Monuments (prae. 89) that Simeon's silence about the translation to Ramsey implies a date for the story prior to that event (i.e. prior to 991) and a composer for it earlier than Simeon. If this idea is admissible, the year 978, when the youthful king Edward the Martyr perished, may be suggested. That unexplained event, which was then the common talk, would secure a wide popularity for a tale like that of the Kentish princes propagated from the various monasteries, and a translation of the relics, or supposed relics, from some "obscure church" of East Anglia would have been a natural sequel. It is to be noted also that Ethelwin the promoter of that translation was the prominent nobleman in East Anglia (see Flor. Wig. Chron. ann. 975, in M. H. B. 578 D, 479 A; Hen. Hunt. lib. iv. ibid. 147 E). He was an active patron of the monastic and anti-clerk movement represented by Dunstan and his friends, who on the accession of Ethelred were in opposition to the queen-mother and the court. When these relics were translated by Ethelwin, the East Anglian monasteries, of which his own was one of the noblest, were in the glory of their recent revival, and must have decidedly influenced the politics of the day. Under all the circumstances Malmesbury's language "celebri pompa" suggests a great deal. The grand ceremonial publication of the ancient Kentish "martyrdoms" as the relics traversed the country must have been intended to accuse the court of Winchester and bring it into odium. It is certain that East Anglia did not effectively support the unfortunate Ethelred in his subsequent war with the Danes. It is significant that the day of St. Ethelbert and St. Ethelred (Oct. 17) commemorated, not their martyrdom, but that translation, and whether the story found in Simeon was written by Simeon or not, it probably represents one that was originated about the period when the relics were carried to Ramsey. The Bollandists' account will be found in Acta SS. 17 Oct. viii. 94. [C. H.]

ETHELBERT (6) (ADALBERT, AELBERT, ALBERT, alias CAENA, ALDBERT, ALUBERT, EADBERT, ELCHBERT, but generally called ALBERT), archbishop of York, a pupil in the school of York, and a kinsman and favourite scholar of archbishop Egbert. He was a person of so much ability that he was soon marked out for eminence and distinction. Egbert ordained him priest, and associated him with himself in his teaching, making him master of the schools. Albert also held another office, that of defensor cleri, which probably involved diocesan work, perhaps that of an archdeacon or of the vice-dominus or abbas within the walls of the minster. (Alcuin, de SS. Eccl. Ebor.)

Albert's most noted pupil was Alcuin, and to him we are indebted for a description of Albert (magister meus he affectionately calls him), which is the main charm of his poem on the saints of the church of York. The scholar dwells not more on the genius of his teacher than on his tact, his energy, his loving-kindness. The range of Albert's learning was very considerable—grammar, rhetoric, law, poetry, astronomy, natural philosophy, formed the subject-matter of his instruction to his pupils. When he became the assistant of Egbert, the archbishop reserved to himself the lectures on the New Testament, but those on the Old fell to the share of Albert. He possessed also the happy power not only of teaching and drawing out the latent powers of his pupils, but also of winning their affections.

Albert was called by dean Gale, and with justice, the fourth founder of the church of York, because, in addition to his restoration of the minster, he was the chief collector of its once famous library. It was begun, indeed, by Egbert, but Albert was practically its author. He sought for MSS. everywhere. More than once did he go abroad, with Alcuin as his companion, not only to gain hints for his educational work, but to acquire books for his collection at home. Alcuin speaks of Albert's visit to Rome and of his honourable reception by kings and great men, who tempted him in vain to take up his abode with them. The same writer in a well-known passage enumerates many of the works which the library contained. He mentions forty-one authors, a few out of many, whose works were in the collection at York. Among these are some of the fathers, Christian poets, and grammarians. The classical writers are only Cicero, Pompeius, Pliny, Virgil, Statius, Lucan, and Boetius, in Latin, and Aristotle in Greek. Alcuin speaks of treatises in Greek and Hebrew without telling us what they are. In the western world there was probably no library out of Rome itself so large and important as this. Certainly there was nothing to be compared with it in France, which was just beginning to awake to the long dormant claims of learning.

In A.D. 766 archbishop Egbert died, and Albert, by the popular voice, was appointed his successor. He was consecrated on 24th April, A.D. 767, and in A.D. 773, pope Adrian sent him the pall (Saxon Chron.; Symeon, ed. Surtees Soc. 22, 24). Albert made an excellent archbishop. He was a strict disciplinarian, but was considerate and genial at the same time. His exaltation made no difference in his personal habits. He was as frugal and simple as before.

Albert, however, was by no means sparing in what he did for God's house. In A.D. 741 the minster of York had been burnt (Symeon, Chron. p. 18). What mischief the fire actually did we do not know. It is probable that the building, which was of stone, would be temporarily patched up for the celebration of divine service. Albert, however, took in hand the erection of what must have been a new building. The old minster contained as its most precious feature the chapel or oratory in which king Eadwine had been baptized in A.D. 627. Here Albert set up an altar dedicated to St. Paul, which he decorated with silver, jewels and gold. Above it hung a large candelabrum with three branches. A tall crucifix or rood was set up at the altar, also made of precious metals. Albert built another altar dedicated to the Martyrs and the Holy Cross. This, too, was covered with silver and precious stones, and he prepared a flagon of pure gold to contain the wine which was to be poured into the chalice.

The new basilica, or cathedral church—minster it has always been called in York, although it has never been tenanted by monks—was built under the superintendence of Eanbald and Alcuin, and it is to the pen of the latter that we owe the only description of it which we possess. Alcuin speaks of a lofty temple uplifted by pillars, which stand in their turn over crypts below. He says that it is bright with ceilings and windows, which were probably coloured. Around it were a number of porches, or apsidal chapels, and the whole building contained as many as thirty altars. Some remains of this structure may still, I think, be discerned in the crypt beneath the present fabric.

About two years before his decease, Albert retired from the cares of office to end the remnant of his days in solitary devotion. In preparation for this he made Eanbald his coadjutor, consecrating him bishop; the school and books he gave to the minster. Ten days before his decease he began and Alcuin saw his old master die, and among the last wishes of Albert was the desire that Alcuin should visit France and Rome. He died at York on the 8th of November, A.D. 781 or 782, at the sixth hour of the day (Fl. Wigorn. i. 59), and was laid to rest in his cathedral, a large procession of ecclesiastics and laymen accompanying him to his grave. Albert's death has been placed by the Saxon Chron. and Symeon in A.D. 780. They have, I think, mistaken the time of his retirement for that of his decease. Eanbald probably became coadjutor bishop in A.D. 780.

Albert was undoubtedly one of the most able men in Europe in the 8th century. His learning, his educational powers, his widespread sympathies and acquaintance with the scholars and great men of other countries gave him a position and a power for good which no one perhaps possessed to a greater degree. Under him the city of York became the centre of a great educational system which developed in every direction. It was famous at the same time for missionary exertion as well, or rather, it kept up its missionary fame, for Northumbria was the country of Wilfrid and Willibrord. Boniface had kind friends in Egbert and Pecthelm (Epp. ed. Giles, i. 87-9, 113). Albert, under the name of Coena, seems to have been also a correspondent of Lullus, archbishop of Mainz, and a letter is preserved from Alcred, king of Northumbria and his queen, addressed to the same dignitary, asking for and promising prayers (Bonifacii Epp. ed. Giles, §§ 83, 211, 242, 247; Haddan and Stubbs, iii.). About the same time a council was held in Northumbria to send Willehad as a missionary to the Frisians and Saxons (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 433). To his efforts and those of Alubert and Iudger, who were connected with the school of York in its brightest days, the church of North Germany is under inestimable obligations (Maclear's Christian Missions, 222-7).

The principal authorities for the life of Albert are Alcuin's poem De Sanctis et Pontificibus Eccl. Ebor., his Letters, and the Life appended to them in the editions of Froben and Jaffé. [J. R.]

ETHELBERT (7) (ÆDELBERHT, ÆDILBERCHUS) was consecrated bishop of Whithern, in Galloway, at York, on June 10, A.D. 777. (Saxon Chron.; Flor. Wigorn. i. 59.) In A.D. 789, on the death of Tilbert, he left Whithern for Hexham. (Symeon, Chron., ed. Surtees Soc. p. 30.) In A.D. 791 he was one of the consecrators of Badulf, bishop of Whithern, and of archbishop Eanbald II. in A.D. 796 (Symeon, pp. 30, 34), also of Eardulf, king of Northumbria, in the same year. He died on Oct. 16 in the following year at a place called Barton, probably on the Tees. His body was brought to Hexham, and was interred by the brethren in the church. (Id. 34; Ric. of Hexham, p. 34.)

Ethelbert, as bishop of Whithern, signs the decrees of the Northumbrian legatine synod in A.D. 787. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 460.) There is a letter to him and his congregation at Hexham from Alcuin, speaking of their old friendship, and asking for his prayers. The great scholar advises Ethelbert to collect books and to organise a school at Hexham. (Epp. ed. Jaffé 374-5.)

Dempster states that Ethelbert wrote a writing against Elipandus of Toledo, one of the opponents of Alcuin, but this is more than doubtful. (Wright, Biogr. Lit. i. 369.) [J. R.]

ETHELBIHT (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 9, title § 10, ed. Hardy), ETHELBIHT (ibid. § 9) ETHELBIHT (ibid. § 17), king of Kent [ETHELBIHT (1).] [C. H.]

ETHELBICT (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 264). marty. [ETHELBICT (5).] [C. H.]

ETHELBIHT (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 86, ed. Hardy), king of East Anglia. [ETHELBIHT (3).] [C. H.]

ETHELBURGA (1) (TATAE), daughter of Ethelbert, king of Kent and his queen Bertha. She was bestowed in marriage by her brother Eadwald king of Kent on Edwin king of Northumbria, after the latter had promised to do nothing hostile to the spread of Christianity, but to secure her and her attendants in freedom of worship; whilst he himself would receive the faith if on examination it should be found more holy and worthy of God than the religion he professed. Ethelburga accordingly was sent to Northumbria, accompanied by Paulinus, and the conversion of the king and his people followed very shortly. Bede has preserved a letter from pope Boniface to Ethelburga, encouraging her to attempt the conversion of Edwin (H. E. ii. 11); the king himself was moved to the change on the occasion of the birth of his daughter Eanfled, and was baptized April 12, 627, less than two years after his marriage. [Lewin.] After Edwin had fallen before the arms of Penda in 633, Ethelburga, accompanied by Paulinus, her daughter Eanfled, her son Eadbert and Uffa, son of Osfrith and grandson of Edwin, returned to Kent, bringing with her many of Edwin's treasures, especially a golden cup and cross, which were preserved at Canterbury in Bede's time. (H. E. ii. 20.) The royal boys were sent for education to France, where king Dagobert took charge of them. In this Ethelburga shewed some mistrust of Eadbald, who was now in alliance with Oswald, the head of the rival dynasty in Northumbria. Dagobert died in 638, and the two boys also died in infancy, and were buried in France with royal honours. Ethelburga had by Edwin two sons, Ethelhun and Wulfred, the former of whom died soon after baptism; and two daughters Eanfled and Eadthrytha; Ethelthrytha died in infancy and was buried, as was Ethelhun, at York. (H. E. i. 14.) Eanfled became the wife of king Oswy (Oswin) of Northumbria. Bede gives no account of Ethelburga's life during her widowhood, but we learn from the Canterbury traditions, and on the testimony of Florence of Worcester that she founded a monastery at Limington in Kent (M. H. B. 635; Elmham, ed. Hardwick, p. 176; Dugd. i. 437), where she was buried. (Elmham, p. 171.) [S.]

ETHELBURGA (2), daughter of Anna king of the East Angles, sister of Sexburga the wife of Eadcombert king of Kent, and sister of Eadreda abbess of Ely; she, with her half-sister Saethryd, took the veil in the monastery of Farnham in Brie, where Ethelburga became abbess. (Bede, H. E. iii. 8, prior Wig. M. H. B. 636; Liber Eliensis, ed. Stewart, p. 15; Hardy, Cat. i. 265.) [S.]

ETHELBURGA (3), sister of Erkenwald bishop of London, and first abbess of Barking. [ERKENWALD.] Bede gives (lib. iv. cc. 7, 8, 9, 10) an account of several miraculous events which happened during her period of rule, and which he extracted from a book which had already been written on the history of the monastery. One of these is a vision which Tortgyth, one of the nuns, had of the death of Ethelburga, a few days before it occurred, and a vision of Ethelburga herself a few days after her death (c. 9). What little is known of the foundation of Barking will be found under ERKENWALD. Capgrave (N. L. A.) gives a life of St. Ethelburga, according to which she was born, like Erkenwald, at Stallington, in Lindsey, was daughter of Offa, who was subsequently converted by her agency; in order to avoid marriage she fled from her father's house; Eadconwald built her a monastery out of his patrimony and invited Hildelitha [HILDILID] from France to teach her monastic customs. This writer also expands the miraculous stories given by Bede. (Nov. Leg. Angl. ed. 1516, fol. 139, 140.) The biography of course proceeded from the same mint as that of Erkenwald. The date of Ethelburga's death, given by Florence of Worcester under 676, is very doubtful; and even the dedication of the church in Bishopsgate, London, can only hesitatingly be ascribed to her. Oct. 11 is the day of her commemoration. (AA. SS. Boll. Oct. 11, tom. v. 649-652.) There is some confusion between Ethelburga and the abbess Eadburga [BUGGA] of Minster, which appears in the life of St. Werburga (Mon. Angl. i. 452), but is corrected by Elmham, p. 224. (See also Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 385.) [S.]

ETHELBURGA (4), abbess of Repton, daughter of Ealdwulf king of the East Angles [ALDULF], more properly called Eadburga. (J. Wallingford, ap. Gale, p. 528.) [EADBURGA (4).] [S.]

ETHELBURGA (5), the wife of Ine king of the West Saxons. She is described by William of Malmesbury (G. R. lib. i. § 35; ed. Hardy, p. 49) as a woman of royal race and mind, and this is borne out by the testimony of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle which represents her as capturing and destroying Taunton in 722, during the struggle in which Ine was engaged with the Etheling Eadlbriht. (Chr. S. 327; H. Hunt. M. H. B. 724.) William of Malmesbury tells the story of the way in which she impressed upon Ine the corruptible nature of all worldly things. Having held high festival at one of his palaces, which is described as exceptionally sumptuous, the king and queen set out for another place. After going a little way she prevailed on him to return, and shewed him his palace filled with filth and rubbish, in accordance with a command which she had secretly given to the steward. The lesson was obvious. Ine determined to renounce his crown; he resigned the kingdom to Ethelhard (who appears in a spurious charter, Kemble, C. D. no. 73, as Ethelburga's brother), and, accompanied by his wife, went to Rome, where they lived, employed in works of humble charity among the poor, and died in the odour of sanctity. According to another tradition which is less plausible and less probable, Ethelburga retired to Barking, where her sister is said to have been abbess, and died there; but this story is of later date, and probably originates in a confusion between the two Ethelburgas. The name of Ethelburga is appended as a consenting party to the great charter of Ine to Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 73; Mon. Angl. i. 25); and occurs in the body of another charter to the same monastery. (K. C. D. 74; Mon. Angl. i. 49; Elmham, pp. 267, 268; W. Malmesb. G. R. i. § 35-37; ed. Hardy, pp. 49-55; Higden, Polychr. ed. Gale, p. 258; Mon. Angl. i. 436 sq.) [S.]

ETHELBURGA (6), daughter of Alfred; a Mercian abbess of some importance in the Worcester cartulary. Her father was a kinsman of the ealdormen of the Hwicci, who were hereditary friends and patrons of the cathedral monastery at Worcester. In 774 she had, by the gift of bishop Milred, a grant of the monastery founded by Dunna at Withington, for her life (K. C. D. 124; Mon. Angl. i. 586), and a few years afterwards (778-781) a similar gift from Aldred, the ealdorman, of the monastery of Fladbury, also for life. (K. C. D. 146.) The reversion in each case was secured to the cathedral monastery. The idea that Ethelburga was the first abbess of a monastery of St. Mary at Worcester (Mon. Angl. i. 567), which was afterwards transferred to monks, is without any historical or even legendary foundation. [S.]

ETHELBURGA (7), wife of Wihtred king of Kent (Kemble, C. D. 41, 42, &c.). Possibly Wihtred was more than once married; for a spurious charter (Kemble, C. D. no. 37) gives him a wife Kyngytha; and in the Privilegium (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 240) his queen calls herself Werburga; cf. note, ib. p. 242. [S.]

ETHELBURGA (8), daughter of Offa king of Mercia, and abbess. She is mentioned by Offa, together with her mother Cynethritha and her sisters Ethelfleda, Eadburga, and Ethelswitha, in the grant of Offa to Chertsey (K. C. D. 151) and attests the same charter. She is not, however, noticed in the Mercian genealogy given by Florence of Worcester. (M. H. B. 630, 638.) To her, without the title of abbess, Alcuin addressed one letter by name (Ep. 59), probably another without name (Ep. 60), and possibly two others under the name of Eugenia. (Epp. 229, 279.) In the first of these he reminds her of the instructions which she has received from him, sends consolations to her sister Ethelfleda [ELFLEDA], the widowed queen of Northumbria, and presents from Luidgarda, the wife of Charles the Great. The second is of similar purport, and the other two mere consolations and good advice. (Mon. Mogunt. pp. 293, 295, 737, 857.) These are referred by Jaffé erroneously to the abbess of Fladbury. [S.]

ETHELBYRHT (1) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 616, in M. H. B. 645 B, C, D, 646 A, 647 A) king of Kent. [ETHELBERT (1).] [C. H.]

ETHELBYRHT (2) (Ethelwerd, Chron. iii. init. in M. H. B. 509 D), king of East Anglia. [ETHELBERT (3).] [C. H.]

ETHELBYRHT (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 646 A, 647 A), young prince of Kent, martyred. [ETHELBERT (5).] [C. H.]

ETHELBYRHT (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 777, in M. H. B. 664 B), bishop. [ETHELBERT (7).] [C. H.]

ETHELDRED (1) (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 264), young prince of Kent, martyred. [ETHELBERT (5).] [C. H.]

ETHELDRED (2) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 798, 799, in M. H. B. 669 K, 671 B), king of Northumbria, son of Moll. [ETHELRED (4).] [C. H.]

ETHELDREDA (1) (AEDILTHRYD), a daughter of Edwin king of Northumbria and Ethelburga his second wife. She was baptized at York in A.D. 627, and died in her infancy (Bed. H. E. ii. 14). [J. R.]

ETHELDREDA (2) (AEDILTHRYD, AETHELDRYTH, AUDRY, ETHILDREDA), queen of Northumbria and abbess of Ely; a daughter of Anna king of East Anglia. Anna had four daughters. Sexburga, Ethelburga, Etheldreda, and Withburga, all of whom were great in the mediaeval calendar. Of these daughters Etheldreda seems to have been the third. The Ely historian (ed. Stewart, p. 15), who confounds the family of Anna with that of his brother Ethelhere, makes Hereswitha the wife of Anna and mother of these daughters.

According to Thomas of Ely, Etheldreda was born at Exning or Ixning in Suffolk. When she grew up she was married to Tondbert, an East-Anglian prince, who bestowed on her the isle of Elge, or Ely, as a dowry. The marriage was solely against the lady's will, as she had practically devoted herself already to a conventual life, but her husband seems to have allowed the union to remain nominal. This so-called marriage is said to have taken place two years before Anna's death, which occurred in A.D. 654.

Tondbert died soon after his marriage, and his widow retired to Ely, where it seems to have been her intention amid the general wreck of her family, to devote herself solely to a religious life. But in A.D. 660 a second and an illustrious alliance was in store for her. She became the wife of prince Egfrid, son of Oswy king of Northumbria, her own kinsman, and a husband whom her own family would think it by no means prudent to refuse. The union lasted for eleven or twelve years, and was of the same nature as that with Tondbert. No entreaties or threats could induce Etheldreda to break her resolution of perpetual virginity. Egfrid ascended the Northumbrian throne in A.D. 670, and was then more free to act with decision in the matter of his marriage. To bring Etheldreda over to his views he sought the help of Wilfrid, who had very great influence with husband and wife. He promised him a great reward if he could succeed; but the monk of Ely does not hesitate to say that the influence of Wilfrid was secretly exerted to confirm the resolution of the queen, and that it was through his means that a divorce was suggested and carried out, after great opposition from Egfrid. The desires of Etheldreda, it is plain, were directed only towards an ascetic life, and she was at all times a kind patron of religious work and men. It seems pretty evident, from a passage in Eddi (cap. 22), that Herham was at one time her property, before it was passed over to Wilfrid, who erected there a church of stone, without a peer in his day on this side of the Alps. For Cuthbert, Etheldreda wrought with her own hands a stole and maniple, rich with gold and precious stones, which, as the monk of Ely says, were preserved in his day in the great shrine at Durham.

In A.D. 671, the ill-sorted couple separated—Egfrid to seek a second consort, Etheldreda to take the veil at the hands of Wilfrid. She was placed as a nun in the house of Coldingham, in Berwickshire, which was then presided over by Ida, king Egfrid's aunt. She continued there for a year. The monk of Ely says that Egfrid tried in vain to carry her off, but Bede does not mention this attempt, and it may therefore be discredited; still it is easy to understand how Etheldreda's stay at Coldingham might be unpleasant after her old husband had taken to himself a second wife. She would be happier in her old home, and among her own people. Etheldreda therefore made her way to Ely. Thomas of Ely mentions some incidents in the journey. Etheldreda was attended by two companions, called Sevana and Sewara. She crossed the Humber at Winttingham, and built a church at Altham, where the party made a short halt. Her priest was a person of the name of Huna, who afterwards died in the odour of sanctity. The isle of Ely at that time was a waste of rushes and reeds, out of which arose here and there little emerald islets, bright with green pasture land, on the highest parts of which the scanty farmsteads were built. It was necessary to take a boat to travel from village to village. There was but one church in the district, at Ely itself, built originally by Augustine, and recently destroyed by king Penda. This Etheldreda restored, with the help of king Aldulf, her brother, and endowed with the island, of which it became the gem and pride. She established there a religious house, which Bede calls a nunnery, whilst the monk of Ely speaks of it as a twin monastery, like Coldingham, with the working of which Etheldreda would be perfectly acquainted. Over this house Wilfrid made her the abbess, and when he visited her next he made it his business to secure for Ely and his old friend a grant of privileges from the pope. Bede gives a short account of Etheldreda's ascetic life, which shews that it was of the severest kind. She was thoroughly in earnest, and made Ely a devotional centre for the whole of the eastern counties. Her life, however, was only a short one. She was attacked by the plague, and died on the third day of her illness, on the 23rd of June, A.D. 679. Her physician, Cuthbert, mentioned to Bede one or two circumstances in connexion with her complaint.

The remains of Etheldreda were deposited in a casket of wood, and interred at Ely. Her elder sister, Sexburga, succeeded her as abbess. In A.D. 695 Sexburga resolved to translate Etheldreda's body. Where could she find a fitting tomb? There was no stone in the neighbourhood of Ely, and so the abbess sent off several of the brethren of the house in a boat, to find elsewhere, if possible, what was unattainable at home. They made their way to Grantchester, on the site of the modern Cambridge, where, near the walls of the Roman town, they found a white marble cist or coffin, rifled probably of the remains of its former tenant, which was the very thing they required. They brought it back with them to Ely, and therein Etheldreda's body was deposited. Like that of Cuthbert, it is said to have been undecayed, and to have been the means of effecting a number of miraculous cures. The authorities for this account of Etheldreda are, the notices of her in Bede and the Life by Thomas, a monk of Ely.

The present "stately fane" of Ely owes its existence to the fame of Etheldreda, who was regarded as one of the greatest of the mediaeval saints. The church which she constructed herself perished in the Danish inroad of A.D. 866-7, but the marauders did no harm to the coffin of the saint. The building was restored about a century afterwards, by king Edgar, under whose auspices it became a house of Benedictine monks, and acquired by degrees great estates and influence. In A.D. 1107 the see of Ely was founded, and the series of abbats came to an end, the monks thenceforward being ruled by a prior. One of the last official acts of Richard, the last abbat, was a solemn translation of Etheldreda's remains, necessitated by the progress of the new Norman fabric. The monk of Ely describes the ceremony, which was of a most interesting nature. The old marble coffin was taken into the new church and laid near the high altar (cf. Malmes. Gest. Pontiff. 322-3). Over this arose a portable shrine of wood-work, richly ornamented, which was borne about on festival days. In A.D. 1144 the monks stripped the shrine of much of its silver work, to meet the pecuniary necessities of bishop Nigel, who acknowledged their kindness by giving the manor of Hadstock to the convent, for the special purpose of decorating and repairing the shrine. It was afterwards richly ornamented by bishops Ridel and de Burgh. In A.D. 1235 bishop Northwold commenced the fabric of the present magnificent choir, and constructed a new shrine for Etheldreda and the saints of the house in the centre of the presbytery. Of this a sketch has been preserved. The shrine perished at the Reformation (Bentham's Ely, var. loc.). The life and merits of Etheldreda were a fertile theme for the mediaeval writers, of whom the following are the most conspicuous.

The earliest notice of the saint is that by Bede, which is really the kernel of every subsequent biography. Appended to this notice is a poem by the same author, in elegiac verse (H. E. iv. 19, 20).

Next in order comes the Life contained in the first of the three books of the Liber Eliensis, written by Thomas, a monk of Ely. Thomas, who seems to have lived in the reign of Henry II., has availed himself of the work of a brother of the same house of the name of Richard, which is now lost, and he is also much indebted to Bede. His narrative is exceedingly diffuse. This Life is printed in the Anglia Sacra, i. 591 et seqq.; Acta SS. 23 Jun. iv. 489; and in Mabillon's Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben. ii. 707, et seqq. The best edition is that printed in 8vo. in 1848, for the Anglia Christiana Society, and edited by the Rev. D. J. Stewart. Unfortunately it carries the Liber Eliensis only to the end of the second book.

The next in importance, although earlier in date, is the Life, written in hexameters, in the time of Henry I., by Gregory, another monk of Ely, to commemorate the foundation of the bishopric. It is unpublished, and contains some curious passages describing the church and neighbourhood of Ely (cf. Hardy's Catalogue, i. pt. 1, 780-1). In MSS. Cotton, Faustina B. iii. is another Life in English verse, unfortunately imperfect, but running to the length of 1200 lines (id.).

There is a Life in Capgrave, a compilation (ff. 141-2), and several others, very brief and of little importance, all of which are described in Hardy's Catalogue, i. 278-284. [J. R.]

ETHELDREDA (3) (ADILTHERYDE, EDILTHRUDA, ETHELDRYTHA) became the wife of Ethelwald Moll, king of Northumbria, Nov. 1, 762, at Catterick (Symeon, Chron. 21). Ethelwald lost his kingdom in A.D. 765. Their son Ethelred afterwards became king, and was slain in A.D. 796. After the death of her husband, Etheldreda took the veil, and became the abbess of some religious house. There is a long letter to her from Alcuin in that capacity, between A.D. 793 and 796 (Epp. ed. Jaffé, 274 et seqq.). He also wrote to her in A.D. 796, consoling her on the death of her son (id. 297). [J. R.]

She is identified with the Aedilthyda "famula Dei olim reginae" to whom Alcuin addressed a letter of thanks for presents, and some exhortations (Mon. Alcuin. Ep. 50, p. 274). [S.]

ETHELFLEDA (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 50, ed. Hardy), daughter of Oswy king of Northumbria, abbess of Whitby. [ELFLEDA (1).] [C. H.]

ETHELFRID (ETHELFRITH, ETHELFRYTH, AEDILFRID, EADFERED FLESAURS, ETALFRAICH), king of Northumbria. He was the son of Ethelric, and grandson of Ida. Ethelric was king of Bernicia, and on the death of Ella seized the kingdom of Deira, to the injury of Edwin, Ella's youthful son. Ethelfrid, who afterwards married Acha, Edwin's sister, did not scruple to continue his father's usurpation of Deira.

Ethelfrid became king in A.D. 593. Pagan although he was, Bede speaks of him in terms of the highest eulogy, comparing him with Saul, king of Israel, for his military genius, and proud of the boldness and persistency with which he subjugated or exterminated the Britons. The Britons, in Bede's view, were irreclaimable heretics. One famous onslaught was made upon Ethelfrid in A.D. 603 by Aedan, king of Dalriada, which ended in his utter defeat. In this fight Theodbald, brother of Ethelfrid, fell with all the army that he led. It seems probable from this that Theodbald had been fighting against his brother on the side of the invading Scots. In one of the versions of the Saxon Chronicle we are told that Hering, son of Hussa, led the hostile army. In the annals of Tighernac (ed. Skene, p. 68), Ethelfrid's brother is called Eanfraich. The scene of the battle is said to be Degsastan, i.e. Degsa lapis (Bede, H. E. i. 34), probably Dawston. But in several versions of the Saxon Chronicle it is called Egesan stane. It has been conjectured that this may be Eggleston, near Barnard Castle. An invading force from Scotland might well descend the Tees to strike a deadly blow at Northumbria, on the very boundary line of Bernicia and Deira. (Arch. Aeliana, n. s. pt. 22, p. 109.) The defeat of Aedan was so decisive, that up to the time of Bede's History no Scottish monarch had ever entered the field again against an English kingdom. (Bede, H. E. i. 35.)

In A.D. 607, according to the Saxon Chronicle (A.D. 613, Annals of Ulster and Cambrian Annals), Ethelfrid struck another very terrible blow at the British race and church. He was carrying his victorious arms beyond the Dee. He nears the city of Chester, then in British hands, called by its inmates Caerlegion, and by the English Legacaestir. When the battle was about to begin, Ethelfrid's attention was attracted by a crowd of men remaining aloof from the combatants. They were monks from Bangor and other places in the neighbourhood, who had come to assist their compatriots with their prayers. Ethelfrid ordered his men to attack them first, alleging that they were really enemies, inasmuch as they were fighting against him with their prayers. His wish was carried out so terribly that only fifty monks escaped, whilst two thousand were slain. A chief of the name of Brocmail had been charged with their defence, but fled on the first onset, leaving the poor helpless creatures to destruction. This was followed by the overthrow of the whole British army, but not without great loss to the victor. And thus, says Bede, somewhat triumphantly, the prediction of Augustine came fearfully to pass upon those who had spurned his warnings and advice (Bede, H. E. ii. 2; Malm. G. R. i. 65, 66).

We are told in the Nennian Genealogies (53) that Ethelfrid gave to his wife Bebbu a place called Dingnoaroy, which was re-named Bebbanburch after the lady (cf. Bede, H. E. iii. 6, 16). Bebbu was Ethelfrid's first wife. About A.D. 603 he re-married Acha or Acca, the daughter of Ella, and sister of Edwin, who was the mother of St. Oswald and St. Ebba. Ethelfrid had seven sons—Eanfrid, Oslaf, Oslac, Oswald, Osric, Offa, and Oswuda; but it is not known for certain which of his two queens was their mother. It seems probable that Eanfrid was the first born.

The reign of Ethelfrid, prosperous although it seemed to be, was by no means free from anxiety and care. He was sitting unjustly on his brother-in-law Edwin's throne, and the thought of some possible retribution made him very jealous of his kinsman as he grew up to man's estate. Edwin also was afraid and left Ethelfrid's court, hiding himself where he could, until at length he found shelter with Redwald king of East Anglia. Ethelfrid discovered his retreat; and by promises, gifts, and threats, endeavoured to make Redwald violate the ties of hospitality. So urgent was his importunity, that Redwald began to waver through fear; and it was only in consequence of Edwin's appeals, and the earnest intervention of his own queen, that at last he became firm. Firmness in such a case meant war; and Redwald was so active in his preparations and onset that he overthrew Ethelfrid's army, and slew its leader, in a battle on the bank of the river Idle, in Nottinghamshire, in A.D. 616. Among the numerous results of this victory, one was the restoration of Edwin. [J. R.]

ETHELFRITH (ETHELFRID, AETHELFRITH), the fourth bishop of Elmham (M. H. B. 618). He was consecrated by archbishop Athelm, who received his pall in 736 (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 659). His successor was Eanfrith, who was bishop in 758. As no bishop of Elmham attended the synod of Clovesho in 747, the see may have been vacant in that year. [S.]

ETHELGITHA (AETHELGITHA, EDILGYTH), a Northumbrian abbess, probably of Coldingham, whose relics were brought to Durham by Ælfred the acrist in the 11th century, and deposited in St. Cathbert's shrine (Symeon, H. E. D. iii. c. vi.). Her name is in the Liber Vitae of the church of Durham (p. 3). [J. R.]

ETHELHARD (1) (AETHELHEARD, AETHELHARD, ADELHARD, EDELHEARD), king of the West Saxons, 725-739 (Cont. Bed. M. H. B. 288; 728-741, Chr. S.). He succeeded to the West Saxon throne on the departure of Ine for Rome. Ine was childless, and Ethelhard, although he is described as kinsman to Ine (Chr. S. M. H. B. 327) was not a near relation, and is not definitely fixed in the genealogy of the West Saxon kings (M. H. B. 637), but generally assigned to the house of Cerdic (ib. 641). The charter of Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. no. 73), in which Ethelhard is described as brother of queen Ethelburga, is not genuine. It is probable that Ine left the succession unsettled among the junior members of the house (juvenioribus), or else that his settlement was disputed by the family, for Ethelhard in the first year of his reign had a struggle with the etheling Oswald, who was descended in another line from Cuthwin, the son of Canlin. As Ethelhard retained his throne, we may infer that Oswald was forced to submit. The Chronicle mentions only two events in the reign of Ethelhard, the conquest of Somerton (probably representing Somersetshire) by Ethelhard of Mercia in 733, and the departure of queen Frithogith for Rome in 736 or 737. Of these the former indicates one phase of the ever-growing struggle between Mercia and Wessex on the side of the Hwicci, and the enormous preponderance acquired by Ethelbald, which is stated by Bede who, at the close of his work, describes the Mercian king as supreme over the southern provinces. It is probable that the weakening of the West-Saxon power on the western border was followed by the loss of territory on the Welsh and Cornish border, and some uncertain victories are claimed by the later Welsh writers over the king Adelrad. (Thorp's Lappenberg, i. 267.) All that can be ascertained from this, however, is that Ethelhard failed to recover the territory or restore the peace which had been lost in the later years of Ine. The documentary history of the reign is very slightly illustrated. Neither Ethelhard nor Frithogitha is mentioned in the letters of Bede. In charters the name of Ethelhard occurs in the year 729 as granting land of sixty manors at Poholt to Glastonbury, in a witenagemot held at Pencrik (Kemble, C. D. 76); and in an Abingdon charter undated, Ethelhard appears as confirming a grant made by Ethelbald of Mercia. (K. C. D. 81.) Neither of these documents is of good authority, and additional doubt is thrown on the latter by the circumstantial character of the attestation which purports to have been granted "in expeditione ultra fluvium Sabrina adversus Britonum gentem"; it is, however, the form rather than the substance of this statement that excites suspicion.

There is likewise a grant made by Ethelhard, at the request of Frithogitha, of land at Taunton to the cathedral of Winchester, which, if genuine, belongs to the year 737 (K. C. D. 1002).

Cuthred, the successor of Ethelhard, is called by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 659), his brother; by other writers his kinsman. According to Rudburne (Ang. Sac. i. 194) Ethelhard was the brother of Frydewyth, mother of St. Frideswide of Oxford, and both he and his sister were buried at Winchester. The mother, however, of Frideswide is called in the legend Sæfrida, although it is given as Fridewiada in the life printed by Mabillon. See also W. Malmesb. G. R. i. § 38; H. Hunt. M. H. B. 725, 726, 727. [S.]

ETHELHARD (2), the ninth bishop of Winchester. (M. H. B. 619.) As his name occurs between that of Cynehard, who was bishop in 754, and that of Egbald, who was bishop in 778, he cannot be identified with Ethelhard, who became archbishop of Canterbury in 793. William of Malmesbury held the bishop of Winchester, the archbishop, and an abbat Ethelhard, abbat of Malmesbury, to have been the same person, but this is impossible. [S.]

ETHELHARD (3) (ETHELHERD), fourteenth archbishop of Canterbury (M. H. B. 616). His appointment is noted by Simeon (M. H. B. 667), on the authority no doubt of the ancient Gesta Regum Northanimbriorum, under the year 791: "Abbas vero Ethelherdus Hludensis monasterii ad eandem sedem est electus et ordinatus episcopus." The more precise date given by Florence of Worcester, July 21, 793, probably marks the day of consecration. The Chronicle places the appointment in 790. As Jaenbert died in the month of August his successor's consecration, if it occurred in July, could not take place earlier than the next year. As July 21 was a Sunday in 793, it may be accepted as the true date; it is not contravened by any evidence in charters, and the apparent delay may easily be accounted for by the circumstances of the Kentish church and kingdom; Offa was attempting to consolidate his rule, and the church of Canterbury was shorn of half its power by the creation of the archbishopric of Lichfield. We are not told by whom the consecration was performed, but it is not impossible that it was by archbishop Higbert of Lichfield himself. Ethelhard before his election to Canterbury was, according to Simeon, abbat of a monastery called "Hlud," which may either have been some obscure place, as e.g. Lydd in Kent, or a more important one, such as Louth in Lincolnshire; but there is no record of the existence of any monastic foundation at this early period in either of those places. It may be argued in favour of Louth that Ethelhard must almost of necessity have been a Mercian abbat, as it would be impossible for Offa, in the existing state of affairs, to have allowed the appointment of a West saxon or Kentishman; and the later attitude of the Kentish men towards Ethelhard shews that he did not belong to the patriotic party. William of Malmesbury, finding the name of Ethelhard in the lists of the bishops of Winchester, and either finding it or placing it in that of the abbats of Malmesbury, has not scrupled to identify the archbishop with both these Ethelharda. (G. P. ed. Hamilton, pp. 160, 389.) As for the bishop of Winchester, his date is irreconcilable with any such theory; and of the abbat nothing is known except from William of Malmesbury himself; that supposition may then be set aside.

Ethelhard, as has been said, found the church of Canterbury at its lowest ebb, and so long as Offa lived he could make no attempt at its emancipation. In a council held at Clovesho in 794, he was obliged to sign the documents there issued after the rival archbishop (Kemble, C. D. 167; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 484, 485). During these years he stood it would seem high in Offa's favour, for Charles the Great addressed a letter to him, asking him to intercede with the Mercian king for certain English exiles. (Monum. Carolina, p. 352.) Early in his episcopate Alcuin had written him a letter full of pious advice (Mon. Alc. Ep. 28; p. 202; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 474), and one of his first acts may have been a participation in the measures taken for declaring the mind of the English prelates at the council of Frankfort in 794; but of this there is no evidence.

Before the death of Offa the troubles of Ethelhard had begun; early in 796 Eadbert Praen had raised the standard of revolt, and met with such support among the Kentish nobles that Ethelhard was compelled or induced to fly from his post. Alcuin wrote to Offa (Mon. Alc. Ep. 44; p. 266; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 496) urging him to support the archbishop; he wrote to Ethelhard himself entreating him not to desert his flock (Mon. Alc. Ep. 44; p. 265; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 495), and to the Kentish men urging them to recall their archbishop (Mon. Alc. Ep. 86; p. 369; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 509).

The death of Offa, the short reign of Egfrid, and the initial difficulties of the reign of Kenulf, left Eadbert Praen in a strong position for three years, during which Ethelhard applied to the pope Leo III. to take his part against Eadbert, who was an apostate clerk, and began the series of measures by which he hoped to reinstate the church of Canterbury in its pristine honours. The archbishopric of Lichfield, although an important part of the imperial policy of Offa, was not such a great object of desire with Kenulf, who no doubt thought that the archbishop was much more valuable as an ally than as a subject, and who intended to rule Kent as a subordinate kingdom through his dependent Cuthred. If, as seems likely, Ethelhard, on leaving Canterbury, sought an asylum at the Mercian court, he would take the opportunity of impressing on Kenulf the injury done to Christianity in England by the degradation of the mother church. However this may have been, the extant professions of obedience made to Ethelhard by the Mercian as well as other bishops, all which contain a distinct recognition of the authority of Canterbury, seem to shew that Higbert, after the death of Offa, could have retained but little more than the title and precedence which Adrian I. had accorded him by bestowing the pall. Of these professions that of Eadulf of Lindsey, Tidferth of Dunwich and Deneberht of Worcester, seem certainly to belong to this period. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 506, 511, 525.)

As soon as Eadbert Praen fell into the hands of Kenulf (798) Ethelhard returned to his see, Alcuin wrote to advise him to do penance for having deserted it (Mon. Alc. Ep. 85; p. 366; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 518), and the proceedings of the synod at Clovesho held the same year shew that both the archbishop's authority and the Mercian power had been re-established. In that synod Ethelhard exchanged lands at Cookham in Mercia for an estate in Kent, with the abbess Cynethritha [CYNETHRITHA], and Kenulf betowed an estate at "Hrempinguic" on the monastery of Liminge. In the charter by which this gift was conferred, the attestation of Ethelhard takes precedence of that of Higbert, but the latter is still called archbishop. (Kemble, C. D. 1019, 175; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 512-515.) It scarcely needed the pressing advice of Alcuin, who urged Ethelhard to attempt the restoration of church unity, to induce the archbishop to reopen the question of the Lichfield archbishopric. (Mon. Alc. p. 369; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 520.) Alcuin in particular recommended him to take the advice of the archbishop of York on the subject. Accordingly the discussion recommenced by a letter of Kenulf to pope Leo III., in which he put before the pope the scheme of St. Gregory for the provincial arrangement of Britain, told the story of Offa's quarrel with Jaenbert and the men of Kent, and mentioned likewise a full statement of the case which had been exhibited by Ethelhard before all the bishops of the province (probably at the council of Clovesho), and had then been sent on to the pope for his decision. (W. Malmesb. G. R. lib. i. § 88; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 521-523.) Although Ethelhard's letter has not been preserved, the pope's answer to Kenulf is extant. (Mon. Alc. Ep. 84; p. 363; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 523.) In it he explains that pope Adrian's division of the archbishopric was the result of a petition from the English bishops, which Offa had represented as unanimous; he refers to the conduct of Eadbert Praen, who had been still in arms when Ethelhard wrote, and pronounced him anathema; he declared that the primacy belonged not to London, as Kenulf had hinted, under St. Gregory's direction, but to Canterbury; and further reminded the king of the annual payment which Offa had promised to the apostolic see at the time of the legation of George and Theophylact. He did not, however, decide or hold out any promise of a decision on the all important question.

In 799 there was a synod at Clovesho, and likewise a great witenagemot at Tamworth; in the latter assembly Higbert took precedence of Ethelhard, and certain lands in Kent were restored to Canterbury (K. C. D. 1020). The state of affairs continued for two years longer. In 801, after a synod held at Cealchyth (K. C. D. 1023), and an interview with archbishop Eabald II. of York, in which he took the opinion of that prelate as Alcuin had advised him (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 532), Ethelhard set out for Rome. He was met by Alcuin's servant at St. Judoc' (Saint-Josse-sur-Mer). Alcuin sent his own horse saddle and servant to meet him, and wrote him a letter of encouragement, inviting him to visit him on his way home, and also wrote to the emperor to help him on his journey. He was accompanied by Coelmund, a thegn of Offa, Tortmund, the friend of the late king Ethelred of Northumbria, bishop Kimbert of Winchester, and another bishop whose name does not appear. (Mon. Alc. Epp. 172, 173; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 533.)

Ethelhard's mission was attended with complete success. He reached Rome, found favour with Leo III., and on Jan. 18, 802, received from the pope a letter, in which, without even mentioning the hostile archbishopric, he declared the ancient rights of Canterbury to be unimpaired, denouncing deprivation against any archbishop or bishop, and excommunication against any layman who might infringe them. (W. Malmesb. G. P. H. i. § 38, ed. Hamilton, pp. 57-59; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 536, 537.) At the same time he wrote to Kenulf acknowledging the receipt of letters and money, mentioning the visit of Ethelhard, and announcing his decision that both the episcopal sees subtracted from the province and the monasteries withdrawn from the church of Canterbury should be restored, and the primatial see replaced in the dignity defined by the letters of St. Gregory to Augustine (W. Malmesb. G. P. i. § 89; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 538, 539). It appears from this letter that Ethelhard's appeal touched not only the integrity of the province but the property of the see, and this explains in some measure the long-continued agitation for the recovery of the Canterbury sees which marks the next thirty years, and was the subject of discussion in many councils.

Alcuin, on hearing of the success of Ethelhard, wrote to congratulate him, and advised him to set his victory with firmness and discretion. The long struggle came to an end at the council of Cloveshoe, Oct. 12, 803. In that assembly, which was attended by all the bishops and a large body of clergy from each diocese of the province, the right of the see of Augustine was solemnly recognised according to the tenour of the pope's letter, and to this act Kenulf and his vassals gave their full adhesion: "Coenwulfus Merciorum Rex ita complevit cum senatoribus"; the archbishopric of Lichfield was abolished, and the letters of pope Adrian I. under the authority of Leo III. declared null (Kemble, A. D. 185; Mon. Angl. i. 107; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 542-544). The same day, by a synodal act, Ethelhard and the clergy assembled in obedience to the papal orders, forbade the election of laymen as lords of the monasteries (L. C. D. 1624; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 445-447). This latter act is attested by the whole body of the synod; among the signatures Aldulf appears as bishop of Lichfield, Higbert the reputed archbishop signing as "Higberht Abbas" and among the clergy of that diocese. Alcuin in his letter of 798 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439) had urged that the pious archbishop should not, so long as he lived, be stripped of his pall, but the recommendation was not adopted, or the remedy for degradation was avoided by resignation on Higbert's part.

In the year 804 there was a synod at Acle, at which Ethelhard was present with the Mercian bishops (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 548); and in 805 he secured the restoration of an estate given by Aldhun to Christchurch, but alienated by royal tyranny, and now recovered by synodal decree.

This is the last recorded act of Ethelhard, who died on May 12 in the same year, 805. Alcuin had died a year before him. Besides the letters cited above, some other epistles of Alcuin to Ethelhard are extant; the whole may be found in Jaffé's Monumenta Alcuiniana, pp. 202, 366, 616, 619, 620, 669, 719, 794. See also, in Alcuin's letters to Charles and others, mention of Ethelhard, pp. 288, 290, 365, 371, 618. In one of these letters, printed for the first time by Dr. Jaffé, Ethelhard is exhorted to put down the custom of carrying "ligatures" or charms containing relics, and phylacteries (Mon. Alc. p. 719); and also to prevent the conventicles or meetings on the hills, at which the people instead of praying indulged in drunkenness.

In the chronology of Ethelhard's Life, as given above, the computation of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and Florence of Worcester has been altered by two years in order to harmonise it with the undisputed dates of documents and other certain authorities.

The correspondence of Alcuin with Ethelhard, together with the general history of his episcopate, exhibits him to us as a man of high reputation for devotion, and of no small power in the conduct of affairs. The fact of his using the power which he had received as a dependant of Offa, to circumvent and overthrow the design which was so important a part of Offa's policy is scarcely to be regarded as a blemish, if the character of the age and the changed circumstances of the Mercian kingdom be taken into account. The appeal to Rome is one link of the scanty chain which bound England to the apostolic see in this obscure age; and the whole episode, falling in one of the darkest periods of the early middle age, but singularly well illustrated by documentary evidence, is perhaps the most important piece of English church history between the death of Bede and the age of Dunstan. ETHELHERD (1) (ETHELHEARD), a Northumbrian "dux" who adopted the religious habit, and died at York, August 1, A.D. 794 (Symeon, Chron. ed. Surtees Soc. 33). [J. R.]

ETHELHERD (2) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann 791, in M. H. B. 667 c), archbishop of Canterbury [ETHELHARD.] [C. H.]

ETHELHERE (ÆDILHERE), son of Eni, the brother of Redwald, succeeded his brother Anna as king of the East Angles in 654. As his brother had been defeated and slain by Penda, it is probable that he obtained the succession by Penda's influence. The next year, 655, he fell fighting on Penda's side, at the battle of Winwædfeld; and Bede charges him with having been the 'auctor belli' on that occasion. His wife Hereswitha was the sister of St. Hilda, a great-niece therefore of Edwin of Northumbria. As the connexion between Edwin and Redwald had been very close, and the family of Edwin had fallen before the rising fortunes of Oswy, the quarrel of Ethelhere with Oswy may have been a result of the old rivalry between the descendants of Ella and Ida. By Hereswitha Ethelhere was the father of Aldulf and Aitwold. Whether Jurminas or Jurninus was the son of Ethelhere as of Anna, our authorities are not sufficiently in accord to prove. Ethelhere was succeeded by his brother Ethelwald. (Bede, H. E. iii. 24; Hist. Elms. ed. Stewart, pp. 14, 15, 23; Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 636.) [S.]

ETHELHILD, a sister of Ethelwin bishop of Lindsey, and Aldwin abbat of Partney. She was abbess of a monastery near Partney, and survived until the time of Bede, who reports a miracle which was wrought in her monastery by a relic of St. Oswald. She had also seen a pillar of light reaching from heaven to the place where his relics were laid. (Bede, H. E. iii. 11.) [S.]

ETHELHUN (1) (ARDILHUN), a son of Edwin king of Northumbria and his second wife Ethelburga of Kent. He was baptized by Paulinus soon after his father in A.D. 627, and died shortly afterwards, whilst still wearing his white baptismal robes. He was buried in York minster (Bede, H. E. ii. 14). [J. R.]

ETHELHUN (2) (OXDILHUN), a brother of Ethelwin bishop of Lindsey, who went with the famous Egbert to study in Ireland. They were together in the monastery of Rathmelsigi (Melfort) in 664, the year of the great plague. The two friends were attacked by the disease; Egbert vowed that if his life were spared he would lead the life of a pilgrim and ascetic. [ROBERT (5).] Ethelhun, in his sleep, had miraculous information of this vow, and said to Egbert, "O brother Egbert, what hast thou done? I hoped that we might enter eternal life together; yet know that what thou hast asked thou shalt receive." Egbert recovered, and Ethelhun died the next night. (Bede, H. E. iii. 27.) [S.]

ETHELHUN (3), a monk who carried letters and presents from Ethelbert II. king of Kent to St. Boniface (Mon. Meym. p. 255). [S.]

ETHELINGA, third prior of Minster in Thanet, according to Weaver (Fam. Monum. p. 202) as noticed by Dugdale (i. 448, note a), but without reference to authority. [BUCKA (3).] [C. H.]

ETHELMOD (ÆTHELMOD, ŌTHIELMOD, ADALMŌDUS), fourth bishop of Sherborn (M. H. B. 620). His name occurs in the charters first in the year 778 (Kemble, C. D. 132); his predecessor, Herewald, appears for the last time in 766. A MS. of Florence of Worcester (H. M. B. 545) places Ethelmod's succession in 782, but the notice is a mere interpolation; for Ethelmod not only attested the dated charter of king Cynewulf in 778, but took part in the synod of Brentford in 781 (E. C. D. No. 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439). He was present also at the Augustine's, according to Elmham. He succeeded Jacobert, who became archbishop in 766, and was blessed by him after he had received his pall; probably in 767. Elmham, however, gives the dates 762 and 764 for the two events (p. 511). The same authority gives 787 as the date at which his abbacy ended. There is a grant made by Offa to Ethelnoth of land at Bewesfield, dated in the fifth year of Offa. (Kemble, C. D. No. 119, Elmham, 331; Thorne, ap. Twyden, c. 1775.) [S.]

ETHELNOTH (2), the 88th bishop of London (M. H. B. 617). He succeeded bishop Osmund between 805 and 811, and subscribed charters from 811 to 816 (Kemble, C. D. 197, 207, 210). His profession of obedience made to archbishop Wulfred on the occasion of his consecration is preserved. Besides the priated charters already mentioned, he attested an unpublished grant of king Kenulf (MS. Lambeth, 1212, p. 301). He was present as 'Londonie civitatis episcopus' in the council held at Crulchyth in July 816. How much longer he lived is uncertain; his successor, bishop Ceolbert, appearing first in 824. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 568, 569, 570.) [S.]

ETHELRED (2), king of Mercia. He was the son of Penda and brother of Wulfhere, whom he succeeded in 675 (Bede, H. E. v. 24), his nephew Coenred, the son of Wulfhere, being too young to govern. In 676 he was at war with Kent and destroyed Rochester. (Bede, H. E. iv. 12. This expedition was probably connected with the internal divisions in the Kentish kingdom itself where the Mercian influence seems to have alternated with the West Saxon. Before his accession, or shortly after it, Ethelred married Othtritha, daughter of Oswy, and sister of Egfrid of Northumbria. This near affinity did not secure peace between the two kingdoms. Egfrid had a few years before wrested the province of Lindsey from Wulfhere, and he regarded it as so safe a conquest that in 678 he obtained from Theodore the consecration of bishop for it. In 679 Ethelred and Egfrid were at war; in a battle near the Trent Egfrid the brother of the one and brother-in-law of the other, was slain, and it was only at a strong entreaty of archbishop Theodore that wergild or money compensation for the life of Egfrid was accepted by the Northumbrian king. The balance of advantage remained, however, with Ethelred, who recovered Lindsey for Mercia. The peace between Egfrid and Ethelred was permanent, and the latter king seems not to have engaged in external warfare during the remainder of his reign. He devoted himself to the care of his people and the consolidation of the Mercian church. One immediate result of the peace was the division of Mercia into five dioceses; a measure which was probably effected by Theodore in the council of Hatfield, or about the year 680 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 141) although the decree of Theodore which directs it is apparently spurious. This must have been done with the co-operation of Ethelred, and is indeed said by Florence of Worcester (M. H. B. 6 to have been done at his instigation, and that of Oshere, the king of the Hwicci. For several years after this Ethelred is heard of only in connexion with the history of Wilfrid. Under the influence of Egfrid he refused to allow Wilfrid to settle in Mercia during his exile after his imprisonment in 681 (Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 39) when he had been entertained by Beorhtwald, the nephew of Ethelred. When, however, Wilfrid had been reconciled with Theodore, the latter prelate strongly recommended him to Ethelred's good offices, and from that time (about 686) onwards he continued to be a most faithful friend (ib. c. 42). He received Wilfrid in his second exile in 691, and not only gave him considerable estates, but settled him in the episcopal see of Leicester. Canterbury being vacant in 692, on the death of Theodore, Wilfrid, at Ethelred's command, consecrated Otfor to the see of Worcester. Wilfrid made his home in Mercia until his restoration to the see of Hexham in the year 705.

During this period two important events took place in Ethelred's life; in 697 his wife Osthrytha was put to death by the "primates" or nobles of Mercia (Bede, H. E. v. 286) or Southumbria; after which, apparently, Ethelred made over Southumbria to his nephew Coenred. [COENRED.] (Chr. S. in M. H. B. 325). In 704 the king himself determined to resign his crown to his nephew Coenred, and retired to Bardney, where he became abbat. Bardney had been endowed by Ethelred and Osthrytha, who had translated thither the remains of St. Oswald king of Northumbria. (Bede, H. E. iii. 11.) Ethelred now found a home there, and one of his first visitors was Wilfrid, who, having in the same year obtained letters from pope John VI. to Ethelred and Aldfrith, was making his last effort to recover his Northumbrian see. Ethelred took pains to place Wilfrid on good terms with Coenred, and did his best to reconcile him with Aldfrith (Edd. c. 55), and in the following year, after Aldfrith's death, Wilfrid was restored to Hexham. Ethelred survived his resignation for several years, died in 716, and was buried at Bardney. By Osthrytha Ethelred had one son, Ceolred, who succeeded to the Mercian kingdom in 709, and died the same year as his father. Ethelred had the reputation of a great ecclesiastical benefactor; to him no doubt Wilfrid owed his monastery at Oundle; his name is conspicuous in the very questionable documents which profess to record the foundation of Medeshamstede, and in the better accredited charters of Worcester. In 675 he attested a grant of Oshere to the abbess Bertana (K. C. D. 12; Mon. Angl. ii. 264), in 676 he appears as consenting to a grant of Swebheard of Kent to abbess Aebba (K. C. D. 14; Elmham, p. 232); in 680 his name occurs in another grant of Oshere to Frithowald (K. C. D. 17) and a grant of Caedwalla to Wilfrid (ib. 18), both spurious, or at least questionable; and 681 he subscribes a charter of Ethelmod (ib. 21). As a benefactor of Aldhelm he grants charters in 681 (Kemble, C. D. 22, 23; Mon. Angl. i. 258). All these are very doubtful. A grant, however, made by Ethelred himself to Worcester (K. C. D. 32; Mon. Angl. i. 384), attested by bishops Hedda and Otfor, is probably authentic. See also Kemble, C. D. 33, 34, 40, 52, 990, 991.

The last document in which his name appears as king is a grant of Swaebraed of Essex to bishop Waldhere of London, dated June 13, 704. This is confirmed by his successor Coenred. (Kemble, C. D. 52.) This date may furnish the exact time of the resignation; see Lappenberg (ed. Thorpe), i. 223.

Although so little that is definite is known about Ethelred, it is clear that he was one of the typical princes of Anglo-Saxon hagiography; that under him the organisation of the Mercian church was perfected, the monastic life devoutly cultivated, and peace fairly well preserved. He was the close friend both of Theodore and Wilfrid, the patron of Medeshamstede, Worcester, Ely, Malmesbury, and other obscurer monasteries; and he died in the odour of sanctity. Possibly the years of peace which Mercia enjoyed under his rule enabled her to take the place among the English kingdoms which she attained under Ethelbald and Offa. [S.]

ETHELRED (3), king of the East Angles. He succeeded Beorn, and by his wife Leofruna was father of St. Ethelbert, the king of the East Angles who was one of the victims of the policy of Offa (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 636). The succession of the East Anglian kings is very obscure. According to Simeon of Durham, Elfwald, the correspondent of St. Boniface [ELFWALD], died in 749; and after him Hunbeanna and Alberht divided the kingdom. According to Florence (M. H. B. 636), Beorn reigned in the time of Offa, and, more definitely, under the date 758 (M. H. B. 544). Thorpe, in his edition of Lappenberg, supposes Hunbeanna to be a corrupt reading for Beorna. Nothing more is heard of either Beorn or Alberht, and Ethelred is only known as father of St. Ethelbert. [ETHELBERT (3).] [S.]

ETHELRED (4), (EGELRED, EDELRED, EDDRET, EDELRETH, called also by Florence M. H. B. 633, ETHELBERT), king of Northumbria. He was the son of Moll Ethelwald, who had occupied the Northumbrian throne from 759 to 765, and succeeded Alhred, the king in whose favour Moll Ethelwald had been set aside, in the year 774. If he were a son of Moll Ethelwald by his wife Etheldritha, whom he married in 762, he must have been a child at the time. He was apparently promoted by a triumphant faction, as Alhred had been, and was obliged, in order to maintain his position, to authorise some cruel acts; for in 778 he ordered two of his ealdormen, Ethelbald and Heardberht, to put to death three of the Northumberland "duces," Aldwulf, Cynwulf, and Ecga. In consequence, probably, of this, he was deposed and driven into exile the next year, Alfwold the son of Oswulf being substituted for him. Ethelred's exile lasted until Alfwold, in 788, was murdered, and Osred, son of Alcred, who succeeded, was deposed within a year. In 790 Ethelred recovered his throne. The cruelties which had disgraced his first reign were repeated in his second. In 791 he seized the ealdorman Eardulf, and ordered him to be executed at Ripon, where having been left for dead, he was rescued by the monks; the same year, apparently, the sons of king Alfwold, Oelf and Oelfwine, were put to death at Windermere; and in 792 Osred, who had returned from banishment, was put to death. The same year, 792, Ethelred, in order to strengthen himself by an alliance with Offa, married Elfleda, daughter of that king on Sept. 29, at Catterick. The rest of Ethelred's reign was a period of domestic disquiet and barbarian invasion. In 793 and 794 the coasts were devastated by the Norsemen, who destroyed the monasteries at the mouth of the Tyne. In 796 Ethelred was killed at Cobre (Corbridge?) on April 18, the result of another of the faction quarrels which had placed him on the throne. (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 665-668; Chr. Sax. ib. pp. 337, 338, 339.) As Alcuin was in close correspondence with York and the Northumbrian church during Ethelred's second reign, the name of the king frequently occurs in his letters; in 790, writing to his steward Joseph, he mentions that Ethelred had been just transferred from a prison to a throne, and that he himself was detained in England in consequence of the change of sovereign (Mon. Alcuin. ed. Jaffé, p. 170). In 793 he wrote to console Ethelred on the devastation of Lindisfarne, and declared the calamity to be a divine judgment called down by the sins which had been practised since king Alfwold's death (ib. pp. 180, 181); another letter to the same effect was addressed about the same time to Ethelred and his great men, one of whom, Osbold, afterwards became king (ib. pp. 184-90); and there is another short letter of good advice (ib. p. 264). From a letter of Charles to Offa, we learn that after pope Adrian's death (Dec. 27, 795), the emperor had sent presents to the several sees of Ethelred's kingdom in memory of the pope (ib. p. 288), whilst from a letter of Alcuin to Offa it appears that the presents had not arrived until after Ethelred's death (ib. p. 290). Charles was greatly distressed on account of the king's murder (ib.). Lastly, in a letter written in 801 to the emperor, Alcuin states that Torhtmund, one of Ethelred's servants, had valiantly avenged his master's death (ib. 619). (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 488, 492, 496, 498, 533.) [S.]

ETHELWITHA, a daughter of Offa, mentioned in the Chertsey charter of 787. (Kemble, C. D. 151.) [S.]

ETHELWALCH (ÆDILWALCH), the first Christian king of the South Saxons. He was baptized in Mercia at the suggestion of king Wulfhere, who was his godfather, about 661. His wife Eaba, daughter of Eanfrith, ealdorman or under king of the Hwicci, had been baptized in her own country previous to her marriage with Ethelwalch. Of the ancestry of Ethelwalch we have no account, but he was probably the hereditary ruler of the South Saxons, and patronised by Wulfhere as a thorn in the side of the West-Saxon kingdom. When Wulfhere in 661 had ravaged the Isle of Wight and the province of the Meanwaras (the district of Meon in Hampshire) he bestowed them on Ethelwalch. The conversion of the South Saxons did not follow the baptism of Ethelwalch for many years. The Scottish missionary Dicul had his small monastery at Bosham, but little success in his labours. And this state of things continued until Wilfrid in 681, having failed to recover his see in Northumbria, undertook the conversion of the nation. In this work he was very successful. Ethelwalch gave him land of eighty-seven families or hides at Selsey, and there was founded a monastic mission, which in 708 became the head of a new diocese. In the year 686 (Flor. Wig. 537) Ethelwalch was killed by Caedwalla, the young aspirant to the West-Saxon throne, who had been driven into exile among the South Saxons. Caedwalla was still a heathen or unbaptized; Centwine, against whom he was in rebellion, was a devout prince, but, owing to his connexion with the Northumbrian kings, disinclined to receive Wilfrid, who at this time had no friends in Mercia. It is, however, difficult to unravel the string of the obscure quarrels, in which Sussex was involved as an outpost of Mercia and a debateable land between Kent and Wessex. After the death of Ethelwalch, the country was governed by two ealdormen, Berchthun and Andhun. In the two following years it was devastated by Caedwalla, and afterwards remained subject to Ine king of Wessex. The Selsey charters furnish the names of South Saxon kings during the next century, but always dependent on Wessex.

William of Malmesbury (ed. Hardy, G. R. p. 46) gives Ethelwalch a successor named Eadric, who was killed by Caedwalla, but this was no doubt the Kentish king of the name whose strength lay in Sussex. [EADRIC.] [S.]

ETHELWALD (1) (OEDILWALD), a son of Oswald king of Deira, and nephew of Oswy. He ruled some portion of Northumbria under Oswy after Oswin's death, and on one occasion took up arms against him (Bede, H. E. iii. 14). His importance in ecclesiastical history is owing to his friendship with Cedda, to whom he gave land for the foundation of the monastery of Lastingham. Caelin, the brother of Cedda, was minister in Ethelwald's household. Notwithstanding his piety and his relationship to Oswy, Ethelwald joined Penda in the attack upon his uncle in 655; but he withdrew from the battle in which Penda fell at Winwaed. It is uncertain at what period of his reign he founded Lastingham, but it was after Cedda had become a bishop, and therefore later than 654. Nothing seems to be known as to the date of Ethelwald's death; but Alchfrith, the son of Oswy, is called by Florence of Worcester his successor. [S.]

ETHELWALD (2) (ÆDILWALD), king of the East Angles. He was brother of Anna, and son of Eni. He succeeded his brother Ethelhere, who fell in the battle of Winwaed in 655, and reigned until 664, when he was succeeded by Aldulf, the son of Ethelhere. (Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 533, 636.) Bede mentions him as godfather to Suidhelm, son of Sexbald, king of the East Saxons, who was baptized by St. Cedda at Rendlesham (H. E. iii. 22). [S.]

ETHELWALD (3) (ÆDILWALD, OEDILWALD), the successor of Cuthbert, A.D. 687, in his oratory or hermitage on Farne island. Much of his early life had been spent in the monastery of Ripon, where Cuthbert, no doubt, had been for a while his companion. Bede describes a miracle which Ethelwald wrought in rescuing three of the brethren of Lindisfarne from a storm. In his Life of Cuthbert the same writer tells us the condition of the oratory on Farne. It was made of wooden planks, which were in great decay.

Cuthbert had stopped up the cracks and holes with hay and clay. When Ethelwald came he begged a calf's skin of the brethren who visited him, and nailed it up in the corner where he and Cuthbert used to pray, to keep the wind and rain out. After a twelve years' sojourn at Farne Ethelwald died, and was buried at Lindisfarne about A.D. 699. Bishop Eadfrid then reconstructed the oratory for the use of Feldgeld, the new anchorite. Feldgeld made a relic of the calf's skin and believed it, from his own experience, to be gifted with miraculous powers. (Bed. H. E. v. 1; Vita S. Cuth. cap. xlv.)

There is a notice of Ethelwald in the Acta SS. for March, iii. 463. His day was March 23. His name occurs the first on the list of anchorites in the Liber Vitae of the church of Durham (ed. Surtees Soc. p. 6). [J. R.]

ETHELWALD (4), an obscure writer, who addressed a letter and a small collection of poems to St. Aldhelm whilst the latter was abbat of Malmesbury. These compositions, which have been, with very little show of probability, attributed to Ethelbald king of Mercia, are printed among the works of St. Boniface. (Ed. Würdtwein, lpp. 149, 81 b; Mon. Mogvat. ed. Jaffé, epp. 5, 6, pp. 35-48.) The writer of the letter describes himself as having been a pupil of Aldhelm during a summer fatally marked by civil wars, and as having been fostered by him from his infancy; he also compares himself to Rehoboam, Aldhelm apparently being the Solomon from whose teaching he had degenerated, and asks him to continue his instructions. He describes the poems which he sends; one is in dactylic metre in seventy verses; the second and third are in octosyllabics, and the second is sent by their common client, Wynfrith. Of the poems subjoined the first mentions the travels of the writer in Domnonia and Cornubia; this makes it possible that he was the bearer of Aldhelm's letter to Gerontius. [ALDHELM.] All five poems are in octosyllabics; and although the name of Ethelwald occurs in one of them, it is questionable whether any of them exactly answers to the description in the letter. In Serarius's edition of Boniface, the poems are appended to another letter, addressed by an anonymous person, to a sister, after Boniface had been made a bishop; with this letter the poems can have no connexion. Dr. Giles, however, followed Serarius. [S.]

ETHELWALD (5) (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 732, 740, in M. H. B. 657 A, 659 B), abbat of Melrose, and bishop of Lindisfarne. [ETHELWALD (2).] [C. H.]

ETHELWALD (6) MOLL, king of Northumbria, succeeded after the murder of Oswulf, July 24, 759. The accession of Ethelwald is dated Aug. 5, which seems to imply that a short interregnum must have occurred. (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 663.) He may possibly be identified with the patricius or ealdorman, Moll, brother of abbat Forthred, who is mentioned in the letter of pope Paul I. to archbishop Egbert in 757 or 758 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 395). His surname may be a contraction for Mucil, i.e. Great; but this is very uncertain. In 761, he had to resist the attack of a competitor, Oswin, who fell in a great battle at Eldunam (Eildon Hills, near Melrose), or Edwinscliffe (Chr. S. p. 333), on Aug. 6. The next year Ethelwald married at Catterick a lady named Etheldritha. In 765, Ethelwald was deprived of his kingdom, apparently in a national assembly at Winchenheale (Sim. Dun. p. 663), and was succeeded by Alhred. Nothing seems to be known of his lineage, or his ultimate fate. He was father of Ethelred, who succeeded Alhred in 774. (See Lappenberg, ed. Thorpe, i. 214, 215.) There are coins attributed to Ethelwald Moll, which bear on the obverse the head of archbishop Egbert, but the ascription is very uncertain. (Hawkins, English Silver Coins, ed. Kenyon, pp. 67, 68.) [S.]

ETHELWALKIUS (Malm. G. R. A. i. § 76, ed. Hardy), king of the South Saxons. [ETHELWALCH.] [C. H.]

ETHELWIN (OEDILWINI). (1) A prefectus or reeve of Oswy king of Bernicia, who at his master's command put to death Oswin of Deira in 651 (Bede, H. E. iii. 14). [S.]

ETHELWIN (2) Second bishop of Lindsey (M. H. B. 624). He was an Englishman of noble race, brother of Ethelhun the companion of the presbyter Egbert and of Aldewin abbat of Partney, and of the abbess Ethelhild (Bede, H. E. iii. 11). Like his brother Ethelhun he studied in Ireland (H. E. iii. 27), and after his return, when in the year 679 the province of Lindsey had been reconquered by Mercia, he was appointed bishop in succession to Eadhed, who retired to Ripon (H. E. iv. 12). As this was the first formal division of Mercia into dioceses, Ethelwin is by Florence of Worcester counted as properly the first bishop of Lindsey (M. H. B. 622; cf. Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 128-130). Of the duration of Ethelwin's episcopate we have no evidence. He was succeeded by bishop Eadgar before the year 716. (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 716.) [S.]

ETHELWOLD (1), second abbat of Evesham. (Chr. Evesham, ed. Macray, p. 76.) He is said to have succeeded St. Egwin, but nothing is known about him. (Mon. Angl. ii. 1.) [S.]

ETHELWOLD (2) (AEDILUWALDUS), bishop of Lindisfarne, A.D. 724-740. There is some doubt as to the duration of his episcopate. The best authorities (Chronol. apud Bedam; Symeon, Chron. ed. Surtees Soc. p. 13) place his death in A.D. 740, and Symeon (Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. i. 12) says that he was bishop sixteen years, which fixes his consecration in A.D. 724, the date generally received. But if this is correct, the see of Lindisfarne must have been vacant for three years after the death of Eadfrith, a fact which it is not easy to account for.

Ethelwold was an officer or servant under Cuthbert, and was afterwards abbat of Melrose, a house which was most intimately connected with Lindisfarne. He ruled there when king Aldfrith visited the monastery to hear the visions of Drythelm (Bede, H. E. v. 12). The anonymous biographer of Cuthbert, who wrote between A.D. 698 and 705, mentions Ethelwold as abbat, and records a miracle wrought upon a cousin of his which he had no doubt described to the narrator. (Bed. Opp. Hist. Min. ii. 107, 108; Vita S. Cuth. cap. xxx.)

Before Ethelwold became abbat, he caused to be made a beautiful cross of polished stone, which was probably designed by himself. His own name was carved on it, but he no doubt intended it to be a memorial of Cuthbert. The cross was one of the ornaments of Lindisfarne until the Danish invasion in A.D. 793, when the marauders broke off the head. This was afterwards fastened to the body with lead, and thenceforward, wherever the Cuthbertines wandered the cross accompanied them, an object of great veneration to the Northumbrians, who were reminded by it of Cuthbert and Ethelwold. In the 12th century Symeon speaks of it as standing erect in the cemetery of the church of Durham. (Hist. Eccl. Dun. i. 12.) The cross was probably ornamented with that delicate interlacing work which was then at its highest point of excellence.

The taste of Ethelwold gave a cover to the famous Lindisfarne Gospels which were written by his predecessor Eadfrid. [EADFRID (2).] This was decorated with gold, silver, and jewels, and was wrought by Bilfrid the anchoret, who was a cunning goldsmith. (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dun. ii. cap. xii.; Lindisfarne Gospels, ed. Surtees Soc., ad finem.) An attempt has been recently made by the authorities of the British Museum to restore it. There seems to be no authority for crediting Ethelwold with the beautiful illuminations with which the MS. is adorned. The honour of these must belong to Eadfrid the scribe.

Among Aldhelm's letters there is one addressed to him by Ethelwold, but it is doubtful whether it can justly be ascribed to the bishop. (Ed. Giles, 100-2.) Dempster, in his History of Scotland (255), ascribes to Ethelwold a life of Cuthbert and a chronicle of the abbats of Melrose, but his statement is unsupported.

Ethelwold's remains accompanied the monks of Lindisfarne in their wanderings with those of Cuthbert, Eadfrid, &c., until they found a resting-place in Durham, when they were deposited in the shrine. (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. ii. 6, &c.) A place was made for Ethelwold in the calendar, and his day is Feb. 12. There is an account of him in the Acta SS. for that month (ii. 604-6 and 897). [J. R.]

Ethelwold's episcopate fell in the early part of the Northumbrian troubles, which began after the death of king Aldfrith; he witnessed the great Northumbrian struggle in 731, which probably shook the fabric of church and kingdom, when Ceolwulf was deposed and restored, and Acca had to fly from his see at Hexham. He lived through the first seven or eight years of the archiepiscopate of Egbert, under whom the pall was restored to York, and the Northumbrian schools began their career of brilliance and usefulness. [S.]

ETHELWULF (1) (ÆTHELULF), the sixth bishop of Elmham. (M. H. B. 618.) He was present at the council of Brentford in 781 (Kemble, C. D. 143; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 439), in which year possibly he had succeeded Eanferth. No more is heard of him. His successor Alheard had come in before the legatine synods of 787. [S.]

ETHELWULF (2), the author of a poetical history dedicated to Egbert bishop of Lindisfarne (803-821), which is printed by Mabillon in the Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. iv. part 2, pp. 317-335, MSS. of which are found in the Bodleian, Cottonian, and Cambridge libraries. (Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 509-511.) The poem contains the history of a monastery and the lives of its abbats. A certain ealdorman named Eanmund takes refuge from the persecution of Osred, king of Northumbria (705-716) in a monastery dedicated to St. Peter. From a bishop, Egfrid (Eadfrith of Lindisfarne, 689-721), he obtains instruction, and a learned priest to instruct his little company, and from Egbert, a bishop of the Scots, he receives rules of monastic life. Among others whose holy lives have shed honour on the place is Ultan a Scottish priest, Fridegils, and Cuicuin the smith. Eanmund on his death is succeeded by Eorpwin, and Eorpwin by his brother Aldwin. The fourth abbat is Sigbald, who greatly increased the beauty of the monastery, and who at his death is succeeded by his brother Sigwin. During Sigwin's time the reader Iglac or Higlac flourished. Sigwin's successor was Wulfsig, under whom the writer was brought up. Of all these the only persons otherwise known are Sigebald, who is probably identical with the abbat Sibbald, whose death is noticed by Symeon of Durham under the year 771, and Higlac the reader. It is very difficult to understand how these facts can be reconciled with the history of any monastery at Lindisfarne, to which they are, according to the MSS., applied. Mabillon points out that the history of the foundation, the date and institution of the monastic rule, the differences in the list of abbats, the fact that the monastery of the poem was situated in a town, and the account of the situation of the church are quite inconsistent with such a theory. Yet the connexion with Lindisfarne and the memory of St. Cuthbert was very close. Mabillon conjectures that Eanmund had founded a monastery on the mainland, to which he may have given the name of Lindisfarne, as the new Corby was called after the old Corveil. No explanation seems to have been attempted since the days of Mabillon. The names of Sigwin, Utta, Eanmund, and Wulfsig are in the Liber Vitae Ecclesiae Dunelmensis. [S.]

ETHELWULF (3) (ÆTHELULF), the tenth bishop of Selsey. (M. H. B. 618.) He first appears as taking part with archbishop Wulfred and bishop Deneberht of Worcester in a council at London, in which king Kenulf sold certain lands to the archbishop, Aug. 1, 811. (Kemble, C. D. 196; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 571.) His name is also attached, with the interpolated description "East Anglorum" episcopus, to the Winchelcomb charter of the same year. (Kemble, C. D. 197; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 574.) As 'Aethelwulfus Selesegae episcopus' he attended the Council of Clovesho in 816 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 579); after which no more is heard of him; but his successor Cenred was bishop in 824. [S.]

ETHEMBRIA. [CETHUBERIA.]

ETHERIANUS. [FIDELIS.]

ETHERIUS (1), (EUTHERIUS, EUCHERIUS) fourth bishop of Antibes, following Agracius, and succeeded by Eusebius. He was present at the second council of Orange in A.D. 529, and at the fourth council of Orleans in 541, subscribing his name Eucherius at one and Euterius at the other. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 390) give from old MSS. a narrative of the acts of the Spanish martyrs Vincentius, Orontius, and Victor, the writer of which (c. 4) speaks of himself as the successor of "Aetherius, Antinciae Ecclesiae Antistes." This Antinciae has been supposed to be Antibes, and the writer to have been Eusebius the successor of Etherius. (Gall. Christ. iii. 1148; Caillier, Hist. des Aut. Sacr. xi. 306; Labbe, Conc. v. 814, 1371.) [S. A. B.]

ETHERIUS (2) (AETHERIUS, EUTHERIUS, HETHERIUS), sixteenth bishop of Chartres, succeeding St. Aventinus, and followed by St. Leobinus, was one of the subscribers of the second, third, and fourth councils of Orleans, held in A.D. 533, 538, and 541 respectively. His name occurs several times in the life of his successor by Venantius Fortunatus, but in no important connection. He is said to have built a church about three miles from Chartres, and dedicated it to St. Priscus, whose relics he placed there. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1095; Venant. Fort. Vita & Leobini, 8, 13, 14 in Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 553, 554; Labbe, Conc. v. 929, 1282, 1371.)

ETHERIUS (3) (AETHERIUS), ST., seventeenth bishop of Auxerre, following St. Romanus, and succeeded by St. Annacharius. He is said to have held the see nine years and six months, and to have been buried in the church of St. Germain. He flourished probably about A.D. 577. Usuard, in his Martyrologium, under the 27th July, has "Antisiodoro, depositio Etherii episcopi." (Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 301; Gall. Christ. xii. 267; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vi. 446.) [S. A. B.]

ETHERIUS (4) (AETHERIUS), thirty-first occupant of the see of Lyons, following St. Priscus. In a Life of St. Austregisilus (given in Boll. Acta SS. 20 Mai, v. 230* c. and there stated to be by a contemporary author) it is said that at the court of King Guntram, distinguished among the other senators was one Aetherius, a man of the highest wisdom and endowed with unusual caution, to whom the king confided beyond any other the secrets of his policy. He was worthy at that time of a bishopric, and afterwards was made bishop of Lyons, the most famous state of Gaul. St. Austregisilus, whom he loved exceedingly, was ordained by him priest and abbat. In or about 589 Etherius, with other bishops, subscribed the rescript to the letter of Gundegisilus on the subject of the excommunication of the authors of the disturbances at Poitiers. [CHROTHILDUS.] In 584, he was summoned by Guntram to Nanterre to be present at the baptism of that king's nephew Clotaire II. He died in A.D. 602, and was succeeded by Secundian. Gregory of Tours relates of him that he made for St. Nicetius a little bed, which after the saint's death worked many miracles in the cure of diseases.

Three letters to him from Gregory the Great are extant; the first addressed to him jointly with several other Gallic bishops, being directed against simoniacal practices, the ordination of laymen to high places in the church, some of whom, Gregory states, did not adopt the tonsure till a see was vacant, against the practice of women other than those permitted by the canons dwelling with the clergy, and the neglect of the yearly synods; the second being addressed to Etherius alone, again insisting on the holding of synods, and commending to his care the monks whom he was sending to St. Augustine in Britain; the third as to the measures to be taken upon the incapacitation of a bishop for his duties by disease or failing faculties. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franco. lib. ix. c. 41, lib. x. c. 28; Fredegar, Chron. c. 22, Greg. Tur. Vit. Pat. viii. 5, 8; Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. ix., ep. 106, lib. xi. ep. 56, lib. xiii. ep. 5 in Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1028, 1173, 1258; Gall. Christ. iv. 38.) [S. A. B.]

ETHERIUS (5), according to Bede (H. E. i. 24, 28), bishop of Arles, who consecrated Augustine bishop of Canterbury. But the Etherius of that date was bishop of Lyons (see the preceding article), and the bishop of Arles was Virgilius.

[C. H.]

ETHERIUS (6) I., bishop of Basti (Baza), one of the fifteen suffragan bishops of the province of Cartagena, summoned to the synod at Toledo, A.D. 610. [GUNTHERIUS.] He signs eleventh on the list (Mansi, x. 507 b; Esp. Sagr. vii. 86; Aguirre, iii. 322). [EUTYCHIANUS (4).]

[M. A. W.]

ETHERIUS (7) II., bishop of Basti, signs the acts of the eleventh council of Toledo (A.D. 675), at which only bishops of the province of Cartagena were present (Mansi, xi. 147 a; Esp. Sagr. vii. 88; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 247). [EUTYCHIANUS (4).]

[M. A. W.]

ETHERIUS (8), bishop of Eliberi from about A.D. 630 to about 646. His signature appears among those of C. Tol. iv. 633, and his vicar signs for him in the seventh council, 646. Loaysa and Aguirre are wrong on this point (Esp. Sagr. xii. 156; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385, 423) [FLAVIANUS (1).]

[M. A. W.]

ETHERIUS (9), titular bishop of Osma towards the end of the 8th century. He is known as having, together with Beatus, published a defence of orthodoxy against the Adoptianist heresy of Elipandus and Felix. [ADOPTIANISTS.] Osma was at the time under Saracen rule, and as we find Etherius writing, jointly with Beatus, from Asturias, and speaking of himself as "Oxomiae sedis indignus nominatus episcopus," or, according to another reading, nuncupatus, the inference seems to be that he was titular bishop only. To him were dedicated the commentaries on the Apocalypse ascribed to Beatus. The friendship between Beatus and Etherius seems to have been a very close one. Elipandus speaks scoffingly of it, as well as of the youth of Etherius, in his letter to the abbat Fidelis A.D. 785. [ELIPANDUS.] The dates of his birth, consecration, and death are alike unfixed, but we may put his consecration probably about A.D. 780, and his death in the early years of the 9th century (Esp. Sagr. vii. 292, v. 256; Nic. Antonio, Biblioth. Vet. vi. 2, 35; Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi.). [M. A. W.]

ETHERIUS (10), according to Anastasius (Lib. Pontif. pp. 318, 319), chaplain and notary of Charlemagne at Rome in 774, drew up the confirmation to pope Hadrian of Pippin's gifts of temporal power. (Quoted by Baronius, s. a. § 6; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. s. a.) [T. R. B.]

ETHERNAN (1) (EDDRAN, IPHERNAN), bishop and confessor, commemorated Dec. 2. This holy bishop lived in the 6th century, and is often confounded with the Ernana, uncle and nephew of St. Columba, as the names may be used interchangeably, but he is different from both. From his legend as given in the Brev. Aberd. (Prop. SS. p. hyem. ff. vi. vii.), we learn that, born of noble parents, and early devoted to religion, he went to Ireland in pursuit of learning, and was made a bishop. When he returned to Scotland he brought with him some learned men, presbyters and clerics, with whom he traversed the country, labouring indefatigably for the salvation of souls, teaching, baptizing, confirming, visiting the sick, and consecrating churches. His cell was in the parish of Rathen, Aberdeenshire, where the church was dedicated to his memory, and the den where his cell is supposed to have been is still called "Eddran's slack." He had also a dedication in the priory of the Isle of May, and the church of Madderty, Perthshire, was St. Iphernan's or Ethernan's. His feast in the Aberdeen kalendar is Dec. 2, but King, Camerarius, and Dempster place him on Dec. 21 or 22, mistaking him for others. Various attempts at identification have been made, but there appears no distinct record of him in the Irish Annals, unless he be the Starnan or Tarnan (read by Skene Itharnan), in Ann. Ult. A.D. 668, and Ann. Tig. 669, who died among the Picts. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 333-4; View Dioc. Aberd. 133-34; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scott. i. 251; Camerarius, De Scot. Fort. 203; Old Stat. Acc. Scot. vi. 15; Rec. Pr. Isle of May, pp. xv.-xvi. 19; Ogilvie, Christ. in Buchan, 15, 17, 34-5; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 168.) [J. G.]

ETHERNAN (2). Dempster has a St. Ethernanus, nephew of St. Columba, and "monasterii Divini Ruris, ut vocant, praepositus," who wrote Gesta Columbae avunculi, lib. i., and flourished A.D. 606, his feast being Jan. 24; on that day in Men. Scot. Dempster calls him abbat and bishop in Iona. Evidently he is the same person as Ernana, son of Eoghan, nephew of St. Columba. [ERNAN (2).] (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 251; Tanner, Bibl. 270; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 191.) [J. G.]

ETHERNASO (ETHERNAISS, IOTHARNAISC, ITHARNAISE), confessor, commemorated Dec. 22. Ethernas is not to be confounded with Ethernan of Rathen; there seems little doubt but he is identical with Itharnaisc, venerated on Dec. 22 at Clane, co. Kildare. He is associated in the calendars with St. Ultan Tua, and the two are said to have been brothers of St. Maighnead (Dec. 18), of Kilmainham, and thus belonged to the Oriels on the side of their father Aedh, and to the Dalcormacs on the side of their mother Sinell. St. Ethernasc must have flourished in the beginning of the 7th century; Skene (Celt. Scot. ii. 311) suggests the end of the ninth. In the Breviary and Martyrology of Aberdeen he is called a bishop; his dedication in Scotland was at Lathrisk, now Kettle, Fifeshire, which probably had its name of Lanthrees, or Lathrisk, corrupted from Llan-Ethernaisc. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 334 et al.; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. iii. 281-2; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 199, 431.) [J. G.]

ETHI (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 8), followers of Aetius. [AETIUS, Vol. I. 51.] [T. W. D.]

ETHICOPROSCOPTAE (ἠθικοπροσκοπταί), literally "offenders (προσκοπτοντες) in matters of ethics," is the title under which St. John of Damascus (De Haeresibus Liber, § 96) describes the holders of certain erroneous opinions, who had come into notice before the age of Heraclius (610-642). They are spoken of as "erring in ethical, that is to say, in practical virtue; gainsaying some precepts of it which are praiseworthy, and following as good other precepts which are to be blamed." The expression, ἐν τῇ ἠθικῇ ἡγουν πρακτικῇ, is somewhat difficult, since Damascenus elsewhere makes ἡ πρακτικῇ not an explanatory equivalent of ἡ ἠθικῇ, as he appears to do here, but as the whole, of which the ethical is one of three parts, the economical and political being the other two (Dialectica, c. iii.). In any case it is plain that the reference in the name Ethicoproscopae is not to any erroneous tenets of theology, but to unsound morality in the conduct of life, and the description given is too vague and general to admit of our applying it to any particular sect or persons. [J. H. L.]

ETHILAUS, bishop of Edessa. [EUTHALIUS (2).]

ETHILBALD (Sim. Dun. G. R. A. ann. 732 M. H. B. 657 D, 658 C; ann. 750, ib. 662 B), king of Mercia. [ETHELBALD (1).] [C. H.]

ETHILIUS, sixth bishop of Vaison, succeeding Fonteius and followed by Gemellus, is said to have sat at a synod at Orange in 501, not to be found, however, in Labbe. One of the subscribers of the first council of Orleans in A.D. 511 was "Sextilius episcopus ecclesiae Vasati-cae," whom some have thought without sufficient reason to be identical with Ethilius of Vaison. (Gall. Christ. i. 922; Labbe, Conc. v. 548.) [S. A. B.]

ETHIMOTHEUS, sixth bishop of Syracuse, early in the 2nd century. His predecessor was Espius, his successor Venatius. (Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, i. 600.) [R. S. G.]

ETHIOPIAN CHURCH. The designation "Ethiopia" (Aethiopia, ἡ Αἰθιοπία of Herod. iii. 114, and also of Strabo and Pliny; the LXX translation of the CUSH of the Hebrews, Ezek. xxxix. 10; Amos ix. 7; Ps. lxxviii. 31) is a geographical expression of great indefiniteness, and must be distinguished from the civilised "Aethiopia" limited to the province or kingdom of the island of Meroë (ἡ Αἰθιοπία ὑπὲρ Αἰγυπτου of Herod. ii. 146), of which we find memorials in the Greek travellers and historians, and also in the monumental records of Egypt. According to Pliny, ἡ Αἰθιοπία consisted of forty-five kingdoms, of which Meroë was the chief. The term is used very vaguely to denote the whole of Africa south of Libya (Herod. iv. 197), and also is confounded with India, and appears to denote occasionally large portions of Arabia. Jerome regards Arabia Felix as the home of the Ethiopian chamberlain (Cat. Script. Ecc. i. 265); and the account of the foundation of the church in Ethiopia is undoubtedly described in Socrates (i. 15) and Sozomen (ii. 24) as the conversion of the Indians. Thus Hen. Valesius, commenting on Sozomen, ii. 24, says: "Pantaenum ante Frumentum Indis istis verbum Dei praedicavisse, sed nullo ibi reliquisse episcopos." Baronius supposes that there were two Frumentii; one for the Indians, and one for Ethiopia.

It is not necessary here to attempt to penetrate the ancient history of Ethiopia, even where it crosses the Biblical history. The Shishak of Scripture and of the monuments conquered Ethiopia—i.e. the seat of Ethiopian power in Meroë; but his successor was killed by the Ethiopians. Shortly afterwards Zerah not only subdued Egypt, but menaced Assa, king of Judah (2 Chron. xiv. 9), who nevertheless overthrew and scattered his vast host (B.C. 941). There is grave difficulty in identifying this prince with any known sovereign either of Ethiopia or Egypt, though attempts have been made to identify him with Osorkon I., the son and successor of Shishak. The Ebed-melech mentioned by Jeremiah (xxxviii. xxix.) was in ready sympathy with the prophet and his career. This fact indicates the presence of a certain amount of proselytism to the Jewish faith among those who bore the designation of Cush. "The boundaries of the African Aethiopians are necessarily indefinite. If they were, as seems probable, the ancestors of the Shangallas, Bisharies, and Nubians, their positions may be loosely stated as having to the south the Abyssinian highlands; to the west, the Libyan desert; to the north, Egypt and Macedonia; and to the east, the Indian Ocean and the Red Sea" (Dict. Geog. art. "Aethiopia"). But Habesh itself is the principal portion of those lands which went under the name of Ethiopia, and may, according to Hofmann (Herzog's Encyc. art. "Abess. Kirche"), be divided into three parts: (1) the north-east highlands, including Axum, and the whole district of the Tigré; (2) the south-west highlands, Amhara, Shoa, and Gonder, including the capital city; (3) the surrounding lowlands. The aim of the present article is to deal with the religious condition and ecclesiastical relations of that portion of the Ethiopian peoples which, after the decline of the kingdom of Meroë, recognised the supremacy and submitted to the authority of the emperor of Abyssinia. The extraordinary development of the power of Habesh or Abyssinia is rather the transference of the hegemony or supremacy to what was once a dependent province. Even after the transfer, Nubia must not be altogether shut out from the political and ecclesiastical relations of Ethiopia. The chief seat of the empire was at Auxume (cf. Dict. Geog. Ἀὐξούμης, Ἀβξούμης, Ptol. iv. 7), the modern Arusa. This city was extensive, and its power and wealth considerable, in the commencement of the second century of our era.

The identity of the Ethiopic or Geez language with the Amharic, or the Homerite, makes it probable that we have here an ancient branch of the Arabic race. Here Gesenius (Ersch und Gröber, art. "Abessinische Kirche") and Adelung are opposed; but Ludolf strongly emphasises the dialectical and tribal identification of the Habeshini and Homeritae, thus lending emphasis to the speculation that the city Auxume and Tigré generally were colonised from Arabia, and even leading to the belief that Egyptian civilisation descended in early times from the sources of the Nile. It should be observed that, while one-third of the roots of the Ethiopic tongue are found in the Arabic, and there are numerous Syro-Arabian peculiarities and many Greek roots, no trace of Coptic can be found. The ancient Ethiopic language has now passed away from living use, and the Amharic variety has taken its place (Gesenius).

There is a valueless tradition that the Abyssinian Ethiopians became proselytes to Judaism under the influence of the queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon, and on her return to her own land introduced the rites and customs resembling those of the Hebrews, which no one disputes to have prevailed in the past, and even to prevail at the present day in Abyssinia. The name of the queen is preserved as Maqueda, and her son by Solomon is said to have been called Menilehec and Ebn-el-Haquim. The title here given to the king is Aramaic in form, and may easily be referred to his reputed royal birth, "Son of the wise man, or Solomon." Such a prince may have lived, but his prominence in the midst of legendary names is itself confused. The catalogues of kings are reckoned differently, some giving twenty and some twenty-four names between Menilehec and Bazenus, in the eighth year of whose reign we are told in Ethiopian history that our Lord was born. Customs analogous to the Hebrew rites did prevail, and were still capable of recognition, in the 16th and 17th centuries, as may be seen at large in the Historia Ethiopiae, by Tellesius (Father Tellez), and Hist. Ethiopiae of Job Ludolf (lib. ii. c. 4 and lib. iii. c. 1). Among these customs were circumcision, the observance of the Sabbath, the distinction of clean and unclean food, the levirate law. There are many ways of accounting for the prevalence of these customs without resorting to the mythical proselytism of an Ethiopian queen. The Egyptians practised circumcision. Phoenicians, Colchians, and other nations borrowed it from them. The Arabians practise it still, but do not profess to have derived it from the Jews. It is not a religious rite with the Mussulman, nor is it referred to in the Koran. The confessio fidei of king Claudius, who reigned in Abyssinia 1541–1559 (Ludolf, ib. ii. 6, 18, and Commentarium, xxvii. xxviii.), is a rather late authority, but it counts for something. He said: "We do not circumcise as the Jews (giving Christian reasons and quotations from St. Paul on the subject), but like as incisions on the face are made in Ethiopia and Nubia, perforations of the ear in India, so that which we do is not in observance of the laws of Moses, but is a human and national custom." The same argument was used by him with reference to abstinence from swine-flesh and other unclean meats. Doubtless abstinence from blood and things strangled obtained far beyond the limits of Judaism. The observance of the Sabbath may be accounted for on other grounds than on that of the general prevalence of Jewish ceremonial before the introduction of Christianity. The form of Christianity which prevailed was of the primitive and ante-Nicene type. There is no doubt that in the earliest form of the Apostolic Constitutions (viii. 33 and vii. 24) we find reference to an early Christian observance of the seventh day as well as the first. The Ethiopian king Claudius in his confession of faith discriminated between the two days in a manner which leads us to infer that both days may have been regarded with reverence by the first preachers of the gospel to this people, and that the Sabbath observance was due to Christian rather than Jewish influences. The custom has prevailed in the Ethiopian church to the present day. We have not only the effort made in the 15th and 16th centuries to disprove the Jesuit charge of Judaism, but the repeated testimony of modern travellers and missionaries (Isenberg and Krapf, Journals; Major Harris, Highlands of Ethiopia, ii. 177, iii. 144).

Hofmann (Herzog's Encyc.) appears to reckon the peculiarity as akin to the extraordinary love shewn by the Ethiopian church to the observance of special days. There prevails among them another custom, which has been held to prove a wide diffusion of Jewish ideas, viz. the marriage of the childless widow of a deceased brother under what has been termed the levirate law. Alvarez used this as an argument. Ludolf urged that the Ethiopians did not borrow the levirate law from the Jews, more certainly or clearly than other nations derived from the same source their polygamy or freedom of divorce. But the marriage of a brother's widow by his surviving brother is a very different arrangement from polygamy or freedom of divorce, and the prevalence of this unusual and self-denying ordinance among Ethiopians and Jews shews some tribal or religious associations which cannot be disposed of with a sneer. It would be more to the purpose to observe that some law of the like import prevailed in many oriental nations, as, e.g., the Moabites (Ruth i. 11-13), the Persians (Zendav. iii. 226, quoted by Lehrer, art. "Leviratsehe," Herzog's Encyc.); and certain Arabian tribes will endure great sacrifices with a view of preserving in this way the name of a family. Hence the custom prevalent among the Ethiopians which resembled the Mosaic law (Deut. xxv. 5-10; vide treatise of the Mishna called Jebumoth) may simply indicate a common parentage of the custom among both peoples without giving a warrant to the charges brought by the Jesuits.

The interesting narrative in Acts viii. 24 of the conversion by Philip the Evangelist of an Ethiopian, alike a Jewish proselyte, and a chamberlain of Candace, queen of Ethiopia, is naturally the starting-place of Ethiopian legend as to the origin of Christianity, and is a still further confirmation of the suspicion that Jewish ideas, Scriptures, and observances were already familiarly known to some branch or division of this great family. The Codex Axumensis to which Ludolf continually refers contains the simple narrative of the conversion, but adds no further details. Zagazaabus in his "Confession of faith," as given by Ludolf, states the bare fact and knows nothing more of the subsequent history of Christianity. It should, moreover, be observed that in the lists of Abyssinian princes, from the time of Bazenus to the date of the undoubted introduction of Christianity into Ethiopia, there is no mention of any queen Candace or of any female ruler at all. On the other hand, Candace was the royal title of the queens who ruled for some centuries over the kingdom of Meroë. From the days of Alexander to the Roman general Petronius, and from Petronius to the time of Eusebius (H. E. ii. 1), the name, title, and honour had prevailed. Pliny (lib. vi. 29) said: "Regnasse quondam foeminam Candacen atque id nomen multis jam annis ad reginas transiisse" (cf. Strabo, xvii. p. 820). Eusebius does not hesitate to say that this Ethiopian convert was the first preacher of the gospel to his own people, and gives him the name of Indich. It is doubtful whether the Ethiopia referred to was on the eastern or western side of the Red Sea, but most probably on the latter, and thus in the earliest times of Christianity it is not impossible that the island of Meroë at least may have received the tidings of the way of life, that other Jewish proselytes may have prepared the way for Christ and been as willing to receive the Christian interpretation of the ancient oracles as was the Ethiopian eunuch. Ecclesiastical writers referred the first offer of the Gospel to the apostles themselves; thus Jerome (Cat. Script. i. 262) made St. Andrew; Rufinus (Hist. Eccl. x. 9) and Socrates (i. 19) made St. Matthew; Chrysostom regarded (Hom. 31) St. Thomas as the first preacher of the Gospel to the Ethiopians. This great diversity is probably due to the cause already adverted to, viz. the extreme indefiniteness of the term Ethiopia, and the confusion of India and Arabia with it.

Whether the gospel had been introduced by apostolic or sub-apostolic hands among any of the subordinate kingdoms of (Abyssinia) Ethiopia or not, it is tolerably clear that no authentic proof of the existence of any Christian ideas, worship, or organisation can be traced to an earlier period than to the visit of the Tyrian youths Frumentius and Aedesius, about the year A.D. 330. The basis of this intelligence is a narrative which Rufinus has preserved (Hist. Eccl. i. 9), having personally gathered the facts from one of the two brothers. The narrative is repeated by Socrates (i. 15), Sozom. (ii. 24), Theodoret (i. 22), cf. Baronius, Ann. 327-8, and Ludolf, H. Eth., and is to the following purport. Between India citerior and Parthia lies India ulterior, inhabited by numerous and various tribes and nations untouched by any apostolic influence or preaching. This India is thus discriminated from Ethiopia, which Rufinus says had been entrusted by lot to St. Matthew. A philosopher, Metrodorus by name, of whom some mention is made in the Chronicon of Jerome, penetrated "ulterior India," being smitten by the love of travel. Meropius (says Rufinus), a Tyrian philosopher (or merchant), imitated his example, and sought to enter India, taking with him two youths, his relatives (according to some accounts these youths were his sons), whom he instructed in the liberal arts. The name of the younger was Aedesius, and that of the elder Frumentius. The vessel in which Meropius and the lads were travelling touched at a port to obtain food or water. The barbarians, who had just thrown off their alliance with the Romans, were ready to put to the sword all and sundry who claimed affinity with then, if they fell into their power. It was the case on this occasion: the whole ship's crew, with the philosopher, were murdered, but the barbarians took compassion on the youths, who were found meditating and reading under the shadow of a tree. They were brought to the king of the barbarians, and secured at once his interest, confidence, and love. This king, if we identify the narrative with the Ethiopian version of the story, must have been the father of the Abreha and Atzbeha of the Ethiopian annals. He made Aedesius his cupbearer and Frumentius the keeper of his rolls (scrinia) and his finances or business affairs (rationes suas). Sozomen describes him as his treasurer. Rufinus says that on his approaching death he left his wife regent, and gave full liberty to the Tyrian youths to take their own course. The widowed queen brought the youths to remain at her court until her infant son (? sons) should become of age. She earnestly entreated them, especially Frumentius, whose mental faculties and knowledge of affairs were the more conspicuous, to assist her in the management of the kingdom. They consented to remain, and Frumentius was led by some divine impulse (Deo mentem et animos ejus instigante) to make diligent inquiry whether there were any Christians among the Roman merchants who visited or resided in the land, and to give them authority and advice to erect houses of prayer, and to adopt all necessary and opportune methods, so that there the Christian seed might spring up among them. When the royal youth reached man's estate, Frumentius and Aedesius, notwithstanding many entreaties on the part of the queen and her son to remain, returned to their own country. Aedesius proceeded to Tyre to revisit his friends and relatives. He was shortly afterwards made a presbyter of the church in Tyre, and from his lips, not from common report, Rufinus tells us that he received the above narrative. Meanwhile Frumentius, thinking it was not just to conceal the work of the Lord, went straight to Alexandria and laid the whole matter before the bishop Athanasius, who had recently been appointed, urging him to send a bishop to the Christians who had been gathered together, and the churches that had been formed in that barbarous locality. Athanasius having given much consideration to the recital of Frumentius, said in a council (concilio sacerdotum), "What other man shall we find such as thou art, in whom is the spirit of God, as He is in thee, who will be able to discharge these duties?" He was at once ordained and ordered to return to the place from which he had come. When he returned as a bishop to India, apostolic signs accompanied his ministry, and an infinite number of the barbarians were converted to the faith."

Frumentius, or Fremonatos, received the title of Abreha, or Abba Salama, father of peace, and by that name he is chiefly known in the Ethiopic annals. The bishopric of Auxume assumed a metropolitan character, and was always renewed at the instigation of the king, by the patriarch of the Coptic church. The title of "Abba Salama" is borne by this dignitary to the present day.

The Ethiopic annals, the Ethiopic liturgy, and the Ethiopic poetry from which Ludolf perpetually quotes, confirm this narrative of Rufinus, and slightly increase our knowledge. We learn, e.g., that there were thirteen kings between Bazenus and the two kings under whose reign Fremonatos (Frumentius) and Sidracus (Aedesius), or Abba Salama, as the former was afterwards called, diffused the knowledge of the gospel. The names of these two kings were Abreha and Atzbeha. The Ethiopic poet praises these kings "for their brotherly love, and because they obeyed the laws of Moses, diffused the gospel of Christ, and built a house to his praise" (Ludolf, l. c. ii. c. 4). In the Ethiopic liturgy Ludolf found the following encomium on the same kings: "With joyful voice I hail them, extolling and exalting Salama, door of pity and mercy, who caused the glory of Christ to shine in Ethiopia, where before all was dark, murky night." Elsewhere, Abba Salama is described under the image of the "Light-bringer." This appears somewhat inconsistent with the statement of the Codex Auxumensis, to the effect that the Tyrian youths wondered at the people who signed themselves with the sign of the cross, when they had never received the gospel from an apostle. Ludolf advances a number of subjective reasons and argumenta e silentio which appear to him conclusive that Christianity could never have been diffused prior to Frumentius. The silence of the Ethiopian records as to the prevalence of bishops, presbyters, or baptism, and of the church historians of earlier times as to the diffusion of the gospel in this remote neighbourhood, weigh strongly with him; also the absence of any record of conflict, persecution, or martyrdom. These considerations deserve weight, but they are not conclusive. Many inchoate and half-developed forms of Christianity diffused themselves widely in the East, without leading to conversion, to the formation of churches or the creation of literature. And, moreover, the representation which Frumentius gave of the success of his own labours implies that there were Christians, houses of prayer, and churches in existence before he was entrusted with the episcopate. It is not impossible that Christian merchants, that Ethiopian proselytes, that wandering Jews converted to the faith of Christ had prepared the way for Frumentius.

A discussion was raised by Hen. Valesius. Commenting on Socrates (H. E. i. 15), he disputed the consecration of Frumentius to the episcopate of Auxume by Athanasius, on the ground that Athanasius was made archbishop of Alexandria, A.D. 326. Further, that Meropius is said to have imitated the example of Metrodorus in his Oriental travel. Now Metrodorus did not return from his travel till 325, when he brought Indian trophies to Constantine. This, says he, could not have occurred until Constantine had been victorious over Licinius. If the journey of Meropius had not commenced until that year, then it is in the highest degree improbable that Frumentius could have passed through the several stages of his career, or become in age or character fitted for the office until 340, or still later. There are many ways of avoiding this apparent conclusion. Metrodorus may have paid two visits to the East. Meropius need not have waited for his return before being smitten with the love of travel, or again Metrodorus may have returned from his wanderings long before he presented his trophies to Constantine. The explicit statement of Rufinus that Athanasius had been recently (nuper) appointed to his high office, or ρεσσευε, as Socrates phrases it, is rather too strong to be overthrown on a conjectural argument. Besides, the authentic proof that Constantius wrote to the prince of Ethiopia to ask him to replace Frumentius by Theophilus, a bishop in communion with George, the Arian patriarch of Alexandria, shews that the appointment of Frumentius must have taken place before 337, when Constantius came to the throne of the East. This letter, which is preserved in "Apology of Athanasius, addressed to the emperor Constantius" (Athanasius, Historic Tracts, with notes by I. H. N. pp. 182, 183; Athan. Opp. ed. Ben. l. i. p. 153), assured the princes, "Aezanes and Sazanes" (either the Grecized form of Abreha and Atzbeha or else the Christian names adopted by the sons of the late king) that Athanasius was "guilty of ten thousand crimes," that the canonical appointment of Frumentius was very doubtful, that he must be examined on these matters and instructed by the "most venerable George." Constantius confessed, moreover, his alarm lest Athanasius might himself find his way to Auxume and corrupt the people with his accursed and impious doctrines. The advice and threats of Constantius appear to have produced no effect at Auxume, and Arianism made no entrance among them (cf. Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 644).

This bright flash of light reveals the presence of churches, Christians, dogmatic beliefs, and the commencement of hierarchical order; moreover, it confirms the truth of the traditionary and vague utterances of the Ethiopic annals and poets. But the darkness settles over the history, and we are led to grope our way onward by the register of a few names and facts, by the occurrence of certain peculiarities in the subsequent constitution of the church, by the deference paid in the Ethiopic church to extra-canonical Scriptures and antique canons of church order, by some confusing traditions with reference to a later introduction of Christianity into the land, and by the unquestionable adhesion of the Ethiopian church of later days to the Monophysite (Jacobite) church of Alexandria and Egypt. Each of these sources of information may be briefly touched upon.

The names of the following bishops of Auxume are gathered from the Ethiopic calendar* by Gams, Series Episcoporum, viz.: Frumentius, Theophilus (Arian Missionary to the Homerites), Alexander, Bartholomaeus, Joannes, Jacobus (cf. Le Quien, 642-660).

The two great names of Abreha and Atzbeha are praised by the Ethiopic poet (Enc. 4, Ludolf, l. c. ii. c. 4) for their brotherly love. They are commended for obeying the laws of Moses, as well as diffusing the gospel of Christ and building a house to his praise. The annals of the Ethiopic poet mention as reigning subsequently to these brothers three contemporaneous kings, whose names were Atzfa, Atzfed, and Amey, who are said to have ruled by turns most happily, but in what way we can only conjecture. To them succeeded Arad, Aladoba, Alamid, the latter called elsewhere Amiamid, son of Salodoba (cf. Ludolf, c. ii. and c. iv.). In the reign of Amiamid or Alamid, we are told that many monks came from Rome and filled the kingdom with the renown of their virtues. Mendezius says this event must have occurred between 460 and 480. If so, it must have been coincident with another event of immense importance in the history of Oriental Christianity, the schism in the church of Egypt, which followed upon the council of Chalcedon. In the first ardours of that conflict these monks arrived. They were probably called "Roman," in the sense in which all Greeks were called Roman at that time from being submitted to the Eastern Roman empire ruling from the throne of Constantinople. Several of these great saints are enumerated—(1) Aragawi, (2) Pantaleon, (3) Gavima, (4) Alef, (5) Saham, (6) Afe, (7) Likanos, (8) Adimata. With the exception of Pantaleon, all these names are Ethiopic, and are the translation of the Greek appellatives of these worthies. Thus Aragawi is equivalent to Michael. It may be borne in mind that the archangel Michael is the patron of the Ethiopian church and kingdom, and to him is consecrated the twelfth day of every month in the calendar (Ludolf, Comm.; cf. Harris, l. c.). The poet sings about him that his life was wisdom, and his death prudence; that the Trinity was with him, that by prayer he destroyed the kingdom of the serpent (arwe), probably some form of heathen serpent worship, which prevailed up to his date. The poet tells us that temples were erected, and churches dedicated to the memory of Pantaleon. This great saint is credited with raising the dead and causing the widow and orphan to sing for joy. In the song of the Ethiopic poet concerning Likanos, all the nine saints are mentioned as making a crown for his brow. When Likanos prayed, the fingers of his upturned hands burned like lamps of fire, and when he held a staff, his hands were seen to be perforated. Is this an anticipation of the legend of the stigmata of St. Francis of Assisi? The Greek Menolog. mentions other doctors, saints and martyrs of the Ethiopian church, who wrought astounding miracles—walked on the sea, moved mountains, drew water from the rock, and raised the dead. Latatzanus lived on leaves and herbs, and that so sparingly that his body became light as air (Enc. xvii). Gabra-Menfes clothed himself in the leaves of trees, and the Ethiopian poets record the fabulous history of twenty or thirty workers of the most astounding miracles, who not only raised men but even animals from death; and of one saint who restored the same person three times from death to this miserable life. Special ascriptions of praise are made to Eustathius, Jacobus, Horus, Martianus, Bessarion, and Aubaca. The Jesuits who subsequently sought to convert the Ethiopian church to the communion of Rome, made no account of the astounding miracles wrought or the extreme asceticism practised by the Ethiopian monks. They did not repudiate the flimsy evidence on which they are based, but discounted their value as being any proof of the Divine approval of their communion because they were separated from the true church. Nevertheless, the eremitic life is traced back to the great Anthony, who in time of persecution devoted himself to the life of abstinence and prayer. [ANTHONY.] The well-known Macarius carried on the tradition of self-mortification. Pachomius was his successor, and Aragawi, one of the nine saints, the destroyer of the serpents, kept the succession alive, and was regarded as the first "general" of the whole monastic order of Ethiopia. His place was subsequently filled by Christus-Bezana, by M-stel-Moa, by Johann, who left his robe (askema) to Tecla-haimonot, the Benedict of Abyssinia, who in the 15th century founded the great monastery of Debra-Libanos. The part played by this great ascetic leader of the regular clergy appertains to a later period of the history than that contemplated in this work. The successors of Tecla, the president, antistes, and visitor of all the monks, acquired a position equal to that of the occupants of the see of Axum (Axume), who successively derived their orders and consecration as their prototype Frumentius had done, from the patriarch of Alexandria. In Ethiopia, as in other parts of Christendom, the contest was often sharp and prolonged between the chief of the monastic order and the Abbuna.

* Ludolf gives the calendar at great length; Harris (Highlands, vol. iii. App.) has translated and abridged it.

Another story of the introduction of Christianity into Ethiopia is told by Nicephorus Callistus in his annals, and it has the support of Sæger (de Emendatione Temp.). Assemani (Bibl. Orient. tom. i. pp. 358 ff.) gives the Syriac authorities for a narrative which represents Aidog or Aidog, emperor of Axumites, vowing vengeance on the Homerite King, a Jewish usurper, who had cruelly murdered "Roman" merchants, on the ground of their Christian activity in his dominions, as well as numerous Homerites. Assemani's authority is a history written by "John, bishop of Asia," and preserved in the Chronicon of Dionysius, and it is followed up by the Syriac letter of Simeon, bishop of Beth Arsamien, whose statements coincide with those of Simeon Metaphrastes (in Surius, i. p. 943), Theophanes, Cedrenus, and of the Portuguese historians of later times, with reference to the martyrdom of these Homerites. The story of Nicephorus, however, is that Aidog or Aidog (or, as Greek and Roman writers call him, AMBAAS), emperor of Ethiopia, uttered a vow that if he conquered the Homerites of the Red Sea coast he would embrace Christianity; further, that he was successful, fulfilled his vow, and appealed to Justinian, who sent bishops to effect the conversion of the Ethiopians, that a Christian-Ethiopian kingdom was thenceforward added to the Homerites. There are many improbabilities in the latter portions of this statement. Not the least of the difficulties is that if Justinian had sent bishops to Ethiopia, he would not have sent Jacobite, but Melchite or Catholic bishops, and there can be little question that the church of Ethiopia in its inception was a hundred years before the reign of Justinian had accepted the Jacobite patriarchy, and remained, as it has done to the present day, the orthodox Alexandrian church. Ludolf makes a strange blunder in appealing to the various Nicene canons in proof of the existence, power, and position of the Ethiopian patriarch at the date of the council of Nicaea in 325! In his commentary (p. 282) he admits the anachronism involved in a statement which would utterly overthrow all his Ethiopic authority, for the conversion of Ethiopia by Frumentius, and the consecration of the latter by Athanasius before the accession of Constantius. Strangely enough Selden led Ludolf into this blunder, which was pointed out by Fabricius, and corrected by himself.

It is not impossible to see through the apparently conflicting accounts. The Greek and Latin authorities, the Syrian and Ethiopian annals and writers all combine to throw some light on the curious vow, from which, as reported by John, "bishop of Asia," who flourished in the reign of Justinian, it has been supposed by no less an authority than Assemani (Bibl. Or. i. 359), that Ethiopian kings and princes had given up their faith in Christ until it was renewed in the time of Justinian. All authorities combine to include among the Homerite sufferers one Aretas and his wife, and a number of his companions, variously estimated as 280 and 340. The Syrian writer, John, speaks of 280 priests, involving a wide diffusion of Christianity in the region. Aretas had been a distinguished man at Auxume, and there built himself a palace. He was appointed governor of Nagran by the emperor of Ethiopia, whose dominions must have included a nominal suzerainty over portions at least of Arabia Felix. The Homerites or Sabaeans occupied the coast on both sides of the Red Sea, but their principal seat must have been in Arabia. They appear to have received an Arian form of Christianity during the reign of Constantius, under the teaching of Theophilus Indicus (Philos. Frag. lib. iii.). However that may be, they suffered cruelly at the hands of Dunaan, a Jewish sectary who had usurped the authority, besieged Najran,^b and punished the Christian with various forms of refined cruelty. The date of the persecution in which Aretas and his wife and companions fell is differently given. Theophanes, quoted by Assemani (i. 358), gives the year A.D. 535, and Nicephorus assigns it to 541. Baronius places it under the year 522.

The authorities quoted at length by Baronius (Ann. 522), viz. Nicephorus, Zonaras, and Cedrenus describe the courage of the martyrs, the bold answers made by Aretas to his tormentors, his refusal to submit to the rites of Judaism, and his unflinching confession of the Trinity and the Incarnation, and his cruel death. The Arabian authorities, Abjaunatus, and Ahmed Ebn Jusef, confirm the story of the cruel death of those who would not conform to the Jewish faith. Philostorgius (iii. c. 4) refers to the fact, and in Sura lxxxv. of the Alcoran, Mohammed is supposed by his commentators to have condemned the cruel act in these words: "Cursed were the contrivers of the pit of fire supplied with fuel, when they sat round the same, and were witnesses of what they did against true believers, and they afflicted them for no other reason, but because they believed in the mighty glorious God, unto Whom belongeth the kingdom of heaven and earth, and God is witness of all things" (Sale's translation). The speculation, based by some on this passage, that the Christian Homerites, or Christian Ethiopians, relapsed into Mohammedanism, is contradicted by the testimony of Mohammed himself, who treated the Christianity of these people as the true religion at that period. (Sale here refers to Ezechielens' Hist. Arab. i. c. 10; Prideaux, Mahomet, 61; Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. art. Abou Nawas.)

^b Modern geographers (see Ancient Atlas, Smith) place Negran or Najran in long. 44° lat. 17°.

The Ethiopic poet thus sings the glory of the martyrs of Nagran. "All hail the beauty of the stars of Nagran, gems of light which illumine the world! May your beauty be my reconciliation and pacification. Should my sin stand before God the Judge, shew Him the blood which you have shed in bearing your testimony to Him." (Ludolf, H. E. c. 4.)

This atrocity of Dunaan was revenged by the emperor of Auxume. The name of this emperor is differently stated. The Syrian authorities call him Aidog or Adad, or David. The Ethiopian poet calls him Caleb; the Greek and Latin writers call him Elesbaan, and under that name he is honoured in the Roman Calendar on 27th October.* The Greeks do not place him among their saints, although they call him Χριστιανισκός, and the martyrologists differ as to the origin of his resolve to undertake reprisals upon Dunawas or Dunaan. Mendez says it was Timotheus the Monophysite patriarch, while Simeon Metaphrastes represents Asterius the Melchite patriarch of Alexandria, as the adviser of the step, but all the authorities concur in the statement that the Alexandrian patriarch advised Elesbaan to carry his arms against the Homerites. He is described as raising an army of 120,000 men, and crossing the Red Sea in twenty-three ships, as conquering Dunaan, as restoring Nagran to the Christians, and placing over them a son of the martyr Aretas as king, and thus forming an Ethiopian Christian dynasty which ruled over the Homerites for several generations. The Persian power subsequently prevailing in the peninsula, at length assumed the right to choose and appoint kings over the Sabaeans or Homerites; their last king, Bazenus by name, became a Mohammedan. The annalists differ as to what became of Elesbaan after his victory. Some say that he became a monk, having resigned the crown to his successors, and Hofmann (Herzog) admits the tradition that Elesbaan went into a cloister. Others aver that for many years he lived in great splendour at Auxume. The Ethiopian annals and poets identify the conqueror of the Homerites with Caleb, the grandson of Tacena, the great-grandson of Alamid, in whose reign the monks arrived. This would make the reign of Caleb fairly synchronize with the career attributed to Elesbaan, and the Ethiopic poet unquestionably identifies the two names. Thus, in Encom. xx. (Ludolf, H. E. ii. c. 4):

"Salutem Calebo! (qui) signum reliquit opum suarum
Dum misit coronam suam Hierosolymam (ut) suspenderent eam.
Hic Heros vanâ gloriâ usus non est ob fortitudinem suam
Cum, per manus ejus, exercitus Sabaeorum deletus fuisset
Ita ut non superesset quisquam ex illo."

To Caleb succeeded, according to the poet, Gebra-Meskel, "the servant of the cross," whose days were "days of peace." A few other names of princes occur down to the rise of the Zagseu family in the 10th century.

During the whole of this period one important fact must be borne in mind. The Ethiopian church derived its orders from the patriarch of Alexandria, but shared throughout the fanatical rejection of the decisions of the council of Chalcedon which was displayed by the Coptic church; it regarded Dioscurus as the pillar of orthodoxy, and took sides throughout the long and weary strife with the Jacobite schism. [COPTIC CHURCH; DIOSCURUS.] Ludolf endeavours to minimise the monophysitism not only of Armenian and Ethiopian churches, but of Eutyches himself, and excites indignant condemnation of himself and his "miserable Ethiopic poet" on the part of Renaudot in his Historia Patriarcharum Alexandrinorum. It is, however, remarkable that though the Ethiopian church was cut off for ages from all intercommunion with the rest of Christendom in consequence of the utter destruction of the Nubian church by the Mohammedans, yet that it retained so many Christian ideas unimpaired. The Jewish element prevailed from the first, and in fasting, circumcision, sabbath observance, and in their reverence for the Temple at Jerusalem, and their confident belief that they possessed the ark of the covenant which had been miraculously transported to them, the Ethiopians present a curious and almost unique amalgam of religious sentiments. Notwithstanding the vehement repudiation of Chalcedonian formulae, the very phrases of Chalcedon orthodoxy are actually woven into their liturgy. Ludolf quotes the following (Comm. lib. iii. c. 8):—Corpus et sanguis Domini . . . quod sumpsit ex Maria . . . et fecit illud unam cum divinitate sua, sine mixtura, neque promissione, sine separatione, neque distinctione Divinitatis. If the whole question had been merely one of words, and if they did hold the whole thing, and the same thing with the Catholic church, the age-long controversy in the East is one of the most melancholy facts in the history of Christianity.⁴ It is unnecessary to repeat the story of the strife. The Ethiopian church, believing itself pre-eminently orthodox, accepted the Jacobite patriarch as the supreme fountain of its hierarchy. The name Jacobite seems lost in obscurity, though variously explained. Thus Nicephorus (lib. xviii. 52) says that Jacobus was a Syrian of the name of Tzanzalus, that he was a disciple of Severus, i.e. the monk who harmonised the conflicting Monophysite sects, in the days of Justin (cf. Le Quien, Oricus Christ. ii. 1346). Eutychius (Alex. Ann. ii. 147) calls his name Baradaeus, and states that he diffused his opinions, those of an extreme Monophysite, throughout Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. Renaudot (l. c. p. 110) says that great difference as to the origin of the term prevails among the ten sects into which Anastasius shows that the Jacobites were divided. Some of the Jacobite patriarchs, such as Chail, before their Mohammedan judges, claimed James, the brother of the Lord, as their founder and father, and others have gone back to the patriarch Jacob for the origin of the name. Renaudot prefers the supposition that some unknown "Jacobus" gave his name to the movement by the diligence with which he propagated his opinions. Some have postponed the origin of the name to the 6th century, and have identified him with Jacobus of Edessa, by reason of a hymn attributed to this James in the Syrian liturgy (Nov. Script. Eccl. Hist. app. p. 480), and Ludolf (Comm. lib. iii. c. 4. xxxi.) enumerates among the Ethiopic liturgies an oratio eucharistica S. Jacobi Serugensis. The Syrian form of this liturgy has been found in the monasteries of Mount Lebanon, and gives to James of Sarug the honour of being the father of the schism. The question is difficult to settle, but there is no dispute as to the fact that the Catholic church in Egypt accepted the cognomen of Melchite, given to them first in scorn, from the circumstance of their bishops being royal nominees, and that the Monophysite, or Dioscuran, or Timothean section of the church accepted the title of Jacobite, first hurled at them in reproach, as the name of some obscure defender of heterodox opinions. Ludolf (Comm. lib. iii. 8, lxxxix.) favours the idea that Jacobus was the disciple of Severus, patriarch of Antioch, and he quotes from the Arabic history of Abulfaragius to shew that the views of Severus were not monophysite in the sense in which such opinions were condemned; but that Jacobus Syrus, if a follower of Severus, and also all the Ethiopic sectaries, repudiated the mixture or confusion of the two natures in Christ. Efforts were always being made to bring about a union between these contending factions in the Coptic church, until the Mohammedans in the 7th century took possession of Egypt, and favoured the Jacobite party. For eighty years there was no Catholic or Melchite patriarch of Alexandria.*

⁴ Even F. Telles admits that there is much sound doctrine in their books. The Jesuits boasted that they convinced the Ethiopians that they were doctrinally wrong from their own literature. But how could they understand one another? The words οὐσία, ὑπόστασις, πρόσωπον, φύσις are all by turns translated by one Ethiopic word. It is clear that the fierceness of the controversy turned on the personal treatment of individuals, rather than on the logical holding of an explicit monophysitism, which would have destroyed both the manhood and the Divinity of the Christ.

No reference is made in this article to the subsequent attempts of the church of Rome in the 15th and 16th centuries, through her Portuguese Jesuits, to establish a Roman patriarchate in Ethiopia. The terrible story in its treachery, cruelty, and failure is told in the article on COPTIC CHURCH (see also Ludolf and Tellez, Harris, High Lands of Ethiopia, vol. iii.)

The Literature and Customs of Ethiopia, so far as they reflect the early activities of the missionary church, may fairly come here under review.

The sacred books of all sections of the Abyssinian and Ethiopic church are written in the Ethiopic language; and were used long after the language ceased to exist as living

* Le Quien (Oriens Christianus, II. 1346 ff., Dioecesis Jacobitica) makes it probable that Severus appointed a Jacobus as bishop of Edessa. Severus died in Alexandria, and having nominated Sergius as his successor, who took the title of patriarch of Antioch. From him the Jacobite line of patriarchs has proceeded unto this day. The heretical Monophysites of Syria and Theodotian Monophysites of Egypt, also called Coptitae, were alike called Jacobites.

speech. The Coptic Christians use the Coptic Bible in their churches and monasteries without comprehending a word of its meaning, and the Ethiopians have followed the same unedifying example. The origin of the translation (Dillmann, art. Herzog, Enc.) is lost in obscurity. The tradition of the Ethiopic poet to the effect that either Frumentius, in the 4th century, or that the nine saints in the 5th century translated the Bible from Arabic into Ethiopic, does much to refute itself. Doubtless the books of which the poet speaks (Encom. xxix.) were in the main the Old Testament and New Testament, but it is certain that the Ethiopic text was made from the Alexandrine text of the Old Testament, as it follows the LXX where they differ in arrangement from the early Arabic version, e.g. in Exodus xxxvi. and Numb. xxvi. The names of animals retain their Greek names; and very frequent conformity with the Alexandrine text renders the speculation of Renaudot that it was made from the Coptic quite superfluous. Moreover, Frumentius and his companions could not have made use of the Arabic, since it seems proved (Bryan Walton in his prolegomena to the Polyglott), that the Arabic version was made between the years A.D. 340 and 350. It is equally unsatisfactory to contend, as some Romish writers have done, that it was made from the Latin Vulgate. The only evidence for this is its correspondence with the Vulgate in some places where our codices of the LXX reveal lacunae. The simple supposition that the Ethiopian scholars had more ancient codices than those we possess is sufficient to account for these facts. Chrysostom (Hom. in Joan. ii. § 2, tom. viii.) recognised a translation of the Bible into Ethiopic. Bruce and Cajetan averred that fragments of both the Old and New Testaments existed in the Ethiopic language before the time of Frumentius; Dillmann repudiates the opinion as a mere guess. According to this great authority, the historical books of the Old Testament reveal manifest study of the Greek text, but no deep knowledge of the Greek language. Many changes have occurred in the text to accommodate it to the changes in the Ethiopic language. The names of the books have been ignorantly Arabized. Thus, Πραξις comes to be Abrazis, and Apocalypsis, Abukalampsis. The earliest codices contain no division into chapters and verses. The canon contains the Apocryphal books, and also other pseudepigraphical works, and these are not discriminated from the canon. There are 81 books, 46 of the Old Testament and 35 of the New Testament. The Old Testament is divided into four parts.

- (1) The Law, including Joshua, Judges and Ruth: 8 books in all;
- (2) The Kings, including Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, 2 books each; Tobit, Judith, Esther, Job and Psalms, 13 in all;
- (3) Solomon: Prov. Eccl. Cant. Wisd. and Sirach; 5 books;
- (4) Prophets: Isaiah, Jeremiah with Lam., Ezekiel, the minor prophets (12) and 2 Macc.: 18 books;

Sometimes Henoah, and 4th Ezra are reckoned as in the canon of Old Testament.

The New Testament is divided into 4 parts, and often indicates some trace of the Peschito Syriac, and of the Vetus Itala.

(1) The Gospels; (2) Acts; (3) Paul; 14 Epistles, including the Pastoral Epistles and the Epistles to the Hebrews; (4) The General Epistles and Apocalypse.

In close association with the New Testament are the collection of canons, headed by a very peculiar form of the apostolic canons, which appears first of all to have been translated into Arabic and thence into Ethiopic. There are three copies of this great Codex, one is still in Abyssinia, two copies are in the Vatican library. Ludolf saw and examined one of these in the year 1649. The Codex enumerates 470 or 480 canons in all, which are thus enumerated: (1) The canons of the 12 Apostles, 127; (2) Canons of Hippolytus, 38; (3) Of the 318 bishops of Nicaea (?). (4) Of Ancyra, 25; (5) Of Neocaesarea, 15; (6) Of Gangra, 20, 21; (7) Of Caesarea, 124 (?). (8) Of St. Basil, 106; (9) Of St. Chrysostom, 17; (10) Of Constantius, 123; making a total of from 470 to 480.

The most important of these are the "canons of the 12 apostles." The ordinary Greek and Latin copies of the apostolic canons in the 8th Book of the Constitutions enumerate 85. Of these there are only 71, inaccurately and inharmoniously arranged in the Greek codex, and another collection of 56, which Ludolf printed from the Ethiopic texts; making in all 127. To these are appended in the great codex, the statutes or precepts, or the διατάξεις of the apostles. The list of the apostles by which they are introduced is very strange, e.g., John, Matthew, Peter, Philip, Simon the Canaanite, James Alphaeus, Nathanael, Thomas, Cephas, Andrew, Bartholomew, Judas the Brother of James, and James the Brother of the Lord. The 38 canons of Hippolytus (of Abulides) are given by Ludolf from a French translation of them by Wannsleb, and they differ from 38 canons called διδασκαλία of the apostles, and of which mention is made by the Ethiopic king Claudius in his Confession of Faith as of paramount authority. These canons, identical with the Coptic form of the apostolic canons, were edited (at least 21 of them) in Ethiopic, with an English translation by Thomas Pell Platt, London, 1834. It is admitted that this διδασκαλία is more ancient than the Nicene canon. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25), Irenaeus (in the Fragmenta Pfaffii), Athanasius (Epist. Fest. 39), Epiphanius (Haer. xlv. 5, lxx. 10) all refer to these canons. The pastoral epistles are the framework on which they are obviously raised, and very varied opinions have been entertained about their genuineness. Dr. de Pressensé has recently argued (Christian Life and Practice in the Early Church, p. 4 ff.) that the Coptic form of these canons (edited by Tattam), and with which these Ethiopic texts agree, indicates a more ancient Greek text than that which is current in the Greek form, and that the original Greek has been interpolated by the same or a very similar hand as that which interpolated the letters of Ignatius; and also that in every instance the interpolations are in the direction of sacerdotalism and the hierarchy. There is truth in this, but as in the case of the Ignatian letters, the shortest Syriac recension contains the germs of the full-~~grown~~ episcopal order which is so prominent in the Greek form. The Ethiopic form of the canons and of the διδασκαλία was free of all admixture of elements introduced into this multitudinous literature after the council of Chalcedon. Their authority in their Ethiopic dress led to the most thorough-going rejection by the Ethiopians of the 16th century of the supremacy of the Roman see.

The Liturgy of the Ethiopic Church (LITURGIES, Dict. Ant.) is too large a subject to be discussed here. There are many forms of Ethiopic liturgy referred to by Ludolf. One, he edits in full, under the title of Oratio Eucharistica Domini et Salvatoris nostri J. C. (Comm. iii. c. 4, xxxi.). It contains many noble sentiments. There is, however, an invocation of apostles, of the mother of God, of the patriarchs, martyrs, &c., in "the prayer of the deacon;" and in the prayer after the words of institution there is a petition that the bread and cup may become the body and blood of the Lord. There is no passage resembling this in the liturgy of St. Mark or St. James, or in the four liturgies edited in parallel columns by Dr. Neale.

The so-called Book of Henoch [ENOCH, BOOK OF], which was said to have been found in Abyssinia in the 17th century, was proved to be a forgery of the Abba Babaila Michaelia, and rejected by scholars. Two hundred years afterwards three copies of an Ethiopic translation of that remarkable work were actually found by the traveller Bruce, and entrusted by him to European scholarship. Archbishop Laurence, Moses Stuart, Ewald, Dillmann, have annotated, edited or translated it, and thus restored it to the students of early literature. The contents of this book do not concern us here. It is not Ethiopic in its origin, but one can judge a little by the prolongation and preservation of its life in Ethiopia, when all other traces of it had perished, what was the daily bread of the Ethiopian church during the silent years.

Some further idea may be gained of the primitive condition of this church, by enumerating some of the ideas, customs, and tendencies, which have survived the contest with Rome, and come under the observation of European travellers.

There has been no common name or term for "sacraments." The word "mystery" was applied to baptism and the eucharist; but the church knew nothing of episcopal confirmation or extreme unction. Transubstantiation was not consciously held. The Ethiopians maintained a vigorous traducian doctrine of the origin of human souls. They prayed for and invoked the dead, but they had no doctrine of purgatory. They have had many objects of worship, but have laid the greatest stress on the unity of the Trinity. Special homage has been paid to the Virgin Mary as the Queen of heaven. There are still thirty-two annual feasts in her honour. This is a natural consequence of the violent antagonism to Nestorianism which characterised their history. In their baptismal rites, agapes, fasts, feasts, and sabbaths there is still a visible reflection of the early Jewish influence upon their life. The isolation of the Ethiopian church has tended to the preservation of many ancient rites and ceremonies; and has unquestionably conserved the strong Jewish element which is more conspicuous in the remains of the Ethiopian church than in any other Christian community. The spect entertained for Cassian by Eucherius makes such a compilation on the part of the latter by no means improbable.

8. Historia Passionis S. Mauricii et Sociorum Martyrum Legionis Felicis Thebaeas Agaunen-um. There is no cogent internal evidence in favour of the ascription of this narrative to Eucherius, and hence it is reckoned by some as doubtful. But there does not seem to be sufficient ground for impugning the traditional belief concerning the authorship. For a discussion of its contents see MAURICIUS.

9. De Statu Animae. This is assigned to our author by Claudianus Mamertus, bishop of Vienne.

Other treatises and homilies are extant, which must, however, be decidedly abjudged from Eucherius; such are the following.

1. Commentarius in Genesis. 2. Commentarium in Libros Regum Libri IV. 3. Sanctorum Capitula Scripturarum. These works are all composed in a style very different from that of the bishop of Lyons. That on the books of Kings contains an eulogy (lib. iii. cap. 18) on the saint Cassiodorus, who was not born until some twenty years after the death of Eucherius. However St. Gregory the Great is cited, who was born about 540, nearly a century after the same saint. In the same category must be ranked 4. Epistola ad Faustianum. 5. Epistola ad Philonem. 6. Regula duplex ad Monachos. 7. Homiliarum Collectio, a set of sermons which is variously ascribed to Eusebius of Emesa, or to Gallianus.

Editions.—There is no complete edition of the writings of Eucherius. For this article recourse has been had to the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima (Lugdun.), A.D. 1677 (tom. vi. p. 822), for Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4: with which may be compared the Bibliotheca Patrum (Colon. A.D. 1618, tom. v. p. 1): the edition of Brassicanus (Basil. A.D. 1531); the Chronologia S. Insulae Lerinsensis by Vincentius Barralis (Lugdun., A.D. 1613) and the list of the works of Eucherius given by Schönemann in his Bibl. Patr. Lat. tom. ii. cap. v. § 36. The account of St. Maurice (No. 5 in the above) was edited in an inconsistent and indefensible shape by L. Surius, and in a not much better edition by Mombrinius. At length Father Chiffet, S. J., found a copy in a celebrated monastery of the Jura, and his copy has been adopted by Ruinart, who has given it, with copious notes, in his Acta Martyrum (2nd ed. Amsterdam, A.D. 1713).

Some confusion has arisen from the existence of a second Eucherius, who must have flourished a century later. [EUCHERIUS (4).] Some have maintained that Lyons was also the see of this Eucherius. But of this there is no trustworthy evidence. It has been made the subject of a dissertation by Jos. Antelmius Assertio pro unico Eucherio Lugdunensi episcopo (Paris, 1726).

[J. G. C.]

EUCHERIUS (3), ST., placed first in the series of the bishops of Viviers by Gams, and fourth by the authors of the Gallia Christiana, preceding St. Maspicianus, and followed by St. Faronus, but his position in the list is a matter of conjecture, and his date is unknown. Gams places the fifth bishop A.D. 432. (Gall. Christ. vol. 541; Gams, Series Episc. 656.) [S. A. B.]

GENEVE. 1802.—VOL. II.

EUCHERIUS (3), bishop of Tongres. (Gall. Christ. vii. 817.) [EUCHARIUS (5).] [R. T. S.]

EUCHERIUS (4), ninth bishop of Avignon, subscribing the fourth council of Arles, 524, the council of Carpentras, 527, and the second of Orange, 529 (Mansi, viii. 627, 708, 709, 718). The subscriptions being without names of sees, this Eucherius was supposed to have been bishop of Lyons, but in the Gallia Christiana (i. 798) evidence is produced that he was really bishop of Avignon. [S. A. B.]

EUCHERIUS (5), bishop of Antibes (a see afterwards removed to Grasse). [ETHERIUS (1).]

EUCHERIUS (6), reputed bishop of Terracina. A bishop Eucherius is found in the ancient lists of the church of Terracina (Ug. Ital. Sac. i. 1290; Contator, Hist. Terracina, 409), but without date. A letter, probably spurious, of pope Liberius to Vigilus, dated 536, is signed by a bishop unnamed but described as "Terracinensis" (Mansi, Concil. ix. 7 a; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 935), and it has been conjectured that the bishop of this letter was the undated Eucherius.

EUCHERIUS (7), ST., the 32nd bishop of Orleans. The authority for his life is an account by an anonymous, but apparently contemporary, author, to be found in Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 217 (cf. Hist. Lit. de la France, iv. 78). He was born at Orleans, of noble parents, towards the close of the 7th century, and was baptized by Ansbertus, bishop of Autun. In his studies, which he began at seven years of age, he surpassed all his comrades. Declining the temptations of a civil career, he entered the monastery of Jumièges (Gemmeticum) in Neustria, and there followed the ordinary routine of a monk's life until, upon the death of his uncle Soavaricus, bishop of Orleans, the people petitioned Charles Martel to appoint him to the see (A.D. 717). Their request was granted, but force was almost necessary to separate the reluctant bishop-elect from the weeping brethren. In his diocese he was remarkable for his activity and self-devotion, while his personal qualities were such as to win unbounded popularity. He was, says his biographer, "mente tranquillus, vultu serenus, aspectu amabilis, corpore decorus et corde strenuus." But his episcopal career was destined to an abrupt close. Envy, we are told, raised him up enemies who poisoned the ear of Charles Martel. Charles, on his return from victory over the Saracens at Tours, ordered the bishop to follow him to Paris, and thence sent him into exile to Cologne in the sixteenth year of his episcopate (A.D. 732). Though his biographer is not explicit, there is little doubt that the real cause of difference was the resistance of the bishop to the appropriation by the mayor of the palace of church revenues and lands to meet the cost of the wars with the Saracens.

At Cologne his popularity soon appeared too great, and he was exiled to Hasbain, in the neighbourhood of Liège. Here or at Sarchinium (Sarcing), near by, he died in the sixth year of his expatriation (A.D. 738 or, according to other accounts, 742 or 743), and was buried in the church of St. Trudo. His remains, together with those of St. Trudo, were about 150 years later elevated to a position of honour by Franco, bishop of Liège. He is commemorated Feb. 30. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1417; Baron. A. E. an. 741 xvi.; Ugh. Cambiac. Chron., in Bouquet, iii. 344.) [S. A. B.]

EUCHERIUS (8) (LEONARIUS), twenty-eighth in the very untrustworthy lists of the bishops of Geneva, succeeding Hupertus, and followed by Gubertus, in the last half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 304; Gema. Serie Episc. 277.) [S. A. B.]

EUCHERIUS (9), FLAVIUS, consul, with Flavius Evagrius, when Gregory Nazianzen made his will. (Greg. Naz. Test.) [E. V.]

EUCHERIUS (10), eldest son of Stilicho by Serena. His birth, which took place at Rome in 380, is celebrated by Claudian (de Laud. Stil. iii. 176 foll.). Orosius (Hist. vii. 37, 38) and Philostorgius (Hist. xii. 3) accuse Stilicho of having designs upon the empire for his son (cf. Soc. H. E. ix. 4, § 1). Zosimus (v. 33) represents the charge as a calumny of Olympius. Eucherius, who, according to Orosius (vii. 38), was from his early years an enemy of the Christian faith and bent on persecuting it, in order to please the barbarians restored the heathen temples and destroyed Christian churches. When his father was seized at Ravenna (A.D. 409), Eucherius fled to Rome, and took refuge in a temple. Orders arrived from Honorius to put him to death, and they were executed by the eunuchs Arvadus and Terentius, just before the arrival of Alaric (Philost. xii. 3; Zosim. v. 34). [M. F. A.]

EUCHERIUS (11), addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris (Epp. iii. 8), who describes him as exercising the virtues of the old Roman statesman with slight reward from the degenerate times. He was probably the senator whose death by the treachery of duke Victorinus, the officer of Euric the Visigoth, is related by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. ii. 30). [R. T. S.]

EUCHINUS is mentioned by Beane (Scot. Hist. c. viii. fol. 151 a, ed. 1575), but is omitted in Bailleden's version (vol. ii., p. 58, ed. 1821). Dempster regards him as the author of Comunes Pias, lib. i., Statuta Ecclesiastica, lib. i., and gives Beane for his authority in entering Euchinus in his Calendar at August 28, "In Scotia Euchini episcopi cognomento Dei timoratus." Lasley associates him with SS. Colman, Priocan, Medan, and Medan, bishops and confessors in Scotland in the time of King Conran (A.D. 501-535). (Bp. Forbes, Kel. Scott. Saints, 209, 335; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 252; Leslie, de Rel. Gent. Scot. 137; Bolland. Acta SS. August 28, tom. vi. 161 c; Turner, Bibl. 271.) [J. G.]

his work on heretics, translates the name (εὐχίτης), but in the next generation the Manichæans had obtained a technical name in Greek also, and were known as Euchites (εὐχίται or εὐχίται). Their chief characteristic was that they professed to give themselves entirely to prayer, refusing to do any work, and living by begging; in this differing from the Christian monks of the time, who supported themselves by the labour of their hands. A further difference was that they were of both sexes, who went about together; nay, in summer weather lying down and sleeping in the streets, men and women promiscuously, as persons who had renounced the world, and had no possession or habitation of their own. Epiphanius is willing to believe that much impurity resulted from this practice, but does not pretend to have any knowledge of this as a fact. Epiphanius dates the commencement of this sect from the reign of Constantine, who died A.D. 361. Theodoret, who speaks of it (H. E. iv. 11; Har. Fab. iv. 10; Kel. Hist. iii., Vit. Marcion. vol. iii. 1146), places its beginning a few years later under Valentinian. There does not seem to be any real foundation for the charge that the Euchites were derived from the Manichæans. Epiphanius connects them with the heathen devotees whom he calls Euphemites, and who it seems had also been known as Manichæans; and it is very credible that before the Christian Euchites, known had gone about in these regions, unconnected with Christianity, who under pretence of devotion lived an idle life. The Euchites appear never to have made any entrance into the West, but in the East, though probably at no time very numerous, they are heard of for centuries; and when the Bogomiles of the 12th century appeared, the name Manichæan still survived, and the new heretics were supposed, and perhaps with truth, to be descendants of the ancient sect.

In the time of Epiphanius the Manichæans would seem to be scarcely entitled to be called a sect. He describes them as having no settled system and no recognized leader; and he imputes to them no error of doctrine, but only criticizes their manner of life. He tells, for instance, that they had no regard for the church times of fasting, and no fixed times for eating but, when after their prayers they were hungry, they ate and drank such food as they could get no matter what the hour or season might be. Epiphanius states also that one of these people would claim to be any person you might name to him: name our Blessed Lord Himself, or an angel, prophet, or patriarch, and he would say that that was himself.

Two accounts of Euchite doctrine are apparently of greater antiquity than the author who preserves them. One is given by Timothy (de Receptione Har. in Coteler's Mon. Eccl. G have used a Messalian book called Asoticon, the doctrines of which, Photius tells us, had been exposed and anathematized at the council of Ephesus in 431. But in any case, it is likely that the same book furnished the "heads of the impious doctrine of the Messalians taken from their own book," which are given by Joannes Damascenus (de Haer. ap. Cotelier, Mon. Ecc. Gr. i. 302, and Opp. La Quien, i. 95), but which would seem also (see Wolf, Hist. Bogomil. p. 11) to have been separately preserved in two MSS. at Leipsic (Acta Eruditorum, 1696, p. 299; 1699, p. 157; and in the Bodleian, Cod. Barocc. 185). From these sources we derive either the theory in which the Euchite practices originated, or else one which was soon devised to justify them.

They held then that in consequence of Adam's sin every one had from his birth a demon, substantially united to his soul, which incited him to sin. For the expulsion of this demon baptism was ineffectual. Dealing only with past sin it did but shear off the surface growth, and did not touch the root of the evil. The true remedy was intense, concentrated prayer, continued till it produced a state from which all affections and volitions were banished (ἀπάθεια). In this the soul felt as sensible a consciousness of union with its heavenly bridegroom as an earthly bride in the embraces of her husband. Then the demon went out in the spittle or in the mucus of the nose, or was seen to depart in smoke or in the form of a serpent, and there was in like manner sensible evidence of the entrance of the Holy Spirit. St. Augustine (Haer. 57), who here had some source of information independent of Epiphanius, whom in this part of his work he has been abridging, ascribes to them a fancy that the Holy Spirit might be seen to enter in the appearance of innocuous fire, and the demon to pass out of the man's mouth in the form of a sow with her farrow. Possibly language intended by them metaphorically was misunderstood; for they described the soul of him who had not Christ in him as the abode of serpents and venomous beasts. They further thought that he who had arrived at the passionless state could see the Holy Trinity with his bodily eyes; that the three hypostases of the Trinity coalesced into one, which united itself with worthy souls. This doctrine no doubt furnishes the key to the account given by Epiphanius of the effacement of the sense of distinct personality in members of this sect. They held that in the passionless state at which they aimed a man might attain a perfection in which sin was impossible to him; he needed neither instruction for his soul nor fasting to discipline his body, for delicate food and luxurious living, which might be a temptation to others, could stir no evil desire in him. It is probably a misconception of their doctrine to suppose that they held his privileges extended to being guilty of licentious conduct without falling from his perfection. The soul of him who was "spiritual," for such they boasted themselves to be, was changed into the divine nature; he could see things invisible to ordinary men; and so some of them used to dance by way of trampling on the demons which they saw, a practice from which they were called Choreutae. It is not wonderful to read that, absorbed in their mystic contemplation, they used to sleep great part of their time away; but the things they saw in their dreams, they took for realities, and boasted that they then acquired a knowledge of future events, that they could see the condition of departed souls, and that they could read men's hearts. Both sexes might partake of this divine illumination, and they had female teachers, whom they honoured not only more than ordinary laymen, but more than the clergy. The use of the Lord's Supper they looked on as a thing indifferent; it could neither benefit the worthy nor harm the unworthy receiver; but there was no reason for separating from the church by refusing to partake of it. Indeed, so little did they wish to break with the church that they were said to have no scruple about denying and anathematizing their doctrines, a charge which seems to have been founded on the behaviour of the first convicted heretics of this sect, concerning which we shall speak presently. It has been already said that they refused manual labour, and lived by begging; and they disparaged all the ordinary forms of Christian charity in comparison of the merit of bestowing alms on one of their members. They had speculations about our Lord's humanity, of which the most intelligible is that the body which He assumed had been full of demons, which it was necessary for Him to expel.

History.—The first whom we read of as a leader of the sect is Adelphius, and Adelphians was one of the many names by which they were known. He was neither priest nor monk, but an ordinary layman, and was of Mesopotamia. Epiphanius speaks of the Messalians of his time as not having any recognised leader, but he mentions that they came from Mesopotamia. Theodoret tells that Flavian bishop of Antioch, having learned that Messalian doctrines were being propagated at Edessa (probably from the statement of Messalians in his own diocese that they had there been taught), sent a body of monks to bring the false teachers to Antioch. There they denied their doctrines, and charged their accusers with calumny. Flavian then used an artifice afterwards repeated by Alexius Comnenus in the case of the Bogomiles. He affected to take the part of the accused, treated Adelphius, who was an old man, with great respect, and led him to believe that he would find in an aged bishop one able to understand and sympathize with views, which younger men rejected only from want of experience. Adelphius, having been thus enticed into a full disclosure of his sentiments, was rebuked in the words addressed by Daniel to the wicked elder (Susanna, 52) and punished as convicted out of his own mouth. He and his party were beaten, excommunicated and banished, and were not allowed, as they wished, the alternative of recantation, inasmuch as no confidence was felt in their sincerity, especially because they were found communicating by writing in friendly terms with Messalians whom they had anathematized. We consider that it was on this occasion Flavian held a synod against the Messalians (Photius, 52) attended by three other bishops (Bizus of Seleucia, a Mesopotamian bishop, MARUTHAS, described by Photius as bishop of the Supharenians, and Samus), and by about thirty priests and deacons. Besides Adelphius there were condemned on this occasion two persons named Sabas, one of them a monk and a eunuch, Eustathius of Edessa, Dadoes, Hermas, Symeon, and others. Flavian wrote to the bishops of Edessa and its neighbourhood, acquainting them with what had been done, and received from them an approving reply. The Messalians who had been banished from Syria went to Pamphylia, and there met new antagonists. They were again condemned in a council of twenty-five bishops held at Side and presided over by the celebrated AMPHILOCHIUS of Iconium. The council sent a synodical letter to Flavian, informing him of their proceedings, and in the Acts Amphilochius gave a full statement of the Messalian tenets expressed in their own words. It is possible that the substance of this statement is preserved for us in the work of Timothy already referred to. Photius represents the synod at Antioch just mentioned as having been called in consequence of the synodical letter from Side, but this is more than doubtful. On comparing Photius with Theodoret, it seems plain that both are speaking of the same thing, and Theodoret mentions only one set of proceedings at Antioch, viz., that which ended in the banishment of the Euchites to Pamphylia. It is unlikely that after their expulsion they would or could have returned to Antioch to receive a new condemnation; and the synodical acts at Antioch contain no letter to Amphilochius, no approval of anything done at Side, but only a letter to Edessa, as might be expected if the occasion of the council was that which we have assigned to it. We regard, therefore, Photius as misled by finding in the volume which he used the acts of the synod at Side coming before those of that at Antioch; and it is remarkable that Theodoret also, in his Ecc. Hist., mentions the proceedings in Pamphylia before mentioning those which resulted in the banishment of the Messalians to Pamphylia. We cannot pretend to fix the year of these proceedings, but a date somewhere about 390 will not be very far wrong.

Measures were taken against the Messalians in Armenia also. Letorius bishop of Melitene by letter asked and obtained information from Flavian as to the proceedings against them in Antioch. Finding some monasteries in his diocese infected by this heresy, he set fire to these dens of robbers, and hunted the wolves from his sheepfold. A less zealous Armenian bishop was rebuked by Flavian for favour shewn to these heretics. In Pamphylia the contest with them lasted for several years. The leaders on the orthodox side were another Amphilochius, bishop of Side, and Verinianus bishop of Perga. They were stimulated to their task by energetic letters from Atticus bishop of Constantinople, and later, in A.D. 426, from the synod held for the consecration of Sisinnius, the successor of Atticus, in which Theodotus of Antioch and another bishop named Neon are mentioned by Photius as having taken active parts. Messalianism had probably at that time given some trouble in Constantinople itself. Nilus (de Vol. Paup. ad Magnam, 21) couples with the name of Adelphius of Mesopotamia, Alexander, who polluted Constantinople with like teaching, and against whom he contends that the idleness they inculcated, instead of being an aid to devotion, gave scope to evil thoughts and evil passions, and was inimical to the true spirit of prayer. Tillemont has conjectured that this was the Alexander who about this time founded the order of the ACOEMETAE (see Dict. Christ. Ant.), but the identification is far from certain. There is no corroborative evidence that the latter was a heretic save that his name has not been honoured with the prefix of saint; and it is not likely that his institution would have met with the success it did, if it could be represented as a scheme devised by a notorious Messalian to carry out the notions of his sect as to the duty of incessant prayer.

During the interval between the accession of Sisinnius and the council of Ephesus in 431, John of Antioch wrote to Nestorius about the Messalians, and Theodosius legislated against them (xvi. Cod. Theod. de Haer., vol. vi. p. 187). At Ephesus Valerian of Iconium, and Amphilochius of Side, in the name of the bishops of Lycaonia and Pamphylia, obtained from the council a confirmation of the decrees made against the Euchites at Constantinople in 426. They also procured the anathematization of the Messalian book called Asceticus, passages from which Valerian laid before the synod. (Mansi, iv. 1477.) Fabricius names Agapius, and Walch Adelphius as the author of this book, but the writer is really unknown. These proceedings at Ephesus were unknown to Gregory the Great (Ep. vi. 14, ad Narsem, vol. vii. p. 361), but are mentioned by Photius, and the decree was read at the second council of Nicaea. (Mansi, xii. 1025.) The cause of Gregory's oversight may have been that his correspondent cited to him as Ephesine the acts of the council of Antioch, and that Gregory searched the Ephesine acts in vain for the names of Adelphius and Sabas. We learn from the Ephesine decree that Messalianism had also been condemned at Alexandria, and Timothy mentions Cyril as an antagonist of these heretics. There is a passage (Ep. ad Calosyrium, prefixed to the tract Adv. Anthropomorph. vii. 363) in which Cyril rebukes certain monks who refused to work, and made piety a cloak for laziness, but there is no evidence that these monks were Euchites. The articles of the Asceticus were the subject of twenty-four anathematizations by ARCHELAUS (who occupied the see of Caesarea in Cappadocia some time between the two Ephesine synods of 431 and 449, there being at the latter date a different bishop in that see) and of two letters by HERACLEIDAS of Nyssa, who also may be placed about 440. The next Euchite leader of whom we read is LAMPETIUS. He was so prominent that his followers were called after him Lampetians, and he is said to have been the first of the sect who attained the dignity of the priesthood. He had been ordained by Alypius, whom we know, from a correspondence with the emperor Leo, to have been bishop of Caesarea (Cappadocia) in 458. He was accused to Alypius by the presbyter Gerontius, superior of the monks at Glitis, on the charge of undue familiarity with women, of unseemly language on the subject, of scoffing at those who took part in the musical services of the church as being still under the law, when they ought to make melody only in their hearts, and of other Euchite doctrines and practices. The examination of the charge was delegated by Alypius to Hormisdas bishop of Comana, and the result was that Lampetius was condemned and degraded from the priesthood. He wrote a work called the Testament, to which an answer was written by the Monophysite Severus, who afterwards became bishop of Antioch. A fragment of this answer is preserved in a catena belonging to New College, Oxford. (Wolf, Anecdota Græca, iii. 182.) It insists on the duty of praising God, not with the heart only, but with the voice also. The same catena contains an extract from another work of Severus against the Euchites, an epistle to a bishop Solon. This extract accounts for the cessation of miracles in the Christian church. Photius tells that in Rhinocorura two persons named Alpheus, one of them a bishop, defended the orthodoxy of this Lampetius, and were in consequence deposed. He learned this from a letter written by Ptolemy, another bishop of the same district, to Timotheus of Alexandria. There have been at Alexandria several bishops of that name, but it is likely that the Timotheus intended is he who was contemporary with Lampetius, and who sat from 460 to 482.

The next Messalian leader of whom we read (in Timotheus) is a money-changer named MARCIAN, who lived in the middle of the 6th century, and from whom these sectaries came to be called by the somewhat confusing name of Marcianists. The correspondence of Gregory the Great, already referred to, arose out of the condemnation under this name, unknown in the West, in 595, of one John, a presbyter of Chalcedon. He appealed to the pope, who pronounced him orthodox, complaining that he had not even been able to make out from his accusers what the heresy of Marcianism was.

In the 7th century Maximus, in his scholia on the Pseudo Dionysius (II. 88), charges those whom he describes by the various equivalent names of Lampetians, Messalians, Adelphians, and Marcianists, with giving but three years to ascetic life, and abandoning the rest of their life to all manner of debauchery. Assemani (Bibl. Or. vol. iii. pt. 2, p. 172), in his account of the schisms of the Syrian Nestorians, gives from Oriental sources several notices, reaching from the year 577 to 694, of the attempts of the Nestorians to put down Messalianism, in which mention is made of the aversion of these heretics to the use of the Lord's Supper, to fasting, and to church psalmody. The article in Photius on anti-Messalian literature, already cited, implies that the sect was, in his time, not yet extinct.

We hear no more of the Messalians till the breaking out of the Bogomile heresy in the 12th century. The history of that controversy lies out of the period embraced by this dictionary. What was asserted by the writers of the period concerning the early history of the sect may be conveniently consulted in Tollius (Insignia Rit. Ital.), where is found the work on the Messalians of Euthymius Zigabenus, with extracts relating to these heretics from Constantine Harmenopolus, and Michael Psellus. Euthymius, for instance, ascribes the origin of the sect to a certain Peter, or Wolf-Peter, so called because the spectators, assembled to witness the fulfilment of his promise that after three days he would rise again, saw only the demon in the form of a wolf escaping from the cairn under which he lay; and he speaks of a certain Tychicus, his disciple, who corrupted and misinterpreted the Scriptures, especially the Gospel according to St. Matthew. Harmenopolus complains of their abominating the cross, holding the Virgin and John the Baptist in no honour, breaking marriages, and allowing those who would, to mutilate themselves, and he ascribes certain immoral teaching to one Eleutherus, a Paphlagonian. Psellus circumstantially tells of these heretics the old stories of "Oedipodean intercourse and Thyestean banquets." All these things, for which no early authority can be cited, may safely be set aside. A later revival of Messalian ideas took place in the mystics of Mount Athos of the 14th century.

To the various names already mentioned by which the Euchites were known may be added that of "Enthusiasts," given by Theodoret, which is used in some of the decrees against them; and "Eustathians," given by Timotheus. There was a Messalian Eustathius of Edessa, but this name was probably derived from the better known Eustathius of Sebaste. The name Psalliani only originated in a transcriber's error. We have referred in the course of this article to the principal ancient writers who speak of the Messalians. We have only to add references to Ephrem Syrus (Opp. Syr.-Lat. ii. 485). A passage quoted from his Testament is proved by the Syriac to have been an interpolation in the Greek text (Opp. Gr.-Lat. ii. 242, 403; Assemani, Bibl. Or. i. 145). There is a notice also in Jerome (Prolog. Dial. cont. Pelag. ii. 679, Vallars.). Of modern writers, those who may most usefully be consulted are Tillemont, viii. 530; Walch, Hist. der Ketz. iii. 418; and Neander, Ch. Hist. iii. 323. [G. S.]

EUCHOLIUS (EUCOLUS, ASCHOLIUS, ACHOLIUS), a man at Constantinople suborned to assassinate the Patriarch Macedonius. The attempt failed, and Macedonius shewed a questionable kindness by ordering gifts to be presented to him. (Theodor. Lect. Eccl. Hist. ii. 22. Patrol. Græc. lxxxvi. part i. 576; Theoph. Chronicon. 198.)

EUCHROCIA (EUCROCIA), wife of the orator and poet Delphidius, described as a noble matron of Bordeaux. After the rescript of Gratian, 381, against the Priscillianists, when Priscillian, accompanied by Instantius and Salvianus, undertook a journey through Gaul to Italy to clear themselves and their party before pope Damasus of the charges against them, after being repelled by the bishop of Bordeaux, Delphinus, they found a refuge on the lands of Euchrocia. There they successfully sowed the seeds of their heresy. They went on thence to Milan and Rome, accompanied by Euchrocia and her daughter Procula. A crowd of others, women especially, accompanied them. Injurious calumnies were vigorously circulated against mother and daughter by their religious opponents. Euchrocia was beheaded at Treves, 386, with Priscillian and his chief associates (Sulp. Sev. ii. 48, 51; L. Pac. Drep. in Panegyrici Veteres, xii. 29; Prosperi Chronicon, s. a.; Ausonius, de Profess. Burdegali. Carm. vi.). [M. B. C.]

EUCOLUS. [EUCHOLIUS.]

EUCRATIUS bishop, who consults Cyprian as to the Christian lawfulness of the calling of a stage-tutor (Cyp. Ep. 2); probably the same as Eucratius bishop of Thessae, a seaport in the Bysacene province (Scott. Epp. 39 in Concil. Carth. sub Cyp. de Bapt. 3. Cf. August. de Bapt. vi. 36). [E. W. B.]

EUDÆMON (1), bishop of Smyrna, who was prevailed upon to offer sacrifice during the persecution of Decius, A.D. 250. He was standing by when Pionius the martyr refused to sacrifice. (Euseb. iv. 15; Act. Sanct. Feb. 1, 40). [T. W. D.]

EUDÆMON (2) (Εὐδαίμων, EUTHEMON), a Meletian bishop, who with others was sent by his party to the emperor Constantine, with frivolous charges against Athanasius, A.D. 328 (Socrates, H. E. i. 27; Athanasius, Apol. § 60; Baronius, a. a. 329, 1; Pagi, Crit. in loc. and a. a. 327, v). He was bishop of Tania in the province of Augustamnica Prima (Le Quien, Orines Christ. ii. 535), and was one of those who withdrew from the council of Sardica, A.D. 347, and met at Philippopolis. He also signed the synodal letter of that assembly (Mansi, iii. 139). In the Acts his name appears as Euthemon. [T. W. D.]

EUDÆMON (3), A.D. 389, presbyter at Constantinople, who prevailed on Nectarius the metropolitan to abolish the office of Penitentiary Presbyter, an example followed almost throughout the Eastern church. The office had lasted rather more than 130 years, when about 389 a noble lady who had confessed to the penitentiary and received disciplinary advice came back shortly to confess that she had since committed adultery with a deacon. Great popular excitement arose, and Eudæmon represented to Nectarius that the only way to save the church from obloquy was to abolish the office altogether and leave participation in communion to be decided by the individual conscience. Socrates the historian received this account from Eudæmon himself. Socrates appears to have been conservative in the matter, for he said to Eudæmon, "Whether, O presbyter, your counsel has been profitable to the church or otherwise, God knows; but I see that it takes away the means of rebuking one another's faults, and prevents our acting upon that precept of the apostle, Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." (Socr. Eccl. Hist. v. 19; Sozom. Eccl. Hist. vii. 16; Bingham, xvi. 3, vol. vii. p. 138.) [W. M. S.]

EUDÆMON (4) (Εὐδαίμων), bishop of EUDEM, clerical witness to the grant of the village of Bertus by King Ithael to the see of Llandaff in the time of bishop Berthgwyn, in the end of the 5th or early in the 6th century (Lth. Land. by Rom. 440-41). [J. G.]

EUDEMUS I., bishop of Patara in Lycia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Orines Christ. i. 977; Mansi, ii. 695.) [L. D.]

EUDEMUS II., bishop of Patara, one of the Lycian bishops who in A.D. 375 were reported to Basil as holding orthodox views and as desiring to enter communion with him. (Basil, Epist. 218 [403].) Eudemus of Patara was present at the council of Constantinople in A.D. 381. [E. V.]

EUDO, duke of Aquitaine at the beginning of the 8th century. Aquitaine, which in 530 had been brought directly under Frankish rule by Dagobert, had in the confusion of the ensuing century become practically, though not technically, independent. The date of Eudo's accession and his origin are unknown. The supposition that he was a Merovingian, and a grandson of Charibert, on whose death in 530 Dagobert had annexed Aquitaine, has been disproved by Rabanis (Les Mérovingiens d'Aquitaine et la Charte d'Alain, 1856, quoted by Richter and Breysig), who has shown that the document on which the theory rests is spurious.

In 719, Chilperic II. and his mayor Ragenfred made an alliance with Eudo against Charles Martel, and one of the conditions of the alliance was the recognition of the independence of Aquitaine ("Regnum et munera tradunt," Fred. Cont. 107, ap. Breysig, Jahrbücher des Fränkischen Reichs, 714-741; Die Zeit Karl Martells, also De Continuato Fredog. Schol. Chronico, by the same author, p. 30). The intended combined attack on Charles was unsuccessful [CHARLES MARTEL], Eudo apparently retiring without fighting ("Eudo territus quod resistere non valeret aufugit," Cont. Fred. 107; cp. Breysig, Karl Mart. p. 31, note 10). Chilperic, after his defeat at Soissons, took refuge with Eudo beyond the Loire (Gesta Fr. 53). The next year, 720, Clotaire IV. having died, an arrangement was concluded between Charles and Eudo, by which Chilperic returned to Paris and was recognised by Charles as king of the Franks. What the position of Aquitaine was under this compact is obscure. Fauriel looks upon the

Meanwhile, however, Othman had risen against Abderahman, and had been defeated and slain. In the following year, 72, Abderahman made the grand Saracenic invasion, not in alliance with Eudo. On the contrary, Eudo met the invaders on the Garonne, was defeated and fled to Charles (Chron. Moissac s. c.) Eudo fought with Charles at the battle of Tours (Paul. Diacon. Hist. Long. vi. 45), when Abderahman was shortly after defeated and slain. All the Frankish chronicles, except the Chron. Moissac, make Eudo the ally of Abderahman (knowing nothing of Othman), and all mention of Eudo's resistance to the enemy, or his fighting at Tours on the Frankish side (Boysig, p. 65, note 5). Eudo was ruined in Aquitaine, but compelled to own homage to Charles (Ann. Mett. 732, Boysig, 4). In 735 Eudo died, and Charles immediately invaded Aquitaine, and brought it into his subjection. Eventually he allowed Eudo's son Odo or Hensold to be duke, on condition of recognizing the superiority of the Frankish king. (Cont. Fred. 109 and Ann. 84, s. c. 742.) [T. R. B.]

EUDOCETUS (Εὐδοκέτιος). For the account of the Valentinians why this was given to the Saviour see Iraneus (I. ii. 4 p. 16). [G. B.]

EUDOCIA, a lady to whom, along with Eusebia, Erychia and Domitiana, pope Gregory I sent such greetings through Narces Patriarch, s. c. 599. (Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. i. ind. c. 4 p. 6. Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 450.) In another letter of 597 to Narces, here called "religious" (Id. vi. ind. xv. ep. 30), he salutes her again with the same, "gloriosas filias meas," Erychia being the dead (Patr. Lat. 806). [C. H.]

EUDOCIA (1), martyr, Mar. 1, born at Samos during the reign of Trajan. In her early days she lived an immoral life, but upon hearing of a woman on repentance from a monk named Gerasius she resolved to live differently, went to Rhodes the bishop, and was baptized by him. Her former admirers giving information against her, she was arrested and brought before the emperor Aurelian (? Aurelius), and as she refused to relinquish her faith she was tortured and put to death. (Men. Bas.) [T. R. B.]

EUDOCIA (2), Aug. 4; called in Rom. Mart. 1. She was seized at Bethsaida (Bembda) with 3000 others in a raid which Sapor II. made into the Roman territory in 360. She was tortured and put to death. (Assom. Mart.

[M. F. A.]

EUDOCIA (3), ARLIA, empress, wife of Theodosius II. Marcellinus in his chronicle calls her Achiva, and places her marriage in 421. Nicophorus, however, places her birth in 383, and her marriage in 413. Two accounts are given of her parentage. Socrates (H. E. vii. 21) says that she was the daughter of Leontina, a sophist of Athens, and that her original name was Athenais. The Chronicon Paschale gives a different account. According to that her father's name was Heracitus, on whose death her brothers Gaius and Valerian refused to let her have share of the inheritance. She came to Constantinople to claim justice of Pulcheria, who was so pleased with her that she persuaded Theodosius to make her his wife. (Chron. Pasch. sub ann. 420.) Socrates tells us that she had been highly educated by her father, and this is attested by her poetical works. Before her marriage she was baptized by Atticus bishop of Constantinople (Soc.) and received the name of Eudoxia. She commemorated the victory of the Romans over the Persians in a poem (Soc.). Besides this she rendered into Greek hexameters the Pentateuch, and the books of Joshua and Judges; she also made a version of the prophet Zechariah and of the book of Daniel, and wrote a poem in three books on St. Cyprian and St. Justin. Of the style and finish of all these works Photius speaks in the highest terms of praise, saying that she conformed to the strictest rules of ancient usage. (Phot. codd. 183, 184.)

Zonaras mentions another work of hers, the compilation and arrangement of the Constitutiones Honorii of Patricius, together with an introduction in heroic verse. (Zonaras, Ann. lib. xiii. p. 45, in Pat. Gr. cxxxiv. 1194 b.) The Chronicon Paschale (sub ann. 421) tells us that her brothers, who had treated her so ill, fled to Greece when they heard of her elevation, but that she sent for them, with the consent of her husband, and appointed them to high offices, saying that she was really indebted to them for her good fortune. She had a daughter Eudoxia [EUDOXIA (3)] by Theodosius (Chr. Pasch.), who married Valentinian III. Marcellinus notices the death of Flaccilla, daughter of Theodosius, in 431. No other child is mentioned by the historians. Shortly after the marriage of Eudoxia (437), Theodosius despatched his wife on a mission to Jerusalem, in order to offer thanks for all the blessings of his reign, and especially for his daughter's alliance. She made many presents, not only to the church of Jerusalem, but to others which she passed on her way (Soc. vii. 47). Evagrius (H. E. i. 20, 22) mentions especially a visit to Antioch, where she made a speech, which was commemorated by a brazen statue. There is some confusion in the chronology of this period, for Evagrius speaks as though she paid only one visit to Jerusalem, where she died; whereas Marcellinus (sub ann. 436) says that she returned with the relics of St. Stephen. It is therefore best to suppose that there were two visits, though we cannot distinguish the events of cash. Evagrius (H. E. i. 20, 29) tells us that she restored the walls of the city and many churches, including that of St. Stephen.

Hitherto her life had been happy, but her last years were overclouded by a misunderstanding between herself and her husband, the precise cause for which it is not easy to discover. Secrates is silent. Marcellinus tells us (sub anno 444) that during a second visit of the empress to Jerusalem (cf. Evang. l. 20, ἐν ἱεροσολύμοις ἐν ἀπαρεῖρμα), Theodosius sent Saturninus with orders to put to death Severus the presbyter and John the deacon, who were in attendance on Eudocia, and that she, in her indignation at this act, had Saturninus also put to death. Marcellinus assigns no cause for this. The Chron. Pasch., Nicophorus, Zonaras, &c., give a different story. They say that the emperor having been presented by a peasant with a remarkably large apple, sent it to the empress. She gave it to Paulinus, the master of the palace, who was laid up with an attack of gout. Paulinus, not knowing his previous history, gave it to the emperor. This roused his suspicions, and he sent for his wife, and asked her what she had done with the apple. She protested that she had eaten it; and the consequence was that Paulinus was put to death and the empress divorced. Since this account is not given by the ancient historians, it seems fair to assume that it has been exaggerated, and we may excuse the empress, of whom all the old authorities speak so highly, from blame. Still, there was apparently some misunderstanding between her and the emperor, which led to her second visit to Jerusalem. There it was that she died. She was buried in the church of St. Stephen at Jerusalem. (Evang. H. E. i. 22.) Evagrius says that there is a doubt whether this was before or after the death of Theodosius, i.e. 450, but Nicophorus (H. E. xiv. 50) places her death in 460, the fourth year of the emperor Leo, which date is accepted by Gibbon. Nicophorus further tells us that she fell for a time into the Eutychian heresy, but finally returned to the orthodox faith, on the entreaty of Pulcheria, and after consultation with Euthymius (H. E. xv. 13). This temporary lapse does not alter the general judgment of the historians, who unite in lauding her piety and manifold benefactions to the church. (See also Du Cange, Ann. August. 52, 58.) [M. F. A.]

Her daughter

was born July

7, 611, her son Heraclius Junior on May 2, 619. She herself died of epilepsy on Aug. 12, or as others say, Aug. 14, 612, and was buried in the Church of the Apostles. (Chron. Pasch. ann. 610, 611, 612, 624, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xii. 961, 963, 1003; Theoph. Chronog. A.M. 6102, 6104, in Migne, cviii. 628, 629; Du Cange, Ann. August. Byzant. 100, ed. Venice.) [T. W. D.]

EUDOCIA (8), empress, third wife of Constantine Copronymus. She is said (Du Cange, v. inf.) to have been related to the Malasian family. The date of her marriage with the emperor is not mentioned; but her predecessor Maria died in 750 and Eudocia's third son by Constantine was born in 764. At her coronation on Saturday, Apr. 1, 768, the emperor declared her Augusta, and on Apr. 2, which was Easter Day, her two elder sons Christophorus and Nicophorus were by the emperor declared Cæsars, and Nicetas her youngest son Nebesimus. All three were invested with the robes and coronets of their respective ranks, and the patriarch said the prayers. On each day the ceremony was performed in the splendid Christmas banqueting hall of the palace known as the Tribunalium or Tribunal of the Nineteen Couches, i.e. triclinia (cf. Du Cange, Gloss. s.v. accubitor; id. Constantinopolis Christiana, lib. ii. sec. 5, p. 107, ed. Venice, 1729; p. 185, ed. Paris). Subsequently to her coronation Eudocia gave birth to a fourth son, Eudoxius or Eudocimus. (Theoph. Chronog. A.M. 6260, 6268, in Patr. Gr. cviii. 993, 998; Du Cange, Ann. August. Byzant. p. 103, ed. Venice.) [C. H.]

EUDOCIMUS (Theoph. Chronogr. 395, Patr. Gr. cviii. 940 a; Zonaras, Annal. xv. 12, ibid. cxxxiv. 1350 a), son of Constantine Copronymus. [EUDOKIUS (14).] [T. W. D.]

EUDOCIUS, a youthful member of a monastic community at Caesarea, who, having quarrelled with the superior, Sacerdos, laid complaints against him before Helladius, Basil's successor in the episcopate, which led to Sacerdos being deprived of his office. Gregory Nazianzen wrote three letters to Eudocius on this subject, rebuking him for his ill-feeling towards his superior, and calling upon him to become reconciled to one who still retained his old affection for him. To persevere in a quarrel was to admit the devil into the heart. Gregory expresses a readiness to receive a visit from Eudocius if the winter did not hinder him (Greg. Naz. Epist. 224, 235, 236.) [E. V.]

EUDOLIUS, bishop of Toul. [EUDULON.]

EUDOXIA (1), martyr at Alexandria with Athanasia her mother, and two sisters, in the reign of Diocletian. Commemorated Jan. 31 (A.A. SS. Jan. ii. 1081.) [T. S. D.]

EUDOXIA (3), wife of the emperor Arcadius and mother of Flaccilla, Pulcheria, Arcadius Theodosius II. and Marina. She was a daughter of Bauto (Bauter) the Frankish general of Gratian (Philostorg. xi. 6; Zosim. v. 33), but was brought up in the house of one of the sons of the general Promotus (Zosim. v. 3). Her marriage with the emperor was arranged by the eunuch Eutropius

(Zon. ad loc.). Philostorgius tells us that she inherited the qualities of her nation (τοῦ βασιλεῦς ἑστέρας οὐκ ἀλίγας). If we may trust George of Alexandria in his Life of St. Chrysostom, her parents were Christians, for the bishop is represented as appealing to their well-known piety (V2. Chrys. ch. 41). Philostorgius attributes the degradation and subsequent execution of Eutropius to Eudoxia's enmity against him. Socrates and Socrates, however, do not assign any particular cause for it. After the death of Eutropius, she succeeded to his influence in the state, and by her overbearing conduct made the lives of all moderate men intolerable (Zonim. v. 24). In the year 400 she received the title of Augusta (Chron. Pasch.). During the latter years of her life she comes into notice especially as the enemy and persecutor of St. Chrysostom, and for this period Socrates is the chief authority. At first indeed we find her supporting him in his efforts to quell the Arian heresy (viii. 8, 4), but a difference soon arose between them in the matter of Severianus (viii. 10, 6). Shortly afterwards, some denunciations of the bishop against women in general were represented as being directed in reality against the empress, and she begged that the council might be summoned (ch. 16), by which he was subsequently deposed. The clamour which arose compelled her to intercede with the emperor for his recall (18, § 5). The next cause of offence was a sermon which the bishop delivered against the honour paid to a silver statue of the empress which she had set up near the great church (Soc. vi. 18, § 1; Soz. viii. 20). She again tried to summon a council, and St. Chrysostom inveighed against her with the words, πάλιν Ἡρωδίας μαίνεται, πάλιν ἑρχεται, πάλιν Ἰωάννου τὴν κεφαλὴν ἐν στίβους σπινδαίνει λαβεῖν. Her death, which occurred on Oct. 4, 404, soon after the second banishment of the bishop, was regarded by the people as a judgment of heaven (Soc. vi. 12, §; Soz. viii. 27, 1). Since, therefore, she is clearly represented by these historians as dying like St. Chrysostom, the letter attributed to bascent I. excommunicating her and her husband after the death of the bishop must be regarded as spurious. (See also Du Cange, Fam. August. 56.) [M. F. A.]

EUDOXIA (3), LICINIA, empress, wife of Valentinian III., daughter of the emperor Theodosius II. and Eudocia. She is described by Procopius as exceedingly beautiful. Marcellinus (Opus.) places her birth in 422, one year after the marriage of her parents according to his reckoning. She was the only one of their children who lived to mature age. In 424 she was betrothed to Valentinian, upon his assumption of the title of Caesar, she being two years old, and her future husband five. The marriage took place in 437 (Marcell.). The first arrangement was that it should be solemnized at Thessalonica, a midway between the two divisions of the empire, but Valentinian in his gallantry insisted upon coming the whole way to Constantinople (Soz. vii. 44). The day of the marriage in the Chronicon Paschale is Oct. 29. Whether she had two or three children is uncertain. The Chron. Pasch. in one place (sub ann. 437) gives the names Eudocia and Placidia, and in another

(sub ann. 455) Placidia and Honoria. Tillemont supposes that Honoria and Eudocia are different names of the same child. After the death of Valentinian in 455 Maximus espoused her by force, and also married her daughter to his son Palladius. (Idatius, Chron.; Prosper. Chron.) Preferring any danger to this disgrace, she sent to Genseric, and promised to betray the capital into his hands. The plot succeeded, and Maximus was put to death. Eudoxia and her daughters were carried off to Africa by Genseric, who married the eldest, Eudocia, to his son Hunneric. The other daughter he sent with her mother to the emperor Marcian at Byzantium. (Evag. H. E. ii. 7.) This is the account of Evagrius, but the truth seems to be that she remained in Genseric's hands until the reign of Leo, and that the real year of her release was 462, as it is given in Idatius's chronicle. (Cf. Priscus, Hist. Goth. c. 7.) Procopius (de Bell. Vand. i. 5) leaves the matter doubtful, since he does not give the name of the emperor. This is the last which we hear of Eudoxia, who appears to have passed the rest of her life quietly at court. Her second daughter was married to a senator, Olybrius. (Evag. ad loc. &c.; Du Cange, Fam. August. 59.) [M. F. A.]

EUDOXIUS (1), bishop of Antioch in Pisidia, mentioned in the menologies (June 23) as baptizing and ordaining St. Eustochius during the reign of the emperor Maximian, c. A.D. 290. (Bas. Men. iii. 141; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1035.) [L. D.]

EUDOXIUS (2), eighth bishop of Constantinople (360–370), previously bishop of Germanicia and of Antioch, one of the most influential of all the Arians. In 311 was martyred, at Arabissus in Armenia, Caesarius, a man of self-indulgence, who shewed nobler elements in his death. This was his father. The son is said to have been of a mild and agreeable disposition, talented and clever but extremely timid, and given up to pleasure. Between 324 and 331 St. Eustathius presided over the see of Antioch. Eudoxius came to him seeking holy orders. Eustathius found his doctrine unsound and refused him. But in 331 Eustathius was deposed. The Arians or Eusebians then had everything their own way, and not only admitted Eudoxius to orders, but made him bishop of Germanicia, on the confines of Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia. This bishopric he must have held at least seventeen years, the dark period of the principal intrigues against Athanasius, and of the reigns of the sons of Constantine.

In the year 341 was held, at Antioch, the Council of the Dedication or Encaenia, under Placillus. Eudoxius of Germanicia attended. He was an Arian pure and simple, a disciple of Aetius, a friend of Eunomius, and subsequently the leader of the Anomoean party, who held that the Son was necessarily unlike the Father, not only in substance but in will. The council produced four creeds, in which the Eusebian party succeeded in making their doctrine as plausible as might be, and the second of these became known as the "Creed of the Dedication." Athanasius says that Eudoxius was sent with Martyrius and Macedonius to take the new creed of Antioch to Italy. This new creed may, however, have been the Mazarinich, or Long Formula, drawn up a few years later at another Council of Antioch.

In 343 or 347 the rival councils of Sardica and Philippopolis were held. At the latter was drawn up a creed more Arian than those of Antioch, and it was signed by Eudoxius. At the end of 347 Eudoxius was in attendance on the emperor in the West, when news came of the death of Leontius of Antioch. Knowing himself on the plan that the affairs of Germanicia required his presence, he hastened to Antioch, and represented himself as nominated by the emperor to the vacant chair. Regardless of the rights of George of Laodicea, Mark of Antioch, and others who should have taken part in the election, he got himself made bishop. Of course this matter would come to the ears of Constantine, and to preoccupy the ground, Eudoxius immediately sent off a presbyter of Antioch, named Asphalius, to make the best of the case at court. Asphalius obtained a letter from Constantine in favour of Eudoxius, and was thinking of returning to Antioch, when there arrived the deputation of the Council of Ancyra, which had been summoned to condemn the errors of Eudoxius. The emperor, who seems to have been influenced always by the latest occupant of his attention, heartily agreed with the new-comers, recalled the letter which he had entrusted to Asphalius, and wrote as follows to the Church of Antioch: "Eudoxius went to seek you without my sending him. I am very far from wishing to favour persons of that kind. If they continue their impostures in other matters as in this, it is very plain that they are mockers of God. To what restraint will men be amenable, who impudently pass from city to city, seeking with a most unlawful appetite every occasion to enrich themselves?"

Meanwhile the new prelate was preaching open Arianism, and persecuting the orthodox. In the first year of his episcopate at Antioch he held a council, which received the creed of Sirmium. An idea may be formed of his sermons from three different sources. About this time Hilary of Poitiers was in the East. He heard Eudoxius in his cathedral, and wished his ears had been deaf, so horribly blasphemous was the language. Theodoret reports him as boasting, with incredible vanity, that there was nothing about God of which he was ignorant; that he knew the essence of God with perfect accuracy, and had the same knowledge about God as God had about Himself. Epiphanius records to the same effect, that he pronounced himself to know God so well that he did not know himself better than he knew God. His friend Eunomius used similar language.

The Council of Ancyra in 350 having persuaded have returned to Antioch, but to have sought the shelter of the court at Constantinople. Here by the aid of the Arians he secured his appointment as patriarch on the deposition of Macedonius, and on the 27th of January, 360, took possession of his throne in the presence of seventy-two bishops.

On the 15th of February was dedicated the great church of Constantinople, St. Sophia, begun in 342 by the emperor Constantine. Eudoxius seized the opportunity for a new specimen of his peculiar taste in sacred rhetoric. Mounting his episcopal throne before the expectant multitude of courtiers, ecclesiastics, and citizens, he began with these prodigious words: "The Father is hroōstēs, the Son is hroōstēs." But although for twenty years Constantinople had been accustomed to Eusebius of Nicomedia and Macedonius, it was not prepared for such a wretched travesty of theology. A great touch of indignation arose on all sides in St. Sophia. The orator was not the least abashed. He obtained silence, and offered this explanation: "The Father is hroōstēs because He knows nobody; the Son is hroōstēs because He knows the Father." This was too much even for the remnant of the congregation, and the new cathedral re-echoed with peals of uncontrollable laughter. It is thus, says Socrates (ii. 43), that these heremarchs tore the church to pieces by the captious subtilties.

The next occupation of Eudoxius must have been highly agreeable to him, the consecration of his friend Eunomius to the see of Cysicus. Warned by Eudoxius to conceal his opinions before so orthodox a population as that of Cysicus, Eunomius at first obeyed; but soon such complaints were brought to the emperor that he ordered Eudoxius to depose him. Eudoxius, terrified by menaces, wrote to Eunomius and persuaded him quietly to retire from his see.

In 365 an attack was made on Eudoxius by the Semi-Arians, who had adopted the name of his predecessor (now dead), and were called Macedonians. From Valens they got leave to hold a meeting at Lampeacus. Here they read the "Creed of the Dedication," cited Eudoxius and his party before them, and as they did so came sentenced them to deprivation; but Valens refused to confirm the proceedings. In 361 Valens, as he was setting out for the Gothic war, was induced by his wife to receive baptism from Eudoxius. In the same year he heard doubtless under the advice of Eudoxius, an order that such bishops as had been banished by Constantine and had returned under Julian should again be exiled. Athanasius was now from a fifth exile only by the zealous representations of the people of Alexandria.

The years during which Eudoxius and Valens acted together were troubled by portents, which many attributed to the anger of Heaven at the cruelty of Valens in banishing bishops who would not admit Eudoxius to their communion. Eudoxius died in 370. He well deserves the character which is given him by Eusebius, "the traitor of all the Arians." See H. E. iv. 20; H. E. ii. 19, 37, 40, 43; Theoph. Chron. ii. 10; Niceph. The Eudoxius is identified in Kollar's edition of Lambecius, Comment. de Biblioth. Caes. (1776, tom. iii. p. 418) with the author of an Oratio de Inventionibus Verbi, some excerpts of which Kollar enumerates among the MSS. of the imperial library of Vienna. [W. M. S.]

EUDOXIUS (3), a bishop in the reign of Constantius addressed in a letter by Serapion bishop of Thmuis. The letter is published by Cardinal Mai in his Classici Auctores (vol. v. p. 364), and likewise in the Patrologia Graeca (vol. i. p. 923). The Eudoxius of this letter was a confessor who had fallen ill under the hardships he had endured, and Serapion exhorts him not to give way to despondency. (Ceillier, iv. 336.) [T. W. D.]

EUDOXIUS (4), bishop of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, present at the synod of Constantinople, A.D. 448 (Mansi, vi. 760); also at the second council of Ephesus, called the Latrocinium, 449 (Mansi, vi. 612). His name is also subscribed to the synodal decree of Gennadius of Constantinople against simoniacal ordinations, 459. (Mansi, vii. 917; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 137.) [L. D.]

EUDOXIUS (5), bishop of Etenna (Trisenna) in Pamphylia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1004; Mansi, vii. 161.) In the list of bishops said to have been present at the fifth Roman synod under Symmachus, A.D. 503, occurs "Eudoxius Etenensis," who is said to be the same (Mansi, vii. 301 b and note). [L. D.]

EUDOXIUS (6), bishop of Choma in Lycia; present at the council of Ephesus in A.D. 431 (Mansi, iv. 1123 c), and at Chalcedon in 451 (Mansi, vii. 162 b). His name appears (Leo. Mag. Ep. 98, 1105, Migne) among the bishops subscribing the synodical letters of this latter council to Leo I. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 983). His name appears also in the list of bishops signing decrees of the council at Rome in 503 (Mansi, viii. 301 b). But this list certainly belongs to some earlier council. (Baron. ann. 503, ix.) [C. G.]

EUDOXIUS (7), count, who had during the reign of Trajan the command of some soldiers in Gaul. An officer named Romulus suggested to Trajan to send persons to compel the soldiers to offer sacrifice, and when they refused to comply with this command, they were banished to Melitina in Armenia. Romulus himself afterwards became a Christian, and was beheaded. The soldiers at Melitina, including Eudoxius their commander, were shortly after put to death. Commemorated Sept. 6. (Men. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

EUDOXIUS (8), martyr with Atticus and Agapetus at Sebaste during the time of the emperor Licinius. Commemorated Nov. 2. (Men. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

EUDOXIUS (9), a professional rhetorician of Cappadocia, a friend of Gregory Nazianzen, who wrote in his favour to Sophronius the prefect of Constantinople, A.D. 369 (Epist. 188, p. 850), and to Antemianus the consul, A.D. 383 (Epist. 132,

p. 862), as well as to Themistius, the sophist (Epist. 139, p. 865). In all, Gregory speaks of Eudoxius in terms of warm affection, and highly commends his "learning and his natural gifts." Eudoxius wishes to gain reputation by his discourses, in order to get his living out of them. We have also a long letter from Gregory to Eudoxius himself (Epist. 63, p. 819), urging him to give up the pursuit of human knowledge and betake himself to the study of divine philosophy; and another (Epist. 39, 297) deploring, as to an intimate friend, the loss of Basil and of Caesarius; his personal trials of old age and sickness; the unfaithfulness of friends, and the storms which threaten to overwhelm the church. [E. V.]

EUDOXIUS (10), the son of the preceding; also a rhetorician by profession, to whom was entrusted the education of Gregory Nazianzen's great-nephews, Nicobulus and his brothers, the sons of Alypiana, Gorgonia's daughter. Gregory manifested the interest he felt in them, especially Nicobulus, by his frequent letters to Eudoxius on the subject of their training, c. A.D. 383. (Epist. 115-117, 119-121, 139.) [E. V.]

EUDOXIUS (11), monk, probably abbat, of a monastery in the island of Capraria (Capraia), to whom St. Augustine wrote in affectionate terms, exhorting the brethren not to make their monastic retirement an excuse for declining active service in the church, but to be strenuous at all times in discharging their conventual duties, and to remember their liability to temptation even within their peaceful abode. Augustine mentions a visit paid to him by two of the brothers, Andreas and Eustathius, during which it seems that the latter had died. (Aug. Ep. 48.) [H. W. P.]

EUDOXIUS (12), consul, A.D. 442, with Dioscorus, in the 18th year of Valentinian III. He had been prefect of the praetorians under Theodosius in 427. (S. Prosp. Aquitan. Chronicon, 748, Patrol. Lat. li. 599; Baron. ad ann. 442, Pagi, note.) [W. M. S.]

EUDOXIUS (13), a gentleman twice greeted by pope Gregory the Great, who styles him "glorious," through Ruspiana Patricia. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. ii. ind. x. ep. 27, lib. viii. ind. i. ep. 22, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 563, 924.) [C. H.]

EUDOXIUS (14) (EUDOCIMUS), son of the emperor Constantine Copronymus by his third wife Eudocia. He was created "nobilissimus" by his brother Leo IV. On the death of Leo, the empress Irene his widow had Eudoxius seized and tonsured, in order to disqualify him for the succession, and on Christmas Day, 780, he was forced to administer publicly the sacrament of the Eucharist. In August, 787, he and his brothers Christophorus and Nicetas had their tongues cut out by order of Irene's son Constantine on the plea that they were implicated in a conspiracy against him. (Theophanes, Chronogr. in Migne, Patrol. Gr. cviii. p. 938; Du Cange, Fam. Aug. 106.) [T. W. D.]

EUDOXIUS (15), philosopher, frequently cited in the Catena in Danielelem, edited by Mai in his Scriptores Veteres (tom. i. In Daniel. pp. 166, 169, 170, 171, 188, 192, 199, 201, 218). Mai observes (p. xxxiv.) that he is similarly cited in Corderius on the Psalms and in Zephyrus on the Pentateuch. He is to be identified according to Mai (ibid.) with Eudoxius the Arian bishop of Constantinople (3). [T. W. D.]

EUDOXIUS (16), physician at Bagauda (St. Maur des Fosses) on the Marne, about seven miles from Paris. In the 25th year of Theodosius II. (i.e. A.D. 432) he was implicated in a local sedition, and on being informed against fled to the Huns (Tiron. Prosper. Chron. sub ann. xxv. Theodosii). The period was eighteen years before Attila invaded Gaul, and it must have been beyond the Rhine that Eudoxius fled, and there he would doubtless report the disaffected condition of part of Gaul. He is described as "pravi sed exercitati ingenii." [T. W. D.]

EUELPIS, a layman of Laranda in Lycaonia, whose permission to preach to the congregation by Neon, the bishop of that city, is mentioned in the letter of Alexander of Jerusalem and Theoctistus of Caesarea to Demetrius of Alexandria, with reference to the preaching of Origen. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 19.) [E. V.]

EUELPISTUS, according to the acts of Justin Martyr, one of the emperor's slaves, who suffered martyrdom at the same time with Justin. He is represented as a native of Cappadocia, and as the son of Christian parents. [G. S.]

EUELPISTUS, a chorepiscopus, who subscribed for Florentius of Lesbos (q. v.) at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. [C. G.]

EUEMERUS of Treves. [EUEMERUS.]

EUMENTIUS, a presbyter, martyred at Rome with pope Alexander under Hadrian (A.D. 117). He is commemorated May 3. (Mart. Hier., Us., Wand.) [T. S. B.]

EUMENTIUS, martyr. [SARAGOSSA, MARTYRS OF.]

EUERTIUS. [EVORTIUS.]

EUETHIUS (1), a presbyter of Constantinople, a faithful friend of Chrysostom's, who accompanied him on his banishment to Cucusus. It was he who roused his master on that terrible night when an alarm of the Isaurians compelled him to leave the villa of Seleucia, near Caesarea, and assisted him through the perils of the night journey over the mountains. (Chrysost. Ep. 14.) We find him with Chrysostom at Cucusus, A.D. 404. (Ep. 114.) He is probably the presbyter despatched by Chrysostom to Constantinople, A.D. 406 (Ep. 127), with instructions to proceed farther, even to Rome itself, should it appear necessary for the advocacy of his cause. His health was but feeble for such a lengthened journey. (Ep. 166.) [E. V.]

EUETHIUS (2), a gentleman of Caesarea who had shewed much kindness to Chrysostom during his stay at that city on his way to Cucusus. Chrysostom wrote to him on his arrival at his place of exile, A.D. 404, to announce the safe termination of his journey, and his enjoyment of the repose Cucusus offered. He begs Euethius to write to him often. (Ep. 173.) [E. V.]

EUETHIUS. See also EVETHIUS.

EUFIMIA, wife of Sergius, archbishop of Ravenna, c. 750. When, having been a layman, he suddenly became archbishop, he consecrated Eufimia as a deaconess. (Agnelli Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Rav. cap. 154.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUFORUS bishop of Cordova. [EUPHORUS.]

EUFRASIUS (1), said to have been sent, along with six others, by the apostles to preach in Spain, and to have died at Illiturgis (Andujar). He was commemorated May 15. (Mart. Usuard.) [CAECILIUS (4).] [T. S. B.]

EUFRASIUS (2), ST., thirteenth or, according to Gregory of Tours, twelfth bishop of Clermont in Auvergne. He was represented at the council of Agde (506) by Paulinus, a priest, and was present in person at the first council of Orleans (511). He entertained St. Quintian, the bishop of Rhodéz, who had been forced to fly from his see to save his life from the Goths. Two letters of Ruricius (Epp. xxi. and xxviii.; Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 101, 106) are addressed to him, and he may possibly be the recipient of the thirty-eighth letter of Avitus. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lix. 254.) According to Gregory he was bishop twenty-five years, and lived four years after the death of Clovis. This brings his death down to A.D. 515. He is commemorated Jan. 14. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iii. 2; Vit. Patr. c. iv. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 242, 1023; Mansi, viii. 337, 356; Gall. Christ. ii. 235.) [S. A. B.]

EUFRASIUS (3) (EUPHRASIUS), presbyter of Auvergne, son of an ex-senator Ennodius, Euvodius, or Evodius. On the death of Cautinus bishop of Clermont in Auvergne, A.D. 572, when many were seeking to obtain the appointment by gifts and promises, Eufrasius sent to the king, by the hand of his kinsman Beragesilus, a large sum of money, which he had procured from the Jews. The attempt failed, and archdeacon Avitus was elected by the clergy and people. Eufrasius is described as elegant in conversation, but more given to feasting barbarians than feeding the poor. (Greg. Tur. H. F. iv. 35, p. 176; Gall. Chr. ii. 242.) [C. H.]

EUFRASIUS. [EUPHRASIUS.]

EUFRAATES, a presbyter to whom, together with Saturninus, St. Augustine wrote to congratulate them on their return from Donatism to Catholic unity, setting forth the universality of the church, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and to discharge zealously their ministerial duties. (Aug. Ep. 142.) [H. W. P.]

EUFRIDIDIUS, deacon of Toledo (Baronius, s. a. 537, xli.; Hildefont. de Vir. Illustr. praef. 6). [LEONTIUS, deacon of Toledo.] [T. W. D.]

EUFRONIUS (1), fifth bishop of Nevers, succeeding St. Aregius, and followed by St. Aeoladius, flourished about A.D. 560. He subscribed a charter of St. Germanus of Paris in favour of the church of the Holy Cross and St. Vincent, now known as St. Germain des Prés, Paris. He was also present at its dedication. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 84; Vita S. Doctrovi, Bouquet, iii. 437; Gall. Christ. xii. 626.) [S. A. B.]

EUFRONIUS (2), eighteenth bishop of Tours. Upon the death of Guntram, the seventeenth of the series, king Clotaire named as his successor Cato, a priest of Clermont. But Cato's deares were fixed upon the see of his own city, and he declined. After the bishopric had stood vacant ten months, the clergy and people elected Eufronius, a priest of senatorial rank, grandson of St. Gregory of Langres, and, according to Gregory of Tours, "vir egregiae sanctitatis." Clotaire, upon learning the circumstances, confirmed their choice (A.D. 555 or 556). In 557 Eufronius took part in the council of Paris. In the civil wars of this period a great part of Tours, with its churches, was burnt to the ground. Two of these he rebuilt at his own charge. The famous church of St. Martin also owed its reconstruction on a nobler scale to him. The neighbouring district, too, was enriched by him with many new churches, the names of which are given by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. x. 31). Like his successor, he was the champion of the citizens against the rapacity of the count of Tour, at this time Galso, who tried to enforce the taxes which Clotaire had remitted. He successfully resisted the attempt, but not without appealing to king Charibert. In 562 he refused to subscribe the decree of the council of Nantes, which deposed Emerius from that see, bringing, no doubt, the scandal which occurred. [EUFRODUS (2).] In 567 he presided over the second council of Tours, and in the same year, together with several other bishops, he subscribed a letter to queen Radegundis, who had lately founded and retired to the monastery of the Holy Cross at Poitiers. It was on the subject of those nuns who after entering the monastery desired to quit it again for the world and marriage. Against them and their seducers the strongest anathemas were denounced. This letter (to be found in the Hist. Franc. ix. 39) was read by Gregory, by way of admonition, to Chrodieldis, when she, with fifty other nuns, seceded from the same monastery, and arrived on foot at Tours to claim the protection of the bishop, but without effect. [CHRODIELDIS.] About the same time Eufrenius joined three bishops of his province in a sort of circular letter addressed to his brethren, speaking of a "cladis gravissimae necessitas," which seemed to be overhanging the province, and which he exhorted them to seek to avert by deferring their intending marriages, paying their tithes, and breaking off all incestuous connexions (Gall. Christ. xiv. Instrumenta, 7). The impending disaster may possibly have been the civil war between Sigebert and Chilperic (cf. Rivet de la Grange, Hist. Lit. de la France, iii. 290). It was at the request of the latter prince that he officiated at the solemn reception of the messengers of queen Radegundis on their return from the East with a piece of the true cross and other relics for her monastery of the Holy Cross. From Sigebert too he obtained the restoration of those church lands of which Charibert had deprived the see. In 568 he was present at the dedication of a church at Nantes, as we learn from the verses of his friend and eulogist, Venantius Fortunatus. He died in 572 or 573, in the seventieth year of his age and the eighteenth of his episcopate, and was buried in the church of St. Martin. He was commemorated Aug. 4. His successor was Gregory the historian, and it is noteworthy that, contemporaries though they were, the latter relates his miracles with the same gravity as undoubted historical facts. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 30, 39, 40, x. 31; de Glor. Confess. xviii.; de Mirac. S. Martini, i. 30; Vita S. Radegundis, 19; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti, i. 331, ed. Paris, 1668-1701; Venant. Fort. Misc. iii. 1, 2, 3, 6; Mansi, ix. 747, 805; Gall. Christ. xiv. 21.) [S. A. B.]

EUFRONIUS (3) (SOPHRONIUS, SUFFRONIUS), eighteenth bishop of Nantes, succeeding Nunnechius II. and followed by Leobardus. He is said to have received St. Columban at Nantes when ordered by king Theodoric to embark there for Ireland (circ. A.D. 612). (Gall. Christ. xiv. 800; Vita S. Columbani, 47; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. ii. p. 24.) [S. A. B.]

EUGAIN. [EURGAIN.]

EUGENDUS (1), Carthaginian. [AUGENDUS.]

EUGENDUS (2), ST., abbat of the monasterium Condatisense or (as written by Gregory of Tours) Condatiscone, subsequently called after him St. Oyan, and finally after St. Claudius of Besançon. It was one of three built by St. Romanus in the Jura. Eugendus was born at Isarnodorum in the same district. At seven years he entered the monastery, which he never afterwards quitted. The abbat Minausius, or Nemansius, named him as his coadjutor during life and successor after death. But the choice was not agreeable to the monastery generally, and the discontent, ascribed by his biographer to envy, advanced even to the extent of a partial secession. During his rule, the monastery, which was of wood, was totally destroyed by fire, and built up again on a grander scale. He was remarkable for the humility of his demeanour, and, as his biographer especially notes, he did not desert the common table. He was severe too in enforcing the community of goods. Feeling the approach of death, he called that one of the brethren on whom he had enjoined the duty of anointing the sick, and bade him touch his breast with oil. This has been cited as an early instance of the rite of extreme unction. He died about the year 510, and was commemorated Jan. 1. The authority for this account is a life by an anonymous disciple and monk, to be found in Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. i. 570, ed. Paris, 1668-1701, and Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 49 (cf. Rivet de la Grange, Hist. lit. de la France, iii. 60-2; and Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, x. 610-2). [S. A. B.]

EUGENIA (1), a daughter of Philippos, who was appointed by Commodus governor of Alexandria. There she became acquainted with Christian literature, and chiefly through having read the epistles of St. Paul she was led to embrace Christianity. She disguised herself in male attire, and went to a monastery; but in course of time she was found out, and sent back to her father. It is said that she induced all her family to become Christians, and that her father was shortly after made a bishop. Eugenia was martyred subsequently, and was commemorated Dec. 24. (Cal. Byzant., Men. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

EUGENIA (3), a virgin, martyred at Rome with Agape. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Hier., Bedae, Us.) Fortunatus (de Virgin. lib. viii. cap. 4) celebrates her in the following extraordinary verses, where the strange treatment of the names may probably have arisen from some confusion between accent and quantity.

"Illic Euphemia, pariter quoque plaudit Agatha,
Et Justina simul, consociante Thecla,
Et Paulina, Agnes, Basilissa, Eugenia regnant,
Et quascumque sacer vexit ad astra pudor."

Baronius describes this Eugenia as a daughter of an imperial prefect in Egypt, and as having suffered under Gallienus. She is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology on Dec. 25, and in the Byzantine Calendar on Dec. 24. [J. G. C.]

EUGENIA (3), martyr. [NICOMEDIA, MARTYRS OF.]

EUGENIA (4), a niece of Gregory Nazianzen, one of the three daughters of his sister Gorgonia. She was brought up most carefully by her grandmother, who had encouraged her to expect a considerable share of her property, but at her death left her only a small legacy, some of which she was in danger of having wrested from her. Her uncle consequently wrote to Theodorus bishop of Tyana to request his aid for her (Greg. Naz. Epist. 85). Eugenia's conduct proved far from pleasing to Gregory, who mentioned her, together with her sister Nonna, with severe reprehension in his will. (Greg. Testam.) [E. V.]

EUGENIA (5), virgin, daughter of Adalbert duke of Alsatia, and niece of St. Odilia. She became abbess of Hohenburg in the diocese of Strasburg, and died in A.D. 735. (Acta SS. 16 Sept. v. 332.) [I. G. S.]

EUGENIANUS, a martyr, commemorated Jan. 8 (Mart. Usuard., Wandalb.). No other ancient writer seems to be acquainted with a martyr of this name. The Bollandist conjectures that he has been confused with Hegemonius bishop of Autun in the 4th century (AA. SS. Jan. i. 473). The Sammarthani (Gall. Christ. iv. 334) do not admit that there are any grounds for supposing Eugenianus to have been this bishop. [T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (1) I., bishop of Rome during the breach between Rome and Constantinople in consequence of the Monothelite controversy; consecrated Aug. 10, 654, buried June 3, 657 (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 164). The emperor Constans having issued a declaration known as 'the Type,' in which the use of either of the phrases contended for, either the Single or Double Will or Energy in Christ, was forbidden for the future, and pope Martin I. (who had in council denounced this Type, and excommunicated Paul the Eastern patriarch) having been seized in 653 and removed from Rome by the emperor's order, the clergy of Rome were ordered by the latter to elect a new pope. The order was not obeyed till the 8th of September in the following year, when Eugenius, a native of Rome, was chosen and consecrated, Martin (who had protested by letter from Constantinople against a new election) being still alive. This ultimate, though tardy, compliance with the imperial will was probably due to a fear lest the emperor himself should interpose and intrude a heretic into the see. Martin lived in exile until September A.D. 655, and thus during the first year of his pontificate Eugenius was canonically an intruder and antipope, though reckoned a lawful bishop after Martin's death in virtue of his acceptance by the Roman church. After his election he sent messengers to Constantinople to announce it to the emperor. These were induced by Peter, who about this time became patriarch of Constantinople, to assent to a declaration of faith intended to reconcile the disputants, in which the curious compromise was adopted of acknowledging One Will in Christ, and also two (unam super duas); one, which was called the Substantial Will, and two besides, called Natural Wills. Having on such terms of union publicly communicated with the patriarch, they returned to Rome carrying from him to pope Eugenius a confession of faith expressed (according to Anastasius) in very obscure terms. From the circumstance, mentioned also by Anastasius, that, when the patriarch's letter was read at Rome in the church of St. Mary ad Praesepe (now Santa Maria Maggiore), it was the clergy and people that tore up the document, and refused to permit the pope to celebrate mass till he had pledged himself to repudiate it, it would seem that the pastor was less resolute in orthodoxy than his flock, and disposed to accept the compromise. There is in fact no evidence of his having anything of the orthodox zeal or spirit of his predecessor Martin. The latter, during the last year of his life, spent in exile, complained bitterly in still extant letters of being neglected by his former friends, especially by the clergy of Rome, who, though having it in their power to relieve him, had left him destitute of even the necessities of life. Eugenius, as the head of the Roman clergy, though not named, must be considered as involved in this reproach. Nor is it inconsistent with the apathy and readiness to accept compromise, of which evidence has been given, that he is described kind, gentle, affable, and charitable to the poor. (Anastasius and Platina.) He held the see, from the date of his election, 2 years, 8 months, and 24 days. Notwithstanding the absence of any recorded acts or characteristics to entitle him to the character of a saint, he is commemorated as such in the Roman Church on the 2nd of June. No writings, genuine or spurious, attributed to him, remain. (Anastas. Biblioth. de Vit. Rom. Pont. num. lxxvii. § 134 in Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 763; Platina, de Vit. Pontif. p. 95.) [J. B—y.]

EUGENIUS (2), bishop of Ammaedara, Admedera (Amadera Morc. hod. Hydra, Playfair's Travels, p. 189), a colony between Carthage and Cirta in Proc. Prov. (?), on the borders of Numidia (Cyp. Sentt. Epp. 32). [E. W. B.]

EUGENIUS (3), an early bishop of Toledo, said by Spanish antiquaries to have been sent as a missionary by St. Dionysius the Areopagite [DIONYSIUS PSEUDO-AREOPAGITA (1) and DIONYSIUS (3)], and to have suffered as a martyr in one of the persecutions of the early church; the breviary of Toledo names that carried on under Domitian. It is, however, admitted by Flores (España Sagrada, tomo v.) that by the time of Ildefonsus the memory of this Eugenius had entirely perished. But his tomb is reported to have been found at Paris in 1148 by Raymond archbishop of Toledo, and his remains transferred to Spain by king Philip II. in 1565. Flores appeals to the abbat Ilduinus and to St. Gerard for his existence, and he is commemorated, in some lists, on Nov. 15. Raimart (Acta Martyrum, Amsterdam, 1713) gives, in an appendix, a Kalendarium Carthaginiensis (the old province of Carthage used to include Toledo and some other sees in Spain) with the entry: "Nonas Jan. depositio S. Deopatri et Eugenii episcoporum." [J. G. C.]

EUGENIUS (4), bishop of the Tauric Chersonese, mentioned with Elpidius and other bishops of the see in the Menology of Basil, March 8. These bishops lived before the reign of Constantine the Great, 306–337. (Migne, Patrol. Graec. cxvii. 9; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1329.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (5), bishop of Laodicea, the metropolis of the province of Phrygia Pacatiana, c. A.D. 300–324. He was originally in the army, and had married the daughter of a senator, but during the Maximinian persecution was deprived of his military rank owing to the constancy of his faith, and fled to Laodicea, where he became bishop. He entirely built the church and adorned it with vestibules and porticos. An inscription has been found at Laodicea having reference to the bishop. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 794.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (6), bishop of Eucarpia, in the province of Phrygia Salutaris; one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 645; Mansi, ii. 695.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (7). Among the subscriptions to the letter of the Eusebian seceders to Philipppolis from the council of Sardica, A.D. 347, there occurs Eugenius de Lysitina, intended, as Le Quien thinks, for Eugenius bishop of Lysinia in Pamphylia Secunda. In the same list there is another bishop Eugenius, the name of the see being lost. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1029; Mansi, iii. 138, 140.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (8), bishop of Nicaea, one of the fifty bishops who met in synod at Antioch A.D. 334. (Soc. H. E. iv. 8; Till. Mém. Eccl. vi. 394.) [E. V.]

EUGENIUS (9), bishop of Pappa in Pisidia, present at the oecumenical council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 570; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1057.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (10), bishop of Heraclea, the metropolis of Thrace. He was originally a presbyter of Constantinople, one of Chrysostom's bitterest enemies, and was deputed, together with Isaac the anchorite, by the Council of the Oak to convey to Chrysostom the summons to appear before them. For his services on this and other occasions Eugenius was rewarded with the see of Heraclea, from which Serapion had been deposed. (Pallad. Vit. Chrysost. in Migne, Patr. Gr. xlvii. 29; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1108.) [E. V.]

EUGENIUS (11), a bishop in Macedonia, addressed with Maximianus and other bishops of the province by Innocent I. (Ep. 17. Patr. Lat. xx. 527). He must be the Eugenius who is named next to Maximianus by Chrysostom (Ep. 163. Patr. Gr. lii. 706), about A.D. 406, when Chrysostom thanks the Macedonian bishops for their support of his cause. [EUMENIUS (5).] [C. H.]

EUGENIUS (12), Phrygian bishop, whose see is not named, one of the four deputed to carry to Rome, A.D. 404, the letter addressed by Chrysostom to pope Innocent, together with those from the bishops who supported his cause, and from the clergy of Constantinople. (Pallad. Dial. pp. 10, 11.) Eugenius's fidelity to Chrysostom cost him his see. He was deposed by Atticus and his party, and he lived in concealment in his own country. (Ibid. p. 195.) [E. V.]

EUGENIUS (13), bishop of Apollonias (Lopadium), on the lake formed by the Rhyndacus in Bithynia, signed the protest of the sixty-eight bishops against the opening of the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, before the arrival of John of Antioch (Baluze, Concil. p. 698, Synodicon. c. 7); nevertheless, like many others, he joined the council when it was opened. (Mansi, iv. 1224; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 613.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (14), bishop of Hermopolis Magna, in the Thebais. Gennadius, who precedes him in the list, is dated A.D. 449. He is mentioned by Joannes Moschus (Pratum Spirituale, § 182, Patr. Gr. lxxxvii. 3053) as having formerly been the abbat of the monastery of St. Sergius called Xeropotamus near Bethlehem. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 595.) [J. de S.]

EUGENIUS (15), bishop of Baratta, a town in Lycaonia whose position and exact name is uncertain. His name was subscribed in his absence by his metropolitan, Onesiphorus of Iconium, to the definition of the faith that was read before the emperor Marcian at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1079.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (16), bishop of Canna in Lycaonia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1084; Mansi, vii. 157.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (17), bishop of Cotena in Pamphylia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1010; Mansi, vii. 164.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (18), supposed bishop of Nîmes. The name appears among the subscriptions (without sees) to a synodical letter of forty-four bishops of Gaul to pope Leo in 457 (Leo Mag. ep. 99 p. 1111 in Patr. Lat. liv. p. 969 c), and a very suspicious MS. of Savaro calls him bishop of Nîmes. The Sammarthani reject him. (Gall. Christ. vi. 427.) [C. H.]

EUGENIUS (19), bishop of Euroea in Vetus Epirus, signed the synodical letter of that province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 619 B; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 145.)

EUGENIUS (20), bishop of Nicopolis, in Vetus Epirus. The emperor Leo I., hearing of the murder of Proterius, bishop of Alexandria A.D. 457, commanded him to assemble a synod of the bishops under his jurisdiction to consider the matter. He obeyed, and the synod wrote a letter to the emperor, which was signed by Eugenius and eight others (Mansi, vii. 619 A; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 134). Hormisdas, bishop of Rome, in his letter of 516 to the synod of Vetus Epirus, greatly praises his conduct on that occasion (Horm. Ep. 8 in Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxiii. 391 and in Mansi, viii. 405).

EUGENIUS (21), bishop of Siniandus in Pisidia, signed a synodical letter to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 571; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1055.)

[L. D.]

EUGENIUS (22), bishop of Carthage in the 5th century. He was elected to the see A.D. 479 (so Morcelli, Africa Christ. iii. 191, but Cave gives the following year), with the approval of the Arian Hunneric, but after five years was exiled to the deserts of Tripoli (Victor Vitensis, de Persec. Vandal. ii. 2-13, Patr. Lat. lvii. 203). On the accession of Gundamund, in the following year, he was recalled (Victor Tununens. Chron. Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 946). During the reign of this prince the orthodox party was not molested, but upon his death, in the year 496, his successor Thrasimund renewed the earlier persecutions (Procop. Bell. Vandal. i. 8). Eugenius was banished to Gaul, and settled near the town of Vienne, where he founded a monastery in honour of St. Amaranthus. He died there in the year 505. Eugenius left a creed, drawn up for presentation to Hunneric, which is printed in the 58th volume of Migne's Patr. Lat. (see also Gennadius, de Script. Eccles. cap. 97, ibid. p. 1116; Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. ii. 3, p. 46).

[J. de S.]

EUGENIUS (23), bishop of Tium on the Black Sea in the province of Honorias, present at the council held at Constantinople, A.D. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 575; Mansi, viii. 971.)

EUGENIUS (24), a Cilician tritheite bishop in the second half of the 6th century, who supported Conon of Tarsus in disseminating that heresy. John of Ephesus, who states that Eugenius was a bishop in Cilicia, assigns him no definite locality in that region, but according to Bar-Hebraeus (Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii. 325) his see was Seleucia in Isauria, and his period contemporary with the Jacobite patriarch Sergius Telensis (539-541). It was at this early period perhaps that they began to declare their views in Cilicia, and for this they were admonished and finally deposed by their fellow bishops. Retiring to Constantinople, they found a zealous patron in Athanasius, a grandson of the empress Theodora; and supported by his fortune they established an active propagandism. Three bishops were requisite, according to the canons, for episcopal ordinations, and they found a third to act with them in Theonas, a deposed provincial bishop who had wandered to the capital. By this means they sent out in every direction numerous episcopal emissaries, who gathered congregations in Rome, in Corinth, in Athens, and in Africa. The public disputation held with the tritheites under the patriarch John by direction of the emperor Justin II. is noticed under Conon. The tritheite leaders were condemned and banished to Palestine; but this had no effect on the activity of their agents, who travelling through Syria, Cilicia, Isauria, Cappadocia, ordained priests and deacons in churches and monasteries, cities and villages, bringing over whole districts to their views. Eventually Eugenius and Conon visited Pamphylia, where Eugenius in the earlier days of his orthodoxy had zealously laboured for the conversion of the Acephali, who had colonised that province in large numbers. Here Eugenius died, and Conon once more retired to Constantinople. These particulars are gathered from the Ecclesiastical History of John of Ephesus (lib. i. 31, v. 1-8), which has been translated from the Syriac into English by Dr. Payne Smith, and into German by Dr. Schönfelder, the latter of whom appends a dissertation on the tritheite controversy. [JOANNES PHILOPONUS; TRITHEISM.] Eugenius is by Baronius (A. E. ann. 535, lxxvii.) erroneously called Evagrius.

EUGENIUS (25), bishop of Egara, subscribing the acts of the fourth council of Toledo, A.D. 633, under Sisenand (Esp. Sagr. xlii. 195; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385).

[M. A. W.]

EUGENIUS (26) I., bishop of Toledo, in Spain, and metropolitan, between the years 636 and 646 or 647. Date of birth unknown. His life ended with his episcopate.

Name.—A Latin translation of εὐγενής into Bene-natus occurs as a proper name in the Gaul of the 6th century (as e.g. in Cyprian's life of Caesarius of Arles, where a man so-called is stated to have acted unworthily of his name). Few names have remained more popular in both the masculine and feminine forms in modern Europe than Eugenio, Eugène, Eugénie.

Authorities.—St. Ildefonsus, bishop of Toledo, De Virorum Illustrium Scriptis (capp. xii. xiii.). This series of short biographies, apparently suggested by the similar one of St. Jerome, is printed at the end of some editions of the works of St. Isidore of Seville; as for example, in appendix I. to tom. vii. of the edition of Arevalus (Romae A.D. 1803); Acts of the fifth, sixth, and seventh councils of Toledo, held respectively in A.D. 636, 638, 646 (Labbe, tom. iii. pp. 597, 601, 613, ed. Paris, 1714).

Life.—This Eugenius was a fellow-student of Justus, his predecessor in the see of Toledo. He was trained as a monk from infancy. His superior, Helladius, has the merit of bringing forward both him and Justus, when he himself became a bishop. Eugenius was a man of dignified demeanour, and not only well versed in sacred learning, but also, we are assured, skilled in astronomy as to astonish his auditors whom he allured, through the influence thus gained, to the reception of religious doctrine. His signature to the fifth council of Toledo stands as follows:—"Ego Eugenius, Dei miſersanctas ecclesias, provincias Carthaginis metropolitani episcopus, his communibus litteris assensum subscripsi." As regards the precise date of the episcopate of this Eugenius, Flores may be consulted. (España Sagrada, tom. v.; Madrid, Marin., A.D. 1750.) Ildefonsus mentions the Gothic kings of Spain, under whom he flourished, namely, Chintila, Tulga, and Chindasvinda. These kings died respectively in A.D. 538, 640, 650. [J. G. C.]

EUGENIUS (27) II., bishop of Toledo between A.D. 646-657. As in the case of his predecessor, we are ignorant of the date of birth, but learn that he died, being still bishop, in A.D. 657, when he was succeeded by St. Ildefonsus.

Authorities.—St. Ildefonsus (de Vir. Ill. Scr. cap. vii.); acts of the eighth, ninth, and tenth councils of Toledo (Labbe, tom. iii. pp. 952, 971, 977).

Life.—This Eugenius was also a monk, and in order to avoid promotion he fled to Saragossa (urbs Caesaragustana), and there hid himself among the tombs of the martyrs. The prince (namingly Chindasvinda) employed force, and constrained him to become bishop. He is described as spare of frame and not physically strong, but fervid in spirit, a great student, and specially versed in musical science, by which he corrected the faulty chanting of his time.

Writings.—This Eugenius composed a short treatise on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, which is said to have been lucid and eloquent. Its intended transmission to Africa and the East was hindered by storms. Two other volumes, one in prose and one in verse, spread his reputation beyond the circles where he was personally known. His prose writings are lost; but the poems were collected and edited by Father Sirmond, 8J., in his Opera Varia, published at Paris in 1696 (tom. ii. p. 278 et seq.), and again at Venice in 1728. They are also given in the Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima (Lyons, 1677, tom. ii. p. 345). They consist of some thirty-five short compositions in Latin hexameters, elegiacs, sapphics, and iambs on sacred subjects or on topics of the day (e.g. No. xxxi. is headed De sancti conjugis Chindasvinti Regis). Although disfigured by the occasional introduction of barbarous words, and exhibiting some licence in the quantity of syllables, especially in the case of proper names, the verses of Eugenius display more point and better latinity than we might expect to find in the Spain of the 7th century. Two of his epigrams (on the invention of letters and the names of hybrid animals) have been thought worthy of preservation by Burmann in his Anthologia Latina (ii. 264). Two are double acrostics, one of them being an epitaph on himself, of which the initial letters of the lines make the word EUGENIUS, and the concluding ones HEILIGUS. The long poem on the Creation ascribed to these entitled Hexaëmeron, has been sometimes assigned to Eugenius as its original author. This mistake ought not to have been made; inasmuch as Ildefonsus (l. c.) states most explicitly the precise relation in regard to it occupied by the bishop of Toledo, who was only in this instance an editor and an enlarger, at the request of the king, of the poem on this theme composed some two centuries earlier by Dracontius. [DRACONTIUS.]

CRIST MOSE.—VOL. II.

The above councils of Toledo, over which the two prelates Eugenius I. and II. presided, or in which they took a leading part, deserve attention in connexion with—(1) the confessions of faith which they set forth; (2) the relative position of the monarchy; (3) the occasional subscription of laymen; (4) the treatment of the Jews living in Spain. A few words must be said upon each of these points.

1. Some profession of faith appears to be recognized as almost a necessary and normal preface to the canons passed by each successive council. In some cases, however, it amounts to little more than a statement of the doctrines of the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation, or to a recital of the Apostles' Creed. But in others it is more ample, especially in the sixth council, summoned in A.D. 638, in the reign of Chintila, and attended by fifty-two bishops, where the articles of the creed drawn up deserve comparison with those proclaimed in the earlier third council of Toledo held in A.D. 586 under the first Catholic sovereign, king Recared or Recaredo. The creed before us, in language of much dignity, and with a terseness of statement which resembles the better features of the scholastic terminology of a later day, proclaims not only the truths insisted on in the Nicene Creed as enlarged at Chalcedon, but is even more distinct on the doctrine of the μωναρχία or Principatus Patris, and also includes a recognition of the double procession, and of the doctrine of original sin. We subjoin a few sentences by way of evidence, italicizing phrases illustrative of these remarks. "Itaque credimus et profiteamur sacramentissimam et omnipotentissimam Trinitatem, Patrem et Filium, et Spiritum sanctum, unum Deum, solum non solitarium; unius essentiae, virtutis, potestatis, uniusque naturae; discretam inseparabiliter personis; indiscretam essentialiter substantiam deitatis, creatricem omnium creaturarum; Patrem ingentum, increatum, fontem et originem totius divinitatis; Filium à Patre intemporaliter et ante omnem creaturam sine initio genitum non creatum. . . . Spiritum vero sanctum, neque genitum neque creatum, sed de Patre Filioque procedentem utriusque esse Spiritum. . . . Ex his igitur tribus divinitatis personis solum Filium fatemur ad redemptionem humani generis, propter culpam debitam (quas per inobedientiam Adae originaliter, et nostro libero arbitrio contraxeramus) resolvenda à secreto Patris arcanoque prodiisse, et hominem sine peccato de sancta semper Virgine Mariâ assumptisse, ut idem Filius Dei Patris esset filius hominis; Deus perfectus et homo perfectus, ut homo Deus esset unus Christus naturis in duabus in personâ unus; ne quaternitas Trinitati accedat, si in Christo persona geminata esset."

2. The king is evidently at this period in close and intimate relation with the Spanish church, sanctioning its councils, giving coactive force to its canons, and even anticipating its desires. The church in turn gives honour and support to the throne. But the notion of an indefeasible hereditary claim to the monarchy is unknown; as in truth it was unknown to the early and even to the later medieval church. It never throve in Spain, though we may find it prevalent in the France of Louis XIV., and the England of the Tudors and the Stuarts. That the crown should rest in certain families, so long as they flourished, was indeed an admitted principle, but that was all. Thus in the fifth council of Toledo, A.D. 638, the third canon treats: "De reprobatione personarum, quae prohibentur adipisci regnum," and excommunication is threatened against the man, "qui talia meditatus fuerit, quem nec electio omnium probat, nec Gothicae gentis nobilitas ad hunc honoris apicem trahit." The combination of electio and nobilitas is worthy of note. That the monarchy was still in a rather unsettled condition appears from the succeeding canon of the same council directed against those who attempt to find out, by divination, the time when the reigning sovereign will die, with a view to their own acquisition of the throne. With these fourth and fifth canons of the fifth council should be compared the cognate ones (the 16th and 17th, and 18th) of the sixth council of Toledo, to which reference has been made above.

3. The rights of the laity to appoint incumbents to churches which they have built or restored, are guarded with much strictness (council ix. canon 2); but abuses on the part of patrons are censured (council x. canon 3). The canons of the 8th council, held in A.D. 653, are signed by fifty-two bishops, thirteen abbats, ten archdeacons, and sixteen counts. This adhibition of the signatures of laymen had occurred also in the earlier council, the third, held under Recared, where we find not only a royal edict in confirmation of its acts, but likewise the participation of all the senators (five leading names being given) in its anathemas against Arianism, and the other heresies condemned by the first four oecumenical councils. The same feature occurs again at a later date, in the twelfth council of Toledo, held in A.D. 681 (Labbe, ubi supra, p. 1715), where fifteen counts palatine sign after the bishops, abbats, and archdeacons. Bishop Jeremy Taylor has called attention to this circumstance in one of his controversial works. He calls these councils the fourth, sixth, and eighth of Toledo. Either bishop Taylor numbers the councils in a way differing from that of Labbe, or he has made a mistake, as the fourth has not any laic signature appended, beyond that contained in the sanction given by king Chintila. Compare the case of the second council of Orange held under Caesarius of Arles. [CAESARIUS (3).]

4. The painful subject of the treatment of the Jews (at that period more eminent in Spain than in any other country for wealth, dignity of position, industry, and numbers) is discussed in connexion with the councils held in the Spanish peninsula and specially at Toledo, by Milman. (Hist. of Jews, books xx. and xxii.) As early as A.D. 313 we find the council of Elvira (Illiberis) forbidding meals being taken in company with the Jews, and benedictions of fruits of the earth by Jews, lest they should make void the blessings of the church (canons xlviii., xlix.; Labbe, tom. i. p. 287). The sympathy existing, as at Alexandria and elsewhere, between the Arians and the Jews, and the favour exhibited towards Jews by Arian Gothic kings, must have intensified the animosity displayed by king Recared and his successor, Sisebut. The fourth council of Toledo, over which Isidore of Seville presided [ISIDORUS], though insisting that even those who had become Christians by compulsion should remain such, forbids the further employment of force to make converts. But the councils, in which the earlier and later Eugenius are prominent, not only denounce (as was right and becoming) the sale of Christians as slaves to Jews, but revert to the use of violence and ultimate expulsion of all who remain firm in Judaism. This is especially the case with the sixth, eighth, ninth, and tenth councils of Toledo. The eighth council received a counter petition from the Jews, which, though not admitted to a place in its acts, is given by Baronius (ad ann. 653, cf. Milman l. c.). The results in some measure resemble those arising in the France of after days from the revocation of the edict of Nantes, namely, thousands of conversions (so called), of which many were probably unreal, and the flight of numbers to Gaul and Africa. A later council of Toledo, the twelfth, in A.D. 681, surpassed in the rigour of its enactments all former persecutions. If, as there seems reason to suppose, the Jews lent powerful aid to the subsequent Moorish invasion, they took a terrible (though, it must be owned, only too natural) revenge for their wrongs.

We pass by canons of the Concilia Toletana directed against the sin of simony and on the illegitimate sons of clerics, because these topics are common to the Christendom of that period, and in nowise specially Spanish. [J. G. C.]

EUGENIUS (28), bishop of Trapezopolis in Phrygia, subscribed the canons of the synod called Trullana, or Quinisexta, held at Constantinople, A.D. 692. (Le Quien, Orions Christ. i. 810; Mansi, xi. 1001.) [L. D.]

EUGENIUS (29), bishop of Forum Corneli (Imola), A.D. 801. He was a native of that city, and is described as "vir magno ingenio." (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 624; Manzonius, Episc. Corneliens. 44.) [T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (30), martyr at Tibur with SYMPHOROSA his mother, and six brothers. [T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (31), martyr at Paris; commemorated on Nov. 15. (Mart. Us., Wand. [EUGENIUS (3)].) [T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (32), martyr with Eustratius and three others in Armenia during the Diocletian persecution. Commemorated Dec. 13. (Men. Bas.; Menol. Graec. Sirlet.; Baron. Annales 311. xx.) [T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (33), martyr with Valerianus during the Diocletian persecution, commemorated Jan. 20. (Men. Bas.) [T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (34), a presbyter of Antioch martyred with Macarius during the reign of Julian. He appeared before the emperor and reproached him for his idolatry. The emperor enraged at this, banished him to Mauritania where he was beheaded. Commemorated Dec. 20. (Men. Bas.; Baron. Annales 362, 90, 91.) [T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (35), martyr with six others in Africa during the Vandal persecution at the close of the 5th century, commemorated Jan. 1. (Mart. Adon.). In Usuard, Notker, and the Mart. Hier. the name appears as Eugentius. [T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (36), martyr with Apollonius. Commemorated July 23. (Mén. Bas.)

[T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (37), martyr at Neocaesarea, with Mardonius, Muso, and Metellus; commemorated Jan. 24. (Mart. Hier., Adon., Usuard., Notker.)

[T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (38), martyr at Cherson, together with Elpidius [ELPIDIUS (2)]. Commemorated March 8. (Mén. Bas.)

[T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (39), martyr in Syria with Paulus, Cyrillus, and four others. Commemorated March 20. (Mart. Us., Notker.)

[T. S. B.]

EUGENIUS (40), a deacon; one of the four legates sent by Sylvester bishop of Rome to the Council of Arles, A.D. 314. (Labbe and Cossart, i. 1453.)

[T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (41), a monk by whom Basil wrote to the Catholics of Alexandria, in A.D. 357, to encourage them under the persecution and sufferings which followed the death of Athanasius. (Basil. Epist. 139 [71].)

[E. V.]

EUGENIUS (42), deacon of Ancyra, sent by his bishop Marcellus cir. A.D. 347 to Athanasius with a confession of faith of the church of Ancyra. (Eugen. Diac. Legat. ad S. Athanas. in Patr. Gr. xviii. 1302; Ceillier, iv. 308.)

[T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (43), an archdeacon of Zenobius bishop of Florence, cir. A.D. 396. (Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 24, Mai. vi. 53, 55, 56; Mart. Rom. Iuv. 21.)

[T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (44), deacon, addressed by pope Gregory the Great, empowering and requiring him to transfer some of the land of the Roman church to the monastery of Blera or Bieda, a town near Sutrium and Viterbo. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xii. ind. v. ep. 45, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1250.)

[C. H.]

EUGENIUS (45) (EUGAN), common latinized form of the Irish Eoghan. [EOGHAN.] A person called Eugenius is said to have been one of the seven hermits from the island in the Tiber, who accompanied St. Regulus (Legend of St. Andrew, in Skene's Chron. Picts and Scots, 187; Bp. Forbes, Eccl. Scott. Saints, 335). Mart. Tallaght (Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xxxix.) commemorates a Eugenius Peregrinus on December 26, and Mr. O'Gorman on the same day has "Eugan as an mara," Eugan or Eugenius, the mariner and traveller (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 262 n. 9).

[J. G.]

EUGENIUS (46) HERMOGENIANUS, a praetorian prefect, at whose instance Maximianus is said to have issued a rescript for the persecution of Christians, c. A.D. 301, and under whom many afterwards suffered death (Boll. Act. Sanct. 29 Mai, vii. 11).

EUGENIUS (47), a usurper in the reign of Diocletian, A.D. 303. Libanius tells us that the 500 soldiers whom he was commanding in Syria, being indignant at the amount of work which was exacted of them, thought to better their condition by proclaiming Eugenius emperor. They marched to Antioch, plundering as they went. At Antioch, however, the whole population, including even the women, rose against them, and the usurpation of Eugenius ended on the same day on which it began. (Libanius, Or. xiii. xiv. xv.)

[M. F. A.]

EUGENIUS (48), "magister officiorum" under Constans. He was present when Athanasius had an interview with that emperor at Milan, A.D. 343. (ATHANASIUS, Vol. I. 190; Athanas. Apol. ad Const. sec. 3, p. 235.)

[T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (49), a wealthy eunuch of Constantinople, who had been expelled from court because of his disaffection to the emperor Jovian. He befriended Procopius with money and otherwise during his rebellion, A.D. 363-366. (Zosim. iv. 5; PROCOPIUS, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biogr. iii. 538.)

[T. W. D.]

EUGENIUS (50), procurator under Theodosius and Valentinian II. A.D. 434. The princess Honoria, sister of the emperor Valentinian, had a child by him, and was consequently expelled from the palace and sent from Italy to Theodosius. (Marcellin. Comit. Chronicon, A.D. 434; Patrol. Lat. li. p. 926; Baronius ad ann. 435, xxvi. Pagi, note.)

[W. M. S.]

EUGENIUS (51), a notary addressed along with the subdeacon Felix and others by pope Gregory the Great, who desires them to see the regulations carried out by which bishops or clerics are prohibited from having women residing with them. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 60; Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 996.)

[C. H.]

EUGENTIUS, martyr. [EUGENIUS (35).]

EUGIPPIUS (1), ST. (EUGYPPIUS), abbat of Lucullanum, born at Carthage about the middle of the 5th century, and at the age of twelve sent by his parents to Rome (Patrol. Lat. lxii. 550), where he was educated and afterwards ordained. He was with St. Severinus when the latter was proselytizing in Noricum (Austria) and entered his monastery near Favianae (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. 8). It was near Vienna according to Mabillon (Annales O. S. B. i. 85, "Monasterium Favinnense"). Here St. Severinus died in A.D. 482, and in 488 Eugippius accompanied his body when it was transferred to the villa of Lucullus between Puteoli (Pozzuoli) and Naples, where a monastery ("Monasterium Lucullanum," Mabil. ib.) was founded in honour of, and called by the name of, the saint. Of this monastery, which belonged to the Benedictine order and was under the rule of Monte Cassino, Marcellianus was the first abbat, and Eugippius the second (Ceillier, xi. 85). Here he wrote many theological treatises, which are printed in the Patrologia, tom. lxii., and in A.D. 511 he composed the life of St. Severinus (Pothast, Biblioth. p. 887). He was addressed by St. Fulgentius, who wrote to him a letter on "Charity"; and he was author of a monastic rule, not extant. There has been some controversy as to whether there was a second writer of the name of Eugippius, and called the African. Sigebert says that "Eugippius" was author of a collection from the writings of St. Augustine, about 580, from which date it would follow that he was a different person from the Eugippius who was with St. Severinus at his death in 482, and who wrote the life of the saint in 511. But it is evident that he makes a mistake, for Cassiodorus had seen the Eugippius author of the "Collection" to which Sigebert refers, and Cassiodorus died at the age of ninety-three before the year 567. (Ceillier, xi. 88.) We may add that both the Bollandists and Cave treat of only one Eugippius, and the Patrol. Lat. places the Vita S. Secerini among the works of Eugippius Africanus. Upon the whole it would seem to be proved that Eugippius abbat of Lucullanum and Eugippius the African were the same person. (Acta SS. Jan. i. 483; Migne, Patrolog. Lat. lxii. 550, &c.; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs ecclés. xi. 85, &c.; Cave, Histor. Liter. i. 498; Surius, de Prob. Sanct. Historiis, Jan. 8.) [I. G. S.]

EUGIPPIUS (2), a priest to whom Dionysius Exiguus dedicated his Latin translation of Gregory of Nyssa's work, De Conditione seu Opificio hominis. The translator's prefatory letter intimates that his task was undertaken at the request of Eugippius. (Patrol. Lat. lxxvii. 346; Ceillier, xi. 124.) [T. W. D.]

EUGNOMONIUS (EUGNOMON) appears among the Eutychians, who as ἐλάχιστοι ἀρχιμανδριται, made an appeal to Marcian the emperor for a general council in A.D. 451 (Labbe, iv. 524 a). The orthodox archimandrites, however, at the council of Chalcedon, refused to recognize him as archimandrite or anything else, "We do not know Eugnomonius" (Labbe, iv. 522 a). [C. G.]

EUGRAPHIA (1), a rich widow of Constantinople, an intimate associate of the empress Eudoxia, and a leading member of the female cabal for the destruction of Chrysostom, who had aroused their enmity by his unsparing denunciations of their avarice, luxury, and extravagance. Her house was the meeting-place of all, both clergy and laity, who were disaffected to Chrysostom. (Pallad. Dial. p. 35.) [E. V.]

EUGRAPHIA (2), a lady to whom Theodoret expresses himself as under great obligations, and whom on the death of her husband he addressed in a long and beautiful letter, offering her various grounds of consolation. (Theod. Epist. 69.) [E. V.]

EUGRAPHUS, a martyr at Alexandria with Menas and Hermogenes, under Maximin; commemorated Dec. 10. (Men. Bas.; Baron. Annal. 307, 38); Dec. 3 (Cal. Armen.) [T. S. B.]

EUGYPPIUS, abbat. [EUGIPPIUS.]

EUHEL (EOIL), commemorated November 14 with Fachtna of Cill-toma, and Gabhran, his two brothers. They are called the three sons of Dubhthach, in the Irish kalendars, and in the Drummond Missal there is commemoration made "trium fratrum Gabran, Eoil et Fachtna."

One of this name, "Euhel de Ros-coerach," is said to have been a pupil at Loch Eirce under St. Barry (September 25) of Cork (Colgan, Acta SS. 607; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 28). [J. G.]

EUIN, duke of Trent (Tridentum), one of the dukes who ruled Italy for ten years after the death of Kleph, when there was no Lombard king. During this time he repelled an invasion made upon his duchy by the Franks. He had charge of an army sent by king Autharis, c. 589, into Istria, and was sent by king Agilulf, c. 591, to make peace with the Franks. He died c. 595. (Paulus Diaconus, ii. 32; iii. 9, 27; iv. 10, who derives this local information probably from Secundus of Trent.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUIPPPIUS, a bishop of long standing, holding Arianizing doctrines, from whom, though there was much reason for his being united to him, Basil felt it due to the cause of truth to separate altogether (Bas. Epist. 57 [56], ad Meletium, 128 [265]). Eustathius of Sebaste, in A.D. 360 violently declaimed against Euippius as not deserving the name of bishop, being one of those by whom Eustathius had been deposed, yet in A.D. 376 Eustathius united himself to Euippius, and recognized the bishops and presbyters he had ordained. (Epist. 226 [73], 239 [10], 244 [82], 251 [72].) [E. V.]

EULADIUS (EULALIUS), placed by the diptychs of the church of Arles as bishop between Patroclus and St. Honoratus (Mabillon, Vet. Analact. p. 220, nov. edit. 1723). Tillemont (Mém. xii. 481) argues that his episcopate could have occupied only a brief period in 426. He is not recognized in the Gallia Christiana (i. 526). [C. H.]

EULADIUS, bishop of Bourges. [EULODIUS.]

EULADIUS, ST., said to have been the first bishop of Nevers. In the twenty-fifth year of his reign (506) Clovis sent for St. Severinus, abbat of St. Maurice (Agaunum), whose miraculous cures were then noised abroad. On his way to Paris, the saint came to Nevers, and asking for the bishop found Euladius lying dead and dumb. He straightway healed him by the sound of his voice. Coquille (Hist. du Nivernois Paris, 1612, sub fin.) apparently identifies him with Oeladius or Æoladius, whom he places seventh, others sixth, in the list of the Nevers bishops. He is commemorated Aug. 26. (Vita S. Severini in Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. 569, Paris, 1668-1701; Gall. Christ. xii. 626.) [S. A. B.]

EULALIA (1), virgin martyr, born in the 4th century, of noble parents, at Merida (S. Emerita) in Spain. At the age of twelve, during the persecution of Diocletian, she was concealed by her mother, but escaped, and went of her own accord to Datianus, the Roman governor. Before him she declared that she was a Christian and that she despised his idols and the emperor who worshipped them. Proof against both torture and flatteries, she struck the governor and overthrew the corn which was being offered to the idols. After she had been burnt to death, it is said that her soul came forth like a white dove and hovered over her body till snow fell and covered it. (Coillier, Hist. des Auteurs ecclés. iii. 39; Baron. Annales Eccles. A.D. 303, 138.) She is commemorated Dec. 10 (Mart. Rom. Vet., Ad., Ca. Wand.). Prudentius has a hymn in her honour (Peristeph. hymn ili.). Bede in his hymn on Etheldreda gives her the following line:—

"Eulalia et perferit ignibus usta ferla."

(H. E. iv. 20.)

[L. G. S.]

EULALIA (3), saint of Barcelona. The very existence of this famous saint, to whom the cathedral of Barcelona is dedicated, has been disputed, and is, indeed, extremely doubtful. The story of her martyrdom is almost identical with that of St. Eulalia of Merida. Both saints are represented as living with their parents in the country. Both hurry to the neighbouring city when the news of the Diocletian persecution reaches them, both seek out the Praeses, and defy him and the gods, both are tortured and burnt over a slow fire. On the bodies of both after death snow descends, and covers them from sight. From the mouths of both a white dove ascends to heaven at the moment of death, and both are visited after death by a certain Felix who had been converted by their example. The points of difference are—(1) Eulalia of Merida is represented by Prudentius as twelve years old, Eulalia of Barcelona is fourteen; (2) in the case of the Barcelona saint the Praeses is the famous Dacian, in the case of Eulalia of Merida, Calpurnian; (3) in the Acta of Eulalia of Barcelona the dead face smiles miraculously at Felix, evidently a touch of later poetry. It is extremely difficult to fix the date of the earliest mentions of Eulalia of Barcelona. In the Mozarabic Liturgy each saint has a complete office, and a complete Mass. The feast of Eulalia of Merida falls on the 10th of December, that of Eulalia of Barcelona on the 12th of February. The authenticity of the hymn in the Mozarabic breviary, in honour of Eulalia of Barcelona, by Quiricus, bishop of Barcelona, and which Gams dates about 650, is doubted by Arevalo (see his edition of Prudentius, Migne, lx. 339). We may consider the cult of this saint however to have been established by the seventh century, and in the following century we find her name in Bede's Martyrology, in which Eulalia of Merida is omitted. Bede, in common with various later authors, says that she was beheaded, a variation from the Acta, which must surely have been a conscious or unconscious attempt to distinguish between the two Eulalias. It seems scarcely possible to doubt that the one story is a reflection of the other. Nevertheless, opinion has been always greatly divided, and Gams, the latest ecclesiastical historian of Spain (Kirchen-geschichte, vol. i. p. 306), has succeeded in persuading himself of the existence of the two Eulalias. The silence of Prudentius, who devotes an entire hymn to Eulalia of Merida, and who might so easily have introduced the name of Eulalia of Barcelona into his mention of that city when he speaks of the martyr Cecilia (Prudentius, Peristeph. hymn 4, 33), together with the similarity of the stories and the likeness of the Acta, has seemed conclusive to many hagiologists against the existence of Eulalia of Barcelona. The cult of the saint is, however, one of the most famous in Spain, and her supposed relics rest in a subterranean chapel of the cathedral of Barcelona, which was consecrated in 1339, and whither they were transferred from the older fabric of 1058, built in its turn upon the site of the still earlier church into which, in 878, bishop Frodoïn of Barcelona is said to have transferred the remains from the church of St. Mary without the walls (Boll. AA. SS. Feb. ii. 576).

EULALIA (3), wife of Probus, and cousin of Sidonius Apollinarius, who addresses her husband in terms of great affection, recalling the early days when Probus was his teacher. (Sid. Apoll. Epp. iv. 1.)

EULALIA (4), lady at the court of Charlemagne, addressed by Alcuin. [GUNDRADA.]

EULALIUS (1), an antipope, elected and ordained as bishop of Rome after the death of Zosimus at the close of the year 418, in opposition to Boniface I., who was finally established in the see, Eulalius being expelled from Rome, by the emperor Honorius in the April of the following year. The official letters which passed have been preserved in the Vatican, and are quoted at length by Baronius (A. E. ann. 418, lxxix. 419, ii.—xxxii.). A summary of their contents, and of the facts deducible from them is here subjoined, since they throw light on the conflicts attending the election of bishops, and on the powers exercised by the emperors in connexion with such elections. First we have a letter (Dec. 29, 418) to Honorius at Ravenna from Symmachus the Praefectus Urbis, who had entered on his duties as such only two days before the death of Zosimus. He states that, after he had warned the people to proceed to a new election without disturbance, Eulalius the archdeacon had been taken to the Lateran church by the clergy and people, duly elected, and ordained; that in the meantime certain presbyters, accompanied by a crowd, had gone with Bonifacius, a presbyter, to the church of Theodora, and, though warned by himself to do nothing rashly, had persisted in ordaining him in the church of St. Marcellus, and thence proceeded with him to St. Peter's basilica. He concludes by requesting the instructions of the emperor, with whom, he says, it rests to give judgment in such a case.

Honorius, taking for granted the correctness of this ex-parte statement, replies (Jan. 3, 419) by ordering Boniface to be expelled from the city, and the authors of the sedition in his favour punished, the reason given for such order being that Eulalius had been duly appointed according to the rule of Catholic discipline (competens numerus ordinantium, solemnitas temporis, locique qualitas), the election of his rival being deficient in these respects. Symmachus replies (Jan. 8) that he has carried out the emperor's order, though not without resistance on the part of Boniface; that the latter had caused a messenger, sent to summon him and to forbid a procession which he was about to commence, to be beaten by the people; had proceeded with the procession in spite of the prohibition; had entered the city again by violence, though the gates were guarded to keep him out; but had been since again expelled by an opposing mob; and that Eulalius had in the meantime celebrated divine service in the basilica of St. Peter amid the acclamations and approval of almost the whole city.

In the meantime the Roman presbyters who supported Boniface had sent the emperor a different account of things from that given by Symmachus. They had been unable, they say, to assemble for a new election in the customary place, namely, the Lateran church, because of its being taken possession of by Eulalius with a very small number of presbyters and an excited mob; they had been compelled therefore to assemble elsewhere, representing themselves as the great majority of the clergy of Rome, and as supported by the better part of the laity, that amid general acclamation of the people they had elected Boniface who, in addition to other merits, was recommended by his unwillingness to accept the dignity offered him; that seventy priests and nine bishops of diverse provinces had concurred in his ordination, whereas his rival had the support of but a small number of clergy, the bishop of Ostia, a sick old man almost at the point of death, having been brought against his will to assist in his ordination. They therefore petitioned the emperor to revoke his former edict, issued under false information, and to summon Eulalius and his abettors to his presence, promising on their side the attendance of Boniface with as many of the presbyters of his party as might be required, for the settlement of the dispute.

Having received this counterstatement, Honorius writes to Symmachus (Jan. 18), revoking his former edict; bidding him command the attendance at Ravenna on a proscribed day (Feb 8) of Boniface and Eulalius, with their respective supporters, prepared to support their cause by reference to ecclesiastical precedent before a synod which was being summoned from various provinces to hear the arguments. In the meantime the matter in dispute was to be considered entirely open and awaiting judgment, with the proviso that the non-appearance of either claimant would be construed as fatal to his claim. Symmachus in reply (Jan. 25), while he reports in courtly phrases his diligent execution of the imperial commands, no longer writes as the supporter of Eulalius, being anxious to represent himself as entirely impartial, and accuses both parties (whom he had forbidden to resort together sh from fear of conflict) of endeavouring their positions by calumnies to start a commotion of the bishops summoned by him to which any who had taken part in ordination of either claimant be either judges or witnesses, a rest are warned to approach about prejudice, and decide after under the guidance of the Holy own the documents that follow re of the synod thus summoned sympathy or opinion and unable mission before Easter (Mar. 30), joined the presence of a bishop in Rome to celebrate the solemnities of the season. Honorius therefore decided on deferring the consideration of the case till after Easter, when he proposed to refer it to a fuller synod, and in the meantime commissioned Achilleus bishop of Spoleto to celebrate Easter in Rome after the usual manner, forbidding both claimants to the see to appear there for the present. In the letter addressed by the emperor to Symmachus, to Achilleus, to the senate, and to the people generally, on this occasion, considerable apprehension of disregard of his injunctions and of disturbance is evident. While on the one hand he takes pains to justify his prerogative of the question on the ground of its importance, the number of new points that had arisen for consideration, and the duty of the emperor to see that episcopal synods decided nothing in haste, though not to arrogate the function of decision; on the other hand he exacts obedience to his orders in a high tone of authority, and threatens with summary punishment all disturbers of the peace.

Having thus, as he hoped, provided for the peaceful celebration of Easter, he lost no time in summoning bishops from far and wide for the intended full synod to be held at Spoleto on the 13th of June. To this end he sent private letters to several of the more important prelates, such as Paulinus bishop of Nola, whose infirmities had prevented his attendance at the previous synod, Augustine, and Aurelius bishop of Carthage, together with circular letters to the bishops of Africa and of Gaul. The proposed assembly however never took place. Eulalius and his party, disregarding the imperial orders, entered Rome at mid-day, Mar. 18, came into violent collision with Achilleus and his supporters, so that a fray ensued, during which Symmachus and the Vicarius Urbis, interposing, narrowly escaped with their lives. On hearing of this the emperor ordered (Mar. 25) Eulalius to be immediately expelled from the city, declaring that his refusal to go would be fatal to his claim to the see, as well as involve him in further consequences. Having not only refused to comply, but also taken violent possession of the Lateran church, he was eventually dislodged thence and from Rome; and his expulsion was followed by an imperial edict (Ap. 3), excluding him from the see and confirming Boniface as bishop of Rome. Accordingly the latter was forthwith conducted into the city, and accepted as bishop, being welcomed (if Symmachus is to be believed) by the whole population with joy, and gratitude to the emperor for his salutary edict. An impartial rescript (Ap. 7) to the presenset Largus countermanded the summons sent to the bishops of Africa and Gaul, speaking of the question at issue being now finally settled by imperial authority.

Eulalius seems to have acquiesced in this decision. At first he retired to Antium, near Rome, expecting the death of Boniface, who fell sick after his accession, but, this hope failing, he made no further attempt to recover the see, though invited to do so by his partisans in Rome on the death of Boniface in 423. According to the Liber Pontificalis he afterwards became bishop of Nepes. Honorius in a letter to Boniface after his establishment in the see endeavoured to provide against future scandals by forbidding all canvassing for the bishopric, and ordering that in any future case of a double election neither of the candidates should be accepted, but a new election made with general consent.

From the account given above, extracted from authentic contemporary documents, the following facts are evident. First, that the ancient custom, prevalent at the time, of election of a new bishop by the clergy, with the assent of the laity, and confirmation by provincial bishops, was allowed in this case, with no desire apparent on the part of the civil power to interfere with it. Secondly, that elections had come to be conducted in an irregular and tumultuous manner, the claims of rival candidates giving rise (as had been also the case on the election of Damasus) to violent party conflicts, attended with bloodshed in the churches as well as in the streets. Thirdly, that it was the necessity of restoring order, and adjudicating between rival claims, that called forth the interference of the emperor in such church affairs. Fourthly, that in this case the emperor at first claimed no right to decide on the validity of either of the two elections on his own mere authority, or without first submitting the question to an episcopal synod; though, on the other hand, he assumed the power of selecting the members of such synod, directing its proceedings, and dissolving it at his pleasure, as well as coercing authoritatively the clergy of Rome pendente iudicio, and commissioning whom he chose to supply the place of the Roman bishop for the time. Fifthly, that eventually he settled the whole question on his own mere authority, without either the sanction of a synod, or regard to the canonicity of the original election of the candidate whom he established in the see. A statement, contained in the Liber Pontificalis, that Eulalius was deposed by a synod of 252 bishops, is entirely inconsistent with the evidence of the contemporary documents above referred to, and, as such, Irenaeus gives it up. It is true that in the letters in which Honorius announces his final decision he intimates that the synod already held without result, as well as himself, had decided that such an attempt as Eulalius had made should involve the deposition of either defendant; but in one letter (that to the proconsul Largus) he speaks of this doubtfully,—“Id quod nostra sententia ordinaverat, et quod iustitiae synodi sententia videbatur,”—and elsewhere he takes the whole responsibility on himself; and the letters of Symmachus and Largus refer the entire decision to him; nor is there evidence of such exercise of power being on this occasion challenged.

With regard to the real claims of the two rivals on the ground of canonical election, it is generally taken for granted, and probably with truth, that the letter of the Roman presbyters who supported Boniface gives a correct account of things, and hence that his claim was the valid one. Still it should be remembered that the previous letter of Symmachus gave a different account, that the synod summoned to consider the question was unable to come to a decision, and that the imperial verdict in favour of Boniface was irrespective of the original merits of the case.

EULALIUS (2), reputed to have been the fourth bishop of Syracuse, succeeding Chrestus II.

c. A.D. 90, and followed by Espinas. (Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, i. 630.) [R. S. G.]

EULALIUS (3). A bishop of this name is said by Socrates (H. E. ii. 43) and Sozomen (H. E. iv. 24) to have presided over Caesarea in Cappadocia, in the early part of the 4th century, and to have had as son the notorious Eustathius of Sebasteia, whom he deposed from holy orders for adopting a dress unsuitable to his office. As no bishop of the name is found at Caesarea at this time, it is probable that these not over-accurate historians have fallen into an error. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. ix. note 24, S. Basile.)

EULALIUS (4), a presbyter, otherwise unknown, chosen by the Arian party of Antioch, as bishop after the deposition of Eustathius, c. A.D. 322. He died a few months after his consecration. The only act recorded of his episcopate is the banishment of Aetius the Anomoean from Antioch (Theod. H. E. i. 22; Hieron. Chron. sub ann. 2344; Philostorg. H. E. iii. 15). There is considerable uncertainty as to the succession and dates of the intruded bishops of Antioch at this period. According to Socrates (H. E. i. 24) the see was vacant for eight years after the deposition of Eustathius, and was then filled by Euphronius. Sozomen also (H. E. ii. 19) makes Euphronius the next successor to Eustathius. Philostorgius, on the other hand, states that Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, was translated to the vacant see, and, having occupied it only six months, was succeeded by Eulalius (cf. Euseb. Contr. Marcell. c. 4; Valesius in Euseb. H. E. x. 1; in Socr. H. E. i. 24; Kaye, Council of Nicaea, p. 60, note 4). [EUSTATHIUS (3) OF SEBASTEIA. EUSEBIUS (23) PAMPHILI, p. 315, note.] [E. V.]

EULALIUS (5), bishop of Iconium, the metropolis of Lycaonia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1068; Mansi, ii. 695.)

EULALIUS (6), bishop of Sebaste, the metropolis of Lesser Armenia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. In some MSS. the name is written EULOGIUS. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 421; Gama, Series Episc. 440; Mansi, ii. 694.)

EULALIUS (7), bishop of Amantia in Epirus, A.D. 343. (Farlati, Illyr. Sacr. vii. 394.) One of the Eusebian party who attended the synod of Philippopolis, A.D. 347, and signed the manifesto to the African church. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 267.)

[J. de S.]

EULALIUS (8), bishop of Doara in Cappadocia Secunda. Shortly before his appointment the church at Doara had suffered severe persecution from the Arians. The orthodox party, however, succeeded in expelling the Arian prelate and electing Eulalius in his room, A.D. 373. Gregory Nazianzen delivered the sermon at his enthronement, in which he commends him highly (Greg. Naz. Orat. 30). Three years later, A.D. 376, the deposed bishop, of whom Basil gives the lowest character, speaking of him as a runaway slave, the paramour of a powerful matron of the place, recovered his see. (Basil, Ep. 231, 239 [395, 10].)

EULALIUS (9), bishop of Amasea in Pontus, banished by Valens and restored by Gratian in 378. His love of peace and fear of schism led him to prefer that the intruded Arian bishops should retain their posts rather than that the Catholics by the assertion of their own just claims should rend the church. Eulalius on his restoration proposed to the bishop whom he found occupying his throne to share the government with him, giving him the precedence. His proposition was refused by the Arian bishop, who soon lent to the orthodox party the small following he had. (See H. E. vii. 3) [E. V.]

EULALIUS (10), bishop of Nazianzus, a cousin of Gregory Nazianzen (Ep. 195 [187]), the brother of Helladius, sons of a mother worthy of each offspring (Carm. 48). The two brothers embraced a solitary life, and purchased a farm on which they might live apart from the world. The enterprise proved disastrous. The seller proved a knave, and their neighbours so unneighbourly, that after the brothers had expended a considerable sum on the estate, they were fain to beg to be allowed to resign it at the original price (Ep. 105). Gregory was much attached to his cousins, and wrote in their behalf to Caesarian, prefect of Constantinople (ibid.) and to Lollia (Ep. 182). Helladius died before A.D. 372, leaving the care of his sick mother to Eulalius alone (p. 108, Carm. 48). Eulalius subsequently became a presbyter and chorepiscopus, and was deputed by Gregory, in conjunction with Celsus, to apprise Theodorus of Tyana of the delays of the Apollinarians (Ep. 86; cf. Tillemont, ix. p. 722; "St. Greg. Naz." note iv.). In A.D. 382 Eulalius was living with other solitaries at Lamin. Gregory visited him during the Lent of that year, which season Gregory had vowed to pass in absolute silence. His sighs and gestures were so correctly interpreted by Eulalius that the visit was one of great mutual edification. When Lent was over Gregory wrote condemning Eulalius for the excessive severity of his self-denial, and proposing to visit him again, now that he could once more hold converse with him (Ep. 98-102). Tillemont reasonably identifies him with Eulalius, Gregory's successor in the see of Nazianzus, 383, who was consecrated by the bishops of Cappadocia Secunda (Ep. 225). Gregory commended him warmly to his namesake of Nyssa, as one in whose arms he would be glad to die. He must not credit the tale that Eulalius's consecration had been in defiance of his wishes; on the contrary, he had repeatedly begged the bishop of his province to relieve him of his episcopate and appoint watchfulness over the weaker members, ruling the fallen, and bringing back the straying, and at the same time exercising a strict and faithful discipline to deepen their repentance and ensure their recovery. Theodoret assures them that he does not write as one possessed of authority over them, but as a friendly counsellor. The letter was sent by Stephen, a presbyter, who had brought Theodoret the news of the persecution. (Theod. Epist. 77.) [E. V.]

EULALIUS (11), bishop of Chalcedon, a contemporary of Nestorius, 430, mentioned in the life of St. Hypatius the hegumen [HYPATIUS (19)]. His lukewarmness is contrasted with the zeal of Hypatius, in refusing to break with Nestorius before his condemnation, in not resisting Leontius and the Olympic games, in expelling Alexander and his monks. The Bellandus, however, throws doubts on his existence, his name not appearing at the council of Ephesus, 431, nor at the Latrecianum, 449. At the council of Chalcedon, 451, Eleutherius was bishop. (A.A. SS. Boll. 17 Jan. iii. 231, 237; Le Quion, Oriens Christ. i. 601.) [C. H.]

EULALIUS (12), bishop of Pionis in Mysia, present at the oecumenical council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quion, Oriens Christ. i. 720; Mansi, vii. 152.) [L. D.]

EULALIUS (13), bishop of Sühium in Phrygia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quion, Oriens Christ. i. 206; Mansi, vii. 154.) [L. D.]

EULALIUS (14), supposed bishop of Viviers. The name without a see appears at the second and fourth councils of Arles, A.D. 452 and 463 (Sirmood, Conc. Gall. i. 102, 132). It has been contended that Viviers was his bishopric. An undecipherable name in an ancient MS. list of bishops of Viviers is thus supplied. This view involves a correction of the chronology of Tillemont (Mém. xvi. 106), who believes Anzonius to have filled the see of Viviers up to A.D. 464. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 544; Gams, Ser. Ep. 634.) [R. T. S.]

EULALIUS (15), bishop of Syracuse, cir. 500. He is mentioned by the writer of the life of St. Fulgentius bishop of Ruspe prefixed to the works of that author. (Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxx.) [FULGENTIUS (3).] Smitten with the love of the monastic life, Fulgentius had sailed from Carthage with the intention of proceeding to the Thebaid. The vessel touched at Syracuse, and the biographer gives a very pleasing picture of the Syracusan bishop, who was greatly impressed by the young traveller. Eulalius held the monastic life in the highest esteem, but dissuaded Fulgentius from going to a country not in communion with the see of St. Peter. Eulalius told him that as a youth he himself had entertained the intention of going as a monk to these very regions, but had been deterred by this difficulty. He entertained Fulgentius for several weeks, finding him in lodging and supplying all his wants (Migne, sup. pp. 128-130). In the letters of Eusebius (lib. iii. 18), we have two to a Eulalius, which were probably addressed to this bishop. Eulalius was present at the fourth synod of Rome under Symmachus, A.D. 501, and took a leading part in the condemnation of the proceedings of Basilus the minister of Odoacer in reference to church property. The speech he delivered on that occasion is of some historical value. (Mansi, vii. 268; Gieseler, Ecol. Hist. ii. p. 122, n. 8, ed. Clark.) Eulalius likewise attended the Roman synod of 503. (Mansi, viii. 299.)

[F. A.]

EULALIUS (17), bishop of Italica (Santi-pae) near Seville, from about A.D. 580 to 589. He signs the third council of Toledo in the forty-first place, taking precedence of twenty-one bishops. In 590 he was succeeded by Sinticus, and may therefore have taken some part in the troubles between Leovigild and Hermengild (q. v.). Eulalius is the first historical bishop of Italica, though legend makes St. GERONTIUS the founder of the see. We have no mention of the see after the Moorish invasion, and the town, which was founded or at any rate named by the great Scipio, has disappeared. (Cortez y Lapez, Dicc. Geogr. Hist. de la España antigua, ii. 97.) It was only a few miles from Seville, and the bishop was therefore naturally a suffragan of that metropolitan see. (Esp. Sagr. xii. 243, 221; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238.)

[M. A. W.]

EULALIUS (18), archipresbyter of Arthona (Artonne in dep. Puy de Dôme) in the 6th century. Gregory of Tours relates how he was entertaining the clergy and the presbyter Edatius the poor and the widows, when the local saint Vitalina, whose vigil they were celebrating, asked them to supply a deficiency in the viands. (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. cap. 5. Pat. Lat. lxxi. 134.)

[T. W. D.]

EULALIUS (19), a count in Auvergne in the 6th century who ill-used his wife Tetradia, and was accused by common fame of being a parricide. On the latter charge he was excommunicated by his bishop Cantinus (ob. 572). Presenting himself at church on the feast of the martyr St. Julian, Eulalius complained to the bishop of having been condemned unheard, whereupon the bishop proposed to test his innocence at the communion. "Take," said he, on reaching that part of the service, "a portion (particulam) of the Eucharist, and put it in your mouth." Eulalius did so and returned in safety (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. x. 8. Pat. Lat. lxxi. 535). From this narrative Mabillon (Levy. Gall. i. 5, § 25) has drawn some inference as to the ceremonial of the period, one of them being that communicants received the bread into their own hands. (Cf. Bingham, Antiq. iv. 5, § 6.)

[T. W. D.]

EULALIUS (20), bishop of Zenopolis in Syria, the locality of which is doubtful. He was present at the sixth general council at Constantinople, A.D. 680. (Mansi, xi. 335; Le Quien, Or. Orient. ii. 1033.)

[J. de S.]

EULAMIUS, a heathen Phrygian philosopher of the 6th century, who in company with Damascius a Syrian, Priscianus a Lydian, and Diogenes, Phoenicians, Isidorus of Armenia, Simplicius a Caesarian, all of them the most eminent of their time, withdrew into Persia, to enjoy greater liberty and meet with general sympathy under king Chosroes than under the Byzantine Christian emperors. They soon found themselves disappointed, and were glad to return. (Agathias, Hist. ii. 30, ed. Dindorf. 1828, p. 131.)

EULAMPIA (1), a martyr together with Eulampius her brother. They were natives of Nicomedia. When the Diocletian persecution broke out, they left their home and retired to a mountain where a number of Christians had taken refuge. One day, however, Eulampius went into the city to purchase provisions; he was recognized as a Christian, arrested, and tortured. As soon as Eulampia received intelligence of this, she came down to the city, threw herself at the side of her brother, and confessed that she was one with him in his faith. They were then both beheaded. They are commemorated Oct. 10. (Men. Bas.)

EULAMPIA (2), mother of the historian Philostorgius, and known to us through a slight mention preserved of her by Photius in his abridgment of the ecclesiastical history of her son. As Philostorgius was born about A.D. 364, we may consider her as belonging to the middle of the 4th century. It would appear that she was the only daughter of an orthodox presbyter of the name of Anysius, who lived at Borissus, a village of Cappadocia, and had likewise four sons. Eulampia, we may be sure, was brought up in the orthodox faith, at that time sadly tried by the prevalence of the Arian or Semi-Arian heresy.

But Eulampia did not continue orthodox. She married one Carterius belonging to the sect of the Eunomians, the keenest and most zealous inheritors of the now condemned Arianism, and whose attachment to the faith which they had inherited was strengthened rather than weakened by the cruel persecutions which they had to endure in maintaining it. Eulampia must have been a woman of ardent dispositions, for she embraced her new faith with great warmth and earnestness. We are told that she gained over to it first her brothers, then her father, and lastly, by degrees, the remainder of her relatives. What is of more consequence, however, is that she brought up her son Philostorgius in the same principles. The notice of her to which we have referred is contained in Philostorgius (lib. ix. c. 9).

[W. M.]

EULAMPIUS, martyr. [EULAMPIA (1).]

EULANCIUS, a friend of Basil, residing at Neocaesarea. Basil wrote to him, A.D. 375, complaining of his unwonted silence, and expressing his fear that he was beginning to look coldly upon him on account of his unpopularity with the Neocaesareans. (Bas. Ep. 208 [281].)

EULODIUS (EULADIUS), fourteenth bishop of Bourges, was father of St. Simplicius, his successor, as we learn from the oration of Sid. Apollinaris, upon the election of the latter. (Gall. Christ. ii. 8; Gams, Ser. Ep. 522.)

EULOGIUS (1), bishop of Sebaste. [EULAMPIUS.]

EULOGIUS (2), bishop of Ambianum (Amiens), at the council of Sardica, 347 (Athan.

Apol. cont. Ar. 133). His name also appears among those subscribed to the acts of the council of Cologne against Euphratas in 346, which however are now generally believed to be spurious. (Gall. Christ. x. 1151; Sirmond, Conc. Gall. i. 11; Mansi, ii. 1371.) [R. T. S.]

EULOGIUS (3), one of the bishops of Egypt in exile in Palestine for the faith, to whom Basil wrote by the deacon Elpidius, A.D. 376. Basil commends him and his fellows for their strenuous resistance to the errors of Apollinaria, but complains of their having admitted the followers of Marcellus to communion. (Basil, Ep. 265 [293].) [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (4), bishop of Edessa. When a presbyter of the church, he was a sufferer in the persecution of the orthodox by Valens. Barses, the orthodox bishop, having been deposed and exiled, the faithful refused to communicate with the Arian prelate, called by Theodoret "a wolf," who had been intruded into the see. Modestus the prefect, by order of Valens, having summoned before him the leading ecclesiastics, of whom Eulogius was the chief, and called upon them to obey the emperor's command, and to communicate with the new prelate, the whole body, with Eulogius at their head, offered so firm a resistance, that Modestus sentenced them, eighty in number, to transportation to Thrace. The holy confessors, however, received so much honour both on their journey and in their place of exile, that Valens broke up the band, and relegated them, two and two, to more distant and trying localities. Eulogius with his brother presbyter, Protogenes, were sent to Antinous in the Thebaid. Though there was a Catholic bishop here, the population was almost entirely pagan. The two presbyters, moved with compassion, commenced missionary work among these heathen. The active duties of the mission fell to Protogenes, who opened schools which attracted large numbers, and paved the way for their conversion. Eulogius meanwhile devoted himself to prayer for the success of the work, and baptized the new converts who were brought him by Protogenes. On the cessation of the persecution, Eulogius and Protogenes returned to Edessa, of which city, Barses being dead, Eulogius became bishop. He is said to have been consecrated by Eusebius of Samosata. (Theod. H. E. iv. 18; v. 4.) He attended the council held at Rome in A.D. 369 (Labbe, ii. 894), and those of Antioch in A.D. 379, and Constantinople in A.D. 381 (Labbe, ii. 955). Eulogius has been regarded as a saint in the western church, and is commemorated on the 5th of May. (See Soz. vi. 34, and Migne's note 61, Patr. Gr. lxxvii. 1394.) [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (5), bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, metropolitan, succeeded John, the successor of Gelasius, at the close of the fourth or early in the fifth century. Eulogius was already bishop in A.D. 404, when Chrysostom wrote to him from Cucusus, expressing very high esteem for his constancy in the faith, and his many virtues; and his hope that the influence of Eulogius would keep the other bishops of Palestine in the right faith (Chrys. Epist. 87). If Palladius is to be believed, Eulogius was hardly worthy of this esteem, for he charges him with communicating with Theophilus, and of ill-treating some of the bishops and presbyters who were banished to Palestine for their adherence to Chrysostom's cause (Pallad. Dialog. p. 200). Two bishops of Gaul, Heros of Arles, and Lazarus of Aix, having brought an accusation of false doctrine against Pelagius during his residence in Palestine, before Eulogius, as metropolitan, he convened a synod which met at Diospolis, the ancient Lydda, in December, A.D. 415. Fourteen bishops assembled under the presidency of Eulogius. The accusers failing to appear under plea of sickness, Pelagius was left to defend himself unopposed, and succeeded in clearing himself of the errors with which he had been charged to the satisfaction of the synod, the members of which were but little acquainted with the subtle questions involved in the controversy. Jerome, as was natural, speaks of this synod with the utmost contempt—"in illa miserabili synodo Diospolitano" (Hieron. Ep. 79). Augustine, who gives its Acts, is more favourable to it. (Aug. Retract. ii. 47; Contra Julian. i. 5; Labbe, ii. 1532.) Eulogius is identified by Tillemont (Mém. Eccl. xi. 518) with the bishop of Caesarea, who deposed Eustathius, a reader of that church, on the false charge of corrupting the virgin daughter of a presbyter (Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 141). He died c. 417. [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (6), bishop of Trimythia (Terenuthis, Taranut), in the second province of the Thebais. He was present at the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1127; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 613.) [J. de S.]

EULOGIUS (7), bishop of Athribis in the Egyptian Delta. He was present at the fourth general council at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where, together with Dioscorus of Alexandria, and the other Egyptian bishops, he vainly opposed the influence of Leo. (Mansi, vii. 51; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 555.) [J. de S.]

EULOGIUS (8), bishop of Philadelphia, in Coele Syria, who signed the acts of the council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) as metropolitan of Arabia. (Labbe, iv. 83, 329, 454, &c.; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 861.) [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (9), bishop of Eporedia (Ivrea). Present at the council held under Eusebius of Milan in A.D. 451; appears as subscribing the synodical letter of the council to Leo I., by the hand of Florentius, a presbyter, because his weakness was too great to allow him to sign with his own hand. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 98, 1083, Migne.) [C. G.]

EULOGIUS (10), a bishop mentioned by Photius (Cod. 130, p. 285; Pat. Gr. ciii. 1086) as presiding in a council in the seventh year of the emperor Marcian (i.e. A.D. 457), and issuing a Decree against the Samaritans. Photius appears to confuse him with the patriarch of Alexandria (No. 14), who lived much later. Tillemont (xv. 782) and Ceillier (xi. 592) suggest the possibility of his being the bishop of Philadelphia (No. 8). [C. H.]

EULOGIUS (11), bishop of Melitene, the metropolis of the Greater Armenia, signed the letter of the synod of Constantinople to pope Hormisdas concerning the ordination of archbishop Epiphanius, A.D. 520. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 443; Mansi, viii. 493.) [L. D.]

EULOGIUS (12), bishop of Perga, the metropolis of the second Pamphylia, present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553, at Constantinople. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1015; Mansi, ix. 394.) [L. D.]

EULOGIUS (13), bishop of Danaba in Phoenicia Secunda, west of Palmyra. He was present at the fifth general council held at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 394; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1015.) [J. de S.]

EULOGIUS (14), fortieth bishop of Alexandria and patriarch, between John I. and Theodosius Scribe, 579–607. He was originally a priest and head of the monastery of the Deipara at Iktish. Some time about 582–584 he had become acquainted with Gregory, afterwards pope Gregory the Great, at Constantinople, from whose letters and from Photius's Bibliotheca the best account of his life and writings can be drawn. He adhered to the Catholic faith, passing his life in struggles with the various forms assumed by the Monophysite heresy, and became revered as a saint both by the Greeks and Latins, being commemorated by the former on Feb. 13 (Basil. Act.) and by the latter on Sept. 13 (Mart. Rom.; Bell. A.A. 88. Sept. iv. 83). The principal modern accounts of him are those of Stilting, the Bellandier (ut sup.), Le Quien and Neale (ut sup.). The patriarchate of Eulogius, and that of John the Almoner who followed him soon afterwards, shed a parting lustre on the Alexandrian church before the Saracen invasion came and overwhelmed it. The bishops of the schools with whom Eulogius had to contend were Damianus and Anastasius Apozygarius; but Alexandrian Jacobitism was then in a corrupt state and found a powerful antagonist in the learned and energetic patriarch.

It is a matter of dispute whether in 588 Eulogius held a synod at Alexandria to settle a dispute amongst the Samaritans concerning the law, "a prophet like unto me" (Deut. xviii. 15), which some of them referred to Joshua, some to Jeruzam, the synod deciding that both were wrong (Photius, Cod. 230; Mansi, ix. 1021). In Photius, the authority for this synod, says it was held in the reign of Marcian, either its president was a different Eulogius or Marcian was not the emperor. Those who adopt the latter view, Stilting among them, conclude that Photius wrote Marcian by mistake for Maurice. For another solution of the difficulty see EULOGIUS (10). Photius gives a detailed account of the writings and orations of Eulogius against Ibas a Novatian (Codd. 182, 208); against Ibas and Timotheus, heretics; against Theodosius; against the union between the Theodosians and Gaisnites (Codd. 225–227); the eleven letters of Eulogius (Cod. 230); and a work against the Novatians divided into five books (Cod. 209). The extant correspondence between Eulogius and Gregory, who were united to one another by a very warm friendship, ranges from 585 to 600, but only Gregory's letters are preserved. In 595 Eulogius is urged to offer strenuous opposition to the title of Universal Bishop assumed by the patriarch John the Elder of Constantinople (Greg. Epp. lib. v. lib. vi. ep. 43). In 596 Gregory dwells upon the intimate union there should naturally exist between the sees of Alexandria and Rome on account of St. Mark having been placed over the former by St. Peter (lib. vi. ind. xiv. ep. 60). In 597 Eulogius is complimented on the vigour he is displaying in his conflict with heresy (lib. vii. ind. xv. ep. 40). In 598 he is inquiring for a work on the gesta martyrum by Eusebius distinct from that historian's account of the martyrs in his extant works. [EUSEBIUS (23), p. 321.] Gregory, who can find no such book either in the archives of the Roman church or in the libraries of the city, takes occasion to send him some interesting information as to how the martyr festivals were then observed at Rome. Gregory is at that time sending him a cargo of timber, but the timber is too small for Eulogius, and no ship will carry beams of the size that he requires (lib. viii. ind. i. ep. 29). It might be surmised that the timber was for a new church. The most interesting letter of all the series is that which Eulogius received in 598, written in June according to the computation of Jaffé (Regest. Pontif. p. 125). He is congratulated on the ground he is gaining upon the heretics, on the harmony of the Alexandrian Catholics, and on their growth in numbers. Gregory can gladden his heart by a narrative of similar prosperity in another quarter. The race of the Angli, placed in an angle of the world, hitherto the victims of a perverse belief and an idolatrous worship, are at length yielding to the gospel. The monk he sent to Britain is now a bishop and doing marvels. News has come that at the preceding Christmas more than ten thousand Angli had been baptized. Eulogius then may shew his Alexandrians how much can be effected at the farthest extremity of the earth by prayer (lib. viii. ind. i. ep. 30). Gregory's expressions in one passage seem to attribute to Eulogius himself no little share in originating the English mission. In 599 Gregory complains that Eulogius does not reply to his observations on the subject of the patriarch John's arrogance (lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 78); perhaps the titular encroachment concerned Alexandria less than it did Rome. Larger timber has now been procured, but the vessel is too small to carry it; what would Eulogius have him do (ib.)? The latest letters received from Gregory were two in the year 600 on the subject of the Agnoëtae (lib. x. ind. iii. epp. 35, 39). From Photius (Cod. 230) it appears that Gregory found fault with a synodal letter received from Eulogius, because it did not make definite mention of the four councils, of Leo's tome, and of the phrase "in two natures"—that test of the true faith, whereupon Eulogius wrote back defending and explaining his orthodoxy.

The death of Eulogius is placed by Le Quien in 607; by Stilting about 605 or 606 (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 442; Neale, Patriar. Alex. ii. 46–52.) [L. D. & C. H.]

EULOGIUS (15), deacon, martyred at Terragona with FRUCTUOSUS his bishop, under Valerian. Commemorated Jan. 21. (Mart. Hier., Adon., Usuard.) [T. S. B.]

EULOGIUS (16), martyr at Constantinople during the Arian persecution in the reign of Valens. He is commemorated July 3. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hier., Ad., Us., Wand.) [T. S. B.]

EULOGIUS (17). An Egyptian monk and presbyter of the 4th century, renowned for his wonderful insight and strictness of discipline, which often made him repel men from the communion, on account of evil thoughts which he had detected in them. (Rufinus, Hist. Mon. cap. 14; Sozomen, vi. 28; Niceph. Call. H. E. xi. 34; Cassiod. Hist. Trip. viii. 1, p. 323, in Pat. Lat. lxxix. 1107 D.) [W. H. F.]

EULOGIUS (18), a monk to whom St. Ephrem Syrus addressed his 47th Paraenesis, which consists of counsels and exhortations chiefly relating to the monastic life. (Ephr. Syr. Opp. ii. 170, ed. Rom. 1743; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs ecclés. vi. 34.) [T. W. D.]

EULOGIUS (19), a presbyter of Constantinople, and an adherent of Cyril, who wrote to inform him of what had occurred at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Cyrill. ep. 23, Migne, al. 21, p. 84, Patr. Gr. lxxvii. 132.) [C. H.]

EULOGIUS (20), a monk to whom St. Nilus addressed one of his treatises on the ascetic life. (Nil. Opp. in Pat. Gr. lxxix. 1094; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs ecclés. viii. 217.) [I. G. S.]

EULOGIUS (21), deacon of the church of Constantinople, A.D. 449. On the appointment of the imperial commission to investigate the charges against Ibas of Edessa, consisting of Eustathius of Berytus, Photius of Tyre, and Uranius of Himera, Eulogius, as the deacon of Flavian, communicated the necessary letters of authority from the bishop to the commissioners (Labbe, Concil. iv. 627). He accompanied the commission to Berytus, and was present during the investigation, as well as at the further proceedings which were held at Tyre, and at the signing of the concordat between Ibas and his accusers (ibid. 635). [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (22), oeconomus of the church at Constantinople, who had himself contended for the orthodox faith, to whom Theodoret wrote A.D. 449, when Dioscorus and others were clamouring for his deposition as a heretic, calling upon Eulogius, as being well acquainted with his teaching, to bear witness to the soundness of his belief, and stop the mouths of his calumniators. (Theod. Epist. 105.) [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (23), a tribune, one of the two imperial commissioners deputed by Theodosius II. to the "Robbers' Synod" of Ephesus in A.D. 449. [ELPIDIUS (42).] [E. V.]

EULOGIUS (24), an officer of rank carrying despatches from the Byzantine court to pope Hormisdas in the year 519. He is designated vir sublimis (Mansi, viii. 474), vir spectabilis et magistrianus (482), vir strenuus (484), vir sublimis (485), vir sublimis tribunus et notarius (515). The letters are undated, but they are assigned by Jaffé (Reg. Pont. 69 sq.) and Baronius (ann. 519, xciv.) to the above year. [C. H.]

EULYSIUS, bishop of Apamea in Bithynia, one of Chrysostom's most loyal adherents. He was one of the leading members of the body of forty bishops who gathered around Chrysostom in the dining-hall of the episcopal palace while the Synod of the Oak was holding its session. On his remarking in reply to Chrysostom's counsel "not to abandon their sees in case of his being deposed," that "it would be necessary for them if they retained their dioceses to communicate with his enemies and to subscribe to his condemnation," Chrysostom answered that "it would certainly be desirable to communicate with them to avoid rending the unity of the church, but that they should refuse to subscribe, as that would be to allow the justice of his deposition." (Pallad. Dial. p. 70.) Eulysius was one of the deputation of five, "all men of sanctity and high repute," entrusted with the remonstrance of the assembled bishops against the lawless proceedings of Theophilus, and with Chrysostom's reply to his summons. He shared in the personal indignities and ill-treatment with which the enemies of the saint vented their disappointment at his refusal to appear. (Ibid. pp. 71, 74.) When Chrysostom was finally expelled from Constantinople, Eulysius accompanied him in the vessel which conveyed him to the Bithynian coast, where, with his companion Cyriacus, bishop of Synnada, he was apprehended and detained in chains on suspicion of being privy to the conflagration which succeeded Chrysostom's departure. The two bishops were carried back to Chalcedon, and after examination were dismissed as innocent. (Ibid. p. 93.) In A.D. 405 Eulysius was bearer of letters from fifteen of the forty friendly bishops to pope Innocent, representing the past and present troubles caused to the church by the violent proceedings of Atticus and his adherents, together with one from Anysius bishop of Thessalonica. (Ibid. p. 26.) Chrysostom addressed a letter from Cucusus in 405 to Eulysius and the bishops who were with him, expressing a high sense of the labours and trials they had undertaken for the peace of the church, which could not fail to procure for them a divine blessing. (Chrysost. Epist. 148.) In A.D. 406 Eulysius and the other eastern bishops accompanied the western deputation to Constantinople, and shared their maltreatment. (Pallad. Dial. p. 31.) On the disastrous termination of the embassy, Eulysius and his companions disappeared, and the report ran that they had been taken out to sea and drowned. It proved, however, that they had really been deported to remote places of exile. That selected for Eulysius was the fortress of Misphas (Mizpah), three days' journey beyond Bostra or Bozrah in Arabia, where he probably died. (Ibid. p. 194.) [E. V.]

EUMACHIUS, 7th bishop of Viviers, about the beginning of the 5th century, succeeded by Auxonius. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 543.) [R. T. S.]

EUMALIUS, imperial vicar of Africa (see Gibbon, ii. 314, ed. Smith), to whom Constantine wrote, informing him of the decision of the council of Arles, A.D. 314, and also of his own decision in favour of Caecilian's innocence. (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 71; Brevic. Coll. iii. 19, vol. ix. pp. 542, 546.) [H. W. P.]

EUMENES (HYMENAEUS), bishop of Alexandria. According to the chronicle of Eusebius, he succeeded Justus in A.D. 130, and occupied the see for thirteen years. (Patrol. Gr. xix. 557; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 389.) [J. de S.]

EUMENIA, servant of Afra the converted courtesan of Augsburg, and martyred there with Afra's mother Hilaria under Diocletian. Commemorated Aug. 12. (Mart. Adon., Usuard., Bother.; Bas. Men.; Assem. Mart. Or. et Occ. ii. 235.) She is by some writers called Eunomia. (Baron. A. E. ann. 303, cxxv.; Ceill. iii. 30.)

EUMENIUS (1), ST., Thaumaturgus, bishop of Gortyna, in Crete, holding the see after the Decian persecution, during which his predecessor Cynillus suffered martyrdom. He is stated to have passed the later part of his life in the Thebaid, and to have died at Thebes in Boeotia. (Le Quim, Or. Christ. ii. 258, and see Menaea for September, ed. Constantinople, 1843, p. 141.) Basil's Macol. (Sept. 18) states that he held the see for many years, and performed miracles.

[J. de S.]

EUMENIUS (2), bishop of Aphrodisias (Stauropolis), the metropolitan see of Caria, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381; some MSS. of the acts of the councils read Eudoxius. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 339; Mansi, iii. 571.)

EUMENIUS (3), a bishop mentioned with another, Maximianus, by pope Innocent I. in a letter to Rufus and other bishops of Macedonia. (Innoc. Ep. 18; Pat. Lat. xx. 538 and note.) From the name of Maximianus being followed by that of Eugenius in Ep. 17, as likewise in Chrysost. Ep. 163, both these epistles being addressed to Macedonian bishops, it has been conjectured that Eumenius in Ep. 18 is a transcriber's error for Eugenius.

[C. H.]

EUMERIUS (1) (EUMERIUS, EUMELIUS), bishop of Nantes at the council of Valence, A.D. 84. (Ceill. iv. 600; Gall. Christ. xiv. 798; Thévenet, Mém. viii. 554; Bruna. Can. ii. 111; Mansi, iii. 491, 493.)

[R. T. S.]

EUMERIUS (2) (FUMERIUS, FUMARIUS, THUMERUS), according to old catalogues seventh bishop of Angers, succeeding Talasius and followed by Eustochius (cir. A.D. 477). (Gall. Christ. iv. 547; Gams, Series Episc. 488.)

EUMERIUS (3), a priest, was the bearer of the letter of pope Anastasius to Clovis, on the Frankish king's conversion. (Thiel. Ep. Rom. Ant. p. 624; Bouquet, iv. 50.)

[T. R. B.]

EUMERIUS (4) (EUMELIUS, EMNERUS, EUMERUS), fifteenth bishop of Nantes, succeeded Euphrosinus, and followed by St. Felix. He was present at the second council of Orleans (A.D. 533). At the third, in 538, he was represented by a priest, Marcellianus. At the fourth, in 541, he was again present in person (Mansi, vi. 339; ix. 21, 121). A letter addressed to him is extant, from Trojanus bishop of Saintes, in answer to one of his as to a boy who did not know whether he had been baptized or not (Pat. Lat. lvii. 995). There is said to be another from Euphrosinus, of Limoges, but it is not in the collection of that bishop's letters in the Patrologia Latina. We learn from some eulogistic lines of Venantius Fortunatus (Miscell. l. i. in Pat. Lat. lxxviii. 151) that he built a church at Nantes. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 798.)

EUMORPHIUS, the son of a Roman widow named Galla. She resided near Gregory the Great while he was yet a layman. Eumorphius, being at the point of death, sent his servant to a certain Stephanus, desiring him to come immediately as there was a vessel ready to take them both to Sicily. The servant thought his master mad, but Eumorphius insisted, and he went. On the road he met Stephanus's own servant, who told him his master had just died. Returning to Eumorphius, the servant found him dead likewise: both, indeed, had died simultaneously. The story was thought by Gregory to shew that the dying are sometimes allowed to know who are their equals in good or evil, and in whose society they are to pass eternity. A similar story is told of another dying man. [JOANNES, monk of Spoleto.] (Greg. Mag. Dial. iv. 35; Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 376.)

EUNAPIUS. The biographer of many of the Neoplatonist philosophers. Born at Sardis in A.D. 346 or 347, he received his earliest instruction from the philosopher Chrysanthius, to whose wife he was related. In his sixteenth year he took a voyage to Athens to attend the lectures of Proaeresius; in an interesting passage, he describes a dangerous fever with which he was seized during his voyage (so that on his landing he was unconscious) and the hospitality with which he was received by Proaeresius and others at Athens. On his return from Athens, where he remained five years, he was again treated with paternal care and affection by Chrysanthius, from whom he used to receive instruction in the afternoon, while he himself gave lectures to others in the morning. It would appear that he depended on his professional art for his livelihood; for he had himself intended to study in Egypt on leaving Athens, had not his parents (oi parétes) recalled him to Lydia to pursue this occupation. He was also skilled in medicine. Of the latter part of his life little is known; he lived, at any rate, till the year A.D. 414 (cf. Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, art. EUNAPIUS).

Besides his biographies, which are extant, Eunapius wrote a continuation of the history, by Dexippus, of the Roman empire. This continuation was in fourteen books, and extended, according to Photius, from A.D. 270 to A.D. 404. Only a few fragments of this latter work are extant: the principal is that known as περὶ πρεσβυτέρων (de Legationibus). The best edition of Eunapius is that by Boissonade (Amsterdam, 1822, 2 vols. 8vo.).

Photius represents Eunapius as a reckless calumniator of the Christians of the imperial court, and especially of Constantine himself (ἀνέδην κακίζων διασύρει, Photius says). This may probably be true; but to speak of Eunapius, as is sometimes done, as a systematic and bitter assailant of Christianity can hardly be correct. Of his two teachers, Chrysanthius, as we learn from Eunapius himself, was but a negligent follower of heathenism (though appointed by Julian high priest of Lydia) and tolerant towards Christianity in the exercise of his priestly office; while Proaeresius was actually a Christian. Nowhere in his extant works is Eunapius bitter against the Christians, except, indeed, where he mentions the monks; of these he says that their manner of life was piggish, and their behaviour in public indecent. But with the story of Hypatia before us, it can hardly be said that the monks did not lay themselves open to still worse charges than these. Eunapius was not a Lucian or a Celsus; the attitude of extravagant admiration towards his teachers was the one into which his mind naturally fell; he was the credulous, subservient disciple of a decaying mysticism. He relates, with apparent belief, how the statue of Hecate visibly laughed under the conjuration of the philosopher Maximus; and how the philosopher Jamblichus called out of two wells two boys, called Eros and Anteros, who embraced him, and were then replaced by him in their watery abodes. He intimates, indeed, a very slight doubt as to the truth of this latter story. This credulity is worth noticing for two reasons. First, it shews the disposition of the age to believe in marvels, and the absence of the critical spirit. Secondly, it can hardly be doubted that these and similar marvels were invented as a counterpoise to the Christian miracles. Certain it is, that Greek and Roman philosophy shews no trace of thaumaturgy till Christianity became a power in the world; and that from the moment Christianity did become such a power, these traces are plentiful. For the rest, notwithstanding the mediocre ability of Eunapius, his writings are not quite unworthy of perusal for the sake of the information they contain as to the general status of the Neoplatonist writers and their relation to the world at large. [J. R. M.]

EUNIUS, bishop. [ENNIVS.]

EUNO, in the system of the PERATAE, one of the heavenly powers, the ruler of the day, and identified by them with that which ignorance had called Isis (Hippol. Ref. v. 14). [G. S.]

EUNOCUS is spoken of by Dempster as a disciple of St. Columbanus (November 2), and a Scot, who wrote Gesta Columbani Magistri, flourished A.D. 606, and was venerated as a saint on October 2 (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 253; Tanner, Bibl. 271). [J. G.]

EUNOICUS, martyr. [SEBASTE, FORTY MARTYRS OF.]

EUNOIUS, bishop of Mitylene, in the island of Lesbos, subscribed the synodal decree of Gennadius of Constantinople against the Simoniaci, A.D. 459. In his subscription Mitylene is called a metropolis, but other subscriptions of bishops of this see do not confirm him. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 955; Mansi, vii. 917.) [L. D.]

EUNOMIA, martyr. [EUMENIA.]

EUNOMIEUTYCHIANI (Εὐνομειευτῦχῖανολ, Soc. v. 24), one of the sects into which the Eunomians of Constantinople became divided after the banishment of Eunomius. [EUNOMIUS (3).] Their founder Eutychius, a layman, in a controversy which arose among the Eunomians as to the foreknowledge of our Lord, and especially as to the meaning of Matth. xxiv. 37 and Mark xiii. 32, maintained that, as He had "absolutely received all things of the Father" He had also received that foreknowledge, and therefore that those passages must be interpreted accordingly. Finding that his opinions were strongly opposed, Eutychius went to Cappadocia to submit them to Eunomius, who approved them. The controversy still continued however, and after the death of Eunomius Eutychius was expelled from the community. He and his followers then formed themselves into a separate party. They also differed from the main body of the Eunomians as to the formula which should be employed in the administration of baptism. The question which thus divided the Eunomians afterwards caused a similar schism among the Monophysites. (Sozom. H. E. vi. 26; vii. 17; Cassiod. Hist. Tripart. ix. 40; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. iv. 3; AGNOETAE, Vol. I. 62 b, II.) [T. W. D.]

EUNOMIOEUPSYCHIANI, an Eunomian sect, called from their founder Euppsychius (Niceph. Call. H. E. xii. 30). They seem to be the Eunomieutychiani (cf. Sozomen, H. E. vii. 17, and note 32 of Valesius), Euppsychius being apparently a variant of Eutychius. [T. W. D.]

EUNOMIOTHEOPHRONIANI (Εὐνομιοθεοφρονιανολ, Niceph. Call. xii. 30), one of the sects into which the Eunomians became divided on a question raised by Theophronius, a Cappadocian, as to the Divine omniscience. They also differed from other sections of the body on the subject of baptism. (Socr. H. E. v. 24, vii. 17; Cassiod. Hist. Tripart. ix. 40; Philostorg. H. E. x. 4; AGNOETAE, Vol. I. 62 B, I.) [T. W. D.]

EUNOMIUS (1), presbyter of Auvergne, cir. A.D. 179, father of Fedanias. (Greg. Tur. Glor. Mart. i. 53.) [C. H.]

EUNOMIUS (2), a bishop, of what see does not appear. He was sent with Olympius to Africa by Constantine, after the decision of the Roman council, A.D. 313, to make further inquiries as to the innocence of Caecilian. The two commissioners spent forty days at Carthage, and concluded that the council's decision must be maintained. (Opt. i. 25; Dict. i. 367.) [H. W. P.]

EUNOMIUS (3) of Cappadocia, bishop of Cyzicus (360-364) after the expulsion of Eleusius.

He was the pupil and secretary of Aetius. He completed and formulated his master's heretical system with a preciseness and logical consistency which stamped the name of Eunomians on the Anomoean heretics instead of the name of Aetians, to whom the party owed its existence. Eunomius stands conspicuous among the controversial leaders of the 4th century for the moral earnestness with which he pursued and urged his own theological convictions, free from the taint of self-interest which characterized others, especially the Arian court party, as well as for the purity of his life, and the high tone of his personal character. He appears to have been a thoroughly honest man, with "a fierce disdain of compromise and dissimulation" (Newman, Arians, ch. iv. § 4), never shrinking from following his dogmatic conclusions to their legitimate issues and declaring them with all boldness, careless of the horror with which the orthodox were filled by what appeared to them such open blasphemies.

His mind was cast in a rigid Aristotelian mould, and was entirely destitute of imagination or sympathy. He was distinguished by "a faculty of subtle disputation and hard mechanical reasoning," (Newman, ibid.), which subjected the Christiana verities to strict logical processes, and rejected every doctrine that could not be shewn to be consistent with human reason. Neander describes him as characterized by a doctrinal tendency which narrowly confined itself within the province of the understanding, and regarded all truth in an outward mechanical way, with a strong opposition to the contemplative and mystical element, and looking on religious feeling as a despicable weakness; the decided enemy of asceticism, as well as of the growing disposition to the worship of saints and relics—in fact, the "Rationalist" of the 4th century. (Neander, A. Hist. vol. iv. p. 78, Clark's translation.) His uncompromising honesty, resolute boldness, and freedom from all vacillation and self-seeking, attracted attention, and to a certain extent secured respect. "Earnestness," writes Dr. Newman, "is always respectable, and if it be allowable to speak with a sort of moral catachresis, the Anomoeans merited on this account, as well as secured, a success which a false conciliation must not hope to obtain" (ib. p. 350).

In our ignorance of the minor geography of Asia Minor, it is difficult to determine the birth-place of Eunomius precisely. The name is given as Decera by Sozomen and Philostorgius, and as Oltiseris by Gregory Nyssen. It is probable that the former was his small paternal estate, and the latter the village to which it belonged. Sozomen describes it as situated under the slopes of Mount Argenus, not far from Caesarea, but Gregory Nyssen is certainly correct in placing it on the confines of Cappadocia and Galatia. (Soz. H. E. vi. 17; Philost. H. C. E. x. 6; xi. 5.) Eunomius was proud of his Cappadocian birth, and resented it as an insult when Basil called him a Galatian. Basil's brother says in excuse that Oltiseris was near the border it was not easy to remember on which side it was. (Basil, in Eunom. lib. i. p. 307; Greg. Nyss. in Eunom. lib. i. p. 307.) Eunomius came of an honest, industrious stock. His grandfather, Priscus, had been a slave, who had probably purchased his freedom, as well as a small farm, with his savings. His father was a unpretending, hard-working man, supporting his family by the produce of his land, and the teaching of a few of the neighbours' children in the winter evenings. (Greg. Nyss. ibid. p. 291.) Eunomius inherited his father's and grandfather's independent, earnest spirit. Determined to rise, he got himself taught shorthand writing, and leaving his paternal farm became amanuensis to a physician, and tutor to his children. The restlessness of an ardent, youthful spirit soon rendered the country distasteful to him, and he repaired to Constantinople, where he hoped to satisfy his taste of studying rhetoric. Gregory Nyssen, who makes it his object to blacken his character as much as possible, hints that Eunomius's life at Constantinople was not very reputable, but he specifies no charges. It was reported that at some time he worked as a tailor, making clothes for girls. Before very long he returned to Cappadocia.

On the death of Aetius, who was then residing as a teacher at Alexandria, reached Eunomius; he conceived an ardent desire to attach himself to him as a pupil, and after a conference at Antioch with Secundus the Arian bishop of Ptolemais, who was intimately acquainted with Aetius, went to Alexandria, about A.D. 356, and placed himself under Aetius's instruction, acting at the same time as his amanuensis (Socr. H. E. ii. 35, iv. 7; Soz. H. E. vi. 27; Philost. H. E. iii. 20; Greg. Nyss. in Eunom. i. p. 290). After two years of study at Alexandria, Eunomius accompanied Aetius to Antioch at the beginning of A.D. 358, to attend the Arian council summoned by Eudoxius, who had through court favour succeeded to the see of Antioch on the death of Leontius the year before.

The bold front which was displayed by the pure Arian party at this council, and the favour shewn to the flagrant blasphemies of Aetius and Eunomius, who did not scruple to assert the absolute unlikeness (ἀνόμοιον) of the Son to the Father, excited the violent opposition of the semi-Arian party, of which George of Laodicea, Basil of Ancyra, and Macedonius of Constantinople, were the highly respectable leaders. Under colour of the dedication of a church a council was speedily held by them at Ancyra, in which the Anomoean doctrines and their authors were condemned. A synodical letter was sent by them to the emperor, denouncing the blasphemous teaching of Eunomius and his master, and charging the latter with being privy to the conspiracy of Gallus. (Philost. H. E. iv. 8.) Intelligence of these proceedings struck dismay into the Arian clique at Antioch. It was felt essential that an able advocate should be despatched to Constantinople to defend them; and Eunomius, who, having previously declined Eudoxius's offer to ordain him because he had not sufficiently broken with the semi-Arian party, had now been ordained deacon, was selected as their advocate. But on his journey through Asia Minor he was apprehended by some imperial officers (invidiously designated by the Arian Philostorgius, emissaries of Basil) and banished by the emperor's order to Midaeus or Migde in Phrygia. Aetius was at the same time banished to Pepuza, while Eudoxius found it prudent to retire to his native Armenia, till the storm of the weak Constantius's wrath had blown over. (Greg. Nyss. ibid. p. 291.) Eudoxius soon found means to reinstate himself in the emperor's favour, and on the deposition of Macedonius by the council of Constantinople at the close of A.D. 359 he was chosen as his successor in the imperial see. Constantius had the utmost abhorrence of the Anomoeans and their teaching. Aetius was therefore sacrificed by the Arians as a scapegoat, while Eunomius was reluctantly persuaded to separate himself from his old teacher and conceal his heterodoxy, that by thus accommodating himself to the times he might secure a position of influence, where he might secretly disseminate his views. Eudoxius procured for him from the emperor the bishopric of Cyzicus, which was vacant by the deposition of the semi-Arian Eleusius [ELEUSIUS (2)]. In compliance with Eudoxius's advice, Eunomius at first maintained a discreet reserve on the points of controversy between the Anomoeans and the orthodox, but, weary of a dissimulation alien from his straightforward nature he soon began to propound his doctrines, at first privately, and then in public assemblies. Complaints of his heterodoxy were laid before Eudoxius, who, vexed with Eunomius for having paid so little regard to his counsel, put the informers off with a promise to investigate these complaints, a promise he never intended to fulfil. The people of Cyzicus, weary of delay, applied to the emperor himself, who sent an order to Eudoxius to summon Eunomius to answer the charges laid against him. Eudoxius again adopted the same policy of delay, until Constantius indignantly threatened that unless he attended to his commands he would banish them both. Eudoxius was now compelled to act. He summoned Eunomius to appear before a council of bishops at Constantinople, at the same time sending him a secret message to warn him of his danger, and counselling flight. Eunomius, not appearing, was condemned in his absence, and was deposed both from his see and his episcopal office, and banished. (Theod. Hæc. Fab. iv. 3; H. E. ii. 29; Philost. H. E. vi. 1.) Eunomius on this broke altogether with those with whom he had to a certain extent made common cause, and became the head of a party of his own, called after him Eunomians, professing the extreme Anomoean doctrines of the general comprehensibility of the Divine Essence, and the absolute unlikeness of the Son to the Father. The accession of Julian in A.D. 361 recalled Eunomius and Aetius, together with other bishops who had been banished by Constantius. They both settled in Constantinople, where they continued preaching during the reign of Julian, and that of his successor Jovian. (Philost. H. E. vi. 7, vii. 6.) The growing popularity of Eunomianism at Constantinople was a cause of jealousy to Eudoxius, who took advantage of the commotions caused by the rebellion of Procopius on the accession of Valens in A.D. 364, to expel both Eunomius and Aetius from the city. Eunomius retired to his country house near Chalcedon. Procopius having also taken refuge there in Eunomius's absence, Eunomius was accused of favouring his designs, and was in danger of being capitally condemned. Sentence of banishment to Mauritania was actually passed upon him, A.D. 367. But on his way thither, passing through Mursa, the Arian bishop, Valens, interested himself greatly in his cause, and by personal application to the emperor Valens obtained the repeal of his sentence. (Philost. H. E. ix. 4-8.) He was again sentenced to banishment in the same year by Modestus, the prefect of the Praetorian guards, as a disturber of the public peace. (Philost. H. E. ix. 11.) But he was again at Constantinople, or at least at Chalcedon, at the beginning of the reign of Theodosius, A.D. 379, to whom in A.D. 383, he, in common with the other bishops summoned by him, presented a confession of faith, which is still extant. The next year Theodosius, finding some of the officers of the court infected with Eunomian views, expelled them from the palace, and having seized Eunomius himself at his house at Chalcedon, banished him to Halmyris, a town of Moesia, on the Danube. This place having been captured by the Goths who had crossed the frozen river, Eunomius was transported to Caesarea in Cappadocia. The fact that he had attacked their late venerated bishop, Basil the Great, in his writings, rendered him so unpopular there that his life was hardly safe. He was therefore permitted to retire to his paternal estate at Dacora, where he died in extreme old age soon after A.D. 392, when according to Jerome (Vir. Illust. c. 120) he was still living, and writing much against the church. He was buried at Dacora, whence his body was transferred to Tyana, by the order of Eutropius, c. 396, and there carefully guarded by the monks, to prevent its being carried by his adherents to Constantinople, and buried by the side of his master Aetius, to whom he had himself given a splendid funeral. (Soz. H. E. vii. 17; Philost. H. E. ix. 6, xi. 5.)

The portrait drawn by Philostorgius (H. E. x. 6), though that of an ardent admirer who extolled his defects as beauties, is by no means flattering. Though he speaks of his face, body, and limbs as full of grace and dignity, when he proceeds to describe the white scorbutic blains, "which marked his face as it were with brands and scars," as adding to the majesty of his person, and his lisp as increasing the attractiveness of his speech, we know what weight to give to his words. According to Rufinus (Hist. Eccl. x. 25) his constitution was poisoned with jaundice within and without ("interius exteriusque morbo regio corruptus").

Eunomianism, as a cold, logical system, wanted the elements of vitality, and notwithstanding its wide popularity at its commencement, did not very long survive its authors. In the following century, when Theodoret wrote, the body had dwindled to a scanty remnant, compelled by the hatred their blasphemies had excited to conceal themselves, and holding their meetings in such obscure corners that they had gained the name of "Troglodytes" (Theod. Hæc. Fab. iv. 3). St. Augustine remarked that in his time the few Anomoeans existing were all to be found in the East, and that there were none of the sect in Africa (Aug. de Past. Cur. c. 8, p. 278).

The efforts of Eunomius as a religious teacher were directed to the formal development of Arianism as a doctrinal system. He starts with the conception of God as the absolute simple Being, of whom neither self-communication nor generation can be predicated. His essence is in this, that He is what He is of Himself alone, underived, unbegotten—and as being the only unbegotten One, the Father, in the strict sense of Deity, is alone God. And as He is unbegotten, inasmuch as begetting necessarily involves the division and impartation of being, so it is impossible for Him to beget. If, also, that which was begotten shared in the Θεότης of the Deity, God would not be the absolute unbegotten One, but would be divided into a begotten and an unbegotten God. A communication of the essence of God, such as that involved in the idea of generation, would transfer to the Absolute Deity the notions of time and sense. An eternal generation was to Eunomius a thing absolutely inconceivable. A begetting, a bringing forth, could not be imagined as without beginning and end. The generation of the Son of God must therefore have had its beginning, as it must have had its termination, at a definite point of time. It is, therefore, incompatible with the predicate of eternity. If that can be rightly asserted of the Son, He must equally, with the Father, be unbegotten. This denial of the eternal generation of the Son involved also the denial of the Essence of His essence to that of the Father, from which the designation of the party, "Aionos" (ἀἰώνιος) was derived. That which is begotten, he asserted, cannot possibly resemble the essence of that which is unbegotten. The unbegotten continues ever unbegotten, and the begotten begotten. As long, therefore, as the two essences are what they are, the notion of equality of essence, "Homousian," or even similarity of essence, "Homoiousian," is plainly untenable. Were the begotten to resemble the unbegotten in its essence, it must cease to be begotten. Were the Father and the Son equal, the Son must also be unbegotten, a consequence utterly destructive of the fundamental doctrine of generation and subordination. Such generation, moreover, Eunomius held to be essentially impossible. For what could the unbegotten Absolute One take out of His essence to impart to the begotten One, but that which is unbegotten? If then, according to the teaching of the church, the Son, who is begotten, were of the same essence as the Father who begets, there must be both an unbegotten and a begotten element in God. The essence of the Father and of the Son must therefore be absolutely dissimilar. And as their essence, so also is their knowledge of themselves different. Each knows Himself as He is, and not as the other. The one knows Himself as unbegotten, the other as begotten. Since, therefore, the Son did not share in any way in the essence of the Father, what is His relation to God, and to what does He owe His origin? Eunomius's answer to this question lay in a distinction between the essence (οὐσία) and the energy (ἐνέργεια) of God. Neither movement nor self-communication being predicable of the Divine Essence, it is to the Divine energy, conceived as separable from the Essence, that we must ascribe the calling into existence out of nothing of all that is. It is a virtue of this ἐνέργεια alone that God can be called Father, as it is by this that all that is, besides Himself, has come into being. Of these creations of the Divine energy the Son or Logos holds the first place, as the instrumental creator of the world. And in this relation likeness to the Father is predicable of the Son. In fact, the Son may be in this sense regarded as the express image and likeness of the ἐνέργεια of the Father, inasmuch as He had conferred on Him divine dignity in the power of creation. This was the ground of the immeasurable difference between the Son and all other created beings. He was produced by the Father, as an inferior Being, the first or most perfect of all beings, to be, by His will, His instrument in the creation of all other existences. God called Him into being immediately, but all other creatures mediately through Him. This teaching introduced a dualism into the essence of God Himself, when it drew a distinction between His Essence and His will—the one being infinite and absolute, and the other relative and limited to finite objects. On the ground of this dualism he was charged by Gregory Nyssen with Manichaeism. Eunomius regarded the Paraclete as sharing in the Divine nature in a still more secondary and derived sense, inasmuch as He was no more than the highest and noblest production of the Only-begotten Son, given to be the source of all light and sanctification.

The entire want of spiritual depth and life which characterized Eunomius is evidenced by his maintaining that the Divine nature is perfectly comprehensible by the human intellect, and charging those who denied this with an utter ignorance of the first principles of Christianity. He accused them of preaching an unknown God, and even denied their right to be called Christians at all, since without knowledge of God there could be no Christianity; while he repudiated the claim of those who did not hold the same views as himself as to the nature of God and the generation of the Son of God, to the possession of any true knowledge of the Divine Being. He held that Christ had been sent to lead other creatures up to God, the primal source of all existence, as a Being external to Himself, and that believers should not stop at the generation of the Son of God, but having followed Him as far as He was able to lead them, should soar above Him, as above all created beings whether material or spiritual, to God Himself, the One Absolute Being, as their final aim, that in the knowledge of Him they might obtain eternal life. It is evident how poor and low Eunomius's idea of the knowledge of God was, placing it merely in a formal illumination of the understanding, and a theoretical knowledge of God and spiritual truth, instead of that fellowship with God as made known to us in Christ, and that knowledge which comes from love, which the church has ever held to be the true life of the soul. In harmony with this formal, intellectual idea of knowledge, as the source of Christian life, Eunomius assigned a lower place to the sacraments than to the teaching of the word, depreciating the liturgical element of Christianity as compared with its doctrinal element. As quoted by Gregory Nyssen, he asserted that "the essence of Christianity did not depend for its ratification on sacred terms, on the special virtue of customs and mystic symbols, but on accuracy of doctrine" (Greg. Nyss. in Eunom. p. 704). For fuller statements of the doctrinal system of Eunomius, see Dorner, Doctrines of the Person of Christ, Div. i. vol. ii. p. 264 ff., Clark's translation; Neander, Church History, vol. iv. p. 77 ff., Clark's translation; Herzog, Real-Encycl. "Eunomius und Eunomianer" (from which works the foregoing account has been derived); Klose, Geschichte und Lehre des Eunomius, 1833; Bauer, Dreieinigkeith, i. pp. 365–387; Meyer, Trinitätslehre, pp. 175 ff.; Lange, Arianismus in seiner weiteren Entwicklung.

Eunomius, as a writer, was more copious than elegant. Photius exhausts a whole vocabulary of vituperation upon the style of his Refutation of St. Basil (Cod. 138, p. 314), which he asserts to be so far removed from all grace and elegance that he seems not even to know those words. His meaning is very hard to arrive at, as by a studied obscurity he seeks to conceal the jejuneness of his thoughts, and the weakness of his arguments. Photius speaks very depreciatingly of his logical power. He says that he took up logic late in life, never fully comprehended it, and often used it erroneously. He pours great ridicule on the pomposity of his dithyrambic language and his misapplied ingenuity in coining harsh words full of consonants, and so difficult to pronounce that it was no easy task to read his interminable periods. Socrates estimates Eunomius's style no less unfavourably. He accuses him of perpetual repetitions, of heaping up words without ever advancing a step, and evidencing weakness both in conception and in argument (Socr. H. E. iv. 7). Notwithstanding these alleged defects, his writings, which Rufinus states were very numerous and directed against the Christian faith (Hist. Eccl. i. 25) were in much esteem among his followers, who, according to Jerome, valued their authority more highly than that of the Gospels, and believed that the very light of truth resided in Eunomius (Hieron. adv. Vigil. tom. ii. p. 123). The bold blasphemies contained in these books were the cause of their destruction. Successive imperial edicts, one of Arcadius, dated not more than four years after his death A.D. 398 (Cod. Theod. tom. vi. p. 152; lib. xvi. 34), commanded that his books should be burnt, and made the possession of any of his writings a capital crime. Little, therefore, of his has come down to us save some few fragments preserved in the works of his theological adversaries. His Exposition of Faith and his Apologeticus are the only pieces extant of any length.

The works ascribed to him are (1) A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, in seven books. Socrates ridicules the verbosity and circumlocution of this work, the seven volumes of which, he says, only prove that he had totally failed to understand the object of the Epistle (Socr. H. E. iv. 7).

(2) Epistles, of which Photius states he had read as many as forty, and found in them the same affectation of subtlety combined with shallowness and a disgraceful ignorance of the laws of epistolary composition (Cod. u. s.).

(3) ἔκθεσις πίστεως, Fidei libellus. A confession of faith presented to Theodosius, A.D. 383 (Socr. H. E. vii. 12). This was first printed by Valesius in his notes to Socrates, and afterwards by Baluze in Conciliorum Nov. Collect. i. 89. It is also to be found in the Bibliotheca Graeca of Fabricius, lib. v. c. 23. Valesius says of it, "etsi totam Eunomii impietatem complectitur, quaedam tamen habet minime spernenda."

(4) Apologeticus, in twenty-eight sections. This is his most famous work, in which, with much subtlety, he seeks to refute the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, especially the co-eternal and consubstantial divinity of Christ. Basil the Great thought the book worthy of an elaborate refutation, which we possess in his five books, Adversus Eunomium. A considerable portion of the Apologeticus was printed by Cave from a MS. in the possession of archbishop Tenison, with a Latin translation from the pen of Henry Wharton (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 220 sq.), and the whole is given by Fabricius, with a Latin translation (Bibl. Graec. lib. v. c. 23, ed. Hamburg, 1717). It has been also published by Canisius (Lect. Ant. ed. Basnage, i. p. 181), and more recently by Thilo (Bibl. Dogm. ii. p. 180, and Migne, Pat. Gr. xxx. 835). An English translation of it was published by Whiston in his Eunomianismus Redivivus, London, 1711, 8vo.

(5) Ἀπολογίας ἀπολογία. A defence of the preceding work from the attack made on it by St. Basil. Philostorgius absurdly states that Basil died of despair after reading this work, feeling himself incapable of answering it (Philost.

H. E. viii. 12). Photius, on the other hand, tells us that, after Eunomius had devoted many years of close study to the composition of this reply, conscious of its inadequacy, he was afraid that Basil should see it, and kept it unpublished till after his death, and even then put it into the hands of his friends and adherents alone. Theodore of Mopsuestia, Gregory Nyssen, and others, however, got hold of it, and treated the wretched thing with the contumely it deserved (Phot. Cod. 138).

EUNOMIUS (4), a bishop intruded by the Arians into the see of Samosata, on the deposition of Eusebius Samosatensis by Valens in A.D. 374. His episcopate was short and unhappy. The people of Samosata resented the loss of their bishop so keenly that they all, from the highest to the lowest, refused to hold any intercourse with Eunomius. No one visited him, or exchanged a word with him. He officiated in an empty church. When he entered the public baths no one would bathe with him, nor even use the water contaminated by a heretic. Thinking it useless to remain where he was the object of general aversion, Eunomius resigned his bishopric and left the city. He was succeeded by Lucius. (Theod. H. E. iv. 15.) [E. V.]

EUNOMIUS (5), bishop of Beroë in Thracia, an Apollinarian. His period was somewhere between Danophilus, A.D. 370, and Sebastianus, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1167.) [J. de S.]

EUNOMIUS (6), bishop of Marazana, or Maruzana, in Byzacene, who was present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. d. Don. Hist. Oberthür, p. 425.) [H. W. P.]

EUNOMIUS (7), bishop of Rhaesina (Theodosiopolis) in Osrhoena, when the city was besieged by Varanes king of Persia, in the reign of Theodosius II., c. A.D. 420. The bishop vigorously opposed the Persian attacks, despising the threat of burning down the church, and ultimately killed one of the kings present in the besieging army by a stone shot from a ballista inscribed with the name of the apostle St. Thomas, the supposed founder of the Edessene church, when upon the siege was abandoned. (Theodoret, H. E. v. 36 al. 37; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 979.) [L. D.]

EUNOMIUS (8), bishop of Nicomedia, 4th century. The thirteenth session of the council of Chalcedon was taken up with a dispute between Eunomius, the metropolitan of Nicomedia and Anastasius, bishop of Nicaea, with regard to jurisdiction of the see of Basilinopolis. It is an instance of appeal, in a purely ecclesiastical matter, to the secular authority of the emperors Valentinian and Marcian. A prominent part in the proceedings was taken by the judges, who were the commander-in-chief Anatolius, the prefect of offices Vincomalus. Anastasius had excommunicated the clergy of Basilinopolis, claiming the city as belonging to his province. Eunomius was supported by Valentinian, Anastasius Julian and Valens.

magistrates and synod declared Nicomedia to be metropolis of all Bithynia, setting aside a claim proposed by Aetius archdeacon of Constantinople, to the effect that that see had the right of consecrating for Basilinopolis (Mansi, Concil. vii. 303; Ceillier, x. 695). [W. M. S.]

EUNOMIUS (9), bishop of Amida (now Diarbekir), on the Tigris, the metropolis of the province of Mesopotamia, consecrated A.D. 546. (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. ii. 48 n.; Le Quien, Orien. Christ. ii. 994.) [L. D.]

EUNOMIUS (10) appointed count of Tours in the place of Leudastes, who was deposed for oppression of the people and persecution of Gregory, A.D. 580. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 43, 50, vii. 23.) [S. A. B.]

EUNUS, Feb. 27, the surname of a martyr named Cronion, who together with Julian was carried through Alexandria on a camel, scourged, and afterwards burned, during the Decian persecution. (Euseb. vi. 41; Mart. Usuard., Rom. Vat. Adon.) [T. S. B.]

EUNUTIUS (ENUTIUS), ST., bishop of Noyon. In the majority of the catalogues after the name of Hunuanus, the twenty-seventh bishop, is found that of Guido, and next to him that of Eunutius, but some have "Guido cum Euntio macto." This has puzzled the commentators, and several explanations have been attempted. It has been suggested (1) that Euntius was a priest only, (2) that he was a sort of suffragan bishop, who performed the duties of the office for Guido, (3) that one was bishop of Noyon, and the other of Tournay. Le Cointe again rejects all these views, and believes that at the synod of Soissons (A.D. 744), either because Guido had become too old to discharge the duties of the episcopate, or for some other good reason, Eunutius was consecrated bishop, while the other was yet living. The dates are an objection to this theory, as there is an extant letter of pope Zacharias to Eliseus, the successor of Eunutius, which is ascribed to the year following the council, while by some of the catalogues six years are allotted to the joint reign of the two bishops. He is commemorated Sept. 10. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. a. 745, n. xix. 12, tom. v. p. 121; Gall. Christ. ix. 985; Boll. Act. SS. Sept. iii. 616.) [S. A. B.]

EUNO-. [See under EVO-.]

EUPARDUS was a bishop of Autun, and is placed by the compilers of the Gallia Christiana (v. 343) seventeenth on the list, between St. Bectarius and Remigius or Benignus, about A.D. 550. This position, however, is matter of conjecture, some putting him rather earlier, while others place him about forty years later. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. a. 560, n. v.; Gall. Series Episc. 499.) [S. A. B.]

EUPATERIUS, a layman who, together with his daughter, had written to Basil requesting that he would declare his faith. Basil replies that he adheres strictly to the Nicene creed, but that the false teaching of others with respect to the Holy Spirit had rendered some addition to it necessary. For his part he would communicate with no one who asserted that the Holy Spirit was a created being. (Basil, Ep. 159 [387].) [E. V.]

EUPATOR, magister militum in Sardinia, who in 598 testified to the fanatical conduct of Petrus the convert from Judaism at Cagliari. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ix. indict. ii. Ep. 6, in Migne, lxxvii. 943, where he is called Eupaterius); in 601 as duke of Sardinia he received a letter from Gregory commending Valdarichus to his protection (lib. xii. indict. v. Ep. 18, in Migne, lxxvii. 1230). [A. H. D. A.]

EUPHEBIUS (EPHEBUS, EUPHEMUS, EFRI-MUS), a bishop of Naples. Ughelli states that his date cannot be positively ascertained, there being no extant narrative of his life. Baronius, following Paulus Regius, states him to have died A.D. 713. Others placed him much earlier. Joannes Diaconus calls him the eighth bishop of Naples, and successor to St. Eustasius, who was "S. Agrippino subrogatus" c. A.D. 180, but the date of whose death is uncertain. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 37; Boll. Acta SS. Mai. v. 236.) [R. S. G.]

EUPHEMIA (1)—Sept. 16. Virgin and martyr at Chalcedon under Galerius, A.D. 307, and celebrated over the east and west. She was arrested by order of the proconsul Priscus, and after various tortures was killed by wild beasts. For the circumstances of her martyrdom we have very early evidence. Asterius [ASTERIUS], bishop of Amasea, A.D. 400, tells us that he saw the sufferings of the martyr depicted on a tablet in the great church of Chalcedon, which was built over her tomb. In the same church the council of Chalcedon met A.D. 451, and the fathers attributed the success of their efforts against Eutychianism to her prayers, a circumstance commemorated afterwards on July 11 (Cal. Byzant., and Neale's note). Her relics were transferred to the church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, where amid the struggles of the Iconoclastic controversies she seems to have been regarded as a special friend of the assailed cultus. Constantine Copronymus, therefore, sought to fling them into the sea about A.D. 766, but they were rescued by the opposite party. There was a church at Rome dedicated to her as early as the time of Gregory the Great, while Codinus tells us that there were no less than four dedicated to her in Constantinople, the most splendid of which was built in her honour by Constantine the Great, and, after the lapse of 450 years, profaned and turned into a public stable by Constantine Copronymus, but restored and beautified afterwards by the empress Irene (Codinus, de Orig. Constant. § 81; Du Cange, Cypolis. Christ. lib. iv. pp. 100-102). Her acts are contained in Symeon Metaphrastes; Surius; Ruinart. The work of Asterius treating of her will be found in Mansi incorporated with the acts of the seventh general council, A.D. 787. Venantius Fortunatus in his poem De Virginitate (Miscellan. lib. viii. carm. 6) represents her as one of an attendant band upon the Blessed Virgin in the character of patroness of Chalcedon. (Mart. Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi; Carthag. Kalendar; Sacramentar. Greg. Mag.) [G. T. S.]

EUPHEMIA (2), AELIA MARCIA, empress, wife of the emperor Justinus. Her original name was Lupicina, and she was first called Euphemia by the acclamations of the populace at her coronation. Her praenomen Aelia is known from her coins. She died in her husband's lifetime, not long after his accession, and was buried in the church of St. Euphemia. (Victor. Tununens. Chron. in Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 952 b; Theoph. ann. 501, p. 141, in Patr. Gr. cviii. 383 a; Du Cange, Fam. Aug. p. 78.)

[C. H.]

EUPHEMITAE, also known as MESSALIANS, "praying people," and therefore reckoned by Epiphanius (Haer. 80) as predecessors of the Christian sect so called. Epiphanius, who is our sole informant about them, tells us that they were neither Christians, Jews, nor Samaritans, but were heathen, believing in a plurality of gods, but offering worship only to one whom they called the Almighty; that they built for themselves oratories, which in some places were made completely to resemble Christian churches; that in these they used to meet at evening and at early morn, with great abundance of lights, to join in hymns and prayer. We learn from him next with some surprise that some of the magistrates put several of these people to death for their perversion of the truth and unwarranted imitation of church customs, and that in particular LUPICIANUS having thus punished some of them gave occasion to a new error; for that they buried the bodies of those who had been thus executed, held meetings for their divine service at the spot, and called themselves MARTYRIANI. In fine Epiphanius charges a section of the Euphemites with calling themselves SATANIANI, and with worshipping Satan under the idea that by such service they might disarm the hostility of a being confessedly of great strength and of immense power to harm. It does not appear that Epiphanius means to assert that the Christian Euchites were historically derived from these heathen Euphemites, but merely that there was a general resemblance of practices between the two. It has been conjectured (Tillemont, viii. 529) that the Euphemites of Epiphanius may be identical with the HYPHISTARII of Greg. Naz., and less probably with the COELICOLAE of Africa. [EUCHITES.]

EUPHEMIUS (1), bearer of a letter from Ascholius bishop of Thessalonica, A.D. 373, to Basil, who speaks in warm terms of him, and also of his wife, whom he calls κοσμιώτατη. (Basil, Ep. 154 [337].)

EUPHEMIUS (2), the owner of a farm at Apenzinus, wrongfully occupied by Meletius, brother-in-law of Gregory Nazianzen. Gregory in his will declared that the farm was the property of Euphemius, whom he had often reproached for his want of proper spirit in abstaining from claiming it. (Greg. Naz. Testam.)

[E. V.]

EUPHEMIUS (3), bishop of Sophene, a district in the province of Mesopotamia; his name is found in the Latin list of the subscriptions to the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1001; Mansi, vii. 403.)

EUPHEMIUS (4), 3rd patriarch of Constantinople, succeeding Fravitta and followed by Macedonius II. He ruled six years and three months A.D. 489–496, and died in 515. Theophanes calls him Euthymius. Euphemius was a presbyter of Constantinople, administrator of a hospital for the poor at Neapolis, untinged with any suspicion of Eutychian leanings, and is described as learned and very virtuous. Finding that Peter Mongus, the patriarch of Alexandria, anathematized the council of Chalcedon, he was so indignant that before he took his seat on the patriarchal throne he solemnly separated from all communion with him, and with his own hands effaced his name from the diptychs, placing in its stead that of Felix III. of Rome. For a year the war raged strong between Mongus and Euphemius. Each summoned councils against the other; Euphemius even thought of persuading a council to depose Mongus; but at the end of October, 490, Mongus died.

To pope Felix the patriarch sent letters, as was usual, to announce his election. Great must have been his indignation when he received the reply that he might be admitted as a private member of the church Catholic, but could not be received in communion as a bishop, because he had not removed from the diptychs the names of his predecessors, Acacius and Fravitta.

Soon after his accession two interesting scenes occurred. One was at the death (probably in 489) of Daniel the Stylite on the pillar where he had lived for thirty-three years. Euphemius came with others to the foot of the pillar to attend his last moments, as a tribute of respect to so renowned a personage. The other scene was in Constantinople. Anastasius, the future emperor, then an aged officer of the emperor Zeno, was an adherent of Eutychian opinions, and according to Suidas formed a sect which met in some church of Constantinople. The patriarch appeared before the conventicle with menacing gestures and drove them from the spot. "If you must frequent the church," he exclaimed, "agree with her! or else no more enter into her gates to pervert men more simple than yourself. Do otherwise, and I will shave your head, and lead you in triumph with the people." Henceforth, says the annalist, Anastasius kept quiet, for the sake of the glory that he coveted. As the emperor Zeno died in 491, this must have occurred within two years after the consecration of Euphemius, and it witnesses alike to his intrepidity and his influence.

After the death of Zeno, the empress Ariadne procured the election of Anastasius, on the understanding that he was to marry her. The patriarch openly called him a heretic and unworthy of reigning over Christians. Vain at first were the entreaties of the empress and the senate that he would consent to crown him. At length Euphemius came to terms; Anastasius must capitulate on all points; he must give a written profession of his creed, promise under his hand to keep the Catholic faith intact, without making any attempt upon it after he should have become emperor, make no innovation in the church and follow as his rule of belief the decrees of Chalcedon. These were severe conditions for Anastasius; but he gave the promise under the most solemn oaths, and Euphemius put it into the hands of the saintly Macedonius, chancellor and treasurer of the church of Constantinople to be stored in the archives of the cathedral (Evagr. iii. 32.)

At the end of 491, or on Feb. 25, 492, pope Felix died. His successor Gelasius immediately announced his elevation to the emperor Anastasius, but took no notice of Euphemius. Euphemius, in his ardent way, had written to him at once to express his joy on his appointment, and his desire for peace and for the reunion of the churches. Not to be chilled even by obtaining no answer, he wrote a second letter, and sent it by the deacon Syncletius. Neither letter remains; it appears however from the reply of Gelasius that Euphemius had congratulated the Roman church on having a pontiff who needed no instruction from any one, but was able to judge with his own eyes all that was necessary for the reunion of the churches; adding that, for himself, he was not sufficiently his own master to do what he wished; that the people of Constantinople would never agree to disgrace the memory of their late patriarch Acacius; that if that measure were necessary, the pope had better write to the people about it himself, and send somebody to try and persuade them; that Acacius had never said anything against the faith, and that if he was in communion with Mongus, it was when Mongus had given a satisfactory account of his creed. Euphemius subjoined his own confession, rejecting Eutyches and accepting Chalcedon. It seems also that Euphemius spoke of those who had been baptized and ordained by Acacius since the sentence pronounced against him at Rome, and pointed out how embarrassing it would be if the memory of Acacius must be condemned. (Caillier, x. 486.)

Replying to these temperate counsels, Gelasius allows that in other circumstances he would have written to announce his election, but early observes that the custom existed only among those bishops who were united in communion, and was not to be extended to those who, like Euphemius, preferred a strange alliance to that of St. Peter. He allows the necessity of gentleness and tenderness, but remarks that there is no need to throw yourself into the ditch when you are helping others out. As a mark of moderation he willingly grants the canonical remedy to all who had been baptized and ordained by Acacius. Can Euphemius possibly wish him to allow to be recited in the sacred diptychs the names of condemned heretics and their recusers? Euphemius professed to reject Eutyches; let him reject also those who have communicated with the successors of Eutyches. Acacius had not advanced anything against the truth; was it not even worse, then, for him to have the truth and communicate with its enemies? Euphemius asked when Acacius was condemned? No condemnation was needed! It was ipso facto according to the decrees of ancient councils. If Peter Mongus did purge himself, why did not Euphemius send proofs, instead of contesting himself with asserting the fact? He is much vexed with Euphemius for saying that he is constrained to do things which he does not wish; no bishop should talk so about that truth for which he ought to lay down his life. He refuses to send a mission to Constantinople, on the ground that it is the pastor's duty to contrive his own flock. At the tribunal of Jesus Christ it will be seen which of the two is bitter and hard. The high spirit of the orthodox patriarch was fired by this dictatorial interference. He even thought of summoning the pope himself to account. And as it is certain that Gelasius was even more suspicious of the emperor Anastasius, who was, in spite of the recantation which Euphemius had enforced, a real Eutychian at heart, so it is very likely that, as Baronius asserts, the patriarch did not attempt to conceal the pope's antipathy to the emperor.

Meantime nothing cooled the zeal of Euphemius for the council of Chalcedon. Anastasius harboured designs against its supporters; to thwart him the patriarch gathered together the bishops who were at Constantinople, and ~~xvi. 1180~~ them to confirm its decrees. According to Theophanes and Victor of Tunis this occurred in 492 (Vict. Tun. Chron. p. 5); but in Mansi (vii. 1180) the event is placed at the beginning of the patriarchate of Euphemius, and the decrees are said to have been sent by the bishops to pope Felix III.

Various jars shewed the continued rupture with Rome. Theodoric had become master of Italy, and in 493 sent Faustus and Irenaeus to the emperor Anastasius to ask for peace. During their sojourn at Constantinople the envoys received complaints from the Greeks against the Roman church, which they reported to the pope. As was likely, Anastasius and Euphemius had much to say on the subject, the chief point of the patriarch being that Acacius could never have been condemned by one prelate only, but that to excommunicate a metropolitan of Constantinople nothing less was needed than a general council. On this Gelasius observed that it had been done in virtue of Chalcedon, according to the custom with all heresies; pope Felix had only put in force an old decree, and had invented nothing new; the same could be done by any bishop, not by a pope only. Gelasius also accused Euphemius of hindering the peace with Theodoric, not for faith's sake, but only to strengthen his own party. (Mansi, viii. 16.)

Now occurred that imprudence of Euphemius which unhappily cost him his throne. The emperor Anastasius, tired of his war against the Isaurians, was looking about for an honourable way of stopping it. He spoke confidentially to Euphemius about it; asking him to beg the bishops at Constantinople (there were always bishops coming and going to and from the metropolis) to pray for peace, that he might be thus furnished with an opportunity of entering on negotiations. Euphemius betrayed the secret to John the patrician, father-in-law of Athenodorus, one of the chiefs of the Isaurians. John hurried to the emperor to inform him of the patriarch's indiscretion. Anastasius was deeply offended, and from that time forth never ceased to persecute his old opponent. He accused him of helping the Isaurians against him, and of corresponding with them. On one occasion when he had gained an advantage over them, he sent Eusebius, his Master of the Offices, to the patriarch with the taunting message, "Your Grace's prayers have covered your friends with confusion" (τοὺς φίλους σου ἡσβολώσας. Theoph. Chronog. A.C. 488).

At another time an assassin, either by Anastasius's own order, or to gain his favour, drew his sword on Euphemius at the door of the metatorium (sacristy). But a very tall ecclesiastic, who was a head and shoulders above his master, received the blow, which was likely to prove fatal. Another of the attendants struck the assailant heavily with the bolt of the door and killed him on the spot.

Anastasius sought other means to get rid of the great prelate whom he so much detested. He was now in open quarrel with him; Theodorus speaks of the violence with which he demanded back the profession of faith on which his coronation had depended (Theodor. Lect. ii. 8, 572 sq. in Patr. Graec. lxxxvi.). He assembled the bishops who were in the capital, and preferred charges against their metropolitan. With obsequious disregard of ecclesiastical rules they declared him at once excommunicated and deposed. The emperor obtained, at the request of Ariadne and the senate, who wished to cover the injustice to Euphemius by a respectable, popular, and orthodox appointment, the election of Macedonius, nephew of the former patriarch Gennadius. But the people, loyal to their noble-hearted bishop, refused to surrender him. As was usual in times of national excitement, they ran in crowds to the great hippodrome, calling aloud on the Almighty, and making a kind of sedition in favour of the deposed patriarch. They had, however, soon to yield to the emperor.

Meanwhile Euphemius, fearing for his life, retired to the baptistery, and refused to go out until Macedonius had promised on the word of the emperor that no violence should be done him when they conducted him to that exile to which he knew at any rate that he was condemned. With a proper feeling of respect for the fallen greatness and unconquerable dignity of his predecessor, Macedonius, on coming to find him in the baptistery, made the attendant deacon take off the newly-given pallium and clothed himself in the dress of a simple presbyter, "not daring to wear" his insignia before their canonical owner. After some conversation, Macedonius (himself to follow Euphemius to the very same place of exile under the same emperor) handed over to him the proceeds of a loan which he had raised for his expenses. Euphemius was taken to Eucaites in 495, the fifth year of Anastasius. His death occurred twenty years later, in 515, at Ancyra, where it is thought that the invasion of the Huns had made him retire.

In the East Euphemius was always honoured as the defender of the Catholic faith and of Chalcedon, and as a man of the highest holiness and orthodoxy. Great efforts were made at the fifth general council to get his name put solemnly back in the diptychs with that of Macedonius (Mansi, viii. 1061 E). Elias metropolitan of Jerusalem, himself afterwards expelled from his see by Anastasius, stood stoutly by Euphemius at the time of his exile, declaring against the legality of his sentence. (Cyrillus, Vita S. Sabas, c. 69, apud Sur. tom. vi.) The authorities for his life are, Marcel. Chron. A.C. 491-495 in Patr. Lat. li. p. 933; Theodor. Lect. Eccl. Hist. li. 6-15 in Patr. EUPHEMIUS (5) (Baron. Annal. ann. 537 xiv.), bishop of Antioch. [EPHRAIM (6).]

EUPHEMIUS (6), bishop of Toledo from cir. A.D. 574 to cir. 590. He signed the acts of the third council of Toledo, 589, as "Metropolitanus Ecclesiae Catholicae Toletanae Provinciae Carpetaniae." This signature is remarkable for the use of the word "Catholic," which also appears in the signatures of three other Metropolitans at the same council: Merida, Braga, and Seville, and refers, no doubt, to the existence of Arian bishops in those sees before the council. It is worthy of notice that, although in the case of certain suffragan bishoprics, Tortosa, Oporto, Tuy, Valencia, and Lugo, the Arian bishop is allowed after conversion to keep the episcopal dignity, so that each of these sees appears with two bishops at the council, there is no trace of this indulgence in the case of the Metropolitan sees, which no doubt were felt to be too important to be allowed to run any risk. The title Metropolitanus Provinciae Carpetaniae, which truthfully expressed the position of the church of Toledo at the time (and which reappears after the Moorish conquest; see Acts of the Synod of Cordova in 839, Esp. Sagr. x. 525), led either to the assembling of the synod of Carthaginensian bishops at Toledo in 610, or to the later forgery of its supposed acts, and of the Decretum Gundemari [GUNTHER]. In the same third council the well-known Peter of Ercavica, signs as Arcavicensis Celtiberiae Ecclesiae Episcopus. Ercavica lay on the boundary between Carpetania and Celtiberia, and Peter therefore seems by his signature to have meant to imply his exemption from the jurisdiction of the "Metropolitan of Carpetania" (Gams, K. G. ii. 2, 68-77). In the Decretum Gundemari Euphemius is said to have styled himself Metropolitan of Carpetania through ignorance; "nos ejusdem ignorantiae sententiam corrigimus"; while Florez, whose views on the primacy of Toledo are now in great measure superseded, supposes it to have sprung from modesty or unweariness. For a discussion, however, of the relation of Toledo to the older bishoprics of Carthaginensis, and of the growth of the primacy, see GUNTHER and JULIAN (Esp. Sagr. vi. 330, 333; v. 251, Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238). [M. A. W.]

EUPHORBUS (EUFORUS, PHOSPHORUS) signs the acts of the eighth Council of Toledo, an. 653, as bishop of Cordova. His name stands thirty-eighth on the list. (Esp. Sagr. x. 236; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448; Gomez Bravo, Cat. de los Obispos de Cordova, p. 77.) [M. A. W.]

EUPHRAIM (Εὐφράϊμος, Soph. Ep. Synod. ad Honor. ap. Photius, Biblioth. ccxxxi. in Patrol. Gr. ciii. 1090 c.), bishop of Antioch [EPHRAIM (6).] [T. W. D.]

EUPHRANON, according to "Praedestinatus," i. 24, a bishop of Rhodes, who opposed the Severiani. [G. S.]

EUPHRANOR, a Libyan bishop, cir. A.D. 263. He was inclined to Sabellianism, on which account Dionysius bishop of Alexandria wrote him a letter afterwards quoted and commented on by Athanasius. (Ath. de Sentent. Dionys. § 10, 12, 13 in Pat. Gr. xxv. 494, 498, 499; Ceillier ii. 399.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIA (1)—Jan. 19. Virgin and martyr at Nicomedia under Maximin, A.D. 309. Being condemned to violation, she ingeniously contrived to preserve her virginity and to secure martyrdom by pretending to the character of a sorcerer. (Bas. Menol.; Nicephorus, lib. 7, c. 13; Bar. Annal. 309, 35.) [G. T. S.]

EUPHRASIA (2)—May 18. One of the seven virgin martyrs at Ancyra. [FAINA.] [G. T. S.]

EUPHRASIA (3), virgin. [EUPRAXIA.]

EUPHRASIA (4), wife of Namatius, or Namatus, bishop of Vienne (ob. 567). Like her husband she was of noble birth, and after his death she devoted herself and her property to "the exile, the widow, the captive, and the poor." Fortunatus wrote an epitaph in her praise. (Venant. Fort. Opp. pt. i. lib. iv. cap. 7; Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 176; Gall. Chr. xvi. 27; Baron. A. E. ann. 582, xxii.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIA (5). [EUPHROSYNIA (1).]

EUPHRASIUS (1), bishop of Andujar or Ukturgi. [EUPRASIUS (1).]

EUPHRASIUS (2), bishop of Colonia or Tuzra in Cappadocia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 413; Mansi, ii. 694.) [L. D.]

EUPHRASIUS (3), bishop of Calanis. [EUPHRATION.]

EUPHRASIUS (4), bishop of Nicomedia, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381 (Mansi, iii. 572). He seems to have died shortly afterwards. (Greg. Nyss. ep. 17; Pat. Gr. xlv. 1056; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 587.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIUS (5), subdeacon of Edessa, who took an active part in the persecution of his bishop, signing the "Instructio et Deprecatio" against him and afterwards appearing in person at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, as one of his accusers. (Mansi, vii. 206, 254.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIUS (6), bishop of Lagania, in the province of Galatia Prima. He took part in the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 488; Acta Conc. Chalced. act. i. a. iii. vi. xv. xvi.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIUS (7), a bishop martyred in Africa at the beginning of the 6th century. He was commemorated on Jan. 14. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 932.) [I. G. S.]

EUPHRASIUS (8), bishop of Antioch, A.D. 521-529. He was a native of Jerusalem. At the commencement of his episcopate he strongly opposed the council of Chalcedon, going so far as to erase the names of the fathers of that assembly, as well as that of Leo bishop of Rome, from the diptychs. He afterwards repented of this, it is said through fear (Theoph. Chronog. A.M. 6013, Patr. Gr. cviii. 392), and according to Joannes Malalas he became a violent persecutor of those whose cause he had espoused (Joan. Mal. Chronogr. lib. xvii. ed. Dindorf. p. 414). Euphrasius perished in the great earthquake which laid the city of Antioch in ruins, A.D. 526. (Theoph. A.M. 6019; Evagrius, H. E. lib. 4, 5; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 733.) [T. W. D.]

EUPHRASIUS (9), said to be the first-known bishop of Parentium (Parenz), c. 521 (Gama, Series Episc. 799; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 781). He is said to have lapsed into schism after one year's episcopate. Pelagius I., c. 558, in a letter (Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 678) to Narses, speaks of a certain "Euphrasius schismaticus." Cappelletti gives an inscription in which his name is recorded. [A. H. D. A.]

EUPHRASIUS (10), bishop of Calahorra, signs by deputy the acts of the thirteenth council of Toledo, 683 (Esp. Sagr. xxxiii. 159; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 287.) [M. A. W.]

EUPHRASIUS (11), bishop of Lugo from about 681 to 688, signs the acts of twelfth, thirteenth, and fifteenth councils of Toledo (Esp. Sagr. xl. 84; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270, 287, 313). [AGRESTIUS.] [M. A. W.]

EUPHRASIUS. See also EUPRASIUS.

EUPHRATAS (1), bishop of Cologne, 343, said to have been deposed for Photinianism by a synod at Cologne, 346 (Mansi, ii. 1371, and note by Binius, 1375). But the acts of this assembly are spurious or have been falsified; for in 347 Euphratas attended the council of Sardica, and not only subscribed its decrees, but was one of those deputed to ask of Constantius the restoration of the churches to Athanasius and his friends. On this mission he proceeded to Antioch, and Theodoret (lib. ii. c. 9) and Athanasius (Hist. Arian. ad Mon. 281) relate a detestable trick played on him by Stephen of Antioch for the purpose of ruining his reputation. (Gall. Christ. iii. 622; Tillemont, Mém. vi. 332, and viii. 119.) [R. T. S.]

EUPHRATAS (2), bishop of Cheronesus (Chersonesus), in Crete. Signed in A.D. 458 the synodical epistle of the Cretan bishops to the emperor Leo. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 271.) [J. de S.]

EUPHRATAS (3), presbyter of Constantinople in 454. In a letter to Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, pope Leo the Great, whose interference in the affairs of the East was systematic, allows Euphratas to be ordained presbyter if he is willing in ample documents to abjure the Eutychian and Nestorian heresies, although he had spoken ill of the late bishop of Constantinople, Flavianus, of blessed memory. (Leo Mag. Epist. cxxxv.; Patr. Lat. liv. 1278; Ceillier, x. 227.) [W. M. S.]

EUPHRATAS (4), eunuch under Justinian, by race one of the Abasgi, a people of the Caucasus. In A.D. 529 he was sent by Justinian on a mission to the Abasgi. A great number of eunuchs came from that race, and Justinian determined to put a stop to the practice of castration. He issued a law to forbid it in general, and despatched Euphratas to warn his countrymen in particular. Justinian also built a church amongst them, and supplied them with missionaries. The tribe was converted to Christianity. (Evagr. lib. iv. cap. 22; Procop. de Bell. ii. 572, 15, Dindorf, 1838; Baron. ad ann. 529, xviii. Justinian, Novell. 142.) [W. M. S.]

EUPHRATAS (5), bishop of Tyana (Eusebia, Christopolis), metropolis of the second Cappadocia, present at the fifth general council, A.D.

553; at the fifth session he quoted the diptychs of his own church to prove that Theodorus, to whom Gregory Nazianzen had written some letters, had been bishop of Tyana, not of Mopsestia. (Le Quien, Orans Christ. i. 400; Mansi, ix. 258. 390.) [L. D.]

Mosheim, in his work on the Ophites (Geschichte der Schlangenbrüder) quoted by Matter (Gnosticisme, i. 180), counts Euphrates as the first Gnostic, on the grounds that he was the founder of the Ophites, and that this sect was anterior to Christianity. But his reasons for the latter opinion have not been found convincing. One of the strongest, viz. that Philaster counts Caelites, Sethites, and Ophites among pre-Christian sects [CAINITES] loses all its weight when we find reason to believe that Philaster here made an arbitrary deviation from the authority he was following (see Lipsius, Quellenkritik der Epiphanius). [G. S.]

EUPHRATES (3), chamberlain of Constantine the Great. According to Codinus he had a great share in Constantine's conversion, but is not mentioned by the earlier authors. See Codin. Orig. Constantinopol. p. 10 c. [M. F. A.]

EUPHRATES (3), presbyter. [EUPRATER]

EUPHRATES (4) (EUPHRATAS), bishop of Eleutherna in Crete; present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 404; Or. Christ. ii. 270.) [J. de S.]

EUPHRATION, bishop of Balaneæ (on the Syrian coast, at the mouth of the river Eleutherna), present at the Nicene council, A.D. 325 (Mansi, ii. 693, 698). Athanasius (de Synod. § 17, p. 584) states that Eusebius of Caesarea, in Palestine, writing to Euphration, did not fear to assert openly that Christ was not very God. A charge of writing to Euphration in blasphemous terms on the same subject is made against Eusebius in the acts of the second council of Nicea (Mansi, xiii. 701 D). He was banished from his see by the Arians at the same time as Eustathius of Antioch, to the great grief of his diocese (Athanas. de Pag. § 3, p. 254). In Athanas (Hist. Arian. ad Monach. § 5) the see of Euphration is written Καλαρέας, which has caused him sometimes to be called bishop of Calanis; but the Benedictine editor there observes, the true name is Βαλαρέας, which occurs in Apol. d Pag. § 3. [K. V.]

EUPHRONIUS (1), bishop of Antioch, one of the prelates intruded by the Arian party after the deposition of Eustathius, cir. 332. He has previously been a presbyter of the Cappadocia Caesarea. For the difficulties connected with the succession of these intruded bishops of Antioch see EULALIUS (4). The see being again vacant by the premature death of Eulalius, the dominant party desired to establish their position by retaining Eusebius of Caesarea, who was then at Antioch as a leading member of the council by whom Eustathius had been deposed and applied to the emperor Constantine to sanction the appointment. Eusebius, however, wrote the emperor to decline the proffered dignity, such translation being a violation of the Nicene canons (Can. 15). Constantine on this wrote three letters, preserved by Eusebius (de Const. iii. 60, 61, 62), one to Eusebius, highly commending his refusal of the see, a second the people of Antioch, bidding them not to over the bishops of other cities, and a third to the ordaining prelates recommending Euphronius of Caesarea and George of Arethusa. The choice fell on Euphronius. He added another to the list of short-lived intruded prelates, dying within less than two years of his election. (Socr. H. E. i. 24; Soz. H. E. ii. 19; Theod. H. E. i. 22; Kaye, Council of Nicaea, p. 60, note 4.) [DUMAS (23) p. 315, note.] [E. V.]

EUPHRONIUS (3), bishop of Colonia in Armenia; afterwards metropolitan of Nicopolis (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 428, 429). While he was at Colonia, A.D. 375, Basil wrote to him apologising for the rarity of his letters, caused by the distance and the difficulty of finding letter carriers, and asking his prayers (Basil, Epist. 185 [317]). The same year, on the death of Theodotus, the sensitively orthodox metropolitan of Nicopolis, Fronto was ordained as his successor by the party of Eustathius of Sebaste. The orthodox Christians of Nicopolis refused to communicate with their new bishop, and held their worship in the open air. Fronto's measures of repression only exasperated the schism. To heal the wound Poemenius, bishop of Sebaste, with the hearty approval of all the bishops of the province and the sanction of the civil authorities, promptly sent Euphronius to occupy the episcopal seat at Nicopolis. The people of Colonia, being very indignant at the loss of their bishop, and threatening to bring the matter before the tribunals, Basil wrote to calm them (Ep. 227 [292]). He begs them to postpone their private feelings to the general good of the church. They could not but be affected by the religious condition of Nicopolis, now metropolitan. Euphronius had promised not to give up his superintendence of his old flock. He would have more labour, but they would have as much care. Basil wrote a similar letter to the magistrates of Colonia (Ep. 228 [290]), counselling peaceable acquiescence in the decision of the bishops. Not content with this, Basil at the same time wrote to the clergy of Nicopolis sympathising for the irritated feeling of the people of Colonia at which they must not take umbrage (Ep. 229 [193]); and to the magistrates of the city, exhorting them to heartily recognise their new bishop, and do all they could to strengthen his feeling in his favour among the people of the rural districts. (Ep. 230 [194].) [E. V.]

EUPHRONIUS (3), bishop of Anemurium in Lycia. He signed the synodical letter of the Lycian bishops to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 563; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 1017.) [J. de S.]

EUPHRONIUS (4), bishop of Hierapetra, in Crete, A.D. 458; signed in that year the synodical letter of the Cretan church addressed to the emperor Leo. (Or. Christ. ii. 267.) [J. de S.]

EUPHRONIUS (5), ST., ninth bishop of Autun, successor of Leontius. Before his elevation to the bishopric he had built the church of St. Symphorian, the martyr of Autun. (Greg. Tar. Hist. Franc. ii. 15; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 214.) The date of his consecration is not quite certain, but it was probably not long before A.D. 452. That year was rendered memorable by an eclipse of the moon, a comet, and some portentous signs in the sky, following close upon Easter. With reference to the last, Idatius (Chronicon, Migne, Patr. Lat. li. 883) relates that Euphronius, now a bishop, addressed a letter to Count Agrippinus, which has not, however, survived. The following year, in conjunction with St. Lupus of Troyes, he wrote an epistle, which is still extant, to Talasius, bishop of Angers, in answer to questions put to them on the subjects of church ritual, and the discipline of the inferior clergy in the matter of marriage. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 66; cf. Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, x. 357.) The middle years of his episcopate are bare of recorded facts, but we know that he was on intimate terms with Sidonius Apollinarius. (See the two letters expressive of friendship and esteem, lib. vii. Ep. 8 and lib. ix. Ep. 2, Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 574, 617.) About A.D. 470 he assisted at the consecration of John I. to the see of Châlons, of which a curious account is given by Sidonius. (Sidon. Apoll. Epist. iv. 25 in Patr. Lat. lviii. 531.) In 474 or 475, he is said to have been present at the councils of Arles and Lyons, held to condemn the Pelagian views of the priest Lucidus (Mansi, vii. 1007). The name also appears among the signatures to a comminatory letter of Faustus bishop of Riez to the same Lucidus, the doctrine in which is said to be semi-Pelagian. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (iv. 340) refuse to admit the identity of this heretic subscriber with the bishop, and they are supported by the fact that no see is appended to the signature. (Cf. Tillemont, xvi. 423.)

In the will of St. Perpetuus of Tours (to be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 754) there is a legacy of a silver reliquary and a missal to his "consacerdos" Eufronius. This may quite possibly have been the bishop, who had a certain connexion with Tours, since Gregory (ut supra) tells us that he sent marble for the top of St. Martin's tomb there. Upon his death, the date of which is unknown, he was succeeded by Flavichonus. He was buried in his own church of St. Symphorian, and is commemorated on Aug. 3. [S. A. B.]

EUPHRONIUS. [EUFRONIUS.]

EUPHROSIUS, bishop of Rhodes, the metropolitan of the Cyclades, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 924; Mansi, ii. 695.) [L. D.]

EPHROSYNA (1), EUPHRASIA, a virgin, of Alexandria, daughter of Paphnutius born in the beginning of the 5th century. She was betrothed by her parents, but in order to escape marriage, fled disguised as a monk to a neighbouring monastery, and describing herself as Smaragdus an eunuch who had escaped from the palace, was received as a monk by the abbat. She was eventually allowed a separate cell, and lived for thirty-eight years without her sex being discovered. Her father in his grief at her loss came to the abbat, who recommended him to take his sorrow to Smaragdus. The father and daughter had a long interview—he known to her, she unknown to him—in which she instructed him in religion, but allowed him to go without betraying herself. In later years, feeling death near, she sent for him, revealed herself, and died. Her father embraced monastic life in the same monastery, and died there. She is commemorated by the Roman church on Feb. 11, by the Greek on Sept. 25. (Basil. Menol.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 537; Baillet, Vie des Saints, Feb. 11.) [I. G. S.]

EUPHROSYNA (2)—Jan. 1. Martyr at Alexandria. (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi.)

EUPHROSYNA (3)—May 7. A female slave of Flavia Domitilla, with whom she suffered. [G. T. S.]

EUPILIUS (LUPILIUS), bishop of Como (539), came from Utrecht. (Acta Sanctorum, Boll. Oct. 11, v. 632; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 513; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 260.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUPITHIUS, bishop of Stratonicia (Hadrianopolis) in Caria, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 411; Mansi, vii. 156.) [L. D.]

EUPLIUS—Aug. 12. Deacon and martyr at Catana in Sicily in the Diocletian persecution. He was one of those who then voluntarily sought martyrdom. His acts, which are, however, very corrupt, tell us that one day he came to the tent of the proconsul and proclaimed outside, "I am a Christian, and for the name of Christ I am willing to die." Upon this he was tortured and beheaded. In Basil's Menology he is noted on Aug. 11. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Usuard.; Kal. Frontonis; Surius, Ruinart; Baron. Annal. ann. 303, cxlviii.) [G. T. S.]

EUPLUS (1), a member of the Ephesian church, sent by that church to meet IGNATIUS at Smyrna on his way to Rome. (Ignat. Ep. ad Eph. 3.) [G. S.]

EUPLUS (2), son of Eusanius bishop of Agrigentum. Eusanius died intestate, and Euplus solicits from pope Gregory the Great that both his father's property and his mother's jointure may be made over to him. Gregory writes to Maximianus bishop of Syracuse, enjoining compliance with this request. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. iv. ind. xii. ep. 37; Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 711.) [C. H.]

EUPNIUS, a magistrate addressed by Firmus bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who pleaded for justice to be done to the bearer of his letter. (Firm. Caes. ep. 40 in Pat. Gr. lxxvii. 1510.) [T. W. D.]

EUPORUS (1)—Dec. 23. Martyr in Crete during the Decian persecution, with Evarestus, Eunicianus and seven others. The magistrate handed him to the populace, who tortured him for thirty days and then beheaded him. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]

EUPORUS (2), bishop of Hypaepa in the province of Asia, on the road between Ephesus and Sardis, present at the council of Ephesus A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 695; Mansi, Concil. iv. 1216.) [L. D.]

EUPBAXIA—July 25. Daughter of a senator, Antigonus, and cousin of the emperor Theodosius, A.D. 390. Having been espoused to a senator, he died before they were married, whereupon she retired with her mother into a monastery at Thebes in Egypt, where she died. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]

EUPRAXIUS (1), a slave of Gregory Nazianzen, brother of Theophilus, manumitted in his will, and bequeathed a legacy of five gold pieces. (Greg. Naz. Testam.) [E. V.]

EUPRAXIUS (2), a disciple and intimate friend of Eusebius of Samosata. While Eusebius was in exile in Thrace, A.D. 374, a letter was carried to him by Eupraxius congratulating him on his good confession, and written either by Basil or Gregory Nazianzen, Tillemont inclining to think to the latter (Mém. Eccl. ix. 230). (Basil, Ep. 166 [251]; Greg. Naz. ep. 65 al. 30.) [E. V.]

EUPREPIA, servant of Afra of Augsburg, martyr with her fellow servants Digna and Eumenia; commemorated Aug. 12 (Bas. Men.; Mart. Usuard., Adon.; Boll. Acta SS. 12 Aug. ii. 58). Her name is sometimes written Eutropia (cf. Ceillier, iii. 30). [EUMENIA.] [C. H.]

EUPREPIA, A.D. 587, the sister of Ennodius bishop of Pavia. Among the 297 letters of Ennodius we have several addressed to Euprepia, and one which is probably from her (Ennod. Epp. lib. iv. 4). She lived in the Gallic province of Narbonne or Arles, and seems at one time to have contemplated changing her abode. In one of the letters Ennodius sends her one of his poems, an epitaph on the wife of his friend and correspondent Faustus. He gives her advice and admonition, and frequently makes mention of her son Lupicinus. He alludes to her in other letters. [F. A.]

EUPREPIUS (1), first recorded bishop of Verona, imagined to have been one of the Seventy, and to have sat A.D. 60–72; commemorated Aug. 21. St. Cricinus follows him. Other bishops of Verona bearing this name in the list of Gams are not recognised by Ughelli. (Ug. Ital. Suc. v. 677; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 400; Mart. Rom. Aug. 1.) [C. H.]

EUPREPIUS (2)—Oct. 17 and Sept. 27. Martyr under Lysias at Aegae in Cilicia with Anthimus and Leontius, his brothers. They were three physicians, of the class known as ἀνδρῶνται, practising without fee, after the example of Cosmas and Damianus, with whom they suffered. [COSMAS (1) and DAMIANUS (8).] (Mart. Usuardi, Sept. 27; Bas. Men. Oct. 17; Menaea Gr. Oct. 17, ed. Constantin. 1843, Oct. p. 123; Ferrarius, Catal. Gen. Sanct. 407.) It would seem to have been in his honour that the monastery to which Nestorius is said to have wished to retire after his deposition was erected. It was situated in the suburbs of Antioch. Nestorius had been a monk there. (Evagrius, H. E. i. 7; Marius Mercator. pt. ii. praef. Garner. in Migne, Patrol. xlviii. 702.) [T. W. D.]

EUPREPIUS (3) (EUTROPIUS), bishop of Adrianopolis in Thrace, deposed by the Eusebian council of Constantinople, A.D. 336, according to the Libellus Synodicus of the council (Mansi, ii. 1170); but as Pagi (ann. 336. vi. in Baron.) points out, Athanasius names this bishop Eutropius, mentioning him in terms of high praise, both for his orthodoxy and the fortitude with which he endured the trials of persecution and exile (Athanas. Epist. de Fug. § 3, in Pat. Gr. xiv. 648; Id. Hist. Arian. ad Monach. § 5, d. 690.) [T. W. D.]

EUPREPIUS (4), bishop of Bizya in Thrace; one of the sixty-eight bishops who demanded that the opening of the council of Ephesus should be postponed until the arrival of John of Antioch. He signed on this occasion also for Fritilas bishop of Heraclea (Synod. adv. Tragoed. cap. 7, in Theodoret. Opp. t. v. in Pat. Gr. lxxxiv. 591). He nevertheless attended the council when it opened, signed the sentence against Nestorius and the "decretum de fide" (Mansi, iv. 1225 c, 1364 e). But Euprepus is chiefly of interest from the memorial termed "supplex libellus," which he and Cyril bishop of Coele in the same province jointly addressed to the fathers of the council (ibid. 1478). In this document they stated that by an ancient custom in the European provinces a bishop sometimes had one or more bishoprics besides his own under his charge; that Euprepus was at that time administering the one of Arcadiopolis in addition to that of Bizya, while Cyril was acting similarly. The council was requested to rule that this custom might not be disturbed, and that Fritilas bishop of Heraclea might be forbidden to appoint bishops in those cities of Thrace which were then without bishops of their own. The prayer was granted, and it was decreed that the custom of the cities in question should be respected. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1136, 1145.) [E. V.]

EUPREPIUS (5), one of the monks under Irenaeus at Constantinople who addressed the Council of Ephesus in 449 against their bishop Flavianus. (Mansi, vi. 862.) [T. W. D.]

EUPREPIUS (6), bishop of Cyzicus, the metropolis of the Hellespontine province, succeeded Eusebius, who was killed by the citizens. John bishop of Ilium signed the decrees of the fifth general council, A.D. 553, in behalf of Euprepus his metropolitan. (Le Quien, Oriens Chr. i. 754; Mansi, ix. 389.) [L. D.]

EUPREPIUS (7), confessor in the reign of Constantine II. He and his brother Theodorus, sons of Plutianus who held a lucrative public post at Constantinople, were zealous maintainers of the Catholic opinions against the Monothelites, being disciples of Anastasius the presbyter and apocryphus of the Roman church, and the warm supporter of St. Maximus. Anastasius was banished to Treves, and the brothers refusing like him to accept the Typus [CONSTANTINUS IV.] endeavored to effect their escape to Rome, but were seized at Abydos and sent into exile to Cherson, where Euprepus sank under his hardships on Oct. 26 in the fourteenth indiction (i.e. A.D. 671). They are mentioned in the Hypomnesticon de Iohanne & Maximiano. (Anast. Biblioth. Collectanea, in Patr. Lat. cxxix. 684.) See also Boll. Acta SS. B. Aug. iii. 114. [T. W. D.]

EUPROBUS (EUTROPIUS), April 30. Bishop and martyr at Saintes, whither he had been sent to preach the gospel. He died in the 3rd century. Palladius, bishop of the same see, built a church in his honour in the 6th century, the consecration of which is described by Gregory of Tours. (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi; Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. cap. 56.) [G. T. S.]

EUPSYCHIOUS (1), martyr, who suffered in the reign of Hadrian. He was discharged after his first arrest, when he gave away all his possessions to the poor, and to those who had informed against him before the magistrates. He afterwards suffered excruciating tortures, his sides being torn with iron hooks before he was dispatched with the sword. (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. 7.) [H. R. R.]

EUPSYCHIOUS (2) (EUTYCHIOUS), saint and martyr, first bishop of Melitene, the metropolis of the second Armenia. In the Menaea he is commemorated on May 28th (AA. SS. Bolland. Mai. vi. 734), and is said to have learned Christianity from the apostles, but his martyrdom is generally referred to the time of the emperor Gordian III., c. A.D. 238. Le Quien (Oriens Chr. i. 439) identifies him with the martyr of Basil's epistles [EUPSYCHIOUS (6)]. [L. D.]

EUPSYCHIOUS (3), martyr. [NICOMEDIA, MARTYRS OF.]

EUPSYCHIOUS (4), bishop of Tyana (Eusebia, Christopolis), metropolis of the second Cappadocia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325, and a speaker in the council; his name was recorded first on the diptychs of that church, as we learn from the speech of EUPHRATAS at the fifth council. (Le Quien, Oriens Chr. i. 395; Mansi, ii. 694.) He is no doubt the Cappadocian bishop mentioned with twenty-seven others as a type and standard of orthodoxy by Athanasius, A.D. 356, in his letter to the bishops of Egypt and Libya. (Athanas. Opp. pars 1, p. 220, § 8 in Patr. Graec. xxv. 557.) [L. D.]

EUPSYCHIOUS (5), whose name appears in the Roman Calendar, and whose martyrdom is celebrated on April 9 (Boll. Acta SS. April 9, i. 822), suffered from the rashness which induced him in the brief reign of Julian to assist in the demolition of a temple to Fortune, which had remained undisturbed in the city of Caesarea in Cappadocia. "All the actors in this transaction were condemned, some to death and others to banishment" (Sozomen, H. E. v. 11). Caesarea was struck from the roll of cities and the order was issued that henceforth it should bear its earlier name Masaca. Among the objects of the emperor's special indignation were Damas and Eupsyichius. The latter was a notary who had recently married. He was made a special example of, and after cruel torment beheaded. Julian gave orders that the temple should be rebuilt, the order was never obeyed, on the contrary a church was erected on the spot, dedicated to the memory of Eupsyichius. To the festival of the dedication of this church Basil summoned the bishops of Pontus, by a letter which is still extant. (Bas. Opp. Paris ed. Ep. cclii.) Moreover, we find Basil eagerly entreating Eusebius of Samosata to be present at the festival of Eupsyichius Sept. 7, in the year 372. (Bas. Ep. c.; Gregor. Naz. Opp. Epp. xxvi. xxvii.; Ceillier, vol. v. p. 252.) [H. R. R.]

EUPSYCHIOUS (6), a person deputed by Tranquillinus, a bishop, to convey tidings to Chrysostom at Cucusus concerning his health and other matters, but who failed to fulfil his commission. (Chrysost. Epist. 37.) [E. V.]

EUPSYCHIU (7), circ. 423, addressed by Atticus, archbishop of Constantinople, in a letter arguing for the union of two natures in Jesus Christ, each keeping its own essence. A fragment of the letter is cited in the third part of the Acts of the council of Chalcedon, among testimonies of the fathers establishing the two natures. (Mansi, vii. 471; Ceillier, viii. 15).

[W. M. S.]

EUPSYCHIU (8), bearer, about 449, of a letter from pope Leo the Great to Flavianus, bishop of Constantinople (Leo Mag. Epist. xxxix.; Patr. Lat. liv. 889; Ceillier, x. 214.) [W. M. S.]

EUREDUS (EUSENDUS), bishop of Lerida; signs the acts of the thirteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth councils of Toledo, A.D. 683, 688, and 693. He is the last bishop of the Gothic period. (Esp. Sagr. xlv. 108; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 287, 304, 313.)

[M. A. W.]

EURESIIUS, a bishop of the civil diocese of Asia denounced as a heretic by an edict of the emperor Arcadius, addressed to Aurelian the proconsul, Sept. 3, A.D. 395 (Cod. Theod. xvi. v. 28). The edict extends the definition of heresy so as to include all who "vel levi argumento a iudicio Catholicae religionis et tramite detecti fuerint deviare" (Cod. Justin. I. v. 2, § 1); and it was under that definition that Euresius was charged with heresy, and forbidden to be regarded as "of the number of the most holy bishops." Baronius, quoting the edict, marks Euresius with an asterisk, to indicate that the name is suspicious (Ann. Eccles. s. a. 395). Gothofred identifies him with the Luciferian bishop Ephesus who is mentioned in the "libellus" presented by Faustinus and Marcellinus to the emperors Valentinianus II., Theodosius, and Arcadius, c. A.D. 386 (Pat. L. xiii. 99), as having been cruelly persecuted by Damasus bishop of Rome, A.D. 366-384; and Pagi accepts the identification (Critic. s. a. 395, v. vi.). It would appear that after his persecution in the West, Euresius fled to the East, and that after Theodosius issued the rescript addressed to Cynegius (ob. 388, Zosim. iv. 45) granting toleration to the Luciferians (Pat. L. u. s. 107) he peacefully exercised the episcopate until Arcadius published this edict. [EPHESIUS; FAUSTINUS]

[T. W. D.]

EURFYL (ERVUL), ST., a Welsh saint of the 7th century after whom Llaneurfyl (Llanerfyl, Llanervul) in Montgomeryshire is named; commemorated on July 6 (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 307).

[C. W. B.]

EURGAIN (EUGAIN, EURGEIN), the foundress of Llaneurgain or Northop, Flintshire, and wife of Elidr Mwynvawr (the courteous), a Lancashire chieftain, is given in the Pedigree of the Saints as daughter of Maelgwn Gwynedd, son of Cadwallawn Llawhir, son of Einion Yrth, son of Cunedda Wledig, and Rees places her among the Welsh saints of the middle of the 6th century. (Myo. Arch. ii. 7, 25, 40; Prof. Rees, Welsh Saints, iii. 261, 535; Rev. W. J. Rees, Cambro-Brit. Saints, 593, 597.)

[J. G.]

EURIC (1) (EV. RICH, EVORICH, EUTHORIK, EVARIX), king of the Visigothic kingdom of Toulouse from 466 to 484, and from 477 onwards master of almost the whole of Spain.

Under him the Visigoth power reached its highest point. In the reign of his successor it was curtailed by the Franks, while in that of his father, Theodoric or Theodored I. (d. 451), and his brothers, Thorismund and Theodoric II., the country occupied by the Goths had still been reckoned as an integral part of the empire ("auxiliumini reipublicae," says Aetius to the Goths before the battle of Chalons, "cujus membrum tenetis," Jord. c. 36), while the Gothic state had found it necessary to submit again and again to the foedus with Rome. But under Euric it took a fresh departure. "Euric, therefore, king of the Visigoths," says Jord. c. 45, "seeing the frequent changes of the Roman princes" (and the weakness of the Roman kingdom, "Romani regni vacillationem," as he says in c. 46), "attempted to occupy the Gauls in his own right, suo jure." And again, "totas Hispanias Galliasque sibi jam proprio jure tenens." Thus the pretence of the foedus was finally set aside, and in the interval between the fall of the Western Empire and the rise of the Ostrogoths and Franks, Euric appears as the most powerful sovereign of the West (Dahn, v. 100).

The facts of his reign are briefly these. In 466, the year of his accession, Euric sent legates to the Eastern emperor Leo, perhaps with a last thought of renewing the foedus. The negotiations, however, came to nothing, and in 467 the Goths and Vandals made a defensive league against Leo, Anthemius and Rikimir, who were about to attack Genseric. Beside his Vandalic auxiliaries in Gaul Euric also had the support of a certain party among the provincials themselves, as is shewn by the evidence given at the trial of Arvandus, prefect of the Gauls, for treasonable correspondence with the Goths (Sidon. Apoll. i. 7), and in 468 he attacked the new made Western emperor Anthemius simultaneously in Gaul and Spain. In Spain the Gothic army took Merida and Lisbon from the Suevi, while in Gaul, the Bretons under Riothimir, the faithful allies of Rome, were defeated at Déols, on the Indre, and Bourges was captured (470?). Between 472 and 474 the state of affairs at Rome prevented any help being sent to the Burgundian and Breton allies, and all over the country south of the Loire, the enfeebled Roman garrisons were no longer able to make any resistance to the Gothic attacks. By 474 the Gothic dominion in Gaul would have extended from the Atlantic to the Rhone and Mediterranean, and from the Pyrenees to the Loire, but for one obstacle—the vigorous defence of Auvergne by Ecdicius, son of the emperor Avitus, and the famous bishop of Clermont, Sidonius Apollinaris (Sid. Apoll. vii. 1). The history of this dramatic struggle, preserved for us in the letters of Sidonius, throws valuable light on the whole state of politics in the 5th century. It is the last desperate effort of the provincial nobility to avoid barbarian masters, and it is a fight, too, of Catholicism against Arianism. But it was an unsuccessful struggle. After besieging Clermont in 474, Euric withdrew into winter quarters, while Sidonius and Ecdicius, in the midst of a devastated country, organized fresh resistance. But with the spring diplomacy intervened. Glycerius, fearful for Italy, and hoping to purchase a renewal of the foedus, had in 473 formally ceded the country to Euric, a compact rejected by Ecdicius and Sidonius, and now Nepos, for the same reason, sent legates to Euric, amongst them the famous Epiphanius of Pavia (Ennod. Vita S. Epiph. AA. SS. Jan. ii. p. 369), to treat for peace. Euric persisted in the demand for Arvergne, and accordingly, in return for a reversal of the foedus ("fidelibus animis foederabatur," Sid. Apoll. ix. 5), Ecdicius and Sidonius were ordered to submit, and the district was given over to the revenge of the Goths. Ecdicius fled to the Burgundians, while Sidonius (see Ep. vii. 7, for his invectives against the peace—"Pulchrum vos hujus foederis, nec utilis nec decorum!"), after having in vain attempted to make favourable terms for the Catholics with Euric, was banished to Livia, near Narbonne (Sid. Apoll. viii. 3). By the influence, however, of Euric's minister, Leo, he was set at liberty after a year's imprisonment, and appeared at the Gothic court at Bordeaux, where, during a stay of two months, he succeeded in obtaining only one audience of the king, so great was the crowd of ambassadors, and the pressure of important business waiting for the decision of Euric and his minister. In Ep. viii. 9, Sidonius has left us a brilliant picture of the Gothic king, surrounded by barbarian envoys, Roman legates, and even Persian ambassadors. It is little to be wondered at, he says, that his own business was passed by—

"Nec multum domino vacat vel ipsi, Dum responsa petit subactus orbi."

The Gothic territory in Gaul was now bounded by the Loire, the Rhone, and the two seas, while in Spain a great many towns—which, is not quite clear—were already held by Gothic garrisons. From these starting-points Euric's troops easily overran the whole country when the time for the next great forward step arrived. In 475 came the fall of Nepos and Augustulus, and the suspension of the empire of the West. The news stirred all the barbarian races in Gaul and Spain to uneasy movement. Euric, with an Ostrogothic reinforcement under Widimer, crossed the Pyrenees in 477, took Pampelona and Saragosa, and annihilated the resistance of the Roman nobility in Tarraconensis. By 478 the whole peninsula had fallen to the Goths with the exception of a mountainous strip in the north-west, relinquished probably by treaty to the Suevi. Since 461 no Roman army had been available for the protection of Spain, while sometimes, as the allies of Rome and under the shelter of the foedus, sometimes as the enemies both of Rome and the Suevi, the Goths had gradually possessed themselves of numerous important parts. Their conquest of the peninsula was now complete, and thus, says Dahn, "a place of refuge was provided for the Goths . . . destined in the following generation to fall back when the young and all-subduing power of the Franks, called to a greater work than they" (Sketches der Germanen, v. 98). Fresh successes in Gaul followed close upon the Spanish campaign. Arles was taken, 480, Marseilles, 481, and ultimately the whole of Provence up to the Maritime Alps (Proc. b. G. i. 1, quoted by Dahn, l.c.). Resistance on the part of the provincials was impossible, and the exiled Nepos, indeed, seems to have formally surrendered almost the whole of southern Roman Gaul to Euric. Euric was now sovereign from the Loire to the Straits of Gibraltar, and appears also as the protector of the neighbouring barbarian races against the encroaching Franks (Cass. Var. iii. 3), taking the same position towards them as Theodoric the Great took later in the reign of Euric's son Alaric, Theodoric's son-in-law. Euric survived the accession of Chlodwig three years, dying before September, 485.

Euric's Personal Character, and his Persecutions of the Catholics.—That Euric was a ruler of commanding gifts and personality cannot be doubted. Even his bitterest enemy, Sidonius, speaks of his courage and capacity in terms of unwilling admiration. "Pre-eminent in war, of fiery courage and vigorous youth," says Sidonius ("armis potens, acer animis, alacer annis," Ep. vii. 6), "he makes but one mistake—that of supposing that his successes are due to the correctness of his religion, when he owes them rather to a stroke of earthly good fortune." He was much interested in religious matters, and was a passionate Arian, not merely apparently from political motives, though his persecution of the Catholic bishops was dictated by sufficient political reasons. The letter of Sidonius quoted above throws great light upon Euric's relation to the Catholic church, and upon the state of the church under his government. "It must be confessed," he says, "that although this king of the Goths is terrible because of his power, I fear his attacks upon the Christian laws more than I dread his blows for the Roman walls. The mere name of Catholic, they say, curdles his countenance and heart like vinegar, so that you might almost doubt whether he was more the king of his people or of his sect. Lose no time," he adds, addressing his correspondent Basilus, bishop of Aix, "in ascertaining the hidden weakness of the Catholic state, that you may be able to apply prompt and public remedy. Bordeaux, Périgueux, Rodez, Limoges, Gabale, Eause, Bazas, Comminges, Auch, and many other towns, where death has cut off the bishops ("summis sacerdotibus ipsorum morte truncatis," a passage misunderstood later by Gregory of Tours, who speaks of the execution of bishops, Hist. Franc. ii. 25), and no new bishops have been appointed in their places . . . mark the wide boundary of spiritual ruin. The evil grows every day with the successive deaths of the bishops, and the heretics, both of the present and the past, might be moved by the suffering of congregations deprived of their bishops, and in despair for their lost faith." The churches were crumbling, and thorns filled up the open doorways; cattle browsed in the porches and on the grass round the altar. Even in the town churches services were rare, and not only clerical discipline, but the very memory of it seemed about to perish. "For when a priest dies, and no episcopal benediction gives him a successor in that church, not only the priest but the priest's office dies" ("sacerdotium moritur, non sacerdos"). Not only are there vacancies caused by death: he gives the names of two bishops, Crocus and Simplicius, who have been deposed and exiled by Euric. Finally, he implores the aid of Basilus, the position of whose bishopric made him diplomatically important ("per vos mala foederum currunt, per vos regni utriusque pacta conditionesque portantur") towards obtaining for the Catholics from the Gothic government, at least the right of ordaining bishops, that "so we may keep our hold upon the people of the Gauls, if not ex foedere, at least ex fide."

Gregory of Tours in the following century echoed and exaggerated the account of Sidonius, and all succeeding Catholic writers have accused Euric of the same intolerant persecution of the church. It is, however, certain that the persecution must be looked upon as to a great extent political. The Catholic bishops and the provincial nobility were the natural leaders of the Romanized populations. The ecclesiastical organization made the bishops especially formidable. (See Dahn's remarks on the Vandal king Huneric's persecutions, Könige der Germanen, i. 250.) Their intrigues and their opposition threatened the work of Euric's life, and did, in fact, backed by the arms of the orthodox Franks, destroy it in the reign of his successor. But whether the persecution was more religious or more political, it has a special interest as one of the earliest instances of that oppression in the name of religion, of which the later history of the Goths and of the Spain they conquered, is everywhere full (Dahn, v. 101).

It is certain, however, that Euric by no means oppressed the Romans as such. His minister Leo was of an illustrious Roman family (Sid. Apoll. viii. 3), and so also was the count Victorius, to whom was entrusted the government of Auvergne after its surrender (Sid. Apoll. vii. 17; Greg. Tur. ii. 35). It was probably by Leo's help that Euric drew up the code of laws of which Isidore and others speak. "Sub hoc rege Gothi legum statuta in scriptis habere coeperunt. Nam antea tantum moribus et consuetudine tenebantur." (Hist. Goth. apud Esp. Sagr. vi. 486.) Dahn, Könige der Germanen, Vte Abth. p. 88-101. See list of sources and literature prefixed. EURIC (2) (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. Epit. cap. 83), king of Gallicia. [EBURIC.] [C. H.]

EURIELA, Breton saint of the 7th cent., daughter of king Hoel III. (otherwise called Judicael) and sister of St. Josse. Lobineau mentions a parish church dedicated to her in the diocese of Dol, not far from Dinan. She was commemorated on Oct. 1. (Lobineau, Saints de Bretagne, vol. ii. p. 117, ed. 1836; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. 1, 198.) [C. H.]

EUOLDUS (CUOLDUS, CONRADUS) is given as twenty-fourth bishop of Besançon, between Wandelbertus and Aurulus, about the middle of the eighth century. He is said to have died in the twelfth year of his episcopate (Gall. Christ. xv. 19). [S. A. B.]

EUROSIA, virgin martyr at Jacca, a town in Spain by the river Aragon, under the Saracens in the 8th century; commemorated June 25. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. v. 88.) [C. H.]

EURVYL. [EURFYL.]

EURYN was one of the sons of Helig Foel, who was descended from Caradog Fraichfras, and chieftain of a district which was overflowed, and is now known as the Lafan Sands in Beaumaris Bay, Carnarvonshire. Like his father and brothers, he is included among the saints, but has no feast or church dedication (Rees, Welsh Saints, 103, 298, 301-2; Williams, Emm. Welsh, 148). [J. G.]

EUSANIUS (1), martyr under Maximinian in the Samnite town of Furconium, near Aquila; commemorated July 9. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 601.) [C. H.]

EUSANIUS (2), bishop of Agrigentum. His son Euplus in 594 is to receive a fair share of the goods which belonged to Eusanius before he became bishop: so directs Gregory the Great (lib. iv. indict. xii. Ep. 37, Migne, lxxvii. 711; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. p. 109). [A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIA (1), empress, second wife of Constantius II. We learn from Julian that she was born at Thessalonica, and was the daughter of a consul. (Or. iii. §§ 107, 109.) She had two brothers, Ensebius and Hypatius, consulars. (Amm. xxi. 6. 4.) Her marriage with the emperor took place apparently in 352 or 353. (Tillemont, Emp. iv. 26.) His affection for her is shewn by the fact that he called a new province of the empire, comprising Bithynia, &c., after her name. (Amm. xvii. 7. 6.) In 354 she was instrumental in saving the life of Julian, whose firm friend she continued to be, and whose panegyric on her is still preserved, being numbered as his third oration. (Cf. esp. §§ 118, 121 and Ad Ath. § 273.) It was greatly owing to her influence that he received the title of Caesar in 355, and also the hand of Helena. (Zosim. iii. 1; Jul. Ad Ath. § 274 A; Trübner ed.) In 356, during her husband's expedition across the Rhine, she paid a visit to Rome, where she was received with great honour. (Jul. Or. iii. § 129 c.) In the following year apparently she persuaded Constantius to make Julian governor of the nations beyond the Alps. (Zosim. iii. 1.) Her death is only alluded to incidentally. (Amm. xxi. 6. 4.) She never had any children, and one serious charge is brought against her by Ammianus (xvi. 10. 18), namely, that through jealousy she several times induced Helena the wife of Julian to take drugs, which produced abortion. With the exception of this, all authorities speak of her with high praise. Julian of course lavishes upon her the most fulsome compliments, but besides that, Zosimus (l. c.) speaks of her as highly educated and endowed with discernment extraordinary for her sex, and Ammianus (xxi. 6, 4) describes her as excelling in the accomplishment of her mind and in beauty of person.

It is possible that St. Chrysostom alludes to her (In Epist. ad Phil. Hom. xv.) where he speaks of an empress whose death was the result of unlawful efforts to procure by drugs the fruitfulness which God had seen fit to withhold from her. Of her attitude towards the church we have not much information. Theodoret (H. E. ii. 16. 28) states that Liberius in exile rejected her presents, as he did those of the emperor, from which we should gather that she belonged to the Arian party, and this is probable on other grounds. Suidas (sub nom. Leontius) relates a story of Leontius bishop of Tripolis in Lydia failing to pay her the adulation which the other bishops displayed, and her anger on account of it. Leontius is called an Arian by Philostorgius. Baronius appears to go beyond the asherities when he speaks of her as the instigator of all her husband's attacks upon the Catholic faith. (Baron. A. E. an. 356 cxxvi.) [M. F. A.]

EUSEBIA (2), pretended virgin of the Manichæans, mentioned by Augustine (De Hæres. cap. 46). [C. H.]

EUSEBIA (3), a deaconess of the Macedonian sect at Constantinople. She was an intimate friend of Caesarius, who built a church in that city in honour of St. Thyrsus. [CAESARIUS (6).] Eusebia had a house and grounds in the suburbs of the city, where she had concealed relics of the forty martyrs who suffered at Sebaste. When on her death-bed, she charged the Macedonian monks of Constantinople to bury her remains where the relics were deposited, but to keep the fact of their concealment there a secret. They fulfilled both her requests, and built a subterranean cavity around the relics and her remains, and a dwelling house over them (Sozomen, u. s.). Caesarius and his wife agreed that whichever of them died first should bury the other by the side of Eusebia, and he therefore purchased the property for that purpose. His wife died first, and was buried there accordingly. It was on that property that Caesarius built his church, but not until after the buildings erected by the monks had fallen into ruins.

In the meanwhile the monks had left Constantinople, probably after the edicts of A.D. 423 directed against the Macedonians (Cod. Theod. IV. v. 59, 60 = 13), but without communicating the secret about the relics to any one. Not long after the erection of the church, however, they were discovered by means of Polychronius, a presbyter of the city, who, when a youth, had witnessed the burial of Eusebia. He succeeded in tracing the only survivor of the monks, who was in possession of the secret, and through him it was revealed. The relics having thus been found, they were placed in a splendid reliquary, which had been prepared for them by the empress Pulcheria, and carried in a grand procession into the church of St. Thyrsus (Sozomen, u. s.). Sozomen tells us that he was present on the occasion. Baronius relates the story under A.D. 538. [T. W. D.]

EUSEBIA (4), virgin at Mylasa, in the 5th century. (Boll. Acta SS. 24 Jan. ii. 600.) [L. RAIN (5).] [C. H.]

EUSEBIA (5), mother of Theodoric the Great. [ERELIEVA.]

EUSEBIA (6), "Patricia," addressed by Gregory the Great in 603. (Lib. xiii. indict. vi. Epist. 32. Migne, lxxvii. 1282.) From this letter it appears that her mind was either so absorbed in riches, or perhaps so occupied by the tumultuous disorders of the imperial city (caput civitatis) that she could not write to Gregory. He counsels her to turn her thoughts rather towards things spiritual; he prays that she may in this world pass a tranquil life with her most noble husband, and rejoice in the welfare of the lord Strategius, until at some distant day she reaches her eternal reward. Gussanovitch, in his notes on this letter, can hardly be wrong in concluding that she is the Eusebia, daughter of Rusticana Patricia, mentioned in a letter of Gregory in 598, where Strategius is also named, he being probably Eusebia's son (lib. viii. ind. i. ep. 22). Rusticana had once resided at Rome, but had removed to Constantinople. [C. H.]

EUSEBIA (7), abbess, was the daughter of noble parents, Adalbrand and St. Rictrude, but was brought up by her grandmother, St. Gertrude, abbess of Hamay or Hamaige (Hamtichense), on whose death in 649 Eusebia was chosen as her successor. As, however, she was only twelve years old, her mother, who was abbess of Marchiennes, on the Scarpe, between Flanders and Hainault, desired her to come and learn to obey before she tried to command others. Eusebia objected, but was obliged to obey an order which her mother obtained from Clovis II., and she came to Marchiennes (Marciana), accompanied by all her nuns. She bore ill her subjection to St. Gertrude, and would often cross secretly at night to Hamay, chant the offices there, and return next day to Marchiennes. Chastised and even seriously injured by her mother, she still remained firm, and she was at length allowed to take back her nuns to Hamay, of which convent she then became abbess, at the age of thirteen. Here she showed extraordinary wisdom and power of command, and died at the age of twenty-three, about A.D. 660. She is commemorated on March 16. (Acta SS. Mar. ii. 452; Migne, Patrol. Lat. 149, 133; Baillet, Vies des Saints, Mar. 16.) [I. G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (1), succeeded Marcellus as bishop of Rome A.D. 309 or 310. He was banished to Sicily by Maxentius, where he died after a pontificate of four months (from April 18 to August 17). His body was brought back to Rome, and buried in the cemetery of Callistus on the Appian Way. The days of the month assigned above to his accession and death are those given in our oldest and most trustworthy authority, the Liberian catalogue (A.D. 354), which however in this case slightly contradicts itself in giving 4 months and 16 days as the duration of his episcopate. It contains no intimation of the year, nor any facts. The Liberian Depositio Episcoporum gives Sept. 26 as the date of his burial, the interval between which day and that of his death being easily accounted for by his having died in Sicily and been buried at Rome. Later authorities vary much as to the date and duration of his reign, the Felician catalogue (A.D. 530) giving the latter as 7 years, 1 month, 3 days, the chronicle of Eusebius (ad ann. 1. Galer.) as 7 months. The Felician catalogue describes him as a Greek by birth and the son of a physician, and speaks of the Invention of the Cross during his episcopate, of the baptism by him of Judas Quiriacus, and of his interment in the cemetery of Callistus. Judas Quiriacus, otherwise Judas Cyriacus, was said to have been the finder of the Cross of our Lord, whence his name (Platina, de Vit. Pontif. art. Eusebius, p. 41). But the authentic accounts of the finding of the supposed true cross by Helena place the event much later than Eusebius, and hence the stories connecting him with it are given up both by the Bollandists and Baronius. Hardly anything indeed was known with any certainty about this bishop till the recent discoveries of De Rossi in the catacombs threw a new light on this page of papal history. It has been already stated that he was known to have been buried in the cemetery of Callistus on the Appian Way, the fact resting on the authority of the Liberian Deposit. Episc., as well as on that of the Felician catalogue, whereas his two immediate predecessors, Marcellinus and Marcellus, were spoken of as interred elsewhere, in the cemetery of Priscilla. But ancient itineraries, written by persons who had visited these tombs, while still open to view, described his resting-place as not being the papal crypt in the cemetery of Callistus, where all the popes (with the two exceptions named) since Pontianus had been laid, but a separate one at some distance from it. Accordingly, De Rossi sought for this crypt, and found it, and therein discovered, in the years 1852 and 1856, fragments of the inscription placed by pope Damasus over the grave. This inscription was indeed previously known by means of copies taken and preserved before the closing of the catacombs. But it was uncertain whether it referred to Eusebius the pope or to some other Eusebius. Baronius, who quotes it, takes it as referring to the priest Eusebius who suffered in the time of the emperor Constantius in connexion with the recall of pope Liberius. Tillemont, and the Bollandists, on the other hand, refer it to the pope. All doubt as to the correctness of the latter view has now been set at rest by the discovery, in the crypt referred to, not only of some forty-six fragments of a slab bearing a copy of the original inscription, but some also of the original slab, identified as such by the well-known peculiar characters of the Damasine inscriptions. The inscription is as follows:—

"Damasus Episcopus fecit.
Heraclius vetuit lapsos peccata dolere
Eusebius miseros docuit sua crimina flere
Scinditur in partes populus gliscente furore
Seditio caedes bellum discordia lites
Extemplo pariter pulsi feritate tyranni
Integra cum rector servaret foedera pacis
Pertulit exillum domino sub iudice laetus
Litore Trinacrio mundum vitamque reliquit.
Eusebio Episcopo et martyri."

On each side of the verses a single file of letters records the name of the engraver of this as well as of all the other Damasine inscriptions, thus:—"Furius Dionysius Filocalus scripsit Damasis pappae cultor atque amator." We thus have revealed to us a state of things at Rome of which no other record has been preserved. It would seem that, on the cessation of the Diocletian persecution, the church there was rent into two — on the subject of the terms of readmission of the lapsed to communion: that one Heraclius headed a party who were for readmission without requirement of the penitential discipline insisted on by Eusebius; that the consequent tumults, accompanied by bloodshed, were such that "the tyrant" Maxentius interposed, and banished the leaders of both factions; and that Eusebius, having died during his exile in Sicily, thus obtained the name of martyr.

It appears further, from the similar Damasine inscription on Marcellus, that the contest had begun at the time of his accession, before the episcopate of Eusebius, and that in his time also the heathen civil power had interposed, banishing Marcellus who, as well as his successor, had required penance from the lapsi, and so caused tumults and sanguinary conflicts. [MARCELLUS.] It is possible that the person referred to by the word "alterius" in the inscription on Marcellus in the lines,

"Crimen ob alterius Christum qui in pace negavit

was the same Heraclius who opposed Eusebius. The way in which his name occurs in the inscription on Eusebius suggests the idea that he may have been elected as an antipope by his party. This view is taken by Lipsius (Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe). However that might be, the whole ground of dispute was essentially the same as what had led to the first election of an antipope, viz. Novatian, after the Decian persecution, some fifty years before; but with these differences; that on the earlier occasion the question was whether the lapsi were to be readmitted to communion at all or not, the schismatics being on the side of severity; on the later occasion the question was only about the conditions of their readmission, the dissentients being on the side of laxity. In both instances the church of Rome, as represented by her lawful bishops, seems to have held a consistent and judicious course, however disgraceful to the Christian community the scandals thus accompanied the later contest.

There are three spurious decretal epistles attributed to Eusebius; one to the bishops of Campania and Tuscia, referring to the Invention of the Cross, and ordering the celebration of a festival in its honour; containing also a long lecture on the authority of St. Peter, and directions as to the reconciliation of properly baptized heretics by the imposition of hands of bishops. Two others, addressed to the bishops of Gaul and of Egypt, relate mainly to accusations brought against bishops and clergy, the object being to afford them protection and immunity.

There are also four decretals attributed to him, allowing betrothed girls to enter monasteries, ordering the Eucharist to be consecrated on white linen only, enjoining the observance of fasts, and regulating the banquets of bishops. None of these documents have any claim to authenticity. There is however a decree of which Benedict XIV., while allowing the probable spuriousness of the rest, refers to as quoted by Ivo of Chartres, and as genuine, the subject being Extreme Unction (Benedict XIV. Servorum Dei Beatificatione, iii. 32. 31). Martene also (de Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritibus, c. art. 2) refers to this decree as preserved by Ivo, adducing it as a proof, among many other that Extreme Unction was anciently administered before the Viaticum, and hence while the patient was still in possession of his faculties, and not, as in later times, when recovery was impaired of. "Jubet enim Eusebius illo decreto et Sacerdos circa aegrotantem poenitentem orationes dicat, et ungat eum oleo sancto, et Eucharistiam ei donet."

Baronius, on the authority of the spurious Acts of Eusebius of Vercelli, states that the pope Eusebius baptized this prelate, and gave him his own name. Tillemont gives no credence to this story, which rests on no good authority. Eusebius is honoured as a saint and confessor on the 26th September in the Roman Calendar.

EUSEBIUS.—Bishops without See or Country mentioned or apparent.

EUSEBIUS (2), subscribed the council of Sardica A.D. 347 (Athan. i. 133, Patr. Graec. xiv. 337). [W. M. S.]

EUSEBIUS (3), a bishop, deposed by the Semarian party at the council of Seleucia A.D. 359, together with Acacius (Athan. de Synod. p. 380, § 12; Socr. H. E. ii. 40). [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (4), a bishop, brother of Chromatius bishop of Aquileia (q. v.), and very closely allied with him ("non plus naturæ quam morum aequalitate germanus," Jerome, Ep. 8, ad Nicæam). He was present at the baptism of Rufinus, who speaks of him as being, though only a deacon, yet a father to him, and his teacher in the creed and the Christian faith (Ruf. Apol. i. 4). He was one of the earliest friends of St. Jerome, and drew from him some of his letters from the Syrian Desert (Ep. 7, 8, ed. Vall.). He was afterwards a bishop, as is known from Rufinus (loc. cit.), but his see is uncertain. The editor of the works of Chromatius (Migne, Patrol. xx. 257) identifies him with the bishop of Bologna, whose name occurs as being present at the council held at Aquileia A.D. 381. But this is quite conjectural. He died A.D. 395, as appears from Jerome's letter to Heliodorus (Ep. 60, § 19, ed. Vall.). [W. H. F.]

EUSEBIUS (5), of Alexandria, a writer of sermons, about whom Galland hesitates not to say that "all is uncertain; nothing can be affirmed on good grounds as to his age or as to his bishopric" (Bibl. Patr. viii. p. xxiii.). It is useless to dwell on the attempts to identify him with Eusebius, the Alexandrian deacon, who became bishop of Laodicea in the 3rd century, with Eusebius of Caesarea, with Eusebius of Emesa. The ascetic writer, Nico the younger, of the 11th century, cited some answers of "Macarius, the Alexandrian, to the great Eusebius of Alexandria" (Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. vi. p. 285; i.e. vol. xi. p. 277, ed. 1801). This Macarius died in 404. "But Nico lived far too late to be of any authority" (Pusey, Doct. of Ant. Presence, p. 449). One of Eusebius' sermons, that on Almsgiving, was preached, at earliest, some time after the death of "holy Melania," which happened after the taking of Rome by Alaric. On the other hand, he is cited not only by John of Damascus in his Parallels (Op. ii. 316, 331, 391, 393, 422, 425, 470, 472, 561, 576, 597, 598, 637, 666, 669, 671, 675, 697, 701), but by the author of the Parallels in the Rochefoucauld MS., who lived a century earlier, in the first year of Heraclius (Le Quien, ib. ii. 279, 749; the quotations are in ib. 777, 783). He cannot therefore be referred (as Le Quien suggested, Or. Christ. ii. 905) to the times of the first Saracen caliphs. The difficulty is rather increased than abated by a Life of Eusebius, printed by Card. Mai in his Spicilegium Romanum, ix. 703 ff., which gives this account of him: Eusebius was a devout monk, revered for his sanctity, who lived in the mountain country of Egypt while Cyril was patriarch of Alexandria. Cyril paid him a visit, and, when dying, recommended him as his successor. The clergy agree; a deputation is sent to Eusebius; he deprecates the proposed elevation; his visitors leave him; he resolves to fly by night into the Thebaid; on the way a voice warns him to return: he obeys, and when again invited to Alexandria, proceeds thither, is consecrated by Cyril, who dies that night; Eusebius is enthroned, and preaches every Sunday with great effect: he converts an obstinate sinner of high birth and great wealth, called Alexander; after a seven years' episcopate, foreseeing his end, he tells Alexander of a visit paid by him in early life to the Cross and the Holy Resurrection at Jerusalem, and of a vision which had assured him of Christ's benignity even to the negligent among His servants. Wishing to die in his old retreat, he is escorted thither with tapers by the Alexandrian people, after consecrating Alexander as his successor, and on his arrival, he commends his "most sweet children" to the Holy Trinity and to their new pastor, and dies "with a smile upon his face." The biographer, John the Notary, adds that he had received a book of ascetic maxims, drawn up by Eusebius, from the author's own hand, had after his death given it into the keeping of Alexander, and when Alexander himself died (20 years after Eusebius) had had it transcribed by the calligrapher Mosobius. This account cannot be received, for it is well known that Dioscorus succeeded Cyril in the see of Alexandria, and no place in the list of its occupants can be found for Eusebius. Nor can Eusebius's bishopric be placed at a Syrian Alexandria. Mai abandons the problem as hopeless; and it would seem that if Eusebius was a bishop, and a bishop in Egypt, he was either a "vacant" bishop (σχολαστής) or consecrated honoris causâ, without a see, like the "John, bishop and monk," in the Life of St. Sabas, c. 21, or the Lazarus (we cannot say Barses and Eulogius [EULOGIUS (4)], cf. Theod. iv. 16, 18) mentioned by Sozomen, vi. 34, not to speak of other instances in the early Irish church. (See Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vol. v. p. 275, i.e. vol. vii. p. 295, ed. 1801.) As to his age, we must be content with uncertainty as to whether he belongs to the 5th or the 6th century. Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. v. p. 275) says that 18 Homilies of Eusebius were found and cited by Turrianus, and some were known to Holstenius and Allatius. A complete list of these sermons is given by Mai, as follows: 1. On Fasting (in Mai's Spicilegium Romanum, ix. 1). 2. On Love (ib. ix. 16). 3. On the Incarnation and its Causes (ib. ix. 21). 4. On Thankfulness in Sickness (ib. ix. 652). 5. On Imparting Grace to him that lacks it (ib. ix. 659). 6. On Sudden Death, or, those that die by snares (ib. ix. 664). 7. On New Moon, Sabbath, and on not observing the voices of Birds (ib. ix. 666). 8. On Commemoration of Saints (ib. ix. 669). 9. On Meals, at such festivals (ib. ix. 673). 10. On the Nativity (ib. ix. 679). 11. On the Baptism of Christ (ib. ix. 679). 12. On "Art thou He that should come?" (ib. ix. 685). 13. On the Coming of John into Hades, and on the Devil (ib. ix. 688). 14. On the Treason of Judas (ib. ix. 693). 15. On the Devil and Hades (ib. ix. 696). 16. On the Lord's Day (Galland. viii. 292). 17. On the Passion, for the Preparation Day (among "Spuria" in Chrysostom, ed. Montfaucon, xi. 793). 18. On the Resurrection (ib. x. 787). 19. On the Ascension (ib. xiii. 247). 20. On the Second Advent (Mai, Class. Auct. x. 595). 21. On "Astronomers" (Mai, Patr. Nov. Bibl. ii. 522). 22. On Almsgiving, and on the Rich Man and Lazarus (ib. ii. 501). Eusebius adheres simply to the Catholic doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation. He uses the ordinary Eastern phrase, "Christ our God" (S. On Almsgiving), speaks of Him as Maker of the world (ib.), as Master of the creation (On Resurrection), as present from the beginning with the prophets (Ascension), and as the Lord whom Isaiah saw in his vision (On the Baptism). He calls the Holy Spirit consubstantial with the Father and the Son (ib.); in the sermon on Almsgiving he calls the Virgin Mother "Ever-virgin" and "Theotocos," and "our undefiled Lady." He insists on free will and responsibility. "God made man capable of free choice . . . He saith, 'If you do not choose to hear Me, I do not compel you.' God could make thee good against thy will, but what is involuntary is unrewarded . . . If He wrote it down that I was to commit sin, and I do commit it, why does He judge me?" If a man means to please God, "God holds out a hand to him straightway," &c. "Time is short, eternity is long," is the point which he urges in the sermon on Almsgiving. "Provide for your salvation before the fair (παρθένος) is broken up, while yet there are those who buy and sell oil." "If a man keep death ever in mind, he will sin no more." He enforces almsgiving. "Some say, there is time enough: I am like my grandfather, I shall live, long as he did; or I shall have a long illness . . . Vain excuse! Remember the man who pulled down his house, &c. Do not say, I must first provide for my children. Death comes like a thief, and shuts you up in a little abode (οἰκίσκῳ μικρῷ) of three cubits." Eusebius is repeatedly severe on Pharisaic formalism. A virginal life, self-control, sleeping on hard beds or on the ground, much fasting, avail not without active charity. "Many wear sackcloth in public, let their hair grow long, walk ostentatiously (ἐπιδεικτικῶς), wish to be thought saints, and to be revered (προσκυρεῖσθαι) by all; but God knows their thoughts, their secret aim," &c. Before a man renounces the world (by a monastic vow) let him try himself, know his own soul. He who fasts must fast with "tongue, eyes, hands, feet;" his whole "body, soul, and spirit" must be restrained from all sinful indulgence. "Fast, as the Lord said, in cheerfulness, with sincere love to all men. But when you have done all this, do not think you are better than A or B. Say you are unprofitable servants." Eusebius discourages a fanatical rigorism; in Lent, he who is in weak health may take wine and oil. Lent must not be broken for a friend's sake, but the station-fasts on Wednesday and Friday may be so: he who eats not must not blame him who eats (here he even quotes Rom. xiv. 6). People are not to blame wine, but those who drink it to excess: nor riches, but the man who administers them ill. Abraham had riches, but they harmed him not, &c. Some sentences shew a true spiritual insight: "What sort of righteousness exceeds the rest? Love, for without it no good comes of any other. What sin is worst? All sin is dreadful, but none is worse than covetousness and remembrance of injuries" (Serm. On Love). He has humour, too, which must have told: "On Sundays, the herald calls people to church; everybody says he is sleepy, or unwell. Hark! a sound of harp or pipe, a noise of dancing: all hasten that way as if on wings" (Hom. on the Lord's Day, Galland. viii. 253). Alexander tells Eusebius, "Some say there are as many stars as men. Were there then only two stars when Adam and Eve were created, or only eight during the Deluge? If you do not give alms while you fast, you simply save yourself expense. He who fasts avoids headache, keeps his feet straight, does not run against walls, or set his house on fire." He rebukes fatalistic superstition, and tells his hearers that he knows of some who say to the sun at its rising, "Have mercy!"—these being not exclusively "Helio-gnostae" but professing Christians as well. He denounces as sinful all language based on astrology. Eusebius is fond of rhetorical amplification of Scriptural passages; he thus deals with Matt. xxv. 34, 41; he dilates on Satan's discomfiture by the Cross, and gives his imagination full scope on the "harrowing of hell" (Serm. 15 and 17). He depicts vividly the extravagance of Alexandrian wealth; the splendid houses glistening with marble, beds and carpets wrought with gold and pearls, horses with golden bridles and saddles, the crowds of servants of various classes,—some to attend the great man when he rides out, some to manage his lands or his house, building, or his kitchen,—to fan him at his meals, to keep the house quiet during his slumber: the varieties of white bread, the pheasants, geese, peacocks, hares, &c., served up at his table (Almsgiving). "I have often walked," he says, "in the broad street of our city" (that which ran across Alexandria, between the gates "of the Sun" and "the Moon"), and heard poor folks talking . . . 'Brother, God will certainly bless A B, for he relieves my poverty. See the cloak I wear; he gave it me. God look on him and shew him mercy!' Then, as to the unfeeling rich: "When I went to beg of him a bit of bread, he set his dogs at me." All those men "cursed and anathematized" such a person (ib.). Eusebius is very full on Sunday duties (Serm. On Lord's Day). Work is to be laid aside: it is no charity to assist a poor man in working on the day that belongs to God. Slaves are to do no work. The Christian should look forward to Sunday, not simply as a day of rest from labour, but as a day of prayer and Communion. Let him come in early morning to church, for the Eucharistic service (the features of it are enumerated: the psalmody, the reading of Prophets, of St. Paul, of the Gospels, the Anglic and Seraphic hymns, the ceaseless Alleluia, the exhortations of bishops and presbyters, the presence of Christ "on the sacred table," the "coming" of the Spirit). "If thy conscience is clear, approach, and receive the Body and Blood of the Lord. If it condemns thee in regard to wicked deeds, decline the Communion until thou hast corrected it by repentance, but stay through the prayers (i. e. the communion service), and do not go out of the church unless thou art dismissed;" or again, "before the dismissal." He censures the custom of persons coming out of church and sitting down outside it, the presbyter often prominent among them, to discuss affairs and disputes; so that when they re-enter the church, they are "scowling and gnashing their teeth at each other." He severely blames a layman who tastes food before the Liturgy is over, whether he communicates or not; but denounces those who communicate after eating (as he knows that many do on Easter Day itself) as if guilty of a heinous sin. (In this case, as in regard to premature departure from church, he does not scruple to refer to Judas.) He blames those who do not communicate when a priest, known to be of bad life, is the celebrant; for "God turneth not away, and the bread becomes the Body," &c. (On Imparting Grace). The true pastor should be full of sympathy, and not excommunicate, or curse, often. In a priest's presence the deacon ought not to excommunicate, or do other offices of the priest. In a priest's absence, he may do all that the priest does, except the holy gifts and mysteries. If a priest is going from home, he should ask the presbyter of another village to give the people the (usual) prayers; failing which he should consecrate bread, that the deacon may administer it to the people. He reproves the disorderly conduct of some who came to the vigil services of a saint's festival, not for prayers, but for conversation and amusement; when they feel sleepy, they go out and lie down till daybreak, then rise and cause great disturbances. "Inside the church, the priest is presenting the supplication . . . having set forth (transfused) the Body and the Blood . . . for the salvation of the world: while, outside, amusements go on" (On Commemoration of Saints). He refers to the different functions of priest, deacon, reader, chanter, and sub-deacon (Idem). He encourages invocation of Saints (Idem 8). He censures those who take a Judaical view of Christian festivals, saying, "to-day is Easter-day," or "to-morrow will be the Nativity, and I cannot carry anything out of my house." "All this is Judaical. At this time, a Christian ought also to eat unleavened bread;" and he quotes Gal. iv. 11 (On New Men). He alludes to superstitions about the evil eye, and to the use of charms in sickness.

Mai calls him a writer delightful from his "ingenuitas," his "Christiana ac pastoralis simplicitas," and his "nativum dicendi genus" (Patrum Hec. Biblioth. ii. 499). [W. B.]

EUSEBIUS.—Bishops arranged in Alphabetical Order of their Sees or Countries.

EUSEBIUS (6), bishop of Abida in Phoenicia Secunda. He signed the synodical epistle of the province, addressed to the emperor Leo, referring to the murder of Proterius at Alexandria. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 849; Mansi, vii. 559.)

[J. de S.]

EUSEBIUS (7), bishop of Alexandria (Scandaret or Iskenderum) in Cilicia. The period in which he flourished is very doubtful; he is placed by Gams (Series Episcop. p. 436) in the 7th century. There seems no ground for including him among the possible authors of the famous Homilies, except that the other claimants are open to almost equally strong objections [EUSEBIUS (5)]. (See the Homilies with prefaces by Mai and Galland, and the life of Eusebius by Joannes Monachus, in the Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. i. 287, et seq. Also Gennadius, Vir. Illust. c. 35; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 905; Thilo, Ueber die Schriften des E. von A. p. 54 ff.; and the articles in Herzog's and Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopaedias by Semisch and Dähne respectively.)

[J. de S.]

EUSEBIUS (8), bishop of Ancyra, circ. A.D. 445, consecrated by Proclus, archbishop of Constantinople (Ceillier, viii. 409). He was present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Mansi, vi. 565 c.)

[W. M. S.]

EUSEBIUS (9), fifth bishop of Antibes, succeeding Etherius, and followed by Optatus. He subscribed the fifth council of Orleans (A.D. 549) by the hand of a deacon called September. The fifth council of Arles (A.D. 554) is also subscribed by a Eusebius, probably the same bishop, though the name of his see is omitted. (Mansi, ix. 137, 703.) The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. ii. 390) give from old MSS. an account of the three Spanish martyrs, Vincentius, Orontius, and Victor, which is conjectured to have been written by this Eusebius. See ETHERIUS, bishop of Antibes. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1148.)

[S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (10) II., the tenth bishop of Antibes in the Series of Gams (p. 554), succeeding Optatus, and followed by Deocarius (A.D. 614). He does not appear in the list of the Gallia Christiana (iii. 1146).

[S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (11), bishop of Antioch by the Maeander in the province of Caria, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 907; Mansi, ii. 695.)

[L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (12), last of the three known bishops of Apollonia, in New Epirus, near the Avus, between Dyrrhachium and Aulon. He was present at the council of Chalcedon in 451. (Mansi, vi. 578 c, 947 a, vii. 161 a; Farlati, Illyr. Sacr. vii. 395, 396; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 248.)

[C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (13), ninth bishop of Apt, succeeding Praetextatus and followed by Clementinus, was in occupation of the see in A.D. 546. An ancient abbey in the diocese which bears his name is said to be called after him. (Gall. Christ. i. 352; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. a. 546 n. vi., tom. i. 703.)

[S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (14), bishop of Arethusa, in Syria Secunda, north of Emesa. He signed the synodical epistle of the province to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 551; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 916.)

[J. de S.]

EUSEBIUS (15). One of the leading bishops of Armenia, to whom Theodoret wrote a letter of encouragement during the Persian persecution, c. A.D. 420, described by him (H. E. v. 38). The chief bishop of the district having vacated his post, either by death, or apostasy, or some other unexplained cause, Theodoret exhorts Eusebius, as next in authority, to occupy the place boldly, and fulfil his duties without apprehension of what it might cost him. He sets forth in very powerful language the duties of pastors as declared in Holy Scripture; but exhorts him not to deal too severely with the lapsed, but to imitate the loving forbearance of God in leading back to repentance and amendment. (Theod. Epist. 78.) [EULALIUS (13).] [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (16) L, eighth in the list of bishops of Arretium or Arezzo, standing between Maximus and Gaudentius, succeeding to the see A.D. 380. (Ughel. Ital. Sacr. i. 409; Gams, Ser. Episc. 741.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (17) II., twelfth in the list of bishops of Arretium or Arezzo, between Laurentius and Gallus; succeeded A.D. 444. (Ughel. Ital. Sacr. i. 410; Gams, Ser. Episc. 741.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (18), bishop of Aspona, subscribed the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Concilia Gener. ed. Rom. 1628, i. p. 369.) [W. M. S.]

EUSEBIUS (19), bishop of Basti (Bara), signs the acts of the fourth Council of Toledo, A.D. 633, taking precedence of forty-five other bishops. He may therefore be supposed to have been old at the time. He signs also the fifth (an. 636), and the sixth (an. 638). He died before Oct. 646. (Esp. Sagr. vii. 87; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385.) [EUTYCHIANUS.] [M. A. W.]

EUSEBIUS (20), bishop of Berytus, vid. of Nicomedia. [EUSEBIUS (60).]

EUSEBIUS (21), ST., fifth bishop of Besançon, succeeding St. Paulinus and followed by St. Hilarius. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xv. 5) quote an anonymous canon of the monastery of St. Paul to the effect that he was a sub-deacon of the church of Rome, whom pope Melchiades (A.D. 311-314) ordained priest and consecrated to the see of Chrysopolis (i.e. Besançon, ibid. p. 2). He is said to have sat two years and a half only, and was then buried in the church of St. Peter, which he had himself dedicated in the suburbs (cir. A.D. 312). [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (22), bishop of Bologna, who took part in the Council of Aquileia, over which Ambrose presided, and joined in the condemnation of Palladius and Secundianus for Arianism. (Ambrose, Opp. iii. pp. 820-843.) [J. Ll. D.]

EUSEBIUS (23) OF CAESAREA, also known as EUSEBIUS PAMPHILI.

I. Literature. A Life of Eusebius was written by Acacius [ACACIUS (2)], his pupil and successor in the bishopric of Caesarea (Socr. H. E. ii. 4). This work, from the pen of a personal friend and disciple who inherited his books and papers (Sozom. H. E. iii. 2, iv. 23), would have been invaluable; but unfortunately it has perished without leaving a trace behind. Of extant sources, the most important are the scattered notices in writers of the same or immediately succeeding ages, such as Athanasius, Jerome, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. At a later date some valuable information is contained in the proceedings of the Second Council of Nicaea (Latue, Conc. viii. 1144 sq. ed. Colet.), as also in the Antirrhetica of the patriarch Nicephorus (Spicil. Solesm. i. p. 371 sq.), likewise connected with the Iconoclastic controversy. The primary sources of information however for the career of one who was before all things a literary man must be sought in his own works. The only edition of the works of Eusebius which aims at completeness is in Migne's Patr. Græc. vols. xix-xxiv. Yet even this does not contain the works extant only in Syriac versions, especially the Theophania (Eng. transl. ed. Lee, Cambridge, 1843) and the longer edition of the Martyrs of Palestine (ed. Cureton, London, 1861); and even some Greek fragments are occasionally omitted (e.g. the letters to Alexander and Euphrat). But it includes the large accessions to the works of Eusebius which were first discovered and published by Mai, and is indispensable for convenience of reference. Lists of the works of Eusebius are given by Jerome (Vir. Ill. 81), by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. vi. 37), and by Ebedjesu (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. p. 18 sq.). Suidas (s. v. Εὐσέβιος) copies the Greek version of Jerome. Notices of individual works of Eusebius, of which some have perished, appear in Photius, Bibl. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 27, 39, 127.

Among modern sources of information are the standard works of Cave (Hist. Lit. i. p. 175 sq.), Tillemont (Hist. Eccl. vii. pp. 39 sq., 659 sq., together with scattered notices in his account of the Arians and of the Nicene council in vol. vi.), Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vii. p. 335 sq. ed. Harles), and others. The Lives of Eusebius by Hanke (Byz. Rer. Script. p. 1 sq.), by Valois (de Vita Scriptisque Eusebii Diatriba, prefixed to his edition of the Ecclesiastical History; often reprinted, and most recently by Heinichen in his Eusebii Script. Hist. i. p. 52 sq., 1868, with notes of his own), and by Stroth (Leben u. Schriften des Eusebius, prefixed to his translation, Eusebii Kirchengeschichte, i. p. xv sq., Quedlinburg, 1799), should be especially mentioned; and to these should be added the Life by Bright, prefixed by way of introduction to the Oxford reprint (1872) of Burton's text of the Eccles. Hist. Valois has appended a very useful collection of testimonia or passages referring to Eusebius in ancient writers. The most complete monograph on the whole subject is Stein's Eusebius Bischof von Cæsarea, Würzburg, 1852. Important contributions will also be found in the special monographs on the Ecclesiastical History, of which a list is given in its proper place.

A list of the editions, translations, and works relating to Eusebius, will be found in Hoffmann, Bibliogr. Lexic. s. v. It is very fairly complete up to the time (A.D. 1839) when the volume appeared, but very much has been done since. The principal editions of the several works will be mentioned below under their respective heads.

II. Birth, Parentage, Education, and Early Life. Of the date of his birth we have no precise information, but the references in his own works enable us to fix it approximately. Thus he mentions Dionysius of Alexandria (H. E. iii. 28) as having occupied the see in his own time (καθ' ἡμᾶς); and Dionysius was bishop of Alexandria from A.D. 247 or 248 to A.D. 265. So also he speaks of Paul of Samosata (H. E. v. 28) as a contemporary (ὁ καθ' ἡμᾶς); and Paul was deposed from his episcopate A.D. 270. In the same way, having occasion to mention the great hierarch of the age (Theoph. iv. 30), he calls him "the monarch of yesterday and of our own times"; while he himself elsewhere (H. E. vii. 31) places Menes during the Roman episcopate of Felix (A.D. 270-274). And, speaking more generally, he draws the line between his own and a previous generation after his account of Dionysius of Alexandria, and before his mention of the accession of Dionysius of Rome (A.D. 259) and the troubles about Paul of Samosata which followed thereupon, declaring at this point that he intends now to relate the history of his own generation for the information of posterity (H. E. vii. 26 τῇ καθ' ἡμᾶς τοῖς μετέπειτα γνωρίζειν γενεᾷ, ὡς ἐκ τῆς ἡμῶν παραδόχου). These notices will hardly allow us to place his birth much later than A.D. 260, so that he would be close upon eighty years old at the time of his death.

Nor again is any direct notice of his birthplace preserved in any early and trustworthy writer. It seems however tolerably safe to assume that he was a native of Palestine and probably of Caesarea. We cannot indeed lay much stress on the fact that he is commonly called "Eusebius the Palestinian" (Marcellus in Eus. c. Marc. i. 4 p. 25, E. δ' τῆς Παλαιστίνης; Basil. de Spir. Sanct. 29, ὁ Παλαιστίνος E., Op. iii. p. 61, Garnier; Theodt. H. E. i. 14, E. τὸν Παλαιστίνου); for some designation was necessary to distinguish him from his namesake of Nicomedia, and "Eusebius the Palestinian" is merely another way of saying "Eusebius of Caesarea," which occurs in the same contexts. It may therefore refer to his see, rather than to his birthplace. But all the notices of his early life are connected with Caesarea; and as it was usual in those times to appoint by preference to a bishopric some native of the place, everything is in favour of this as the city of his birth. The first writer who distinctly calls him a native of Palestine appears to be Theodorus Metochita (Cap. Miscell. 17), who flourished in the earlier part of the 14th century.

Of his parentage and relationships absolutely nothing is known. It has been inferred from an expression of Arius who, writing to Eusebius of Nicomedia, designates his namesake of Caesarea ὁ ἀδελφεός σου ὁ ἐν Καισαρείᾳ (Theodt. H. E. i. 4), that they were actual brothers. Against this it is objected that Eusebius of Nicomedia (Theodt. H. E. i. 6) calls him "my master Eusebius" (τοῦ δεσπότου μου Εὐσεβίου), and that such an expression is inconsistent with brotherhood. Neither the argument nor the answer carries much weight. Arius might well call them brothers, as being associated in theological sympathies as well as in episcopal office. Eusebius of Nicomedia might equally well style an actual brother his "master," owing to ascendancy of character or of intellect; just as Seneca speaks of his own brother, "domini mei Gallionis" (Ep. Mor. 104). But the absolute silence of all contemporaries, as well as of the two persons themselves, on any such relationship is quite fatal to this supposed brotherhood. There is more ground for the belief that he was related to his friend Pamphilus. Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. vi. 37) makes him a nephew (ὁ τοῦτον ἀδελφιδού) of the martyr. Yet it is somewhat strange that he himself should never allude to this connexion, if it were so close. On the contrary, he speaks of his becoming acquainted with Pamphilus in such a manner as to suggest that there was no existing relationship which brought them together (H. E. vii. 32).

Whether he was a native of Caesarea or not, it was with this city, the early home of Gentile Christianity (Acts x. 6 sq., xxiii. 23, 33, &c.), that all the associations of his youth, so far as we know, were connected. Here, as a child, he was catechized in that declaration of belief which years afterwards was laid by him before the great Council of Nicaea, and adopted by the assembled fathers as a basis for the creed of the universal church (see below, p. 313). Here, as a young man, he remembered to have seen (A.D. 296) in company with the reigning Augustus the future persecutor of the faith, then on his progress through Palestine, a tall and handsome prince of right royal mien, who was destined hereafter to exert an unrivalled influence on the future of the Christian Church, and with whom the interests of his own later life were closely bound up (Vit. Const. i. 19). Here he listened to the Biblical expositions of the learned Dorotheus, thoroughly versed in the Hebrew Scriptures and not unacquainted with Greek literature and philosophy, once the superintendent of the emperor's purple factory at Tyre, but now a presbyter in the church of Caesarea (H. E. vii. 32). Here, in due time, he was himself ordained a presbyter, probably by that bishop Agapius whose wise forethought and untiring assiduity and open-handed benevolence he himself has recorded (H. E. ib.). Here, above all, he contracted with the saintly student Pamphilus that friendship which was the crown and glory of his life, and which martyrdom itself could not sever.

Pamphilus, a native of Phoenicia, had studied in Alexandria, but was now settled in Caesarea, of which church he was a presbyter. He had gathered about him a collection of books which seem to have been unrivalled in Christian circles, and which, supplemented by the excellent library of bishop Alexander at Jerusalem (H. E. vi. 20), enabled Eusebius to indulge to the full his portentous appetite for learning. Eusebius himself left a catalogue of the books contained in the library of Pamphilus (H. E. vi. 32). Acacius and Euzoius, the successors of Eusebius in the see of Caesarea, repaired the collection, and supplied the ravages of time and wear (Hieron. Epist. 34, Op. i. 155). Jerome describes Pamphilus as gathering books together from all parts of the world, thus rivalling in the domain of sacred learning the zeal which Demetrius Phalereus or Pisistratus had shewn for profane knowledge (l. c.). Origen himself had set the example of a literary society. Aided by the munificence of his friend Ambrosius, he had kept about him always a large number of shorthand writers, to whom he dictated, and of calligraphers—women as well as men—who copied out the Scriptures for him (H. E. vi. 23). His example was not thrown away on Pamphilus.

Pamphilus was a devoted admirer of Origen. He possessed the original copy of the Hexapla of Origen, which was afterwards used by Jerome at Caesarea (Hieron. Comm. in T. t. iii. 9, Op. vii. 734). He sought out the works of this father before all others (Hieron. Op. i. 155; Euseb. H. E. vi. 32). He even transcribed the greater part of them with his own hand for his library (Hieron. Vir. Ill. 75). One long work of Origen in the handwriting of Pamphilus came into the possession of Jerome himself; owning it, he says, he considers that he owns the wealth of Croesus; it is signed, as it were, with the very blood of the martyr (l. c.). Like Origen too, Pamphilus paid great attention to the reproduction of accurate copies of the Scriptures. More than one extant MS has been taken from or collated with some copy which he had transcribed or corrected with his own hand (see Scrivener's Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, pp. 51, 59, 159, 223, 228). In this work he had the assistance of Eusebius (Vir. Ill. 81). Hence the Palestinian manuscripts of the LXX, which Jerome describes as published by Eusebius and Pamphilus from the text of Origen (c. Rufin. ii. 27, Op. ii. p. 522). A colophon found in an extant Vatican MS, and given in facsimile in Migne's Euseb. Op. iv. 875 (after Mai, Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv.), presents a lively picture of the common labours of the two friends at this time: "It was transcribed from the editions of the Hexapla, and was corrected from the Tetrapla of Origen himself, which also had been corrected and furnished with scholia in his own handwriting; whence I, Eusebius, added the scholia. Pamphilus and Eusebius corrected [this copy]." The readings of the "Eusebian" copy (τὸ Εὐσεβίου, τὸ βιβλίον Εὐσεβίου τοῦ Παμφίλου) are frequently mentioned in the scholia to the Old Testament (Field's Hexapla, i. p. xcix).

Nor was it only in copying and editing that the society gathered about Pamphilus occupied itself. The work of translation would necessarily engage attention in a city which stood on the border land between the Greek and Syrian language; and we are especially told of one of his associates, the martyr Procopius, that he translated from Greek into Aramaic (Euseb. Mart. Pal. p. 4, ed. Cureton).

Amidst these and kindred pursuits their friendship ripened. But Eusebius owed far more to Pamphilus than the impulse and direction given to his studies. Pamphilus was no mere student recluse. He was a man of large heart and bountiful hand; he was above all things helpful to his friends (Mart. Pal. 11); he gave freely to all who were in want; he multiplied copies of the Scriptures, which he distributed gratuitously (Euseb. in Hieron. c. Rufin. i. 9, Op. ii. 465). And to the sympathy of the friend he united the courage of the hero. He had also the power of impressing his own strong convictions on others. Hence, when the great trial of faith came, his house was found to be not only the home of students but the nursery of martyrs. To one like Eusebius, who owed his strength and his weakness alike to a ready susceptibility of impression from those about him, such a friendship was an inestimable blessing. How else could he express the strength of his devotion to this friend, who was more than a friend, than by adopting his name? He would henceforward be known as "Eusebius of Pamphilus." "In the midst of all" this glorious company of martyrs, writes Eusebius, "shone forth the excellency of my lord Pamphilus; for it is not meet that I should mention the name of that holy and blessed Pamphilus without styling him 'my lord'" (Mart. Pal. p. 37, ed. Cureton). It was either a blundering literalism or an ignoble sarcasm, which led Photius (Epist. 73, Baletta) to suggest the explanation that he was "the slave of Pamphilus." Any man might have been proud to wear the slave's badge of such a devotion.

III. The Persecution. Eusebius was now in middle life when the last and fiercest persecution broke out. For nearly half a century—a longer period than at any other time since its foundation—the Church had enjoyed uninterrupted peace, so far as regards attacks from without. Suddenly and unexpectedly all was changed. The city of Caesarea became a chief centre of persecution. Eusebius tells us how he saw with his own eyes the houses of prayer razed to the ground, the holy Scriptures committed to the flames in the midst of the market-places, the pastors of the churches hiding themselves as they were hunted here and there, and shamefully jeered at when they were caught by their persecutors (H. E. viii. 2). For seven years the attacks continued. They were fitful and intermittent. But the suspense and uncertainty must have increased the horror. No governor stayed his hands; no year was without its sufferers. Almost at any moment a devout and zealous Christian might be required to do that which his faith forbade him to do even at the cost of his life. Of some of the terrible scenes which ensued, Eusebius was himself an eyewitness; of all he had the full and exact knowledge which is derived from immediate local and personal contact with the incidents. His written account shews how deeply he was impressed with the constancy and the triumphs of the sufferers; of Procopius from Scythopolis, the proto-martyr of this glorious band, who had scarcely passed the gates of Caesarea when he was ordered to sacrifice to the gods, and was beheaded for his refusal (Mart. Pal. ed. Cureton, p. 3 sq.); of Alphaeus, the reader and exorcist in the church of Caesarea, who, when the emperor's vicennalia were celebrated, held back the people from sacrificing to idols, and was crowned with martyrdom after suffering cruel lacerations and rackings for his reckless audacity (p. 5 sq.); of the blameless ascetic youth Apphianus, not yet twenty years of age, who "resided in the same house with us" (p. 13), having come from Beyrout to Caesarea to be instructed by Pamphilus in the holy Scriptures, who in his extravagant zeal seized the hand of the governor Urbanus and held him back as he was offering libations, who after enduring a succession of excruciating tortures with a "body and soul like adamant" paid his life as a forfeit for his temerity, being thrown into the deep waters with stones tied to his feet, but whom nevertheless the sea refused to hold captive, giving up her dead before the time and amidst earthquake and tempest "vomiting back the holy body of the martyr of God," while the whole population of Caesarea crowded to the shore to see the marvellous sight; of Aedesius, the brother of Apphianus, well versed in the learning of the Greeks and Romans, who likewise "had passed a long time in the society of the martyr Pamphilus, and by him had been imbued with the godly doctrine, as with purple suited for royalty" (p. 18), who was first imprisoned at Caesarea, then sent to work in the copper mines of Phaeno in Palestine, then released, then seized again at Alexandria, being provoked into a reckless protest against the governor Hierocles by the lawless and fierce outrages inflicted on the unoffending Christians, and after cruel sufferings drowned like his brother in the sea; of Agapius, who, having been condemned some time before at Gaza, but reserved to grace the festivities at Caesarea when "the chief of tyrants, Maximinus," visited that city, bore himself bravely in the teeth of the wild beasts, and, lacerated and half dead, was remanded to prison till the next day, when his mangled body was thrown into the sea, and his soul "winged her flight through the air into the kingdom of heaven, whither she was before hastening, and was received together with the angels and the holy company of martyrs"; of these and many others, young and old, who endured and won the crown during this protracted reign of terror; above all, of that "name very dear to me," that "heavenly martyr of God," the "holy and blessed Pamphilus," "my lord Pamphilus" (pp. 25, 37), who after two years of imprisonment sealed his long confession by martyrdom and crowned a saintly life with an heroic death, the centre of a brave company, among whom he shone "as the sun among the stars." For at this same time eleven others perished with him. It was a perfect number, twelve in all, a type of the prophets and apostles (p. 38). A typical company too—so it appeared to Eusebius—in another respect; reproducing in miniature "a perfect representation of the Church"; for it included sufferers of all ages, one a youth of eighteen, others in middle life, one an old man with grey hairs; of diverse countries, some foreigners from Egypt and from Cappadocia, some natives of Caesarea, and even inmates of Pamphilus's own household; of various intellectual acquirements, the simplicity of the uneducated and the profound learning of the scholar; and, lastly, of all ranks in the Church, presbyters, deacons, readers, laymen, even catechumens. So they fitly perished by diverse kinds of death. "It seemed as if a great door of the kingdom of heaven had been opened by the confession of Pamphilus, and an abundant entrance effected for others as well as for himself into the paradise of God" (p. 43). This happened under the governor Firmilianus, A.D. 309. It was the last spectacle (θέατρον) on a grand scale displayed before men and angels in this arena of Christian fortitude. Not long after, the chief persecutor proclaimed his "palinode" to the world; and the Church had peace again.

* The second book of the treatise against Sabellius, if genuine, contains some touching reminiscences of his friend. The writer relates the devout fondness with which his friend used to dwell on the expression "the only-begotten Son of God," so that the tones of his voice still linger in his ears (Op. vi. 1059, 1063, 1067 sq.); for, if Eusebius of Caesarea were the writer, we could hardly hesitate to follow Valois in identifying the unnamed "beatus vir" with Pamphilus. Reasons however have been given for assigning the treatise to another (see below, p. 345).

And meanwhile, how had Eusebius borne himself in this season of peril? A quarter of a century later, when he was sitting in judgment at the council of Tyre, a grave charge was brought against him, affecting his conduct at this crisis. Potammon, bishop of Heraclea, an Egyptian confessor, started up and addressed the president, "Art thou seated as judge, Eusebius; and does Athanasius, innocent though he is, await his sentence from thee? Nay, tell me then, wast thou not with me in prison during the persecution? And I lost an eye for the truth, but thou, as we see, hast received no injury in any part of thy body, neither hast thou suffered martyrdom, but remained alive with no mutilation. How wast thou released from prison, unless it be that thou didst promise to those who put upon us the pressure of persecution to do that which is unlawful, or didst actually do it?" Eusebius, we are told, in vexation rose and dismissed the court, saying, "If ye come hither and say such things against us, then do your accusers speak the truth. For if ye behave thus tyrannously here, much more do ye in your own country" (Epiphan. Hær. lxxiii. 8).

On the strength of this charge he is supposed to have escaped martyrdom by offering sacrifice, or at least by some unworthy concession. But what does the evidence amount to? It is the language of a strong partisan, bitterly hostile to him; and it is after all only a conjectural inference of his accuser. How could Eusebius have been imprisoned for the faith, and escaped from prison, if he had not been untrue to his convictions? It did not occur to the blind hatred of Potammon that possibly Eusebius might have remained in captivity till the proclamation of Galerius opened the prison doors to all alike; or that meanwhile a thousand things might have occurred to earn for him an exceptional favour which might save his life without forfeiting his honour. There is a dignity in the response of Eusebius which bespeaks rather the disdainful innocence that will not condescend to a reply, than the uneasy conscience which shrinks from investigation. Even Athanasius (Apol. c. Arion. 8, i. p. 103), when referring to this incident, can only say that Eusebius was "accused of sacrificing" by the confessors. He does not dare to affirm that he was guilty. He himself obviously knows nothing of any such crime. He never elsewhere calls Eusebius "the sacrificer" (δ θύρας) as he does Asterius. If Eusebius had been guilty, this accusation would have been flung at him again and again, surrounded as he was by angry controversialists, in an age when controversy was not too scrupulous in its personalities. Nor again is such a blot on his past history reconcilable with his appointment by universal consent to the bishopric of his own city of Caesarea, where his character was so well known. Neither would he have ventured, if he were conscious of any such guilt, to refer, as he does again and again, with fearlessness to the shameful defections which had occurred during the persecution.

So far as we have information of his movements at this time, they do not betray any such cowardice. During the long incarceration of his friend, Eusebius must have spent a great part of his time with him. There is no com-this time he enjoyed the entire confidence of his imperial master. "He alone of the Eastern prelates could tell what was in the mind of the emperor; he was the clerk of the imperial closet; he was the interpreter, the chaplain, the confessor of Constantine" (Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 118).

(i) The Inaugural Address. It was probably owing to court favour that he occupied the first seat to the right of the emperor (V. C. iii. 11 τὸ ἐκ δεξιῶν τῷ βασιλεὺς πρῶτον), and delivered the opening address to Constantine when he took his seat in the council-chamber (V. C. i. proem., iii. 11; Sozom. H. E. i. 19). The council was held during the emperor's vicennalia; his last rival and bitterest foe, Licinius, had been defeated and slain not long before; and the orator's address naturally took the form of a paean of victory, a hymn of thanksgiving (V. C. i. proem. τὸν καλλίνικον, i. iii. 11, Sozom. l. c., χαριστήριον ὕμνον). The speech is unfortunately not preserved, but we may form some notion of its probable character from the extant oration which Eusebius delivered on the tricennalia of this same sovereign. There can be no doubt from the manner in which Eusebius describes the orator at the council of Nicaea that he is speaking of himself (V. C. iii. 11); and indeed he elsewhere incidentally mentions having delivered a panegyric of the emperor on that occasion (V. C. i. proem.; see l. c., p. xxvii sq.). Yet this function is assigned by Theodoret (H. E. i. 6) to Eustathius of Antioch, whom he reports to have sat next to Constantine, and "crowned the emperor's head with the flowers of praise." Moreover, the very oration which purports to have been delivered by Eustathius on this occasion is extant (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. ix. p. 132 sq.); but it stands self-condemned by its post-Nicene phraseology, and seems to have been composed by Gregory of Nazianzus, who flourished some centuries later. And again, Theodore of Mopsuestia and Philostorgius, as reported by Nicetas Choniates (Thes. & Crit. Ed. v. 7), assigned the opening address neither to Eusebius nor to Eustathius, but to Alexander of Alexandria. These divergent accounts may perhaps be reconciled by supposing that a few formal words were first addressed to the emperor by the two great Eastern patriarchs, while the true inaugural oration was delivered by Eusebius. Some such hypothesis is suggested by the statement in the Hist. Tripart. ii. 5, and in Eusebius, H. E. viii. 16, where Eusebius is represented as following Eustathius.

(ii) The Creed. When the main subject, for which the council had been assembled, came under discussion, we find Eusebius again taking a prominent part. He himself has left us an account of his doings at this stage in a letter of explanation which he afterwards wrote to his own church of Caesarea (see below, p. 344). He laid before the council the creed which was in use in the Caesarean church, which had been handed down to him from the bishops who preceded him, which he himself had been taught at his baptism, and in which, first as a presbyter and then as a bishop, he had instructed others. The emperor was satisfied with the orthodoxy of this creed, but he was however the single word ὁμοούσιον. At the same time he gave explanations as to the sense of the term which set the scruples of Eusebius at rest. The assembled fathers however did not rest here, but taking this as their starting-point (προφάσει τοῦ ὁμοουσίου) made other insertions and alterations. The creed as thus revised is still substantially the Caesarean creed, but the additions were not unimportant. Moreover, an anathema was appended in which Arian doctrines were directly condemned. Eusebius took time to consider before subscribing to this revised formula. The three expressions which caused difficulty were: (1) "of the substance of the Father" (ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ πατρὸς); (2) "begotten, not made" (γεννηθέντα, οὐ ποιηθέντα); (3) "of the same substance" (ὁμοούσιον); and of these he demanded explanations. The explanations were so far satisfactory that for the sake of peace he subscribed to the creed. He had the less scruple in assenting to the final anathema, because the Arian expressions which it condemned were not scriptural, and he considered that "almost all the confusion and disturbance of the churches" had arisen from the use of unscriptural phrases. This letter, he concludes, is written to the Caesareans to explain that though he would resist to the last any vital change in the traditional creed of his church, he had nevertheless subscribed to these alterations, when assured of their innocence, to avoid appearing contentious (ἀφιλονεκῶς). On this subject, see especially Hort's Two Dissertations, p. 55 sq.

(iii) The Paschal Cycle. The settlement of the dispute respecting the time of observing Easter was another important work undertaken by the council. In this work also a leading part has been assigned to Eusebius by some modern writers (e. g. Stanley, Eastern Church, p. 182, following Tillemont, H. E. vi. p. 668). The cycle of nineteen years, which ultimately prevailed in the Church under the name of the Golden Number, is supposed to have been fixed by the council; and this work is attributed expressly to Eusebius. This table for determining Easter, it is maintained, "first originated in the council chamber of Nicaea; perhaps in the desire of the emperor Constantine to soothe the wounded feelings of his favourite counsellor. . . . The council would naturally turn to the most learned of its members to accomplish the work. That member was unquestionably Eusebius of Caesarea. He had paid special attention to chronology. . . . It is creditable to the justice and wisdom of the council that they should not have allowed these recent disputes and wide theological differences to stand in the way of intrusting this delicate task to the man who on general grounds was most fitted to undertake it" (Stanley, l. c.). But the evidence does not justify either of the assumptions involved in this view. (1) There are strong reasons for hesitating to believe that the nineteen years' cycle was adopted at the council of Nicaea. It was the old Metonic cycle (invented about B.C. 432), and it had already been applied to the determination of Easter by Anatolius of Laodicea about A.D. 284 (Euseb. H. E. vii. 32). It did not therefore originate in the council. Still the council might have given it an authoritative sanction, and thus secured its currency in the Church at large. This would follow from the language of St. Ambrose (Epist. 23, Op. ii. p. 880 sq.), who says (§ 1) that the Nicene fathers "congregatis peritissimis calculandi, decem et novem annorum collegere rationem," and adds, "hunc circulum enneadecaterida nuncuparunt." In the next century too Cyril (Epist. 86, Op. x. 382, Migne), writing to Leo (A.D. 444), ascribes the adoption of this cycle to the Nicene council; and the same statement is made by later writers (see Butcher, Ecclesiastical Calendar, Dublin, 1877, Appendix, p. 267). But, though these statements are explicit, their accuracy is open to grave question. For first, in the documents relating to the treatment of the Paschal question at Nicaea, not a word is said as to the mode of calculating Easter (Euseb. V. C. iii. 18; Socr. H. E. i. 9); and, secondly, the churches of Rome and the West continued long after to make use of an older cycle (Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, i. p. 315), and they are hardly likely to have disregarded any direct decision of a council which they always treated with the highest respect. (2) But, even if it were more certain that the Nicene council directly sanctioned the cycle of nineteen years, there is no ground for regarding this as especially the work of Eusebius. Jerome indeed (Vir. Ill. 61) says that Eusebius "arranged [composed] a canon for Easter, which was a cycle of nineteen years, that is, an ἐννεακαιδεκαετηρίς"; and Bede (de Temp. Rat. 44, Op. i. 483, Migne) says the same thing, probably deriving his information from Jerome, though stating more precisely that Eusebius was "the first" to apply this cycle to the Paschal computation, which he certainly was not. But neither writer connects this fact with the council of Nicaea. Eusebius did indeed write a treatise on Easter (V. C. iv. 35), of which a fragment is extant (see below, p. 342), and in it he may have advocated the Metonic cycle. To this treatise probably Jerome and Bede refer; but it was written many years after the Council of Nicaea, with which it appears not to have had any connexion. The probable inference from the notices seems to be that the calculation of Easter was entrusted to the bishops of Alexandria, and that the nineteen years' cycle, being already in use in the Alexandrian church, thus indirectly obtained the sanction of the council. The earliest extant authority who mentions this duty as imposed on the Alexandrian bishops is Cyril of Alexandria (A.D. 437), Epist. 87 (Op. x. 383). The expression of Athanasius (Festal Letters, x. p. 67, Oxf. transl.), "the custom which has been delivered to us by the fathers," seem not to refer to any authorization of the Nicene bishops (as it has been interpreted), but to the traditional practice of the Alexandrian patriarchs, who, at least as early as Dionysius (Euseb. H. E. vii. 20), are found issuing these Paschal letters. Leo the Great also, writing A.D. 453, states explicitly (Epist. 121, p. 1228) that "the holy fathers" (of Nicaea) delegated this duty of announcing the time of Easter to the bishop of Alexandria, because the Egyptians were skilled in these computations from ancient times. The Festal Letters of Athanasius (see the index in the Oxford translation, p. xv sq.) cover the period from A.D. 328 to 373. The nineteen years' cycle is already the basis of the calculation here. This appears, for instance, from the year 330, when Athanasius places Easter on April 19, whereas, according to the alternative eighty-four years' cycle which obtained at Rome, it would fall on March 22. How long it had prevailed in the Alexandrian church, we are without means of ascertaining. But inasmuch as Anatolius, who certainly advocated it, was himself an Alexandrian, we may conjecture that it was introduced by him. The action of the Nicene council therefore would be altogether indirect in this matter; and there is no reason for supposing that Eusebius in particular took any prominent part in the decision, though he is known to have approved the Alexandrian mode of reckoning.

(iv) Dispute with Philosophers. In the dispute between the bishops and the "philosophers," as related by Gelasius in his account of the Nicene Council, a conspicuous part is assigned to Eusebius of Caesarea (ii. 18, 19). The philosopher Phaedo hurls at him the favourite Arian text, Prov. viii. 22, where Wisdom says (according to the LXX translation), "The Lord created (ἐκτίσεν) me the beginning of His ways for His works." Wisdom being a synonym for the Logos, the Logos is thus declared to be a created thing (κτίσμα). Eusebius answers this Arian argument at great length, partly by monologue, partly by questioning his opponent. The whole discussion, it need hardly be said, is purely fictitious; but the fiction bears testimony to the prominent position asserted by Eusebius in the council, and it is not a little remarkable that a severely orthodox part is assigned to him.

(v) Metropolitan Rights. A more authentic indication of his influence appears in the seventh canon of the council, in which we may perhaps see "a slight passage at arms" between him "and Macarius of Aelia Capitolina, not yet 'Jerusalem': As custom and ancient tradition have obtained that the bishop of Aelia should be honoured let him bear his proper honour—so far Macarius gained his point, but (and here we cannot mistake the intervention of his superior, the metropolitan of Caesarea) always saving the rights of the metropolitan" (Stanley, l. c. p. 193). But if so, the victory of Eusebius was more complete than would appear from this translation, for the words, ἐχέτω τὴν ἀκολουθίαν τῆς τιμῆς, in this context are naturally translated, "let him have the next [second] place in point of honour," not "let him have the honour consequent thereupon."⁴

VI. Progress of the Arian Controversy. The hopes which Eusebius with others had built upon the decisions of the Nicene council were soon dashed. The final peace of the Church seemed as far distant as ever. In three several controversies with three distinguished antagonists, Eusebius took a more or less prominent part; and his reputation, whether justly or not, has suffered greatly in consequence.

(i) Synod of Antioch. Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, was a staunch advocate of the Nicene doctrine and a determined foe of the Arians. Against Eusebius of Caesarea he had already taken up a position of antagonism. He had assailed the tenets of Origen (Socr. H. E. vi. 13), of whom Eusebius was an ardent champion. He had attacked Eusebius himself, charging him with faithlessness to the doctrines of Nicaea.

and was accused in turn of Sabellianism by Eusebius (Socr. H. E. i. 33; Soz. H. E. ii. 19). To the historian Socrates the doctrines of the two antagonists appeared to have so much in common that he was puzzled to conceive how they managed to fall out (οὐκ οἶδ' ὅπως ἐνυμφεύθησαν αἱ ἑξῆς). At all events Eustathius of Antioch and Eusebius of Caesarea were regarded as the two principals in the quarrel (Soz. H. E. ii. 18). Conflict so serious could not be confined to a paper war, and more active steps were taken. A synod of bishops was assembled at Antioch, A.D. 336, to consider the charge of Sabellianism brought against Eustathius. If we are to believe Theodoret (H. E. i. 21), this synod was put together by a vile conspiracy on the part of Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nicaea, a view which induced Eusebius of Caesarea and other Palestinian bishops to join; but Theodoret's account condemns itself by its false chronology (Hefele, Conciliengesch. i. p. 484). The character of the bishop of Caesarea is not saved by this blot. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the assembly was mainly composed of bishops with Arian or semi-Arian sympathies. The charges brought against Eustathius are described in their proper place. [EUSTATHIUS.] Eustathius was deposed, and the his injunctions that they should not seek to violate the apostolic rule, but that other fit persons should be put forward for election, of whom he mentioned two by name. One of these, Euphronius, was elected.* Thus Eusebius remained undisturbed in the see of Caesarea, which he retained till his death. Throughout this matter, if we except the pardonable vanity which leads him to insert the emperor's compliments to himself, there is nothing to the discredit of Eusebius. On the contrary, his renunciation of the honour which was thrust upon him contrasts favourably with the unscrupulous ambition of too many of his contemporaries. Of the previous incidents which led to the vacancy in the see of Antioch, he says not a word; but he intimates that he abstains from giving the emperor's letters denouncing the factions at Antioch, because they inculcate certain persons and he does not wish to revive the memory of wrongdoings in the past. It was by this synod of Antioch also that Asclepias, bishop of Gaza, was deposed (Hilar. Op. ii. p. 654; see Hefele, i. p. 435), and we are especially told that he pleaded his cause in the presence of Eusebius of Caesarea (Athan. Ap. c. Arim. 47, Op. i. p. 130; Hilar. Op. ii. p. 626).

(ii) Synode of Caesarea, Tyre, and Jerusalem. The next stage of the Arian controversy exhibits Eusebius in conflict with a greater than Eustathius. The disgraceful intrigues of the Arians and Meletians against Athanasius, which led to his first exile, are related in the biography of that saint [ATHANASIUS, p. 183 sq.]. It is sufficient to say here that the emperor summoned Athanasius to appear before a gathering of bishops at Caesarea, to meet the charges brought against him. It is stated by Theodoret (H. E. i. 26) that Constantine was induced to name Caesarea by the counsels of the Arian party, who selected this place because the enemies of the accused were in a majority there (ἐνθα δὲ πλεονεχέειν ἦσαν οἱ ἐναντιοί). It is equally probable that the emperor would himself have given the preference to Caesarea, since he reposed the greatest confidence in the moderation (ἐνστάθεια) of its bishop. However this may be, Athanasius excused himself from attending. He believed, and he may have so pleaded in reply to the emperor, that there was a conspiracy against him, and that he would not have fair play at such a place (Festal Letters, p. xvii, Oxford transl.; Theod. H. E. i. 26; Soz. H. E. ii. 25). This was A.D. 334. Of this synod at Caesarea Athanasius himself is silent in his Apology.

The matter however was not allowed to rest here. In the following year (A.D. 335) Athanasius received a peremptory and angry summons

* Euphronius is represented as the immediate successor of Eustathius by Soz. H. E. ii. 10, Socr. H. E. i. 34; and this is the natural inference from Constantine's letter (Eus. V. C. iii. 63). On the other hand, Theodoret (H. E. i. 21) says that they appointed Eulalius first but that he only lived a short time, and they then desired to translate Eusebius of Palestine. Jerome (Chron. ii. p. 192, Schönke) gives the names of the Arian bishops who were thrust in succession into the place of Eustathius, as "Eulalius, Eusebius, Eufronius, Placidius," &c. Perhaps Eulalius was put forward for the vacant see, like Eusebius, but never actually appointed. The statement attributed to Philostorgius, that Paulinus of Tyre succeeded Eustathius, will be considered below, p. 323.

from Constantine to appear before a synod of bishops, not now at Caesarea, but at Tyre.^f Theodoret (l. c.) conjectures (ἐξ ὀλίγου) that the place of meeting was changed by the emperor out of deference to the fears of Athanasius, who "looked with suspicion on Caesarea on account of its ruler." It is not improbable that Athanasius, or his friends, had taken objection to Eusebius as a partisan in this controversy; for the Egyptian bishops who espoused the cause of Athanasius, addressing the synod of Tyre, allege "the law of God" as forbidding "an enemy to be witness or judge," and shortly afterwards add mysteriously, "ye know why Eusebius of Caesarea has become an enemy since last year" (Athan. Ap. c. Arian. 77, Op. i. p. 153), as if he had taken offence at the objections then raised against him. The scenes at the synod of Tyre form the most picturesque and the most shameful chapter in the Arian controversy. After all allowance made for the exaggerations of the Athanasian party, from whom our knowledge is chiefly derived, the proceedings will still remain an undying shame to Eusebius of Nicomedia and his fellow intriguers. But there is no reason for supposing that Eusebius of Caesarea took any active part in these plots. Athanasius is generally silent about him, mentioning him rarely, and then without any special bitterness. The "Eusebians" (οἱ περὶ Εὐσέβιον) are always the adherents of his Nicomedian namesake. But, though probably free from any participation in their plots, of which he may have been wholly ignorant, he was certainly used as a tool by the more unscrupulous and violent partisans of Arius, and he must bear the reproach of a too easy compliance with their actions. The proceedings of the bishops assembled at Tyre were cut short by the withdrawal of the accused himself. Athanasius suddenly took ship to Constantinople, and appealed in person to the emperor. The synod saw no other course but to condemn him by default. For a fuller account of its proceedings, the reader is referred to the biography of Athanasius; but there are two incidents connected with it which relate to Eusebius, and which claim a mention here. (1) It was on this occasion that Potammon, the Egyptian confessor, flung the taunt of cowardice and apostasy in the face of Eusebius, as related already (p. 311). Hefele discredits the story altogether (Concilien-gesch. i. p. 446). He supposes it to be another version of an incident related by Rufinus (x. 17; comp. Sozom. H. E. ii. 25) respecting Paphnutius and Maximus of Jerusalem. It seems more probable however that some such taunt was levelled at Eusebius on this occasion. But whether so or not, no stain rests upon his character in consequence of this reckless accusation. (2) It will be remembered that, among the charges brought against Athanasius at this synod, Theodoret and Rufinus (x. 17) mention that he was accused of having seduced a girl, who had a child by him, and that, when confronted with him, she was unable to identify her supposed seducer, but pointed to another as Athanasius. The story is clearly unworthy of credit, for there is no mention of it in Socrates or Sozomen, or in Athanasius himself. But it is instructive to find that Philostorgius gives the same story, transposing the persons (H. E. ii. 12). Athanasius is the false accuser; Eusebius of Caesarea the innocent accused. The falsehood is detected in a similar way; and the synod condemns Athanasius for his vile conspiracy. The two forms of the story are a painful illustration of the recklessness with which moral charges were flung at theological opponents on either side. It is worth observing that both in the incident of Potammon (Epiphan. Haer. lxxviii. 7 ἐκέλευσε δικάζειν Εὐσέβιον τὸν Καισαρείας καὶ ἄλλους τινάς . . . ἀναστὰς διέλυσε τὸ δικάστηριον) and in the story of the seduction (Philost. ii. 12 ὃς τοῦ ἐκεῖσε συνεδρίου κορυφαῖος ἐνομίετο) Eusebius appears as the presiding bishop at Tyre. This does not seem very probable. It should be noticed also that in Sozomen's account (H. E. ii. 25) the contumacy of Athanasius in not appearing before the bishops assembled in the preceding year at Caesarea is alleged as a special ground of condemnation.

^f In the preface to the Festal Letters, p. xvii, it is stated that Athanasius left Alexandria, Epiphi 17, A.D. 335; but this must be an error of a year, for a document given by Athanasius, Ap. c. Arian. 75 (Op. i. p. 152), and written later than this event, is dated Thoth 10 (= Sept. 7), A.D. 335.

The bishops assembled at Tyre were in the midst of their session, possibly preparing to crown the work of condemning and deposing Athanasius by the readmission of Arius and his friends into the church, when an urgent summons from the emperor, through the notary Marianus, called them to take part in the approaching festival at Jerusalem (Euseb. V. C. iv. 41 sq.; Socr. H. E. i. 33 sq.; Sozom. H. E. ii. 26; Theodt. H. E. i. 29). It was the tricennalia of Constantine. No previous sovereign after Augustus, the founder of the empire, had reigned for thirty years. Constantine had a fondness for magnificent ceremonial, and here was a noble opportunity (V. C. iv. 40 καὶ εὐκαιρος). The occasion was marked by the dedication of Constantine's new and splendid basilica, built on the site of Calvary. Bishops were summoned from all parts; the imperial posts were put at their disposal; and nothing was left undone to give lustre to the festival. The prelates assembled at Tyre formed only a fraction of the subsequent gathering at Jerusalem. If an accidental reference in the acts of St. Basil of Ancyra refers to this occasion, as it appears to do (Act. Boll. Mart. xxii; see Tillemont, vi. p. 284), the number of bishops who met for the dedication was not less than 230. The festival was graced by a series of orations from the principal persons present; some pronouncing panegyrics on the emperor, others describing the magnificence of the building, others discoursing on high topics of theology, others interpreting the hidden meaning of the Scriptures. In these rhetorical displays Eusebius bore a conspicuous part. It is probable that Eusebius found in this dedication-festival a far more congenial atmosphere than in the intrigues and bickerings of the synod at Tyre. At all events he treats the assemblage at Tyre as a mere episode of the festival at Jerusalem (ὁδοῦ δὴ πέραν). The emperor, he says, preparing for the celebration of this festival, was anxious to put an end to the quarrels which rent the Church. In doing so he was only obeying the Lord's injunction, "Be reconciled to thy brother, and then go and offer thy gift" (comp. Soz. i. 26). This view of the emperor's motive is entirely borne out by Constantine's own letter to the synod at Tyre. It accords moreover with his proceedings on a previous occasion. As the council of Nicaea had been summoned with a view to re-establishing peace in the Church for its approaching vicennalia, so now the bishops were directed to meet at Tyre on their way to Jerusalem to secure a general pacification before the celebration at the close of his next decennium. Eusebius shows by his language that he was greatly impressed by the celebration; but Tillemont, who manifests a strong prejudice against Eusebius throughout, altogether misstates the case in saying that he "compares or even prefers this assembly to the council of Nicaea, striving to exalt it as much as he can, for the sake of sharing the glory of that great council," &c. (vi. 234). So far from preferring it, he says distinctly that "after that first council" this was the greatest synod assembled by Constantine of all those with which he was acquainted (V. C. r. 47 τὴν μάλιστα ἐν Ἰερουσαλὴμ σὺνδον ἐκείνην σπουδαιότερον . . . μετὰ τὴν πρώτην ἐκείνην &c.). And on the other hand, so far from showing any desire to depreciate the council of Nicaea, he cannot find language magnificent enough to sing its glories (V. C. iii. 6 sq.), when it is the proper theme of his narrative.

But the bishops assembled at Jerusalem did not content themselves with the celebration of the religious festival. They took another highly important step. Arius and Euzoios had presented a confession of faith to the emperor, seeking readmission to the church. The emperor himself was satisfied with the terms expressed in this document, and persuaded himself that it was in harmony with the faith of Nicaea. It did not perhaps directly contradict the creed of the Nicene fathers in any part; it even contained a strong expression respecting the pre-existence of the Son (τὸν ἐξ αἰῶνος τὸν πατέρα τῶν αἰώνων γεγεννημένον Θεόν λόγον); but after all that had passed, its omissions were more eloquent than its admissions. These omissions however were not likely to strike Constantine. He therefore despatched Arius and Euzoios to Jerusalem, at the same time requesting the synod to consider their confession of faith, and to restore them to communion.⁵ The request was not made in vain. The condemnation of Athanasius at Tyre was followed by the readmission of Arius and his followers at Jerusalem. Of the bishops who were responsible for this act, some would be instigated mainly by hostility to Athanasius, desiring thus to complete his defeat; others, taking the emperor's view, would regard it as an act of pacification. How far either motive would prevail with Eusebius of Caesarea, we can only conjecture; but the stress which he lays on Constantine's desire to secure the peace of the church, on this as on all other occasions, suggests that pacification would be a predominant idea in his own mind, though perhaps not unmixed with other influences. It is strange that throughout his account of these proceedings Eusebius does not name either Athanasius or Arius; that in his allusion to the synod of Tyre he confines himself to vague generalities about the settlement of quarrels; and that in his narrative of the assemblage at Jerusalem he does not so much as hint at any synodical action of any kind.

(iii) Synod of Constantinople. The conduct of the emperor at this time was strangely fickle and inconsistent. He had no distinct theological convictions on the great doctrine at issue, and was therefore at the mercy of the last speaker. Athanasius had not fled to Constantinople in vain. Constantine desired pacification, but he was not insensible to justice; and the personal pleadings of Athanasius convinced him that justice had been outraged (Ap. c. Arian. 86). The bishops assembled at the dedication festival had scarcely executed the request, or the command, of the emperor's first letter, when they received another written in a very different temper (Athan. Ap. c. Arian. 86; Socr. H. E. i. 34; Sozom. H. E. ii. 27). It was addressed "to the bishops that had assembled at Tyre"; it described their proceedings as "tumultuous and stormy" (μετὰ θορύβου καὶ χειμῶνος); it contended that their judgment had been overclouded by a spirit of contentiousness to the perversion of the truth; and it ended by summoning them to present themselves without a moment's delay at Constantinople. The leaders of the Eusebian party alone obeyed; the rest slunk away to their respective homes. Among those who repaired to the imperial city was Eusebius of Caesarea. Of the principal events which marked this occasion, the banishment of Athanasius and the death of Arius, it is unnecessary to speak here. But the proceedings of the synod then held at Constantinople (A.D. 336) have an important bearing on the literary history of Eusebius. The chief work of this synod was the condemnation of Marcellus [MARCELLUS], bishop of Ancyra, an uncompromising opponent of the Arians. He had written a book in reply to the Arian Asterius "the sophist," in which his zeal against Arian tenets goaded him into expressions that had a rank savour of Sabellianism. The proceedings against him had commenced at Jerusalem. They were taken up again at Constantinople, where he was condemned of Sabellianism, and deposed from his bishopric (Socr. H. E. i. 36; Soz. H. E. ii. 33). Eusebius is especially mentioned as taking part in this synod (Athan. Ap. c. Arian. 87; comp. Euseb. c. Marc. ii. 4, p. 115). But the dominant party were not satisfied with this condemnation. Eusebius was urged by his friends to undertake a refutation of the heretic. The two works against Marcellus, of which an account will be given in the proper place, were his response to this request.

salia had not yet ended, and the bishop of Caesarea delivered a panegyric which he afterwards appended to his Life of Constantine. An account of this work, which is extant under the title De Laudibus Constantini, is given below. With complacent vanity the orator records the emperor's satisfaction with his performance. This sovereign so "dear to God listened attentively, and was like one in an ecstasy of delight" (κατακροώμενος δὲ τῷ θεῷ φίλος γαννυμένῳ ἔφκει); he expressed his approval afterwards at a banquet to the bishops who were his guests (V. C. iv. 46). Possibly the delivery of this oration may have been the chief motive which induced Eusebius to accompany the Arian bishops to the imperial city. It must have been during this same visit also, though on an earlier day, that he delivered before the emperor his discourse on the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which had probably been spoken previously at the dedication itself. On this occasion too the satisfaction of Constantine was not less marked. He stood the whole time, though on the orator's own confession the discourse was lengthy; he refused again and again to be seated; he listened intently throughout, and would not suffer the orator to break off when he desired to do so (V. C. ix. 33, 46). This oration has unfortunately not survived (see p. 343).

VII. His Relations with the Emperor and Imperial Family. It does not appear that Eusebius had any personal interview with Constantine, when as a young man he passed through Caesarea in the retinue of Diocletian (see p. 309). The historian records the incident merely as a sight-seer. The first direct communication on record is a letter from the emperor to Eusebius as metropolitan of Caesarea after the restoration of peace, giving orders for the rebuilding of the churches (V. C. ii. 46); but this does not suppose any personal acquaintance. Constantine indeed addresses him on this occasion as his "dearly beloved brother," but nothing can be built upon the expression. At the Council of Nicaea however he stood high in the emperor's favour, as the prominent position there assigned to him shews (p. 312 sq.); and from that time forward there seems to have been no interruption to his cordial relations with his imperial friend. The emperor was wont to enter into familiar conversation with him, relating to him the most remarkable incidents in his career, such as the miraculous appearance of the cross in the skies (V. C. i. 28), and the protection afforded by this same emblem in battle (V. C. ii. 9). He corresponded with him on various subjects. Besides official letters, such as that which has been already mentioned, Constantine wrote to compliment him on his declining the see of Antioch. "Consider thyself happy," he says on this occasion, "forasmuch as by the testimony of the whole world, so to speak, thou hast been judged worthy to be bishop of every church" (V. C. iii. 61). On receiving from Eusebius his treatise on the Paschal festival dedicated to himself, he sent in reply a letter of acknowledgment, expressing his excessive admiration (ὕπερβανμῶσας) and urging his correspondent to write many more such discourses (V. C. iv. 45). On another occasion again he writes to him, asking him to see to the execution of fifty copies of the Scriptures for his new capital Constantinople, and supplying him with the means necessary for executing the order (V. C. iv. 36; see below, p. 334). But he not only corresponded familiarly with the bishop of Caesarea. It was a still greater mark of respect to listen with patience, and even with delight, to the lengthy and elaborate orations which Eusebius held from time to time in his presence, as we have seen him doing. We may well suppose that, beyond his vast learning, the bishop of Caesarea had other qualities which rendered his society attractive to the great emperor. Constantine himself praises his gentleness or moderation (V. C. iii. 60 ὅν καὶ αὐτὸς παιδεύσεως τε καὶ ἐπεικείας ἔνεκεν καλῶς τε καὶ πολλοῦ γινώσκω, and again, τῷ περὶ αὐτοῦ τοσαύτην ὁμᾶς ἐπεικείας ψῆφον ἐνέγκασθαι). Nor would the unfeigned admiration which Eusebius entertained for his imperial host fail to recommend him to the great man. On the other hand, the bishop praises the frankness and affability of the sovereign, which was condescending and unsuspecting to a fault, so that the unscrupulous preyed upon his confidence (V. C. iv. 54). Nor was Constantine the only member of the imperial family with whom Eusebius had friendly relations. We find the empress Constantia, the sister of Constantine and wife of Licinius, writing to him on a matter of religious interest. To her Eusebius replies in a letter, of which a great part is still extant. In his reply we are especially struck with the frankness of expostulation, almost of rebuke, which he addresses to this high personage (Spicil. Solesm. i. 383). These relations of Eusebius with a lady of the imperial family had a precedent in the life of his great hero Origen, who in like manner found an attentive disciple in Mammaea, the mother of the emperor Alexander Severus (Euseb. H. E. vi. 21).

VIII. Latest Years and Death. Within twelve months, or a little more, of the time when he had listened with rapt attention to the orations of the bishop of Caesarea, the great emperor, who then had seemed so strong and vigorous, breathed his last (May 22, A.D. 337); and the orator himself soon followed his imperial master. The precise time when Eusebius ended his long and laborious life is not known, but he was no longer living in 341, for we find his successor Acacius representing Caesarea in the synod held at Antioch that year. From the connexion in which his death is mentioned by the historians, we may infer that it happened not later than the close of A.D. 339 or the beginning of A.D. 340.^a In Wright's Ancient Syrian Martyrology, ^a Socrates (H. E. ii. 4) writes ἐν δὲ τῷδε τῷ χρόνῳ τελευτήσαντος Εὐσεβίου κ. τ. λ. In the previous chapter he mentions the intrigues of the Arians which led to the second exile of Athanasius, but says that he will defer the account of this exile till later (μικρὸν ὕστερον λέξω). In the following chapter he describes the death of the younger Constantine as happening "no long time after;" μετ' οὐ πολὺ. The second exile of Athanasius seems to have taken place in March, 340 [ATHANASIUS, p. 388]. Constantine was slain in the early months of the same year (Clinton, Fast. Rom. i. 402). Sozomen (H. E. lii. 2) places the death of Eusebius in exactly the same relation to all these events. It happened therefore, after the transactions which led to the exile of Athanasius had begun, but before the exile itself, and before the death of the younger Constantine.

which cannot date later than half a century after the event, "the commemoration of Eusebius bishop of Palestine" is placed on May 30. If this represents the day of his death, as probably it has, he must have died in 339, for the notices will hardly allow so late a date in the following year. His literary activity was unabated to the end. Four years at the most can have elapsed between his last visit to Constantinople and his death. He must have been fast approaching his eightieth year when the end came. Yet at this advanced age, and within this short period, he composed the Panegyric, the Life of Constantine, the treatise Against Marcellus, and the companion treatise On the Theology of the Church; while probably also he had in hand at the same time other unfinished works, such as the Theophania. There are no signs of failing mental vigour in these latest works. The two doctrinal treatises, which must certainly be assigned to the last four years of his life, are perhaps the most forcible and lucid of his writings. The Panegyric and the Life of Constantine are disfigured indeed by a too luxuriant rhetoric; but in vigour they do not fall behind any of his earlier works. Of his death itself no record is left. He passed away silently, we may suppose, as an old man of regular habits and equable temperament might be expected to pass away. Acacius, his successor, had been his pupil. Though more decidedly Arian in his bias, he was a devoted admirer of his master (Sozom. H. E. iii. 2). He wrote a life of Eusebius (see p. 308), and seems to have edited some of his works (see p. 328).

II. Literary Works. The literary remains of Eusebius are a rich and comparatively unexplored mine of study. With the exception of the Chronicle and the Ecclesiastical History, none of his writings have been investigated with proper diligence, and the vast majority remain still with the most meagre annotations, if annotated at all. Even in the excepted cases much remains still to be done. In wandering through this wide and pathless waste, without guides and without tracks, a writer will necessarily go astray; and the following account must therefore be regarded as only tentative. The literary chronology of Eusebius is especially perplexing. He was in the habit of re-editing his books, and, possibly also, of adding references from later works in the earlier, even when he did not re-edit. Hence the apparently contradictory evidence with regard to dates, which meets us again and again in his writings.

His works may be arranged under the following heads: A. Historical; B. Apologetic; C. Critical and Exegetical; D. Doctrinal; E. Orations; F. Letters. The division is of necessity more or less artificial, and in some cases a work might be placed under more than one of these heads. Thus the Defence of Origen is partly historical, partly doctrinal, while in one sense it may be called apologetic; and so again the Letter to the Church of Caesarea is exclusively doctrinal, and the Oration in Praise of Constantine is mainly apologetic. But a rough classification like this is recommended by its obvious convenience.

References are given in brackets [], after the titles of the several works, to the edition of Eusebius in the Patrologia Graeca of Migne, whenever the works in question are included in that collection.

A. HISTORICAL.

(1) Life of Pamphilus. Eusebius (Mart. Pal. 11), speaking of his friend's martyrdom, refers to this work as follows: "The rest of the triumphs of his virtue, requiring a longer narration, we have already before this given to the world in a separate work in three books, of which his life is the subject." He also refers to it three times in his History (H. E. vi. 32, vii. 32, viii. 13). In the first of these passages he states that in it he has given a full list of the works of Origen and of the other ecclesiastical writers collected by Pamphilus at Caesarea. Doubtless Jerome's list of Origen's works, which was discovered a few years ago (see Redepenning in Zeitschr. f. hist. Theol. 1851, p. 66 sq.), is borrowed from this source. This Life is several times mentioned by Jerome (Ep. 34, Op. i. p. 154 sq.; Vir. Ill. 81; c. Ruffin. i. 9). In the last passage he describes it as containing "tres libros elegantissimos," and gives a short extract from the third book. This appears to be the only remaining fragment; for the account of Pamphilus' death, published by Papebroch, belongs, as we shall see, not to this work, but to the longer edition of the Martyrs of Palestine. The date of the Life of Pamphilus is uncertain; but it was written before the History (on the v. l. ἀναγράφωμεν for ἀνεγράψαμεν in H. E. viii. 13, see Heinichen), and before the shorter edition of the Martyrs of Palestine (l.c.).

(2) On the Martyrs of Palestine (περὶ τῶν ἐν Παλαιστίνῃ μαρτυρησάντων) [Op. ii. 1457 sq.]. This work is extant in two forms, a shorter and a longer.

(i) The shorter form is found attached to the Ecclesiastical History in most MSS of the latter, but not always in the same place. Commonly it stands between the eighth and ninth books, but in one MS at least it is placed in the middle of viii. 13, where in fact Eusebius makes a reference to it; while in some others it is relegated to the end of the tenth book. In one or two MSS however, and notably in D. Marc. Venet. 338, perhaps the most important of all, it is wanting; neither has it any place in the Latin of Rufinus, or in the Syriac version of the History. Its fluctuating position in the MSS has a close analogy in the famous pericope (Joh. vii. 53-viii. 11) of the evangelical narrative.

(ii) The longer form is not extant entire in the original Greek. In the Bollandist Acta Sanctorum (Jun. t. i. p. 64) Papebroch published for the first time in Greek, from a Paris MS of the Metaphrast, an account of the martyrdom of Pamphilus and others (Ἀθλησις τῶν ἁγίων καὶ ἐνδόξων τοῦ Χριστοῦ μαρτύρων Παμφίλου κ.τ.λ.) which professed to be "composed by Eusebius Pamphili" (συγγραφεῖσα παρὰ τοῦ Εὐσεβίου τοῦ Παμφίλου). It had appeared in a Latin version before. The Greek was reprinted by Fabricius, Hippolytus ii. p. 217. This is a fuller account of the same incidents which are related in the Mart. Pal. 11 attached to the History. In the matter which the two contain in common they are expressed in the same words, or nearly so. Hence it followed that the one must have been an enlargement or an abridgment of the other. Both Papebroch and Fabricius supposed that the Metaphrast had extracted these Acts from Eusebius's Life of Pamphilus. On the other hand, Valois maintained that the Meta-phrast must have had a fuller edition of the Martyrs of Palestine than the existing Greek text. He was confirmed in this view by the fact that some anonymous Latin Acts of St. Procopius, which he printed, stood in exactly the same relation to the account of this martyr's death in the Mart. Pal. 1. These Latin Acts were evidently translated from some contemporary account, for they contained the words, "primo anno quo adversus nos fuit persecutio."

Recent discovery has established the conjecture of Valois. In A.D. 1861 Cureton published from a MS in the British Museum, dated A.D. 411 (the same which also contains the Theophania), an ancient Syriac version of the Martyrs of Palestine. The portions relating to Procopius and to Pamphilus and his companions correspond to the longer forms of their respective Acts as already described. Here then is a translation of the entire work of Eusebius in its longer form.

This discovery moreover throws light on another fact. S. E. Assemani's Acta Martyrum Occidentium, p. 166 sq. (Romae, 1748), contains accounts of the deaths of several of these Palestinian martyrs in Syriac, published from the Vatican MS Syr. 1. Assemani, starting from the theory of Valois and finding that his Syrian Acts of Procopius were identical with the Latin Acts already mentioned, inferred that we had in these Syriac Acts portions of the complete work of Eusebius, of which the Greek attached to the History was only an abridgment. So far he was correct in his inference. But he went on to express his opinion that Eusebius himself wrote the work in Syriac, and that the Acts which he published were in fact the originals of the author. This latter theory is shattered by Cureton's publication. Assemani's Acts (so far as they contain common matter) are another and independent Syriac version of the same Greek as Cureton's. Assemani's Syriac has the following Acts taken from the work of Eusebius: (1) Procopius, p. 166 sq.; (2) Alphaeus, &c., p. 172 sq.; (3) Timotheus, p. 182 sq.; (4) Apphianus, p. 186 sq.; (5) Aedesius, p. 195 sq.; (6) Agapius, p. 198 sq.; (7) Theodosia, p. 201 sq.; (8) Peter Absalom, p. 206 sq.

Of the genuineness of this longer work there can be no reasonable question. The Syriac MS of the Curetonian version itself was written within little more than seventy years of Eusebius's death. Moreover, it is plainly not the original autograph of the translation. The confusion and transposition of Syriac letters shew that the version has passed through one and probably more stages of transcription after it was made. Thus Apphianus is changed into Epiphanius, Anea into Aia, Peleus into Paulus, &c. (see pp. 58, 61, 64, 69, 78, 84, 85, Cureton). And in other words also, besides proper names, the text has been corrupted (pp. 57, 63, 83). Moreover, the Greek MS from which the Syriac version was made had either been mis-copied or so blurred by time as to be illegible in parts. Hence the name Paesis (a good Egyptian name, like Paapis, Paphnutius, &c. with the meaning "belonging to Isis"; see Tattam s. v. Π&ΗCΙ) has become Plasis by a confusion of Α Λ (p. 57), Aedesius has become Alosis by a confusion of Α Λ (p. 60), &c. Allowing sufficient time for these corruptions, we are carried back to the date of Eusebius himself. Moreover, the historical notices, which this longer account superadds to the shorter narrative, indicate a contemporary and an eye-witness.

Nor again can it reasonably be doubted that the shorter form of the Palestinian Martyrs, attached to the history, is Eusebius's own. Not only does the compiler retain those notices of the longer form in which Eusebius speaks in his own person; but in those passages also, which are peculiar to this shorter form, Eusebius is evidently the speaker. Thus, in his account of Pamphilus (c. 11) he mentions having already written a special work in three books on his martyred friend's life. Again, when recording the death of Silvanus who had had his eyes put out (c. 13), he mentions his own astonishment on one occasion (καταπληγῆναι ποτε αὐτὸς δημολογῶν), when he heard him reading the Scriptures, as he supposed, from a book in church, at being told that he was blind and was repeating them by heart. Moreover, other incidental notices, which are inserted from time to time and have no place in the longer form, shew the knowledge of a contemporary and eyewitness.

Eusebius was in the habit of working up old matter in new forms. A twofold edition of this book therefore is no stumbling-block. But it is an interesting problem to inquire the motive in this particular case.

The longer edition seems to be the original form of the book. It is an independent work, and appears to have been written not very long after the events themselves. It betrays no other motive than to inform and edify the readers, more especially the Christians of Caesarea and Palestine, to whom it is immediately addressed. "Our city of Caesarea" is an expression occurring several times (pp. 4 twice, 25, 30). "This our country," "this our city," are analogous phrases (pp. 8, 13). The martyrs are described as "those of whom the whole people of Palestine is proud, for in the midst of this our land also the Saviour of all mankind himself arose" (p. 3). "We also," he writes, when relating a miraculous occurrence, "call as witnesses to you of these things which we have written the whole of the inhabitants of the city of Caesarea, for there was not so much as one of the inhabitants of this city absent from this terrific sight" (p. 17). The beginning and end are hortatory, and suggest a directly didactic purpose in the narrative.

In the shorter form the case is different. The writer does not localize himself in the same way. It is always "the city," never "this city," of Caesarea. The appeal to the Caesareans in recounting the miracle is left out (c. 4). The hortatory beginning and ending are omitted; and generally the didactic portions are abridged or excised. For the hortatory opening a chronological notice, and an account of the decree under which the martyrs were condemned, are substituted. The hortatory close in like manner makes room for a brief summary of the sufferings of the martyrs under Diocletian throughout the world, ending with a reference to the palinode of the persecutors. "We must now," so it concludes, "record the palinode" (ἀναγραφπτέα δὲ καὶ ἡ παλινωδία).

It would seem then that this shorter form as part of a larger work, in which the sufferings of the martyrs were set off against the deaths of the persecutors. The object of this statistical treatment would be the vindication of God's righteousness. This idea appears several times elsewhere in the writings of Eusebius, and he may have desired to embody it in a separate treatise. The work is plainly not complete, as we have it. The palinode, which is promised, never comes. Nor is this the only sign of incompleteness. In c. 12 Eusebius refers to something which he has "said at the beginning." To this there is nothing corresponding in the extant work. The preface therefore is wanting, as well as the conclusion. This hypothesis as to the intention of the work, if it be admitted, involves another difficulty. At the end of the eighth book of the History, several MSS (generally the same which contain the Martyrs of Palestine) give a short appendix, as contained "in some copies" (ἐν τισὶν ἀποτυπώσεσιν). This appendix contrasts the miserable deaths of the persecutors with the happy end of Constantius the friend of the Christians, crowned by the happy accession of his son Constantine. It evidently does not belong to the History itself. It is no less obviously a fragment of some larger work; for it refers to an account of the abdication of the two emperors, which has been given in a previous part of the narrative. May we not have here a fragment of the second part of the treatise of which the Martyrs of Palestine in the shorter recension formed the first?

(3) Collection of Ancient Martyrdoms (ἀρχαίων μαρτυρίων συναγωγή). The title of the work may be inferred with substantial correctness from a comparison of the references in H. E. iv. 15, v. praef., 4, 21. Of this work Eusebius was not, as some have supposed, the author, but merely, as the title suggests and as the notices require, the compiler and editor. The narratives of martyrdoms had a double importance in the eyes of Eusebius: they were not only valuable as history, but they were instructive as lessons (H. E. v. praef. οὐχ ἱστορικῶς ἀλλὰ καὶ διδασκαλικὴν περιέχον τιμὴν). Hence he took pains to preserve authentic records of them. He conceived that those which happened during the last persecution should be narrated by contemporaries and witnesses. Hence he himself undertook to record the sufferings of the martyrs of his own country Palestine at this time; while he left to others in different parts of the world to relate those "quae ipsi miserrima viderunt," declaring that only thus strict accuracy could be attained (H. E. viii. 13, οὐχ ἡμέτερον, τῶν δ' ὄψει τὰ πρῶτα παρὰ τῶν ἰδίων ἂν γένοιτο, with the whole context). But he was anxious also to preserve the records of past persecutions. Hence this collection of Martyrologies. The epithet "ancient" (ἀρχαία) must probably be regarded as only relative. Those martyrdoms were "ancient," which took place prior to the "persecution of his own time" (ὁ καθ' ἡμᾶς βίβητος, according to his favourite expression). He himself refers to this collection for the martyrdom of Polycarp and others at Smyrna under Antoninus Pius A.D. 155 or 156 (iv. 15), for the fragments relating to the sufferers in Gaul under Maximian A.D. 177 (v. 1, sq.), and for the death of Apollonius under Commodus A.D. 180-185

(v. 21). But it would probably comprise any martyrdoms which occurred before the long peace that preceded the outbreak of the last persecution under Diocletian.

Out of this simple fact that Eusebius made a collection of the older acts of martyrdom, much legendary matter has grown. It gave rise to a fictitious correspondence between Jerome and others (Hieron. Op. xi. 542, Vallarsi). Chromatius and Heliodorus, the bishops, write to Jerome asking him to search for the "feriales" in the archives of St. Eusebius at Caesarea, and instruct them that they may observe the saints' days with more regularity. He replies to them, stating how on the occasion of Constantine's visit to Caesarea Eusebius had requested that the judges throughout the Roman empire might be directed to furnish him with copies of any judicial proceedings against the martyrs. Using these materials Eusebius had compiled a narrative giving "omnium pene martyrum provinciarum omnium Romanarum trophaea." From this work Jerome himself draws up the calendar of saints' days, which he sends in answer to his correspondent's request. These letters were afterwards prefixed to the so-called Martyrologium Hieronymianum, which they are intended to recommend. Baronius (Mart. Rom. praef. cc. vi, vii), and S. E. Assemani (Act. Mart. Occ. p. 39 sq.) have pointed out the historical impossibilities which these letters contain. But though a forgery, they appear to have been in circulation at an early date. There is a reference to them even in Cassiodorus (Inst. Div. Litt. 32, p. 556), if the passage be not interpolated. They seem also to have suggested the statement in the forged Acts of St. Sylvester, where this imaginary work of Eusebius is described in similar language, with the additional statement that it contained twenty (v. l. eleven) books. We may suppose also that directly or indirectly they prompted the inquiry of Eulogius of Alexandria, who wrote to ask Gregory the Great to send him this work of Eusebius. Gregory (Ep. viii. 29) says in reply that no such work exists in the archives of the Roman church or in the libraries of Rome, and that he himself had never heard of it, till he got the letter of Eulogius. In the middle ages however rumours of this work appear and re-appear; and at the revival of learning hopes of its discovery were excited from time to time. The story is fully investigated by Assemani (l. c.) who shews it to be incredible in itself and irreconcilable alike with the silence and the utterances of Eusebius.

(4) Chronicle [Op. i. 99 sq.]. As this is made the subject of a separate article [EUSEBIUS, CHRONICLE OF], little need be said here. The suggestion there thrown out, that Eusebius published two different editions of this work (see p. 352), deserves every consideration. It would solve not a few difficulties which we encounter in the literary history of Eusebius. The following reasons may be alleged for this theory. (i) The Armenian version differs from Jerome's in some important respects, but especially in the dates of the Roman bishops. (ii) Jerome states that the work was brought down to the vicennalia of Constantine (A.D. 325). But the History was published not very many months after this (see below, p. 322), and must have been in progress long before. Now the dates of the earlier Roman episcopate in the Armenian differ widely from those given in the History, while Jerome's dates agree with the latter. If there was only one edition, this phenomenon may be explained in one of two ways. Either Jerome reproduces the original Eusebian chronology of the Roman bishops and the Armenian translator (or some later redactor of the Chronicle before his time) tampered with the work, and substituted a confessedly erroneous chronology for one substantially correct—a very improbable supposition; or (as assumed by Lipsius and commonly) the Armenian may give the proper Eusebian dates, and Jerome may have altered them—a hypothesis which is still less credible, when we remember that Jerome's chronology in the Chronicle agrees substantially with the History, and that Eusebius was engaged on the History at the same time with the Chronicle. (iii) The references in other works of Eusebius are best explained on the hypothesis of a first edition of the Chronicle some years earlier than the copy which fell into Jerome's hands. Thus it is mentioned in the Eclogae Propheticae, and this latter work was certainly written during the persecution, i.e. at all events before A.D. 313 (see below, p. 339). Again, it is referred to likewise in the Praeparatio Evangelica, and there are indications, though not so absolutely certain as in the previous case, that the earlier books of the sequel to this work, the Demonstratio Evangelica, were written during and soon after the persecution (see below, p. 329). Tillemont (H. E. vii. p. 50) was disposed to postulate an earlier edition of the Chronicle, on the sole ground of the reference in the Praeparatio. The publication of the Eclogae Propheticae, and the discovery of the Armenian version of the Chronicle, have strengthened the position twenty-fold. If this hypothesis be correct, the Armenian must be a mixture of the earlier and later editions, for it also refers to the vicennalia (i. pp. 71, 131, Schoene). Petermann on entirely independent grounds attributes a mixed origin to this Armenian version (see below, p. 354).

(5) Ecclesiastical History (ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία) [Op. ii. 10 sq.]. The date of the work is ascertained from the following facts. (1) Eusebius refers to the following works as already written: the Chronicle (i. 1); the Extracts from the Prophets (i. 2, 6); the Collection of Ancient Martyrdoms (iv. 15, v. proem., 4, 22); the Defence of Origen (vi. 23, 33, 36); the Life of Pamphilus (vi. 32, vii. 32, viii. 13 [?]). On the other hand he expresses his intention of relating the sufferings of the martyrs, of which he himself was an eye-witness, in another work (viii. 13), referring apparently to the Martyrs of Palestine. (2) The work closes with a eulogy of Constantine and his son Crispus. As Crispus was put to death by his father in the summer A.D. 326, this gives a terminus ad quem, beyond which the publication of the work cannot be placed. (3) The last incident recorded, or alluded to, in the work is the defeat and punishment of Licinius. Licinius was defeated A.D. 323, and put to death A.D. 324 (Clinton, Fast. Rom. i. pp. 376, 378). (4) There is no reference, direct or indirect, to the Council of Nicaea, which met in June, A.D. 325. On the other hand, the theological language of Eusebius (e.g. i. 2, 3) is such as he would hardly have used after he had put his signature to the creed of this council. (5) The last book is dedicated to his friend Paulinus. Here again we have a definite terminus ad quem, for Paulinus died A.D. 324, or 325 at the latest. Those who would postpone the date of the History meet this argument in one of two ways. (i) They suppose that Paulinus was no longer living when Eusebius wrote these words. This however is an unnatural interpretation, not being suggested by anything in the context. The expression ἐπεγράτε has a parallel in the preface to his Onomasticon, where he addresses this same person, when he was certainly living, as ἐπὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἀνθρώπου Παυλίῳ. Even if with Heinichen we interpret the words σοὶ τοῦτον ἐπιγράψωμεν, not "let us inscribe," but "let us ascribe this to thee," as if the tenth book had been added at the instigation of Paulinus, it will still imply that he was living. The imperative however and the δραβομένοι of the context seem to point rather to a dedication. (ii) They postpone the death of Paulinus to a much later date. This however seems impossible. Paulinus was bishop first of Tyre and afterwards of Antioch (Euseb. c. Marcell. i. 4). This last see he only held six months before his death (Philostorg. H. E. iii. 15). At the Council of Nicaea however, Zeno is bishop of Tyre and Eustathius of Antioch. His death therefore must have taken place before the summer A.D. 325, when the council met; and Jerome (Euseb. Chron. ii. p. 192) is unquestionably right when he represents Paulinus as the immediate predecessor of Eustathius. On the other hand the language of Philostorgius (l.c.), as given by Photius, implies that he succeeded Eustathius when Eustathius was deposed, for it apparently makes him the immediate predecessor of Eulalius. If Philostorgius said this, the facts already adduced shew that he was wrong, but possibly the error is due to Photius's mode of abridging.¹ Theodoret (H. E. i. 6) overlooks Paulinus's short tenure of office, when he makes Eustathius the immediate successor of Philogonius. Other passages quoted by Heinichen (e.g. Soz. H. E. ii. 18) prove nothing, for they do not require that Paulinus should be still living at the times of which they speak.

From all these considerations it seems clear that the History was finished some time in A.D. 324 or 325; before midsummer in the latter year, and probably some months earlier. But there are reasons for thinking that the earlier books were written some years before this time. "If we compare the closing sentences of the ninth and tenth books it is evident that, when the ninth book was written, Eusebius was not aware of the rupture between Licinius and Constantine, which happened in 314; and it appears also that he was at the same time very imperfectly informed of the course of affairs in the west, which led to the decisive victory of Constantine over Maxentius in 312, though he was well acquainted with the eastern campaign, which ended with the death of Maximian in 313. We may therefore suppose that the nine books were composed not long after the edict of Milan in 313, while the tenth book was added in the interval between 323 and the close [the summer?] of 325" [W]. In this case the words "not yet seized with phrensy" (οὐπω μανέντος τότε), referring to Licinius (ix. 9), must have been a later insertion of the author; and indeed they are altogether out of harmony with the context. This early date of the first nine books will explain the fact that in viii. 13 Eusebius speaks of the Martyrs of Palestine as a projected work. "If this view of the date of the History be true, the book gains an additional interest. It becomes itself the last great literary monument of the period which it describes. It belongs not only in substance, but also in theological character to the ante-Nicene age. It gathers up and expresses in a form anterior to the age of dogmatic definition, the experience, the feelings, the hopes of a body which had just accomplished its sovereign success, and was conscious of its inward strength." [W.]

The work contains no indications that it was due to any suggestion from without, as some have supposed. If the author had been prompted to it by Constantine he would hardly have been silent about the fact, for he is only too ready elsewhere to parade the flatteries of his imperial patron. Moreover, it was probably written in great measure, or at least the materials for it were collected, before his relations with Constantine began. His own language rather suggests that it grew out of a previous work, the Chronicle. In his preface he speaks of it as an expansion (ἐκτενέστερον . . . τῇ ἀφήγησιν) of the narrative which he had given in epitome in this last-mentioned work. Accordingly, in the opening words, in which he sums up its contents, he places the chronological element in the forefront: "The successions of the holy apostles together with the times which have been accomplished from the days of our Saviour to our own age." But though the first suggestion of the work may have been derived from the Chronicle, the central conception is entirely different and modifies the work accordingly.

For the design of the work then we must refer to his opening chapters. He begins by enumerating the topics which the book is intended to comprise. These are: (1) the successions of the apostles with continuous chronological data from the Christian era to his own time (τὰς τῶν ἁποστόλων χρόνους); (2) the events of ecclesiastical history (ὅσα τε . . . λέγεται); (3) the most distinguished rulers, preachers, and writers in the Church (καὶ ὅσοι . . . ἐπρέσβευσαν λόγον); (4) the teachers of heresy who, like 'grievous wolves,' have ravaged the flock of Christ (τίνες τε . . . ἐκτροχίσσας); (5) the fate which has befallen the Jewish race as a retribution (πρόσπερ . . . τιμωρόντα); (6) the persecutions of the Church and the victories of the martyrs and confessions, concluding with the great and final deliverance wrought by the Saviour in the latter's own day (ὅσα τε αὖ . . . ἀντίληψιν). Such a narrative can only have one starting-point, the Incarnation. After giving this sketch of its purport and contents, he prays for guidance, since he is entering upon a desert and un-trodden way, where he will find no footprints, though the works of predecessors may serve as beacon-lights here and there through the waste. He considers it absolutely necessary (ἀναγκαιότατα) to undertake the task, because no one else before him had done so. The work, he concludes, must of necessity commence with the Incarnation and Divinity (οἰκονομίας τε καὶ θεολογίας) of Christ, because from Him we all derive our name. Accordingly in the succeeding chapters he goes on to shew that Christianity is no new thing, but has its roots in the eternal past. The Word was with God before the beginning of creation. He was recognised and known by righteous men in all ages, especially among the Hebrews; His advent, even His very names, were foretold and glorified; His society also—the Christian Church—was the subject of prophecy, while the Christian type of life was never without its examples since the race began. It is important to bear this in mind as a refutation of the charge brought against us Christians, that our doctrines are new and our society is of yesterday (i. 4, comp. ii. 1). "After this necessary preparation" (μετὰ τὴν δέουσαν προκατασκευὴν, i. 5), he proceeds to speak of the Incarnation, of its chronology and its synchronisms in external history, the Herodian kingdom, the Roman empire, the Jewish priesthood, including a discussion of the Saviour's genealogy; thus shewing that it came in the fulness of time as a realisation of the prophecies (c. 5–10). Then follows an account of the personalities employed in the announcement of the Kingdom and the foundation of the Church. A chapter is devoted to the Baptist as the first herald (c. 11), another to the appointment of the twelve and the seventy (c. 12); a third to the mission sent by Christ Himself to Edessa, as recorded in the archives of that city (c. 13). We are thus brought to the time of the Ascension.

So the first book ends. The second comprises the preaching of the apostles to the destruction of Jerusalem, the writer's aim being not to repeat the accounts in the New Testament, but to supplement them with notices from external sources. The third book extends to the reign of Trajan and covers the sub-apostolic age, ending with the notices of Ignatius, Clement, and Papias. The fourth and fifth carry us forward to the close of the second century, including the Montanist, Quartodeciman, and Monarchian disputes. The sixth contains the period from the persecution of Severus (A.D. 203) to that of Decius (A.D. 250), the central figure being Origen, of whom a full account is given. The seventh continues the narrative to the outbreak of the great persecution under Diocletian, and is made up in great measure of quotations from Dionysius of Alexandria, as we are warned in the preface (Διονύσιος ἰδίαις φωναῖς συνεκπονήσει). It is significant that the last forty years of this period, though contemporary with the historian, are dismissed in a single long chapter. It was a period of very rapid but silent progress, when the Church for the first time was in the happy condition of having no history. The eighth book gives the history of the persecution of Diocletian till the "palinode," the edict of Galerius (A.D. 311). The ninth relates the sufferings of the Eastern Christians until the victory over Maxentius at the Milvian bridge in the West, and the death of Maximin in the East, left Constantine and Licinius sole emperors. The tenth and last book, which is dedicated to Paulinus, gives an account of the rebuilding of the churches, of the imperial decrees favourable to the Christians, of the subsequent rebellion of Licinius and the victory of Constantine, by which he was left without a rival as the master of the Roman world. A panegyric of Constantine closes the whole.

It will have appeared from this account that Eusebius had a truly noble conception of the work which he was taking in hand. It was nothing less than the history of a society which stood in an intimate relation to the Divine Logos Himself, a society whose roots struck down into the remotest past and whose destinies soared into the eternal future. He felt moreover that he himself lived at the great crisis in its history. Now at length it had conquered, or at least seemed to have conquered, the powers of this world. No such moment in its development had ever occurred before; and it was difficult to see how any such could occur again. This was the very time therefore to place on record the incidents of its past career. Moreover, he had great opportunities, such as were not likely to fall to another. In his own episcopal city, perhaps in his own official residence, was the largest Christian library which had hitherto been got together—the books collected by his friend Pamphilus. Not far off, at Jerusalem, was another valuable library, collected in the earlier part of the preceding century by the bishop Alexander, and especially rich in the correspondence of men of letters and rulers in the church, “from which library,” writes Eusebius, “we too have been able to collect together the materials for this undertaking which we have in hand” (H. E. vi. 20). Moreover, he himself had been trained in a highly efficient school of literary industry under Pamphilus, while his passion for learning has rarely been equalled, perhaps never surpassed.

It must be confessed however that the execution of his work falls far short of the conception. The faults indeed are patent and tend to obscure the merits, so that an unjust depreciation of the work has too commonly been the consequence. Yet, with all allowance made for these, it is a noble monument of literary labour. He himself, as we have seen, pleads for indulgence, as one who is setting foot upon new ground, “nullius ante trita solo.” As he had no predecessor, so also he had no successor. Rufinus, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, all commenced their work where he had ended. None ventured to go over the same ground again, but left him sole possessor of the field which he held by right of discovery and of conquest. The most bitter of his theological adversaries were forced to confess their obligations to him, and to speak of his work with respect. It is only necessary to reflect for a moment what a blank would be left in our knowledge of this most important chapter in all human history, if the narrative of Eusebius were blotted out, and we shall appreciate the enormous debt of gratitude which we owe to him. The little light which glimmered over the earliest history of Christianity in medieval times came ultimately from Eusebius alone, coloured and distorted in its passage through various media.

The two points which require consideration are (1) the range and adequacy of his materials; (2) the use made of these materials.

1. The range of materials is astonishing when we consider that Eusebius was a pioneer breaking new ground. Some hundred works, in several cases very lengthy works, are either directly cited or referred to as read. When we remember that in many instances he would read an entire treatise through for the sake of one or two historical notices, while in many others he must have done the same without finding anything which would serve his purpose, we are able to form some conception of the enormous labour involved in the work. This then is his strongest point. Yet even here deficiencies may be noted. He very rarely quotes the works of heresiarchs themselves, being content to give their opinions through the medium of their opponents' refutations. A still greater defect is his ignorance of Latin literature and of Latin Christendom generally. Thus he knows nothing of Tertullian's works, except the Apologeticum, which he quotes (ii. 2, 25, iii. 20, 33, v. 5) from a bad Greek translation (e. g. ii. 25, where the translator, being ignorant of the Latin idiom cum maxime, makes shipwreck of the sense). Of Tertullian himself he gives no account, but calls him a “Roman.” Pliny's letter he only knows through Tertullian (iii. 33), and is unacquainted with the name of the province which Pliny governed. Of Hippolytus again he has very little information to communicate, and cannot even tell the name of his see (vi. 20, 22). His account of Cyprian too is meagre in the extreme (vi. 43, vii. 3), though Cyprian was for some years the most conspicuous figure in western Christendom, and died (A.D. 258) not very long before his own birth. He betrays the same ignorance also with regard to the bishops of Rome. His dates here, strangely enough, are widest of the mark in the latter half of the 3rd century, close upon his own time. Thus he assigns to Xystus II. († A.D. 258) eleven years (vii. 27) instead of eleven months; to Eutychianus († A.D. 283) ten months (vii. 32) instead of nearly nine years; to Gaius, whom he calls his own contemporary, and who died long after he had arrived at manhood (A.D. 296), “about fifteen years” (vii. 32) instead of twelve. He seems to have had a corrupt list, and he did not possess the knowledge necessary to correct it. With the Latin language indeed he appears to have had no thorough acquaintance, though he sometimes ventured to translate Latin documents (iv. 8, 9; comp. viii. 17). But he must not be held responsible for the blunders in the versions of others, e. g. of Tertullian's Apologeticum. Whether the translations of stat. documents in the later books are his own or not does not appear. But as Constantine was in the habit of employing persons to translate his stat. papers, speeches, &c., from Latin into Greek (V. C. iv. 32), we may suppose that Eusebius generally availed himself of such official or semi-official versions. See on this subject Heinichen's note on H. E. iv. 8.

2. Under the second head the most vital question is the sincerity of Eusebius. Did he tamper with his materials or not? The sarcasm of Gibbon (Decline and Fall, c. xvi) is well known: “The gravest of the ecclesiastical historians, Eusebius himself, indirectly confesses that he has related whatever might redound to the glory, and that he has suppressed all that could tend to the disgrace of religion. Such an acknowledgment will naturally excite a suspicion that a writer who has so openly violated one of the fundamental laws of history, has not paid a very strict regard to the observance of the other." The passages to which he refers (H. E. viii. 2; Mart. Pal. 12) do not bear out this imputation. There is no indirectness about them, but on the contrary they deplore, in the most emphatic terms, the evils which disgraced the church, and they represent the persecution under Diocletian as a just retribution for these wrongdoings. The ambitions, the intriguing for office, the factious quarrels, the cowardly denials and shipwrecks of the faith,—“evil piled upon evil” (κακὰ κακοῖς ἐπὶ κακοῖς)—are denounced in no measured language. But the writer contents himself with condemning these sins and shortcomings of Christians in general terms, without entering into details, and declares his intention of confining himself to such topics as may be profitable (πρὸς ἐπέλεάς) to his own and future generations. This treatment may be regarded as too great a sacrifice to edification. It may discredit his conception of history; but it leaves no imputation on his honesty. Nor again can the special charges against his honour as a narrator be sustained. There is no ground whatever for the surmise that Eusebius forged or interpolated the passage from Josephus relating to our Lord, quoted in H. E. i. 11, though Harnack (iii. p. 623 sq., Melet. ii.) is disposed to entertain the charge. Inasmuch as this passage is contained in all our extant MSS, and there is sufficient evidence that other interpolations (though not this) were introduced into the text of Josephus long before his time (see Orig. c. Col. i. 47, Delarue's note), no suspicion can justly attach to Eusebius himself. Another interpolation in the Jewish historian, which he quotes elsewhere (ii. 23), was certainly known to Origen (l. c.). Doubtless also the omission of the owl in the account of Herod Agrippa's death (H. E. ii. 10) was already in some texts of Josephus (Ant. xix. 8, 2). The manner in which Eusebius deals with his very numerous quotations elsewhere, where we can test his honesty, is a sufficient vindication against this unjust charge.

It is not the substitution of an angel for an owl, as the case is not uncommonly stated. The result is produced mainly by the omission of some words in the text of Josephus, which runs thus: Ἀνακύψας δ' οὖν καὶ ἰδὼν [τὸν βουβῶνα] τῆς αὐτοῦ κεφαλῆς ὑπερ-σέβασεν εἶδεν [ἐπὶ σχεινίου τινοῦ], ἄγγελόν [τε] πρὸς αὐτὸν ἐνόησε κακῶν εἶναι, τὸν καὶ ποτὲ τῶν ἀγαθῶν γινώσκοντα. The words bracketed are omitted and αἶψα is added after εἶναι, so that the sentence runs, εἰς ἄγγελον τούτων εὐθὺς ἐνόησε κακῶν εἶναι αἴτιον αἶψα. This being so, I do not feel at all sure that the change (by whomever made) was dictated by any dangerous motive. A scribe, unacquainted with Latin, would stumble over τὸν βουβῶνα which had a totally different meaning and seems never to be used of an owl in Greek; and he would alter the text in order to extract some sense out of it. In the previous mention of the bird (Ant. xviii. 6, 7), Josephus or his translator gave it as a Latin name, βουβῶνα δὲ οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι τὸν αὐτὸν καλοῦσι. Möller (quoted by Bright, p. xlv) calls this “the one case” in which, so far as he recollects, Moreover, Eusebius is generally careful not only to collect the best evidence accessible, but also to distinguish between different kinds of evidence. “Almost every page witnesses to the zeal with which he collected testimonies from writers who lived at the time of the events which he describes. For the sixth and seventh books he evidently rejoices to be able to use for the foundation of his narrative the contemporary letters of Dionysius; ‘Dionysius, our great bishop of Alexandria,’ he writes, ‘will again help me by his own words in the composition of my seventh book of the history, since he relates in order the events of his own time in the letters which he has left’ (vii. praef.) In accordance with this instinctive desire for original testimony, Eusebius scrupulously distinguishes facts which rest on documentary from those which rest on oral evidence. Some things he relates on the authority of a ‘general’ (iii. 11, 36) or ‘old report’ (iii. 19, 20) or from tradition (i. 7, ii. 9, vi. 2, &c.). In the lists of successions he is careful to notice where written records failed him. ‘I could not,’ he says, ‘by any means find the chronology of the bishops of Jerusalem preserved in writing; thus much only I received from written sources, that there were fifteen bishops in succession up to the date of the siege under Hadrian, &c.’ (iv. 5).” [W.] “There is nothing like hearing the actual words” of the writer, he says again and again (i. 23, iii. 32, vii. 23; comp. iv. 23), when introducing a quotation.

The general sincerity and good faith of the historian seem therefore to be assured. But his intellectual qualifications for his task were in many respects defective. His credulity indeed has frequently been much exaggerated. “Undoubtedly he relates many incidents which may seem to us incredible, but, when he does so, he gives the evidence on which they are recommended to him. At one time it is the express testimony of some well-known writer, at another a general belief, at another an old tradition, at another his own observation (v. 7, vi. 9, vii. 17, 18)” [W.]. The most remarkable passage bearing on the question is one in which he recounts his own experience during the last persecution in Palestine (Mart. Pal. 9). “There can be no doubt about the occurrence which Eusebius here describes, and it does not appear that he can be reproached for adding the interpretation which his countrymen placed upon it. What he vouches for we can accept as truth; what he records as a popular comment leaves his historical veracity and judgment unimpaired.” [W.] Gibbon (c. xvi) describes the character of Eusebius as “less tinctured with credulity, and more practised in the arts of courts, than that of almost any of his contemporaries.”

A far more serious drawback to his value as a historian is the loose and uncritical spirit in which he sometimes deals with his materials. This shews itself in diverse ways. (a) He is not always to be trusted in his discrimination of genuine and spurious documents. As regards the canon of Scripture indeed he takes special pains; he lays down certain principles which shall guide him in the production of testimonies; and on the whole he adheres to these principles with fidelity (see Contemporary Review, Jan. 1875, p. 169 sq.). Yet elsewhere he adduces as genuine the correspondence of Christ and Abgarus (i. 13), though never treating it as canonical Scripture. The unworthy suspicion that Eusebius himself forged this correspondence which he asserted to be a translation of a Syriac original found in the archives of Edessa has been refuted by the discovery and publication of the original Syriac (The Doctrine of Addai the Apostle with an English Translation and Notes by G. Phillips, London, 1876; see Zahn, Götting. Gel. Anz. Feb. 6, 1877, p. 161 sq.; Contemporary Review, May 1877, p. 1137; a portion of this work had been published some time before in Cureton's Ancient Syriac Documents, p. 6 sq., London, 1864). Not his honesty, but his critical discernment was at fault. Yet we cannot be severe upon him for maintaining a position which, however untenable, has commended itself to Cave (H. L. i. p. 2) and Grabe (Spic. Patr. i. p. 1 sq.), and other writers of this stamp, as defensible. This however is the most flagrant instance of misappreciation. On the whole, considering the great mass of spurious documents which were current in his age, we may well admire the discrimination with which he separates the false from the true, as e.g. in the case of the numerous Clementine writings (iii. 16, 38), alleging the presence or the absence of external testimony for his decisions. Pearson's eulogy (Vind. Ign. i. 8) on Eusebius, though exaggerated, is not undeserved. He is generally a safe guide in discriminating between the genuine and the spurious. (b) He is often careless in his manner of quoting. His quotations from Irenaeus for instance lose much of their significance, even for his own purpose, by abstraction from their context (v. 8). His quotations from Papias (iii. 39) and from Hegesippus (iii. 32, iv. 22) are tantalizing by their brevity, for the exact bearing of the words could only have been learnt from the suppressed context. But with the exception of the passages from Josephus (where the blame, as we have seen, must be shifted to other shoulders) the quotations themselves are given with fair accuracy. (c) He draws hasty and unwarranted inferences from his authorities, and altogether he is loose in interpreting their bearing. This is his weakest point as a critical historian. Thus he quotes the passages of Josephus respecting the census of Quirinus and the insurrections of Theudas and of Judas the Galilean, as if they agreed in all respects with the accounts in St. Luke, and does not notice the chronological difficulties (i. 5, 9; ii. 11). He adduces the Jewish historian as a witness to the assignment of a tetrarchy to Lysanias (i. 9), though in fact he says nothing about this Lysanias in the passage in question, but elsewhere mentions an earlier person bearing the name as ruler of Abilene (Ant. xx. 7. 1; B. J. ii. 11. 5). He represents this same writer as stating that Herod Antipas was banished to Vienne (i. 11), whereas Josephus sends Archelaus to Vienne (B. J. ii. 7. 3) and Herod Antipas to Lyons (Ant. xviii. 7. 2; but in B. J. ii. 9. 6, Spain is given as the place of exile). He quotes Philo's description of the Jewish Therapeutae, as if it related to a body of Christian ascetics (ii. 17). He gives, side by side, the contradictory accounts of the death of James the Just in Josephus and Hegesippus, as if the one tallied with the other (ii. 23). He entangles himself in a hopeless confusion between the imperial brothers M. Aurelius and L. Verus (v. prooem., 4, 5) from a misunderstanding of his documents, though in the Chronicle (ii. p. 170) he is substantially correct with regard to these emperors. And examples of such carelessness in the use of his materials might be largely increased. (d) He is very desultory in his treatment. We have not unfrequently to pick out from various parts of his work the notices bearing on one definite and limited subject. He relates a fact, or quotes an authority bearing upon it, in season or out of season, according as it is recalled to his memory by some accidental connexion. "Nothing can illustrate this characteristic better than the manner in which he deals with the canon of the New Testament. After mentioning the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome, he proceeds at once (iii. 3) without any further preface to enumerate the writings attributed to them respectively, distinguishing those which were generally received by ancient tradition from those which were disputed. At the same time he adds a notice of the Shepherd, because it had been attributed by some to the Hermas mentioned by St. Paul. After this he resumes his narrative, and then having related the last labours of St. John he gives an account of the writings attributed to him (iii. 24), promising a further discussion of the Apocalypse, which however does not appear. This catalogue is followed by some fragmentary discussions on the Gospels, to which a general classification of all the books claiming to have apostolic authority is added. When this is ended, the history suddenly goes back to a point in the middle of the former book (ii. 15). Elsewhere he repeats the notice of an incident for the sake of adding some new detail, yet so as to mar the symmetry of his work." [W.] Examples of this fault occur in the accounts of the first preaching at Edessa (i. 13, ii. 1), of the writings of Clement of Rome (iii. 16, 38; iv. 22, 23, &c.), of the daughters of Philip (iii. 30, 39; comp. v. 17, 24), and in many other cases.

“a sinceritatis via paululum deflexit noster”; and even here the indicument cannot be made good. The severe strictures therefore against Eusebius made, e.g. by Alford on Acts xii. 21, are altogether unjustifiable.

The History of Eusebius was early translated into the two languages which shared with the Greek by far the largest part of the whole area of Christendom. The Syriac version is preserved in great part in two MSS: one at St. Petersburg, dated A.D. 462, and containing books i-iv, viii-x with lacunae, and small portions of books v, vii (see Dindorf's Præf. p. vi sq.); the other in the British Museum (Add. 14,639 described in Wright's Catalogue, p. 1039), belonging to the 6th century and containing books i-v (with some mutilations in the beginning of the first book). As there were among the companions of Pamphilus persons who made it their business to translate from the Greek into Syriac (see above, p. 310), and as other works of Eusebius were certainly translated into this latter language very soon after they were written (see pp. 320, 332), we may infer that this Syriac version of the History late not many years after the original, and perhaps during the lifetime of the author himself. Dr. Wright is preparing an edition of this version, of which he has given a specimen (i. 1-4) in Dindorf's praef. p. xviii sq. The old Latin version was made by Rufinus, who, as usual, deals very freely with his original. He abridges and even inserts at pleasure. The text is accompanied by a continuation from his own pen, carrying the history down to the death of Theodosius the Great. The exact date of this translation is uncertain, but the possible limits are narrow. In the preface Rufinus mentions that Chromatius, to whom it is dedicated, imposed the task upon him at a time when Alaric was laying Italy waste. Alaric first invaded Italy A.D. 402, and the version therefore should probably be dated soon after. Chromatius died A.D. 406. The best edition is that of Caszari, Rome, 1740. The work is the subject of an important monograph by Kimmel, de Eusebio Eusebii Interprete, Gerae, 1838. See also Eurt. Christl. Latein. Literatur, p. 310 sq. (Leipzig, 1874).

The editio princeps of the Greek of Eusebius's History is that of Stephens, Paris, 1544. The following are the principal editors after Stephens. (1) Valesius (Paris, 1659), who has contributed more largely than any one else to the criticism and elucidation of Eusebius. (2) Reading (Cambridge, 1720); together with the Ecclesiastical Histories of Socrates, Sozomen, etc. Reading reprinted Valesius' translation and commentary with additions and corrections from this editor's manuscript notes, and supplemented it with materials from other writers. (3) Heinichen (Leipzig, 1827); a very important contribution, but superseded by his later edition, of which an account is given below. (4) Stroth (Halae ad Salam. 1779). The first volume only appeared, containing books i-viii. (5) Burton (Oxford, 1838); the text, translation of Valois, and apparatus criticus, to which Burton himself made important contributions. This was followed in A.D. 1842 by two volumes of variorum notes and excursuses, issued by the Oxford press, containing the labours of Valois, Heinichen, and others. Burton died before the edition was completed (1838), and it was brought out by anonymous friends. (6) Schwegler (Tubingae, 1852); a text and critical apparatus, but no explanatory notes; a convenient edition with useful indices. (7) Laemmer (Staphisae, 1862). This is the most important edition for the criticism of the text, the editor having made large additions to the existing materials; but it has no explanatory notes. (8) The later edition of Heinichen in his Eusebii Pamphili Scripta Historica (Lipsiae, 3 vols., 1868, 1869, 1870), which includes also the Vita Constantini, the Panegyricus (de Laudibus Constantini), and the Constantini ad Sanctorum Carum Oratio. This is the most complete and useful edition, comprising prolegomena, text, apparatus criticus, explanatory notes, excursuses, and indices. The editor has revised and supplemented his former work, making use of the materials which have accumulated since the appearance of his first edition. To these editions should be added, as the most recent text and convenient for use, that of W. Dindorf in Teubner's series (Lipsiae, 1871).

Monographs on the Ecclesiastical History are very numerous. The following may be mentioned. Möller, de Fide Eusebii in Rebus Christianis enarrandis, Havn. 1813; Danz, de Eusebio Caesariensi Historiae Ecclesiasticae Scriptore, etc., Jenae, 1815; Kestner, de Eusebii Historiae Ecclesiasticae Conditoris Auctoritate, etc., Göttingae, 1816; Reuterdahl, de Fontibus Hist. Eccl. Eusebii, Lond. Goth. 1826; Hély, Eusèbe de Césarée, premier Historien de l'Église, Paris, 1877. The writer of the present article has also had the advantage of consulting some manuscript notes of Dr. Westcott, from which extracts have been given above with the initial [W.]. Particular points are more fully treated in special works; e.g. the list of Roman bishops by Lipsius, Die Papstverzeichnisse des Eusebios, Kiel, 1868, and Chronologie der Römischen Bischöfe, Kiel, 1869.

(6) Life of Constantine [Op. ii. 905 sq.], in four books. The date of this work is fixed within narrow limits. It was written after the death of the great emperor who is its subject (May 337), and after his three sons had been declared Augusti (Sept. 337); see iv. 68. On the other hand, the death of the author himself was not later than A.D. 340 (see above, p. 318). Gothofred (Philostorg. Eccl. Hist. vii. 3, and elsewhere) denied its genuineness; but this opinion does not deserve serious refutation. The work is not named indeed by Jerome, but then he himself implies that his catalogue is far from complete (Vir. Ill. 81). On the other hand, it is directly mentioned by Socrates (H. E. i. 1, v. 22) and largely used by writers of the 5th century, and it bears manifest traces of Eusebius's pen. Photius also gives an account of it (Bibl. 127), styling it εἰς Κωνσταντῖνον τὸν μέγαν βασιλέα ἐγκωμιαστικὴ τετραβιβλος. Eusebius does not profess to give a complete or general biography of Constantine. He distinctly states that he intends to pass over his military exploits and his legislative enactments, and to confine himself to those incidents which pertain to the religious life (μονὰ τὰ πρὸς τὸν θεοφιλῆ συντελεσθέντα βίον, i. 11). Accordingly the heading prefixed to the table of contents runs, κεφάλαια τοῦ κατὰ Θεὸν βίου τοῦ μακαρίου Κωνσταντίνου κ.τ.λ. Though not professing to be a continuation of the Ecclesiastical History, it fulfils this function to some extent. In this relation it is mentioned by Socrates (H. E. i. 1), to whom, as to other historians of the same events, it furnishes important materials for the period to which it relates. For the Council of Nicaea more especially, and for some portions of the Arian controversy, it is a primary source of information of the highest value. As regards the emperor himself, it is notoriously one-sided. The advice of Fleury to believe "everything bad which is told by Eusebius, and everything good which is told by Zosimus, of Constantine," will not easily be forgotten. A biography of this emperor, which does not even hint at the dark tragedy of the imperial household, when son and nephew and wife were murdered in rapid succession, must necessarily give a false and distorted impression of his character, whatever palliating circumstances for this crime we may discover or imagine. The verdict of Socrates, the earliest writer who mentions this work, will not be disputed. The author, he says, "has devoted more thought to the praises of the emperor and to the grand-loquence of language befitting a panegyric, as if he were pronouncing an encomium, than to the accurate narrative of the events which took place." But with all this there is no ground for suspecting him of misrepresenting the facts. Suppression rather than invention is the fault of the work. He has given us no shadow in his portrait, and Constantine's character was marked with some very dark lines. With this important qualification, his biography has the highest value. It is a vivid picture of certain aspects of a great personality, painted by one who was familiarly acquainted with him and had access to important documents. It may be fulsome, and nauseous in its fulsomeness; but flattery is a word quite out of place. Flattery cannot pierce the sealed grave; and the language which he uses of the reigning sovereigns does not overstep the bounds of the conventional homage expected in those ages from a loyal subject. It may even be set down to the credit of Eusebius that his praises of Constantine are much louder after his death, than they ever were during his lifetime. In this respect he contrasts favourably with the meanness of Seneca in blackening the memory of the very sovereign whom a short time before he had extolled to the skies. Nor shall we do justice to Eusebius, unless we bear in mind the extravagant praises which even heathen panegyrists lavished on the great Christian emperor before his face, as an indication of the spirit of the age. But after all excuses made, this indiscriminate praise of Constantine is a reproach from which we should gladly have held Eusebius free.

In this work, as in several of his other writings, Eusebius has had no scruple in repeating himself. Some chapters are taken from the Ecclesiastical History; others from the Tricennial Oration; others again from the Theophania; but by far the greatest part of the work is new. Its most valuable portions are the letters and speeches of Constantine, and the author's personal reminiscences of the emperor. The headings of the chapters occasionally contain information which is not in the chapters themselves (e.g. iv. 44, where the name of Marianus is given). They must therefore have been added by some one acquainted with the facts, and presumably a contemporary. If the reasons given by Valois for denying their Eusebian authorship be held valid, we may naturally attribute them to his successor Acacius, who inherited his papers and may possibly have published the Life of Constantine as a posthumous work.

This work was first printed by Stephens with the Ecclesiastical History (A.D. 1544). It was afterwards edited with the same by Valois, and by Reading after Valois. Heinichen's first edition (Lipsiae, 1830) was independent of the Ecclesiastical History; but in his later revision of his work (A.D. 1869) it is included with the latter in the Scripta Historica of Eusebius (see above, p. 327). Various opinions respecting the character of the work are given in his Melet. xxiii attached to his notes (iii. p. 754). Photius (l.c.) criticizes it as too florid (ἀνθηρότερον) and forced (ἐκβεβλασται) in style.

B. APOLOGETIC.

(7) Against Hierocles [Op. iv. 795]. This work is not named by Jerome, but was read by Photius, Bibl. 39. Hierocles was governor in Bithynia, and used his power ruthlessly to embitter the persecution which he is thought to have instigated (Lactant. Div. Inst. v. 2; Mart. Pers. 16; see Mason, Persecution of Diocletian, pp. 58, 108). If he was the same Hierocles who in the later years of the persecution ruled in Egypt, Eusebius had himself been an eye-witness of his cruelties (Mart. Pal. p. 18, ed. Cureton comp. H. E. viii. 9). At all events he alludes in this work to the judicial functions of his adversary (c. Hierocl. 20, p. 524, τὰ ἀνωτάτω καὶ καθόλου δικαστήρια πεπιστευμένῳ). But Hierocles, not satisfied with assailing the Christians from the tribunal, attacked them also with his pen. The title of his work, which consisted of two books, seems not to have been Φιλαλήθεις Λόγοι, as it is most commonly given after Pearson (p. 584), but ὁ Φιλαλήθης simply, 'The Lover of Truth,' for Eusebius so styles it again and again (§ 1 twice, 4 several times, 14, 17, 25, 34, 43). It was headed, says Lactantius (Div. Inst. v. 2), not contra Christianos [κατὰ Χριστιανῶν], as if he were attacking enemies, but ad Christianos [πρὸς Χριστιανούς], as if he were reasoning with friends. Nevertheless it was a ruthless assault on Christianity, written in a biting style. Its main object was to expose the contradictions of the Christian records. With this main part of the work however Eusebius does not concern himself. He says (§ 1) that it is shamelessly plundered, sometimes even verbatim, from previous assailants of Christianity like Celsus; that when the time comes it may perhaps be met by a special refutation (he seems to be referring to his own treatise against Porphyry, which he had either begun or projected at this time); and that meanwhile it had been virtually refuted by anticipation in Origen's work. He therefore confines himself to one point—the comparison of Apollonius, as described in his Life by Philostratus, with our Saviour, to the disparagement of the latter. There is much difference of opinion whether Philostratus himself intended to set up Apollonius as a rival to the Christ of the Gospels [APOLLONIUS OF TYANA], but Hierocles at all events turned his romance to this use. On this point alone (which, by the way, is brought forward also by "the philosopher" whom Macarius refutes, Apocr. iii. 1) does Eusebius credit Hierocles with originality.

Eusebius refutes his opponent with great moderation, and generally with good effect. He allows that Apollonius was a wise and virtuous man, but he refuses to concede the higher claims advanced on his behalf. He shews that the work of Philostratus was not based on satisfactory evidence; that the narrative itself is full of absurdities and contradictions; and that the moral character of Apollonius as therein portrayed is far from perfect. For this purpose he takes the eight books in succession, fastening on such points as serve his purpose. He maintains that the supernatural incidents, if they actually occurred, might have been the work of demons. At the conclusion (§ 46–48) he refutes and denounces the fatalism of Apollonius, as alone sufficient to discredit his character for wisdom. The book begins, "Well then, dear friend, is it not right?" as if it had been attached to some thing which went before. But this mode of expression is perhaps assumed to give it an air of can. The work is correctly described by Photius as "a short treatise in refutation of the arguments of Hierocles in favour of Apollonius of Tyana" (ἡμετέριον βιβλιδάριον πρὸς τοὺς ὑπὲρ Ἀπολλωνίου τοῦ Τυανέως Ἱεροκλέους λόγους), and the titles in the MSS are to the same effect. It was probably one of the earliest works of Eusebius.

This treatise was first published by Aldus (Venet. 1502) with Philostratus's Vita Apollonii. It has been several times printed together with the work of Philostratus. The most convenient of recent editions are those of Gaisford, Eusebii Pamphili contra Hieroclem et Marcellum Libri (Oxon. 1852), and Kayser, Flavii Philostrati Opera, i. p. 369 sq. (Lipsiae, 1870, Teubner). An important aid is Pearson's Prolegomena in Hieroclem, reprinted in his Minor Works, ii. p. 575 sq.

(8) Against Porphyry (κατὰ Πορφύριον), an elaborate work in twenty-five books: Hieron. Epist. 70 ad Magn. § 3 (i. p. 427, Vallarsi), Vir. II. 81. In the latter passage indeed the printed texts have "libri triginta de quibus ad me viginti tantum pervenerunt," but all Vallarsi's MSS "suo consensu" read "libri viginti quinque," omitting the other words. This accords with the notice in Epist. 70. The vulgar text therefore must be regarded as a later alteration, perhaps due to some confusion with another refutation of Porphyrius by Apollinaris, which did contain thirty books and is mentioned elsewhere by Jerome in connexion with Eusebius. The alteration however is earlier than the Greek version of Sophronius, which agrees with the vulgar text. The work of Porphyrius, which this treatise undertook to refute, comprised eleven books, and was the most formidable of the heathen attacks on the Biblical records: see Hulten, de Vit. et Script. Porph. c. xi. p. 273 sq. (reprinted in Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 207 sq. d. 1); Tillemont, Empereurs iv. p. 74 sq.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. v. p. 746 sq. (ed. Harles); Sander, Church History i. p. 236 sq. (Bohn); Reiter in Theolog. Quartalchr. xlvii. p. 60 sq. (1865). The ablest part of the work seems to have been the assault on the authenticity of Daniel in the 12th and 13th books, and to this Eusebius replied in the 18th, 19th, and 20th books of his refutation: Hieron. Comm. in Dan. praef. (Op. v. p. 617), Comm. in Matt. lib. iv. (ii. p. 196); comp. c. Rufin. ii. 33 (ii. p. 527). The correspondence of position in the attack and reply seems to shew that Eusebius took the arguments of Porphyry in order from beginning to end.

It is strange that, though Eusebius again and again quotes from this very work against Christianity (H. E. vi. 19; Praef. Ev. i. 9. 20 sq.; v. 2. 9 sq.; x. 9. 12), and elsewhere, when referring to other works by Porphyry, describes him as the author of this attack on the Christians (Praef. Ev. iv. 6. 2; v. 5. 4; vi. 36. 5; Dem. Ev. i. 7. 1), yet he never once (so far as I remember) mentions his own refutation. His silence may be explained with Valois by supposing that his refutation was written after these works in which Porphyry is mentioned, i.e. after A.D. 325. On the other hand, we have seen that he was already contemplating some such work at a much earlier date, when he wrote his tract against Hierocles. The project however may have been long delayed, and meanwhile he may have come to regard Porphyry as a foeman worthier of his steel than Hierocles. At all events there were personal circumstances, irrespective of the importance of Porphyry's work, which would lead Eusebius to notice it. He constantly speaks of Porphyry as a contemporary (ὁ καθ' ἡμᾶς, H. E. vi. 19; Praep. Ev. i. 9. 20; iv. 6. 2; v. 2. 9), though he appears to have died in the very earliest years of the century. Porphyry was an Eastern, a native of Batanea, and had studied at Caesarea itself. If Socrates may be believed (H. E. iii. 23), he was at one time a Christian, but having received blows from some Christians, he apostatized in vexation at this treatment. This however is a typical story, which is reproduced in various forms of others, so that no weight attaches to it. On the other hand we have it on Porphyry's own authority (quoted in Euseb. H. E. vi. 19) that when young he had known Origen, and, as we may infer, had been his pupil. His disparagement and misrepresentation of this father, whom Eusebius regarded as the great master, would supply a personal stimulus to an admirer of Origen to refute the work in which the depreciation and misstatements occurred (see Euseb. H. E. i. c.).

It is strange that no part of this elaborate refutation has survived. Yet we may form some notion of its contents from the Praeparatio and Demonstratio Evangelica, in considerable portions of which Eusebius obviously has Porphyry in view, even where he does not mention him by name. To Jerome and Socrates the refutation of Eusebius seemed satisfactory. Philostorgius (H. E. viii. 14) preferred the similar work of Apollinaris to it, as also to the earlier refutation of Methodius. He himself however was induced to add another to these writings against Porphyry (H. E. x. 10). All the four refutations alike have perished, with the work which gave rise to them.

(9) Praeparatio Evangelica (Προπαρασκευὴ Εὐαγγελικὴ) [Op. iii. 9]. So Eusebius himself calls this treatise (e.g. Praep. Ev. xiv. prooem., xv. 1. 1; xv. 62. 16; comp. also Hieron. Vir. III. 81) by a convenient abridgment, and this appears to be the title which it bears universally in the MSS; but more strictly it ought to have been called Praeparatio Demonstrationis Evangelicae (comp. Dem. Ev. ii.), for it is an introductory treatise leading up to the work which follows.

(10) Demonstratio Evangelica (Εὐαγγελικὴ Ἀπόδειξις) [Op. iv. 9]. These two treatises in fact are parts of one great work. They are both dedicated to Theodotus, bishop of Laodicea in Syria (Praep. Ev. i. 1. 1 θεῖον ἐπισκόπων χρῆμα), an adherent of the Arian party, who held this see for some thirty years.

Various opinions have been held as to the time when these works were written. These have sometimes been based on erroneous data. Thus in Dem. Ev. vi. 13. 17, Eusebius has been supposed to refer to his History, but ἡ ἡμετέρα ἱστορία there means 'my personal investigations.' Thus again conversely in two passages in the H. E. i. 3, 6, he has been understood as referring to the Demonstratio; but the first reference is certainly to the Eclogae Propheticae, and the second would be satisfied as well by Ecl. Proph. iii. 45 (p. 149 sq.) as by Dem. Ev. viii. 2 sq. There is indeed a direct reference to the Quaestiones ad

Stephanum in Dem. Ev. vii. 3. 18; but the difficulties which beset the date of that work and the existence of a cross reference in it to the Demonstratio (see below, p. 338) deprive this notice of any value. All these notices failing us, we have recourse to the allusions to contemporary events. In Dem. Ev. iii. 5. 78 he says that "the confession of the name of Jesus is wont to inflame the wrath of the rulers," so that they inflict the severest punishments on the Christians though innocent (comp. iv. 16. 22). This passage seems to have been written before the cessation of the persecution (A.D. 312). On the other hand, in v. 3. 11 he speaks of "churches flourishing (ἀνθούσας) throughout the world" in language which implies that the Christians then enjoyed peace; and in vi. 20. 17 he describes the enemies of the Gospel in Egypt as plotting to extinguish it, but "being scattered (διασκορπυμένους) by God," language which implies that the tyranny of Hierocles was over, and that the edict of Milan had ended the reign of terror. See Tillemont, vii. p. 23 sq. Again, Praep. xii. 10. 5 alludes to the persecution in language which seems to shew that it had not long ceased (εἰσέτι δεῦρο). On the other hand, Praep. x. 9. 11 contains a direct reference to the Chronicle, but this may perhaps be regarded as a reference inserted afterwards, unless indeed Eusebius published two editions of the Chronicle (see above, p. 322). In the absence of more direct testimony therefore, we may infer that these works were begun during the persecution, but not concluded till some time after.

The Preparation is extant entire and comprises fifteen books. It is mentioned by Jerome (l. c.) and by Photius (l. c.), who both give the number of the books. The Demonstration on the other hand is incomplete. It consisted originally of twenty books (Hieron. l. c., Photius Bibl. 10). Of these, only the first ten are extant in the MSS, but an extract from the fifteenth was discovered and published by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. i. 2, p. 173) from a commentary on Daniel; and Jerome, Comm. in Hos. praef. (Op. vi. p. xxiii), refers to the eighteenth. In the older editions the beginning of the first book and the end of the tenth are mutilated. The missing portions of these two books were first supplied by J. A. Fabricius (Delect. Argum. etc. Hamburgi, 1725) from a MS in the possession of Mavrocordato, prince of Wallachia. Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. vi. 37) gives ten as the number of books, so that it was already mutilated in his time. There is, so far as I am aware, no evidence that these works were translated into Syriac. They are not mentioned in Ebed-jesu's catalogue. Probably the version of the Theophania, where the apologetic of Eusebius is given in a shorter form, satisfied the demands of the Syrian Church.

The Preparation begins with a preface, which serves as an introduction to the whole work. It sketches briefly what the Gospel is, and then adverts to the common taunt that the Christians accept their religion by faith without investigation. The whole work is an answer to this taunt. Taken in connexion with the opening chapters of the Demonstration, this introduction conveys an adequate idea of the design of Eusebius. The object of the Preparation is to justify the Christians in transferring their allegiance from the religion and philosophy of the Greeks to the sacred books of the Hebrews. The object of the Demonstration is to shew from those sacred books themselves that they did right in not stopping short at the religious practices and beliefs of the Jews, but adopting a different mode of life. Thus the Preparation is an apology for Christianity as against the Gentiles, while the Demonstration defends it as against the Jews, and "yet not" he adds, "against the Jews, nay, far from it, but rather for the Jews, if they would learn wisdom" (οὐ . . . κατὰ Ἰουδαίων, ἀπαγέ, πολλοῦ γε καὶ δεῖ, πρὸς αὐτῶν μὲν οὐκ, εἰ εὐγνωμονοῖεν, Dem. Ev. i. 1. 11). Thus the two treatises form one comprehensive work. It is a justification of the anomalous position of the Christians, so unintelligible to the ancient world, with which religion was essentially a matter of nationality and patriotism, and appearing to them as "a novel route through a trackless waste, deserting the paths of Jew and Greek alike" (Praep. Ev. i. 2. 4 καὶ τινὰ καὶ ἐρήμην ἀνοδίαν . . . μήτε τὰ Ἑλλήνων μήτε τὰ Ἰουδαίων φυλάττουσαν). Accordingly the writer on his part "invokes the aid of the God of all alike, whether Jews or Greeks," in the Saviour's name to assist him in his task (Dem. Ev. i. 1. 19). He claims originality for his comprehensive plan, as contrasted with the partial labours of previous apologists and exegetes (Praep. Ev. i. 3. 4). It is a challenge thrown down to the whole non-Christian world.

Of the contents of the Preparation a summary is given at the beginning of the last book (xv. 1. 1-7). In the first, second, and third books he attacks the mythology of the heathen, exposing its absurdity, and refutes the physiological interpretations put upon the myths; in the fourth, fifth, and sixth, he discusses the oracles, and as connected therewith the sacrifices to demons and the doctrine of fate; in the seventh, eighth, and ninth, he passes on to "the Hebrew Oracles," explains their bearing, and adduces the testimony of heathen writers in their favour; in the tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth, he remarks on the plagiarisms of the Greek philosophers from the Hebrews, dwelling on the priority of the Hebrew Scriptures, and shews how all that is best in Greek teaching and speculation agrees with them; in the fourteenth he directs attention to the contradictions among Greek philosophers, pointing out how those systems which are opposed to Christian belief have been condemned by the wisest Gentile philosophers themselves; and lastly, in the fifteenth, he exposes the falsehoods and errors of the Greek systems of philosophy, more especially the Peripatetics, the Stoics, and the materialists of all shades and schools. He thus considers that he has given a complete answer to those who charge the Christians with transferring their allegiance from Hellenism to Hebraism blindly and without knowledge.

In the Demonstration, the first and second books are introductory (iii. 1. 1 τῶν προλεγόμενων). In the first a sketch is given of the Gospel teaching, and reasons are alleged why the Christians, while adopting the Hebrew Oracles, should depart from the Jewish mode of life; a distinction being drawn between Hebraism, the religion of all godly men from the beginning, and Judaism, the temporary and special system of the Jews, so that Christianity is a continuation of the former, but a departure from the latter. In the second, testimonies are adduced from the prophets to shew that the two great phenomena of the Christian Church had been foretold long ago—the general ingathering of the Gentiles and the general falling away of the Jews—so that the Christians “were only laying claim to their own” (iii. 1. 1 διὰ καὶ ὡς οἰκέων ἐλπίσιν ἁλλοτρίων αὐτῶν μεταποιούμεθα). With the third book begins the main subject of the treatise (ἀντὶ τῆς ὑποθέσεως). In this third book he promises to speak of the humanity (περὶ τῆς μετὰ τὴν ἐκθάρσιν οἰκονομίας) of Christ, as corresponding to the prediction of the prophets; but the topics are introduced in a desultory way (e.g. that Christ was not a sorcerer, that the Apostles were not deceivers, etc.) without any very obvious connexion with the main theme, though otherwise this is one of the most important books in the treatise. In the fourth and fifth books he passes on to the divinity of Christ, both as the Son and as the Logos (see v. proem. l. 7), this likewise having been announced by the prophets. From the sixth book onward to the end he treats of the incarnation and life (ἐκδήσις) of our Lord, as a fulfilment of the prophecies. In this division he speaks of the manner of Christ's appearing, of the place of His birth, of His parentage and genealogy, of the time of His advent, of His works, as in like manner foretold (from the sixth to the ninth book). In the tenth book, the last which is extant, he reaches as far as the passion, treating of the traitor Judas and the incidents at the time of the crucifixion. What topics were comprised in the remaining ten books we have no data for determining, but we may conjecture with Stein (p. 102) that they dealt with the burial, resurrection, and ascension, and perhaps also with the foundation of the Christian Church and the Second Advent. The extant fragment of the fifteenth book relates to the four kingdoms of Daniel ii. The reference in Jerome (l. c.) to the sixteenth book speaks of the author as there “discussing some matters respecting the prophet Isaiah.”

This great apologetic work exhibits the same merits and defects which we find elsewhere in Eusebius. There is the same greatness of conception marred by the same inadequacy of execution, the same profusion of learning combined with the same inability to control his materials, which we have seen in his History. The divisions are not kept distinct; the topics start up unexpectedly and out of season. But with all its faults, this is probably the most important apologetic work of the early church. It necessarily lacks the historical interest of the apologetic writings of the 2nd century; it falls far short of the thoughtfulness and penetration which give a permanent value to Origen's treatise against Celsus as a defence of the faith; it lags behind the Latin apologues in rhetorical vigour and expression. But the forcible and true conceptions which it exhibits from time to time, more especially bearing on the theme which may be briefly designated “God in history,” arrest our attention now, and must have impressed his contemporaries still more strongly; while in its learning and comprehensiveness it is without a rival. The Preparation exhibits the same wide range of acquaintance with the classical writers of Greece which the History exhibits in the domain of Christian literature. The list of writers quoted or referred to is astonishing for its length (see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 346). Some of these are only known to us even by name through Eusebius, and of several others he has preserved large portions which are not otherwise extant. The range of his quotations from extant writers may be inferred from the fact that he quotes not less than twenty-one works of Plato, and that there are between fifty and sixty quotations from the Laws alone. It was chiefly the impression produced by this mass of learning which led Scaliger to describe it as “divini commentarii,” and Cave to call it “opus profecto nobilissimum” (H. L. i. p. 178).

The first editions of the Greek of the Praeparatio and Demonstratio were those of Stephens, A.D. 1544 and A.D. 1545 respectively. The Praeparatio was afterwards edited by Vigerus (Viguer), Paris, 1628, who revised the text, translated the work afresh into Latin, and added notes. The most important edition is that of Gaisford (4 vols., Oxon. 1843), who revised the text and gave a full critical apparatus, reprinting the translation and notes of Viguer. In 1846, Seguer published a French translation with notes. These notes are reprinted in Migne (iii. p. 1457 sq.). The Demonstratio also was edited by Gaisford (2 vols., Oxon. 1852), with critical apparatus and translation. The Latin translation was made by Bernardino Donato, 1498. The most recent text of both the Praeparatio and Demonstratio is that of W. Dindorf in Teubner's series, 1867. The Praeparatio and Demonstratio are the main subject of a monograph of Haenell de Eusebio Caesariensi Religionis Christianae Defensore (Gottingae, 1843).

(11) Praeparatio Ecclesiastica (Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ Προπαρασκευή), mentioned by Photius (Bibl. 11), and—

(12) Demonstratio Ecclesiastica (Ἐκκλησιαστικὴ Ἀπόδειξις), also mentioned by Photius (Bibl. 12).

The first of these works does not appear to be mentioned elsewhere. The second is named in the Jus Graeco-Romanum (lib. iv. p. 295, ed. Leunclav.), but the reference conveys no information as to its contents. Photius merely gives, or rather gave, the number of books in each (the numbers have been obliterated), and adds in the case of the Praeparatio Ecclesiastica, that it contained extracts. Thus we are left to conjecture. The names however, combined with the one fact which Photius does mention, suggest that these two works aimed at doing for the society what the Praeparatio and Demonstratio Evangelica do for the doctrines of which the society is the depositary. If so, there seems to be an allusion to the Demonstratio Ecclesiastica in the Praeparatio Evangelica (i. 3. 11), where Eusebius speaks of having gathered together in a special work (ἐν οἰκείᾳ ὑποθέσει) the sayings of Christ relative to the foundation of His Church and compared them with the events. In this case we may suppose that those portions of the Theophania (book iv) which relate to this subject were adapted from the Demonstratio Ecclesiastica just as other portions (book v) are adapted from the Demonstratio Evangelica (see below, p. 333).

(13) Two Books of Objection and Defence (Ἐλέγχου καὶ Ἀπολογίας λόγοι δύο), mentioned likewise by Photius (Bibl. 13). He adds that he also read "two others which, while they varied from the two former in some passages, were the same in all other respects both in the language and in the sentiments." In other words, they were two different editions of the same work, just as we have two editions of the Martyrs of Palestine. This book again is only known from Photius. He tells us that Eusebius in this work "introduces certain difficulties as alleged by the Greeks against our blameless religion (θρησκείας), and solves them well, though not so in all respects" (καλῶς, εἰ καὶ μὴ ἐν πᾶσιν, ἐπιλύεται). Cave (Hist. Lit. i. p. 182) strangely supposes that the purport of this work was a defence of himself against the charge of Arianism. This view is quite irreconcilable with the language of Photius, which implies that it was an apology for the Christians against attacks of the heathen. The form is illustrated by a similar apologetic work, the recently discovered Apocritica of Macarius Magnes, where the Gentile philosopher alleges his objections and the Christian apologist answers them. Photius does indeed mention the Arianism of Eusebius just below, but this mention has no special reference to the book in question. Having spoken of several works in succession by the same author, he adds at the close some general remarks on the style and opinions of the writer himself. There seems to be an allusion to this work in Eccl. Theol. ii. 22 (p. 269, Gaisford).

(14) Divine Manifestation (Θεοφάνεια), in five books [Op. vi. 607 sq.]. This work is mentioned in the lists of Jerome (Vir. Ill. 81) and Ebedjesu (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. p. 18). It is quoted sometimes in the Catenae as Εὐαγγελικὴ Θεοφάνεια (vi. pp. 609, 618, 645, 655), but elsewhere as Θεοφάνεια simply. The simpler title accords with Jerome and with the heading of the Syriac version. This work was long supposed to be lost, except by Labbe, who believed that the five books of the Theophania mentioned by Jerome were the five extant books against Marcellus, imagining θεοφάνεια to be a synonyme for θεολογία. Meanwhile it was noticed that certain Catenae in the Vienna and other libraries contained extracts purporting to be taken from the Theophania of Eusebius (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. v. p. 408, ed. Harles). At length fragments of the Greek original were published by Mai from Vatican MSS in his Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. i (1831), viii (1833). A few years later (A.D. 1842) the work was printed entire in a Syriac version by Dr. S. Lee, who in the following year also published an English translation with introduction and notes (Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, on the Theophania, etc., Cambridge, 1843). By the aid of this version, Mai (A.D. 1847) in his Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 310 (comp. p. 110) published anew his Greek fragments collected and rearranged, including among them some extracts which he had before erroneously assigned to the commentary on St. Luke. This collection of Greek fragments is reprinted in Migne.

The Syriac MS which has preserved this work is the same which also contains the Martyrs of Palestine, and has been mentioned already (p. 320). As it is dated A.D. 411, and as the Syriac text already contains very many corruptions which point to several stages of transcription (see Lee, p. xiv sq., note, and passim), the version itself was probably contemporaneous, or nearly so, with the original work. The Greek text however had already undergone some few corruptions, as the rendering 'of stone' (= λίθος) in Theoph. v. 2 (corresponding to ἡλίθιος in the parallel passage of the Dem. Ev. iii. 7. 20) shews. The difficulty of rendering the involved and florid sentences of Eusebius into Syriac must have been enormous, and the translator has necessarily used much freedom in unravelling the constructions and reproducing the imagery; but on the whole he has expressed the meaning fairly well. He was not however a complete master of Greek idiom, as e.g. when he renders κατὰ κεφαλῆς, said of St. Peter's crucifixion, "after his Head," i.e. Christ, instead of "head downwards" (v. 31).

The subject of the Theophania is, as its name suggests, the manifestation of God in the Incarnation of the Divine Word. The contents of the five books are as follows. (1) An account of the subject and the recipients of the revelation. As against atheists on the one hand and polytheists on the other, the doctrine of the Word of God is insisted upon. His person and working are set forth. The polytheist and the pantheist are alike at fault. The Word is essentially one. His relation to the different grades of creation, and more especially to man. The pre-eminence, characteristics, destiny, and fall of man. (2) The necessity of the revelation. The human race was degraded by gross idolatry with its accompanying immoralities. The philosophers could not rescue it. Plato had the clearest sense of the truth, and yet even he was greatly at fault. Meanwhile the demons of polytheism had maddened mankind, as we see from the human sacrifices and from the prevalence of wars. The demons too had shewn their powerlessness; they could not defend their temples, and they did not foresee their overthrow. (3) The proof of the revelation. The evidence of its excellency and power as seen in its effects. For this end it was necessary that the Word should be incarnate, should be put to death, and should rise again. The change which has come over mankind in consequence. (4) The proof of the revelation continued. The evidence from the fulfilment of Christ's words—His prophecies respecting the extension of His kingdom, the trials of His Church, the destinies of His servants, and the fate of the Jews. (5) The common objection of the heathen that Christ was a sorcerer and a deceiver, and that He achieved all these results by magic, is discussed and answered.

Eusebius had no hesitation about repeating himself; and the Theophania is a notable example of this freedom from scruple. Large portions of the treatise appear not only in substance but even verbatim in his other works. The coincidences with the Oration on the Tricennalia of Constantine are perhaps the most striking. Very considerable portions of the first and second books, and some three-fourths of the third book, will be found in this panegyric. (Comp. Theoph. i. 2-34 with L. C. 11. § 8-12 § 15; Theoph. ii. 1 sq. with L. C. 13. § 1 sq.; Theoph. ii. 78-80 with L. C. 9. § 2-7; Theoph. ii. 2-39 with L. C. 16. § 1-17. § 15, 13. § 16-14. § 12; Theoph. iii. 45-60 with L. C. 15. § 1-4; besides other coincidences.) The plagiarisms from the Demonstratio are hardly less. The whole of the fifth book, with the exception of the opening chapter and an occasional paragraph here and there, will be found in Dem. Ev. iii. 3. 1-ii. 7. 38, though the order is sometimes changed, and the coincidences are not always verbatim. Nor are these the only parallels between the two works. The Praeparatio also contributes its quota (comp. e.g. Theoph. ii. 53-64 with Praep. Ev. iv. 15. 8-iv. 16. 15), though here the debt is not so large. It has been conjectured above (p. 331) that great parts of the fourth book were taken in like manner from a lost work, the Demonstratio Ecclesiastica.

The date of the Theophania is a matter of some interest. The place of writing is Caesarea (ii. 6), and it was plainly written after the triumph of Constantine and the restoration of peace to the Church. The persecution is over, and the persecutors have met with their punishment (iii. 20, v. 52). Polytheism is fast waning, and Christianity is spreading everywhere (ii. 76, v. 79). Lee however would place it soon after the restoration of peace, mainly on the ground that "whatever portions of this work are found either in the Praeparatio, the Demonstratio Ecclesiastica, or the Oratio de Laudibus Constantini, they there occur in no regular sequence of argument as they do in this work, especially in the latter, into which they have been carried evidently for the purpose of lengthening out a speech" (p. xxi sq.). On the relation of our treatise to these other works of Eusebius with which it has matter in common, the settlement of the date must mainly depend; but Lee appears to have misconceived these relations altogether. (1) As regards the Praeparatio and Demonstratio, the phenomena are occasionally such as can hardly be explained otherwise than as their priority to the Theophania. Thus in Praep. Ev. iv. 16. 9, 10, we have two quotations from different parts of Porphyry (de Abst. ii. 56, followed by ib. ii. 27) in succession. The words of the joining run thus: "But even at the present time who does not know that a man is sacrificed to the great city at the feast of Jupiter Latiaris?" and again he (Porphyry) says: "From whence even to the present time not only in Arcadia at the Lycaea, but in Carthage they all publicly offer human sacrifices to Cronos." In the Theophania ii. 64, though Porphyry's language is repeated word for word, no indication is given that Eusebius is quoting from any one, and the two quotations are run into each other thus: "... of Jupiter Latiaris. For even to the present time not only in Arcadia at the Lycaea, ...". The effect of this is so confusing that Lee has entirely misapprehended the meaning. By "the great city" is meant Rome, as the mention of Jupiter Latiaris shews, so that the two passages of Porphyry refer to two different human sacrifices in localities far apart. But Lee supposes that "the great city" is the polis in Arcadia, and he boldly translates τοῖς Ἀρκάδοις (i.e. τοῖς Ἀρκάδοις), "to the Arcadians," thus making one sacrifice of the two.
